JUDICIAL AND STATUTORY DEFINITIONS

OF

WORDS AND PHRASES.

VOLUME 4.

FREEZE.

"Freezing," as used in a bill of lading of a cargo of potatoes, exempting the carrier from liability from freezing, should be construed to mean freezing while the potatoes are being forwarded with reasonable dispatch, and hence does not include a freezing resulting from a delay in transportation. Read v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co., 60 Mo. 199, 201.

FREEZER.

A "freezer," as used in the cold storage trade, is a place for the preservation of meat or poultry, where the temperature is kept below freezing—from zero up to 32 deg. Allen v. Somers, 47 Atl. 653, 654, 73 Conn. 355, 52 L. R. A. 106, 84 Am. St. Rep. 158.

FREIGHT.

See "Dead Freight"; "Local Freight"; "Through Freight."

See "On Account of Freight"; "On Freight."

In mercantile law, freight is understood to be the hire or compensation which the owner of the ship is entitled to receive for the carriage of the goods of another. Clark v. Ocean Ins. Co., 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 289, 293; Wolcott v. Eagle Ins. Co., 21 Mass. (4 Pick.) 429, 435; Hagar v. Donaldson, 25 Atl. 824, 825, 153 Pa. 242.

"Freight signifies the earnings or profit gained by the shipowner or hirer by the carriage of goods." Micheal v. Prussian Nat. Ins. Co., 63 N. E. 810, 813, 171 N. Y. 25.

"The word 'freight,' when not used in a sense to imply the burden or load of the ship, or the cargo which it has on board, is the hire agreed upon between the owner or master for the carriage of goods from one port or place to another." Brittan v. Barnaby, 62 U. S. (21 How.) 527, 533, 16 L. Ed. 177; Lord v. Neptune Ins. Co., 78 Mass. (10 Gray) 109, 112.

"Freight" is defined as the price or compensation due to a carrier for the actual transportation of goods. Ascherson v. Bethlehem Iron Co., 2 Pa. Dist. R. 597, 598 (citing 3 Kent, Comm. 219); Watson v. Duykinck (N. Y.) 3 Johns. 335, 337; Ogden v. New York Mut. Ins. Co., 35 N. Y. 418, 421; Lake Superior & M. Ry. Co. v. United States, 93 U. S. 442, 454, 23 L. Ed. 965; Griggs v. Austin, 20 Mass. (3 Pick.) 20, 23, 15 Am. Dec. 175. And such is its meaning by the established law of the maritime countries on the continent of Europe. Reina v. Cross, 6 Cal. 29, 31; Palmer v. Gracie (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1033, 1039; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Sly, 65 Pa. (15 P. F. Smith) 205, 211.

Property carried is called "freight." The reward, if any, to be paid for the carriage of freight, is called "freightage." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2110; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 662; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2800; Rev. Codes N. D. § 4186; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1539.

Freight is a compensation for the carriage of goods. Watson v. Duykinck (N. Y.) 3 Johns. 335, 339.

"Freightage," in the sense of a policy of marine insurance, signifies all the benefit derived by the owner either from the charter of the ship, or its employment for the carriage of his own goods or those of others. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2661; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4540.

The word, "in its original and elementary signification, means the hire which is earned by the transportation of goods." Poland v. Spartan (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 912, 914.

The original and exclusive legal meaning of the term "freight" is compensation to the owners of a vessel for its use in the transportation of merchandise, as "rent" is the like for the use of land, paid to its owners. The reasons given why the meaning of the word should not be enlarged are that an insurance of freight amounts to a representation, if not to a warranty, that the insured was owner, and such a representation is material, because the owner has a stronger interest in the equipment and management than a stranger having no such stake in the voyage. Huth v. New York Mut. Ins. Co., 20 N. Y. Super. Ct. (8 Bosw.) 538, 552.

In discussing the admissibility of evidence to explain an ambiguity, the court said: "For instance, the word 'freight' has several meanings in common parlance. It may refer to goods carried by a common carrier, or it may refer to the charge for the carrying of such goods, so that parol evidence would be admissible to explain its meaning." Peisch v. Dickson (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 123, 124.

Advance of freight money.

The term "freight," in a policy of marine insurance, would seem to include an advance of freight money; but, to enable the party to recover the amount of the underwriter, he must prove the fact of the advance. Robbins v. New York Ins. Co., 1 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Hall) 363.

As cargo or goods carried.

"Freight is that with which anything is brought or laden for transportation, and, by a figure of speech, the price paid for the transportation." Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Sly, 65 Pa. 205, 211.

The term "freight," in a policy of insurance, does not include cargo or goods laden on board. Minturn v. Warren Ins. Co., 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 88, 91.

In an action on a policy covering the cargo of a vessel, issued to the owner, it appeared that the insured was to take a cargo of lumber on board, and transport it to Porto Rico, for which he was to have, in lieu of freight, three-fifths of the lumber. The court said: "We agree that freight cannot be insured under the name of 'property,' but we think the contract by which the insured undertook to carry the cargo gave them an interest in that cargo different from freight, and well coming within the term 'property.'" Wiggin v. Mercantile Ins. Co., 24 Mass. (7 Pick.) 271, 273.

The term "cargo and freight," in a policy of marine insurance on cargo and freight, does not include live animals and the freight of them, but they must be made the subject of particular insurance, nor does it include goods laden on deck, nor food for the subsistence of live animals; but it includes coin, and the freight of it, put on board by the owner of the ship to be invested by the master in merchandise. Wolcott v. Eagle Ins. Co., 21 Mass. (4 Pick.) 429, 432.

As compensation for use of ship.

In the strict sense, freight is the price of the carriage and delivery of goods by a ship according to the agreement of the parties. Citing Kirchner v. Venus, 12 Moore, P. C. 390. In a wider sense, in the insurance law, it includes compensation for any use of the ship. Christie v. Davis Coal & Coke Co. (U. S.) 95 Fed. 837, 838 (citing Carv. Carr. by Sea, § 542; 1 Arn. Ins. 31).

The term "freight" is a technical expression. "It does not always imply that it is the naulum, merces, or fare for the transportation of goods. It is applied to all rewards, hire, or compensation paid for the use of ships, either for an entire voyage, one divided into sections, or engaged by the month or any period. In Saxon, from which much of the English law is derived, it is called 'fracht,' whether it be a compensation for transportation in ships by sea, or a carriage by land, either of goods or persons, in gross or detail. There can be no distinction, in reason and law, whether this 'freight' or 'hire' be actually paid by one for the use or chartering of a vessel of another, or whether he sends his own vessel for or with a cargo to a designated port, which cargo is to be obtained by funds or credit there, or goods, money, or bills, sent in and with the ship." Giles v. Cynthia (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 369, 370.

Compensation to charterer.

Where a plaintiff chartered a ship for a voyage, for which he was to pay a fixed sum to the owner on the termination of the outward voyage, and a similar sum at the termination of the return voyage, and entered into a contract with the owners of goods to be transported on the outward voyage for a freight to be paid by them, and assume the risk of the dangers of the sea, as between the plaintiff and the owner of such goods the plaintiff was the owner of the ship, and they were the freighters. As between these parties, freight, eo nomine, was payable by them to plaintiff, and was properly described as such in an insurance policy issued to plaintiff on such freight. Clark v. Ocean Ins. Co., 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 289, 293.

Due at end of voyage.

Freight is a compensation received for the transportation of goods and merchandise from port to port, and is never claimable by the owner of the vessel until the voyage has been performed and terminated. Under a policy of insurance of freights on a vessel from Baltimore to Auxcayes, and thence back to Baltimore, where the vessel was lost on the return voyage, after discharging the cargo taken on the outward voyage, and the freight therefor had been fully paid, and the cargo received for the return voyage, the contract was one of indemnity for the freight of each voyage, terminating in its operation upon the freight of the first voyage upon the safe arrival of the vessel at Auxcayes, and attaching upon the freight of the return cargo so soon as the assured had acquired an insurable interest therein. Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Biscoe (Md.) 7 Gill & J. 293, 300, 28 Am. Dec. 319.

"Freight is the price to be paid for the actual transportation of goods by sea from one place to another. The delivery of the goods at the place of destination according to the charter party is a condition precedent to entitle the owner to freight. Hence, if any accident befalls the ship, so that the goods are never delivered, no freight is admissible. This has been from the remotest time the maritime law of the world." Hagar v. Donaldson, 25 Atl. 824, 825, 154 Pa. 242.

Freight, in general, is not due unless the voyage be performed. Where a ship and cargo never arrived at their port of destination, neither the whole freight nor a pro rata freight was due. Caze v. Baltimore Ins. Co., 11 U. S. (7 Cranch) 358, 362, 3 L. Ed. 370.

"Freight does not accrue until the vessel is loaded and bill of lading is signed by the master, and it is payable when the vessel finishes her voyage and discharges her cargo." Ascherson v. Bethlehem Iron Co., 2 Pa. Dist. R. 597, 598.

Freight is the compensation for the carriage of goods, and, if it be paid in advance, and the goods be not carried by reason of any event not imputable to the shipper, it is to be repaid, unless there be a special agreement to the contrary. Griggs v. Austin, 20 Mass. (3 Pick.) 20, 23, 15 Am. Dec. 175.

Freight is a compensation for the carriage of goods, and, if paid in advance, and the goods be not carried by reason of any event not imputable to the shipper, it then forms the ordinary case of money paid on a consideration which happens to fail. Watson v. Duykinck (N. Y.) 3 Johns. 335, 337.

Fare of passengers included.

The words "cargo" and "freight," prima facie, and in their ordinary and natural meaning, refer to goods only; and, where the words "cabin passengers" and "passage money" appear in the same charter party with the words "cargo" and "freight," the latter do not include passengers and passage money of any description. Lewis v. Marshall, 7 Man. & G. 729, 745.

"Freight," in its most extensive sense, is applied to all compensation for the use of ships, including transportation of passengers, and for all purposes except lien. Lord Ellenborough says they seem to be the same thing. Mulloy v. Backer, 5 East, 321. Passage money and freight are governed by the same rules. And therefore passage money paid in advance may be recovered back on the breaking up of the voyage by a peril of the sea, and the failure of the owner of the ship to send the passenger to his destination. Brown v. Harris, 68 Mass. (2 Gray) 359, 360.

In Rev. St. § 4283 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2943], limiting the liability of shipowners to the value of the ship and their freight then pending, freight includes fare for passengers. The term "freight" is a technical expression, and does not always imply that it is the fare for the transportation of goods. Giles v. Cynthia (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 369, 370 (cited and approved in Main v. Williams, 14 Sup. Ct. 486, 487, 152 U. S. 122, 38 L. Ed. 381).

As founded on contract.

"Freight is a compensation for the carriage of goods, and is in all cases bottomed upon contract, either express or implied. The former happens when the charter party or bill of lading stipulates for the payment of freight generally, or fixes the sum to be paid, or the rate by which it is to be computed. If there be no express stipulation on the subject, then the law raises an implied contract to pay such freight as is reasonable and usual for similar services." Palmer v. Gracie (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1033, 1039.

As freight for whole voyage.

"Freight," as used in a bottomry bond pledging the freight for the voyage, means the freight of the whole voyage, and not the freight for that part of the voyage unperformed at the time of giving the bond. The Zephyr, 30 Fed. Cas. 928.

As profit on cargo.

"Freight," as used in a policy of insurance for a certain amount on prepaid freight on board a certain vessel, signifies the earnings or profits derived by the shipowner for the hire of a ship, from the use of it himself, or by letting it to others, or by carrying goods for others, and does not comprehend the profit which the owner of a cargo, having no interest in the vessel or earnings, as such, expects to derive from the transportation of his goods to their port of destination. Minturn v. Warren Ins. Co., 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 86, 91.

As property.

See "Property."

Towage and salvage.

The compensation earned by towage and salvage services is not freight. The Battler (U. S.) 58 Fed. 704.

Value of carriage of vessel owner's goods.

Freight is the price of the carriage of the cargo, and is the shipowner's compensation for the employment of the ship—his return for the labor and capital which he employs in the purposes of commerce. If he carries a cargo belonging to another person, he receives his compensation in the price paid by that person for the carriage. If he carries his own cargo, he may be fairly considered as charging the price of the carriage to the goods, and crediting the ship in account, expecting the goods to reimburse their outlay upon their sale at the port of destination. "The term 'freight,'" said Lord Tenderden, "as used in policies of insurance, means the benefit derived by the shipowner from the employment of the ship. It is the same thing," he observed, "to the shipowner, whether he receives the benefit of his ship by a money payment from one person, who chartered the whole ship, or from various persons, who put specific quantities of goods on board, or from persons who pay him the value of his own goods at the port of delivery, increased by their carriage in his own ship. The assured may fairly consider that additional value as the freight, and so term it in the policy." Flint v. Fleming, 1 Barn. & Adol. 45. Mr. Arnold, in his very valuable treatise, after citing this opinion of Lord Tenderden, adds: "Accordingly it is now established law in this country that the assured, under a general insurance on freight, may recover the profits he expects to make by carrying his own goods in his own ship on the voyage insured." Arn. Ins. p. 221. And Mr. Phillips uses the following language: "Where the owner of a ship is also the owner of the cargo, a policy of freight will cover the interest received on the transportation of the cargo. In such case the profits of the voyage, says the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, may be insured under the denomination of freight." Paradise v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., 6 La. Ann. 596, 602, 603 (quoting 1 Phil. 197).

FREIGHT BILL.

"An insurance declared to be upon the freight bill of a steamboat is an insurance that the boat shall earn freight, and the insurer is responsible if the boat fail to earn freight by an accident to the boat, as by any damage to the cargo." Field v. Citizens' Ins. Co., 11 Mo. 50.

FREIGHT CAR.

As house, see "House."

A freight car is defined by the Century Dictionary to be a railroad car for carrying freight, commonly called a "box car." State v. Green, 15 Mont. 424, 426, 39 Pac. 322.

Under Rev. St. § 4410, punishing any person who shall break and enter in the daytime any railroad freight car, an express car is included. Nicholls v. State, 32 N. W. 543, 545, 68 Wis. 416, 60 Am. Rep. 870.

The term "freight car," as used in defining the offense of placing or running any freight car in the rear of passenger cars, does not include a baggage, express, or mail car. Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 392.

FREIGHT DEPOT.

Where a covenant in a deed of a right of way to a railroad required the railroad to establish and maintain a depot for freight and passengers, evidence is admissible to explain what was intended by the term "freight and passenger depot," as there are freight and passenger depots all the way from mere flag stations, where there are no buildings at all, to the most modern depot, with all its equipments and conveniences. Murray v. Northwestern Ry. Co., 42 S. E. 617, 622, 64 S. C. 520.

FREIGHT MONEY.

Where the owner of property in possession of a carrier contracts for a cash sale thereof to defendant, and the latter procures possession of the goods without paying therefor by the mere payment of freight and storage charges, the words "freight money," as used in a finding in a replevin suit that the payment of freight money by the defendant was not a payment made in good faith, in accordance with the terms of the sale, includes the money paid for both freight and storage. Adams v. O'Connor, 100 Mass. 515, 517, 1 Am. Rep. 137.

FREIGHT ON BOARD.

See "On Board."

FREIGHT PENDING.

"Freight pending" means the amount which the charterers of a ship have agreed to pay to the shipowners for the prolonged use of the vessel after the time limited. Though not technically freight, it partakes so much of the same character that it must be held subject to the same rule. "It represents the earning of the vessel during the voyage or charter in the performance of which losses were caused by the misconduct of the owners' agent, the master, for which, but for the limitation of law, the owners would have been fully liable. 'Freight' signifies the earnings or profit derived by the shipowner or the hirer from the use of it himself, or by letting it to others, or by carrying goods for others. All hire or reward for the use of the vessels is freight." The Giles Loring (U. S.) 48 Fed. 463, 473.

The words "freight pending," in the statutes relating to the limitation of the liability of shipowners, "represent the earnings of the voyage, whether from the carriage of passengers or merchandise. Main v. Williams, 14 Sup. Ct. 486, 152 U. S. 122, 38 L. Ed. 381. But they do not include salvage, for that is paid as a reward to the vessel, its officers and crew, in their efforts to save life and property, and is personal to the salvors, irrespective of any relation they bear to others." In re Meyer (U. S.) 74 Fed. 881, 897.

"Freight then pending," as used in Rev. St. § 4283 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2943], limiting the liability of the owners of a vessel and her freight then pending in certain cases, includes freight prepaid for the carriage of merchandise and the passage money, and is not to be taken in a narrow sense, as meaning only freight to be earned by a successful conclusion of the voyage. The Jane Gray (U. S.) 99 Fed. 582, 591 (citing Main v. Williams, 152 U. S. 122, 133, 14 Sup. Ct. 486, 38 L. Ed. 381).

"Freight," as used in Rev. St. § 4283 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2943], limiting the liability of shipowners for damages in a collision to the value of the vessel and freight then pending, is used in a broad sense, and is even broader than that of the English statute, which was, "freight due, or to grow due." It may properly be held to mean the earnings of the vessel in transporting the goods on board, and also to be the increased value of goods conferred on them by their carriage, so that the fact that part of the goods carried were the goods of the owner of the vessel did not the less exempt the owner from liability for freight thereon, in determining what share of a loss should be apportioned to the freight in general average. Allen v. Mackay (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 487.

FREIGHT RECEIPTS.

The gross receipts received from passengers and freight, within the meaning of Act June 1, 1889, which provides that a railroad company owning, operating, or leasing any railroad shall pay a tax upon the gross receipts received from passengers and freight, do not include tolls received by one railroad company from another for the joint use of the track of the former, computed not upon the amount of the gross receipts, but at a certain specified sum per ton or per passenger. Commonwealth v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 22 Atl. 806, 145 Pa. 200.

FREIGHT SOLICITOR.

A freight solicitor in charge of a railway business office is "an officer or agent of such corporation," within Rev. St. 1889, § 2017, providing for service on the corporation by delivering a copy of the summons or complaint to such officer or agent. Davis v. Jacksonville South Eastern Line, 126 Mo. 69, 28 S. W. 965, 967.

FREIGHT TRAIN.

A locomotive and cab, when not run for carrying freight, nor intended to be presently used for such carriage, is not a freight train, and an indictment charging the running of a freight train on Sunday is not supported by evidence of the operation of an engine and cab. McNealy v. State, 21 S. E. 581, 94 Ga. 592.

The term "freight train," in a city ordinance prohibiting the running of freight trains faster than six miles per hour, or passenger trains faster than ten miles, within the corporate limits, includes what is called a "wrecking train," consisting of an engine, way car, three freight cars, and a dirt car. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Johnson, 53 Ill. App. 478.

FRENCH.

The word "French," in the trade-name of an article, is broadly geographic, and indicates its origin, so that it cannot be appropriated as a trade-mark. Draper v. Skerrett (U. S.) 116 Fed. 206, 208.

FRENCH CHALK.

French chalk is steatite or soapstone. Jenkins v. Johnson (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 525, 527.

FRENCH POOL.

"French pool," also called "Paris Mutual," is described to be a small machine, containing the name of each horse to be run in the particular race, written or printed on the side, and printed numbers placed on the inside of a machine, which can be seen through holes in it. It is used by the owner or person operating it, and by those engaged in betting on horse racing, in this way: The owner or operator sells the tickets for $5 each. They bear numbers corresponding with the number given the horse on the machine, and, by turning a crank or screw attached to the machine, the bettor is shown at once the number of tickets sold on each horse, as each of said tickets is sold, so as to enable him to bet more intelligently and safely, and lessen the chance of disaster to himself. Commonwealth v. Simonds, 79 Ky. 618, 619.

"French pool" is a contrivance used to make wagers on horse races. Elias v. Gill, 13 Ky. Law Rep. 798, 800, 92 Ky. 569, 18 S. W. 454.

FREQUENT.

Sp. Laws 1885, § 4, p. 39, declares that it shall be unlawful for any person to frequent an opium den for the purpose of smoking opium, etc. Held, that the word "frequent" undoubtedly requires more than one visit, to constitute the offense—how many, the court cannot, as a matter of law, determine. State v. Ah Sam, 13 Pac. 303, 304, 14 Or. 347.

"Frequenting," as used in Rev. St. 1881, § 2088, making the act of frequenting a gambling house criminal, means something akin to, or in the nature of, a habit of going to such place. Evidence of a single or even an occasional visit is not sufficient. Green v. State, 9 N. E. 781, 109 Ind. 175.

"Frequenting," as used in 47 Geo. III, c. 14, § 12, providing that any person having any debt or balance of account or otherwise, not exceeding the value of £5, owing to him by any person "using or frequenting the markets" of Birmingham, may sue for it in the court of requests, means for the purpose of substantially obtaining thereby the party's livelihood. Jenks v. Taylor, 1 Mees. & W. 578, 580

Visit distinguished.

The word "frequents," as employed in Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 2089 (Horner's Rev. St. 1897, § 2002), providing that whoever, being a male person, frequents or visits a gambling house or houses, shall be fined, etc., is not synonymous with "visits." "Frequent" means to visit often; to resort to often or habitually. etc. (Webst. Dict.); while "visits" is satisfied by a single visit. Roberts v. State, 58 N. E. 203, 204, 25 Ind. App. 366.

FRESH.

In a declaration alleging that defendant sold the plaintiff 16 pounds of onion seed for a certain price, and that the defendant warranted the seed to be "fresh, genuine, and the product of the preceding year," proof was that the seed was "good, fresh, and such seed as would grow." Held, that the terms "fresh, genuine, and the product of the preceding year," and the terms "good, fresh, and such seed as would grow," are all terms of similar import, having reference to the reproductive quality of the seed—that is, its quality to germinate and grow—and that such was the meaning of the term "fresh seed," and hence there was no variance between the declaration and the proof. Ferris v. Comstock, 33 Conn. 513, 515.

FRESH FISH.

The term "fresh fish," in Tariff Act Index, cl. 609, authorizing the admission of fresh fish free of duty, means "fish which have not been salted or subject to any of the known processes for curing them, such as pickling, smoking, or drying; but these words do not exclude fish which have been frozen, either naturally or artificially, as all persons living in the cold latitudes know, as a matter of common knowledge, that meats and fish are kept fresh by freezing. Cross v. Seeberger (U. S.) 30 Fed. 427, 428.

FRESH IN HIS RECOLLECTION.

See "While Fresh in His Recollection."

FRESH PURSUIT.

The term "fresh pursuit," in criminal law, was frequently used in the common law, and has the same meaning as the term "immediate pursuit." "The interval which may elapse between one event and another may in a particular instance be sufficient to destroy their relation as immediate in time, while, as to two other events, the same interval shall not have such effect." People v. Pool, 27 Cal. 572, 578.

"Fresh pursuit," as used in Code, § 3026, providing that, in the case of a fresh pursuit of a felon after a felony had been committed, he may be arrested without a warrant, would include the pursuit of a felon; a felony having been committed at night, and not being discovered till morning, the officer then immediately following and overtaking the felon. White v. State, 11 South. 632, 70 Miss. 253.

FRESH-WATER RIVERS.

By "fresh-water rivers" is understood rivers where the tide does not ebb and flow, and which are therefore said to be not navigable. Shrunk v. Schuylkill Nav. Co. (Pa.) 14 Serg. & R. 71, 78.

FRESHET.

A freshet is defined by Webster as being a flood or overflowing of a river by means of rains or melted snow—an inundation—and is essentially different from a storm or tempest. Stover v. Insurance Co. (Pa.) 3 Phila. 38, 42.

Where a controversy as to the height at which a dam might be maintained was submitted to arbitrators, who determined that the dam might be maintained to a specified height, "with the right to keep thereon flashboards twelve inches wide at all times, except in times of freshet," but did not specify what was meant by a "freshet," the award was indefinite, uncertain, and void. The word "freshet" varies in its meaning in various rivers, in various years, and in various seasons of the year. Harris v. Social Mfg. Co., 9 R. I. 99, 100, 101, 11 Am. Rep. 224.

FRIABLE.

"Friable" is defined by Webster as easily crumbled, pulverized, or reduced to powder. Atlantic Dynamite Co. v. Climax Powder Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 72 Fed. 925, 934.

FRIEND.

Under Rev. St. c. 9, § 11, providing for the appointment of a guardian to take charge of the person and property of an insane person by the judge of probate, and (section 16) that the parent, guardian, or friend of any insane person may cause him to be sent to the asylum, etc., the wife may properly be regarded as the friend of the husband. Davis v. Merrill, 47 N. H. 208, 210.

FRIENDLY FIRE.

The term "friendly fire," in reference to insurance law, is a fire built in a stove, which did not spread from the stove, but which caused damage by smoke and soot escaping from a defective stovepipe, and an insurance company is not liable for such damage under a policy insuring against all direct loss or damage by fire. Cannon v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 35 S. E. 775, 776, 110 Ga. 563, 78 Am. St. Rep. 124.

FRIGHT.

"Fright" is included in the term "mental agony." San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Corley (Tex.) 26 S. W. 903, 904.

FRIVOLOUS PLEADING.

A frivolous pleading is one interposed for delay, and indicating by its character bad faith in pleading. Lerdall v. Charter Oak Life Ins. Co., 8 N. W. 280, 282, 51 Wis. 428.

"Frivolous," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 537, providing that if a demurrer, answer, or reply is frivolous, the party prejudiced thereby may apply for judgment thereupon, and judgment may be given accordingly, is equivalent to "irrelevant." Colt v. Davis, 3 N. Y. Supp. 354, 355, 50 Hun. 366.

A frivolous pleading is one so clearly untenable, or the insufficiency of which is so manifest upon a bare inspection of the pleadings, that the court or judge is able to determine its character without argument or research. Farmers' & Millers' Bank v. Sawyer, 7 Wis. 379, 383; Cahoon v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co., 10 Wis. 290, 293; Cottrill v. Cramer, 40 Wis. 555, 558; Morton v. Jackson, 2 Minn. 219, 222 (Gil. 180, 182); Peacock, Hunt & West Co. v. Williams (U. S.) 110 Fed. 915, 916; Rosenberg v. Hyman, 84 N. Y. Supp. 171, 172.

The fact that a pleading is bad, and so adjudged on hearing, does not show that it is frivolous. After a frivolous answer, demurrer, or reply is stricken off, the party is then in default, his time for pleading having gone by; the frivolous plea being merely regarded as no plea at all. Farmers' & Millers' Bank v. Sawyer, 7 Wis. 379, 383.

An answer can be said to be frivolous only when it is so clearly bad as to require no argument to show its character, and which would be said to be so manifestly defective as to be indicative of bad faith upon a mere inspection. Gruenstein v. Biersack, 37 N. Y. Supp. 538, 539, 1 App. Div. 580; Trumbull v. Ashley, 49 N. Y. Supp. 786, 788, 26 App. Div. 356; Bedlow v. Stillwell, 61 N. Y. Supp. 371, 45 App. Div. 557; Stronge v. Sproul, 53 N. Y. 497, 499; Nichols v. Jones (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 355, 358; Hill v. Warner, 57 N. Y. Supp. 355, 356, 39 App. Div. 355. If an argument is required to show that the pleading is bad, it is not frivolous. Maccarone v. Hayes, 82 N. Y. Supp. 1005, 1008, 85 App. Div. 41 (citing Youngs v. Kent, 46 N. Y. 672).

A frivolous answer is one which is manifestly impertinent, as alleging matters which, whether true or not, do not affect the plaintiff's right to recover. Erwin v. Lowery, 64 N. C. 321, 322.

To justify a decision that a pleading is frivolous, it must not only be without adequate reason, but so clearly and plainly without foundation that the defect appears upon mere inspection. If any argument is required to show that the pleading is bad, it is not frivolous. Cook v. Warren, 88 N. Y. 37. That only may be regarded as frivolous which is made to appear so incontrovertibly by a bare statement of it, and without argument. Youngs v. Kent, 46 N. Y. 672, 674. Under such rule, a pleading cannot be regarded as frivolous where counsel making the objection found it necessary to submit a brief of 7,000 words. Lloyd v. Ballantine, 45 N. Y. Supp. 809, 810, 20 Misc. Rep. 141. See also, Chatham Nat. Bank v. Pratt, 32 N. E. 236, 237, 135 N. Y. 423.

A frivolous plea is described to be such as is unimportant—a nonsensical trifling with the dignity of the court and the majesty of the law, on which no serious question of law or fact can arise. Such a plea is perhaps better described to be where, taking every fact stated in it to be true, still it is plain, without reference to reason or authority, that no defense to the action is made, and, if issue be taken on it, that would be immaterial. Gray v. Gidliere (S. C.) 4 Strob. 438, 442.

An answer which fixes the complaint, and alleges immaterial and irrelevant matters, that in no way ratify or affect the rights sought, is a frivolous answer. Weill v. Uzzell, 92 N. C. 515, 517.

As pleading setting up no defense.

A frivolous answer is one that has no substantial relation to the controversy. Howell v. Ferguson, 87 N. C. 113, 114.

A frivolous pleading is one which on inspection is inherently bad; that is, it contains no defense. Hill v. Warner, 57 N. Y. Supp. 355, 356, 39 App. Div. 424; Bedlow v. Stillwell, 61 N. Y. Supp. 371, 45 App. Div. 557.

"A frivolous answer is one which denies no material averment in the complaint, and which, if admitted to be true, does not constitute any defense to the plaintiff's cause of action." Goldstein v. Krause, 13 Pac. 232, 233, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 294; Morton v. Jackson, 2 Minn. 219, 222 (Gil. 180, 184); Howell v. Ferguson, 87 N. C. 113, 114; Brown v. Jenison, 5 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Sandf.) 732, 1 Code R. (N. S.) 156, 159; Hull v. Smith, 8 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Duer) 649, 650; Lefferts v. Snediker (N. Y.) 1 Abb. Prac. 41, 42; Struver v. Ocean Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 2 Hilt. 475, 476; Nichols v. Jones (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 355, 356; Soper v. St. Regis Paper Co., 78 N. Y. Supp. 782, 784, 76 App. Div. 409; Nolan v. Breed, 1 N. Y. Law Rec. 112; Hecker v. Mitchell (N. Y.) 5 Abb. Prac. 453, 455; Perkins v. Squier (N. Y.) 1 Thomp. & C. 620, 621; Hemme v. Hays, 55 Cal. 337, 339.

A pleading is frivolous only where there is clearly no defense set up in it. If a defense can be spelled out from the pleading, or any part of it, it is not frivolous. Moody v. Belden, 15 N. Y. Supp. 119, 60 Hun, 582.

Where it cannot be said of an answer that it controverts no material allegation in the complaint, or that it is manifestly insufficient, or that it fails to deny the allegations of the complaint, it cannot be said to be frivolous. To make an answer frivolous, the objection must extend to and embrace the whole answer, so that nothing is left of it. Peacock, Hunt & West Co. v. Williams (U. S.) 110 Fed. 915, 916.

A frivolous answer has been defined to be one which, if true, does not contain any defense to any part of the plaintiff's cause of action. An answer that merely controverts allegations of the complaint is frivolous, unless it contains a denial of some material allegation of the complaint. An answer that only controverts the allegations of the complaint is frivolous, if it does not put in issue some allegation which the plaintiff must establish to entitle him to a verdict. Gilbert v. Rounds (N. Y.) 14 How. Prac. 46, 50.

Unless it appears by inspection of the pleading that it raises no issue upon any fact which plaintiff must prove, it is not frivolous, however objectionable it may be in other respects. Gruenstein v. Biersack, 37 N. Y. Supp. 538, 539, 1 App. Div. 580.

A denial of allegations of a complaint on information and belief will not be stricken out as frivolous, though it appears improbable that the defendant should not have been aware of the exact facts. Trumbull v. Ashley, 49 N. Y. Supp. 786, 788, 26 App. Div. 356.

An answer which is so framed that it does not set up a valid defense, but which states facts that might, by being properly averred, constitute a defense, cannot be regarded as sham, irrelevant, or frivolous. Struver v. Ocean Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 9 Abb. Prac. 23, 27.

Where an answer sets up facts which, if proven, would present a serious question as to whether they did not constitute a good defense to the action, it cannot be held frivolous. Moyer v. Strahl, 10 Wis. 83, 85.

An answer which puts in issue its material allegations as to the defendant cannot be called frivolous, though the defense stated therein is an unreasonable one. West End Savings & Loan Ass'n v. Degan, 89 N. Y. Supp. 414, 415, 4 App. Div. 618.

While it may be quite apparent the pleading is interposed to gain time the court cannot say, on a bare examination of it, that a denial of a material allegation in the complaint is made for that purpose. The issues raised in a permissible manner cannot be disposed of in that summary way. Bedlow v. Stillwell, 61 N. Y. Supp. 371, 45 App. Div. 557. See, also, Andreae v. Bandler, 56 N. Y. Supp. 614.

Sham distinguished.

There is a well-defined distinction between a sham and a frivolous answer. The former is good upon its face, but false in fact, while the latter denies no material averment in the complaint, and sets up no defense. Andreae v. Bandler, 56 N. Y. Supp. 614; Hull v. Smith (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 149, 150; Lefferts v. Snediker (N. Y.) 1 Abb. Prac. 41, 42.

A sham answer and defense is one that is false in fact, and not pleaded in good faith. It may be perfectly good in form, and to all appearances a perfect defense. A frivolous answer is one that shows no defense, conceding all that it alleges to be true. Each may be stricken out on motion, but it is under different provisions of the Code. Brown v. Jenison (N. Y.) 1 Code R. (N. S.) 156, 157.

Vagueness.

Vagueness in pleading, it is well settled, is not frivolousness. It is to be corrected by amendment, and not visited by judgment. It is enough on the application for judgment on the ground that the answer is frivolous that a good defense is set forth. Where the defense set up, if true, is good, judgment should not be granted on a summary application. Kelly v. Barnett (N. Y.) 16 How. Prac. 135, 137.

FRM.

Frm., as used in the various tax-title proceedings in describing the premises, is well understood to mean the word "from," and nobody could be misled thereby. Blakey v. Bestor, 13 Ill. (3 Peck) 708, 714.

FROG.

A frog, in railroad parlance, is a section of a rail, or of several rails combined at a point where two railways cross, or at the point of a switch from a line to a siding or to another line, and its function is to enable a car or train to be turned from one track to another. In a block frog, the point of space between the rails at the point where the car is switched from one track to another is filled with wood or other material, so that the foot will not be held. Southern Pac. Co. v. Seley, 152 U. S. 145, 150, 14 Sup. Ct. 530, 531, 38 L. Ed. 391.

The space between the main and guard rails in a railway track is usually designated as a "frog." Craver v. Christian, 36 Minn. 413, 415, 31 N. W. 457, 1 Am. St. Rep. 675.

FROM.

See "At and From."

The words "to or from," in the reservation in a deed to lay railroad tracks to or from limekilns reserved by the grantor, means to or from the locality where they are situated, in such a manner and to such an extent as to enable the grantor to enjoy their use and possession for the purpose named in the reservation. James v. Fonda, 3 Atl. 195, 58 Vt. 453.

When used in a devise of a remainder, limited upon a particular state and terminable on an event which may necessarily happen, "from" will be construed to relate merely to the time of the enjoyment of the estate, and not to the time of its vesting. Canfield v. Fallon, 57 N. Y. Supp. 149, 154, 26 Misc. Rep. 345 (citing Moore v. Lyons [N. Y.] 25 Wend. 119, 144; Sheridan v. House, *43 N. Y. [4 Keyes] 569; Livingston v. Greene, 52 N. Y. 118, 123; Ackerman v. Gorton, 67 N. Y. 63, 66; Nelson v. Russell, 135 N. Y. 137, 31 N. E. 1008); Poor v. Considine, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 458, 474, 18 L. Ed. 869, 874.

The words "in," "to," or "from" the ocean shore mean a point three miles from shore. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3907.

As according to.

In a contract that such first party agrees to furnish scales made from patterns now in use by such party, and to make no change from such patterns on the scales furnished to such said second party, the word "from" will not be used in its ordinary sense to mean that the scales must be made from the same wooden patterns originally used, but in the sense of "according to," so that the scales made from other patterns which were made to replace the original patterns sufficiently comply with the contract. Kimball Bros. v. Deere, Wells & Co., 77 N. W. 1041, 1043, 108 Iowa, 676.

As away from.

The clause "from the place of his abode," as used in St. 25 Geo. II, c. 29, § 1, providing that the coroner shall be allowed a certain sum per mile for every mile he is compelled to travel from the place of his abode to take an inquisition, excludes the miles traveled in returning from the place where the inquisition was taken. King v. Justices of Oxfordshire, 2 Barn. & Ald. 203, 204.

Continuity imported.

Rev. St. § 4347, making it unlawful to "transport goods from one domestic port to another," means to carry goods in one continuous voyage, either directly from the one port to the other or by the customary voyage pursued in commerce between two ports. It does not mean to carry them in two distinct and separate voyages, or in two distinct vessels. United States v. 250 Kegs of Nails, 61 Fed. 410, 411, 9 C. C. A. 558.

The word "from," in a condition on a railroad ticket that it is good for one continuous passage on and from the date stamped on the back, makes the ticket cover the whole time to be consumed in the continuous trip, commencing on the day of the date of the ticket. Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Powell, 35 S. W. 841, 842, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 212.

In a railroad ticket containing a statement that it was good for one continuous passage on and from a date stamped on the back, the word "from" indicates that the time in which the passage must be made, other than the day on which it is begun, is that which immediately and without intermission follows the day on which the ticket is issued. Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Demiley (Tex.) 41 S. W. 147, 148.

As directly from.

A town ordinance, prohibiting a person from a place infected with smallpox from entering such town, was held to only embrace persons leaving the infected place after the passage of the ordinance and coming immediately into the town. The language may have several meanings, but only one applicable to the connection in which it is used. "A citizen of S. will say of a citizen of G., whom he sees in S., that he is from G., signifying his residence there. On the other hand, when one at S. speaks of a person coming from G., without any words referring to the time, he means coming immediately or directly from it, and the same language in the law can only mean the same thing, with the addition that the coming must be from the place after the law forbidding it was passed. Salisbury Com'rs v. Pawe, 51 N. C. 134, 136.

As exclusive or inclusive according to intent.

The word "from," in the habendum clause in a lease, providing that the lessee is to have and to hold the premises demised from a certain day, will be construed as exclusive or inclusive of the day named in the habendum clause, as will best express the intention of the parties, to be gathered from the whole instrument. The old rule, doubtless, was to exclude the day of the date in all cases where the holding was from a given date; but since the decision of Pugh v. Duke of Leeds, Cowp. 714, the word has been construed to express the intention of the parties. McGlynn v. Moore, 25 Cal. 384-390.

The word "from," like the words "after," "succeeding," "subsequent," and other similar words in a devise of property to a beneficiary on condition that he shall pay to another a certain sum within one year after the testator's decease, or after, succeeding, or subsequent to his decease, where it is not expressly declared to be exclusive or inclusive, is susceptible of different significations and is used in different senses, and with an exclusive or inclusive meaning, according to the subject to which it is applied; and, as it would deprive it of some of its proper significations to affix one invariable meaning to it in all cases, it would, of course, in many of them, pervert it from the sense of the writer or speaker. Its true meaning, therefore, in any particular case, must be collected from its context and subject-matter, which are the only means by which the intention is ascertained. Sands v. Lyons, 18 Conn. 18, 27.

As exclusive as to place.

"From" is a term of exclusion, unless by necessary implication it is used in a different sense. "From an object" excludes the terminus referred to. State v. Bushey, 24 Atl. 940, 84 Me. 459.

The words "to," "from," and "by," when used to express boundaries, are ordinarily terms of exclusion, and are always to be understood in that way, unless there is something in the connection that makes it manifest that they were used in a different sense. Wells v. Jackson Iron Mfg. Co., 48 N. H. 491, 538.

"From," as contained in a description in a deed prescribing that the boundary shall run from a given monument, means that it begins at the exterior part, and not the center, of such monument or location, and this applies to a location which contemplates a square formed from a common center. Clark v. Reeves (N. Y.) 3 Caines, 293, 298.

A franchise granted to a fuel company to supply heat to the public within a certain city by means of natural gas conveyed from such adjoining counties as may be convenient is to be construed as authorizing the company to use such natural gas, and only such natural gas, as is brought from adjoining counties, and not gas found within the limits of the city. Emmerson v. Commonwealth, 15 Pittsb. Leg. J. 273, 275.

A railroad charter, authorizing it to build a line of roads "from one town to another," does not require the railroad to come within the corporate limits of either town, but is satisfied by a road extending from the boundary of one town to that of the other. People v. Louisville & N. B. Co. (Ill.) 5 N. E. 379.

12 St. at Large, p. 129, § 5, providing that a railroad should be constructed from Charleston to a certain point, restricts the Charleston terminus to the corporate boundary of the city. The word "from" is exclusive, and does not authorize the company to commence its road at any point within the city. North Eastern R. Co. v. Payne (S. C.) 8 Rich. Law, 177, 178.

The word "from," in a policy of marine insurance from a certain port, operates to prevent the policy from attaching until the vessel weighs anchor and breaks ground for the voyage, with all the preparations completely made. Mosher v. Providence Wash- ington Ins. Co., 33 N. Y. Supp. 85, 86, 12 Misc. Rep. 104; Bradley v. Nashville Ins. Co., 3 La. Ann. 708, 709, 48 Am. Dec. 465.

The word "from," used alone, is held to exclude the risks while lying in port before sailing. An examination of the cases from which this rule is deduced shows that the use of the word "from" in this exclusive sense is confined to the commencement of the voyage insured, and that those cases which depend upon the meaning of the words "at," "at and from," and "to," relate to the beginning and end of risks, and are not applicable, in that exclusive sense, to ports at which the vessel may stop during a voyage described in the policy. The word "thence" is frequently used in reference to the intermediate ports of a voyage, and never recognized by courts as a term of exclusion; and insurance to the port, thence to another, thence to a third, is the same as from the first to the last, with liberty to stop at the intermediate ports. So a policy on a vessel "at and from New Orleans to Habana, from thence to Burita, and back to New Orleans," covers the vessel while lying at the port of Habana. Bradley v. Nashville Ins. Co., 3 La. Ann. 708, 709, 48 Am. Dec. 465.

The use of the word "from," in a marine policy on a voyage from Amsterdam, entered into after the underwriters had refused to insure "at and from" Amsterdam, was construed to cover damages to the vessel while lying in the Texel waiting for cargo, although it was the custom for vessels of the size of the insured vessel to take part of their cargo to Amsterdam and part to the Texel. Mey v. South Carolina Ins. Co. (S. C.) 3 Brev. 329.

As exclusive as to time.

The word "from," in speaking of the time from a certain day, generally excludes the day to which it relates. People v. Hornbeck, 61 N. Y. Supp. 978, 30 Misc. Rep. 212; Bigelow v. Willson, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 485, 495; Kendall v. Kingsley, 120 Mass. 94, 95; Rand v. Rand, 4 N. H. 267, 276.

Lord Mansfield, in Pugh v. Duke of Leeds, Cowp. 714, 717, after an extensive review of the authorities, says "Courts of justice ought to construe the words of parties so as to effectuate their deeds and not destroy them," and that "'from the date' may in vulgar use, and even in strict propriety of language, mean either inclusive or exclusive." He says that the cases "for 200 years had only served to embarrass a point which a plain man of common sense and understanding would have no difficulty in construing." Thus the term "from," in a statute allowing the lands of the deceased debtor to be sold under execution, but prohibiting it from being done after the expiration of 18 months from the date of the letters of administration upon his estate, was construed to include the terminus a quo, and therefore a sale on the 1st day of May, 1821, was held valid, though the letters of administration were dated on the 1st of November, 1819. Griffith v. Bogert, 59 U. S. (18 How.) 158, 163, 15 L. Ed. 307; Price v. Whitman, 8 Cal. 412, 415; Wilcox v. Wood (N. Y.) 9 Wend. 346, 348.

"It is now well settled as a general rule that when an act is to be done within a given number of days from the date or day of the date or act done, the day of the date is excluded; otherwise, an act to be done in one day must be done on the same day, and, as there is no fraction of a day, such stipulation must create an obligation to do it instantaneously." Per Shaw, C. J., in Inhabitants of Seekonk v. Inhabitants of Rehoboth, 62 Mass. (8 Cush.) 371, 373.

2 Rev. St. §§ 24-28, providing, in proceedings upon a distress for rent, that five days from the time of making the distress and serving the notice thereof must elapse before an appraisal of the goods can be made or notice of sale given, should be construed to mean five full days from the time of making the distress and serving the notice thereof; and hence, where a warrant was dated March 9th, the five days did not expire until after the 14th of March, and not on the 14th day of March, and therefore the earliest day for the appraisal and for giving notice of sale was the 15th of March. Butts v. Edwards (N. Y.) 2 Denio, 164, 167.

Where a statute provides that a brook on which a mill has been erected shall be kept open and free for the passage of fish from the 5th day of May to the 5th day of July in each year, the word "from" will be construed to be exclusive; and hence the owner of the mill will be entitled to the full use of water until the 6th day of May. Peables v. Hannaford, 18 Me. 106, 108.

The word "from," when used in a lease for a term of years "from the 1st day of" a month, will operate, when there is nothing to show a contrary intention of the parties, to exclude such 1st day in computing the time of the duration of the lease. Ordway v. Remington, 12 R. I. 319, 34 Am. Rep. 646; Goode v. Webb, 52 Ala. 452, 453; Atkins v. Sleeper, 89 Mass. (7 Allen) 487, 488.

Under a lease for the term of six years from the 1st of April, 1807, ending on the 1st of April, 1813, the rent to be payable on the 1st day of April during the six years, no rent was due or payable until the 1st day of April, 1808. The term being for six years from the 1st day of April, 1807, such day was excluded, and not a part of the term. Thornton v. Payne (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 74, 76.

An officer's commission to hold office during the term of four years from the 2d of March, 1845, means that the day of date—that is, the 2d of March, 1845—should be excluded; and hence such officer is in office on the 2d of March, 1849. Best v. Polk, 85 U. S. (18 Wall.) 112, 119, 21 L. Ed. 805.

The use of the word “from,” in a policy of insurance requiring the payment of an assessment within 30 days from the notice thereof, is to be construed as showing that the time is to be computed by excluding the day on which the notice is received and including the thirtieth day thereafter. Protection Life Ins. Co. v. Palmer, 81 Ill. 88, 95.

The word “from,” in Act March 26, 1827, giving five years from the day of entry of a judgment for its revival by scire facias, is to be construed as exclusive of the day on which the judgment is entered. Where the word is used by the Legislature, there seems to be equal reason for rejecting minute verbal criticisms and resorting to something more reasonable and solid; and we think that, where an act of assembly requires a thing to be done within a certain time from a prior date, and perhaps also from a prior act, and the party by not doing it loses his right, as in limitation laws, by which the right is to be taken away, there, in relief of the party and to preserve him from loss, the most liberal construction ought to be chosen, and the furthest time given from which the reckoning is to be made. Appeal of Green (Pa.) 6 Watts & S. 327, 328.

Under St. 1844, c. 123, providing that, when no person shall appear to discharge the taxes duly assessed on lands owned by nonresidents within nine months from the date of the assessment, the collector shall certify the same to the treasurer of the town, the owner of the land has the full period of nine months, excluding the day of the assessment, in which to discharge the tax, and a certificate made within such period of nine months is void. When a statute requires an act to be performed in a certain time from the date of some transaction, the day of such date is excluded in the computation of the time. Flint v. Sawyer, 30 Me. (17 Shep.) 226, 228, 229.

The use of the word “from,” in a contract providing that merchants shall have 20 days to load a vessel, counting from the day of readiness until the day of dispatch, operates to exclude the day of readiness. Merritt v. Ona, 44 Fed. 369, 370, 11 L. R. A. 724.

A marine policy was issued on a vessel upon a voyage from Santa Martha to New York, with liberty to use two additional ports, and thereafter an additional clause was added to the policy, by which it was agreed for an additional premium that the vessel should have the privilege of using three additional ports on the voyage from the Spanish Main to New York. In an action on the policy it was held that the word “from,” in the additional clause, did not necessarily exclude ports upon the Main, but that the policy, as modified by the additional clause, gave the vessel the right of stopping at ports upon the Main. De Peyster v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., 19 N. Y. 272, 277, 75 Am. Dec. 331.

Under a contract giving an option to purchase land, if the vendee shall so elect after investigation, he to “have three months to satisfy himself, and after that time this agreement is to be null and void,” the contract is to be understood and construed as if it had been said that the vendee is to have three months from the date of the instrument, and, where the instrument was dated April 8th, a tender made on July 8th was within time. Blake v. Crowninshield, 9 N. H. 304, 307.

As inclusive as to place.

The words “from,” “to,” and “at” are taken inclusively, according to the subject-matter. Thus authority to construct a railroad or turnpike from A. to B., or beginning at A. and running to B., is held to confer authority to commence the road at some point within A. and to end it at some point within B. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 343, 346, 23 L. Ed. 428.

The act relating to the construction and alteration of the highway between the villages of H. and M., the first section of which appointed commissioners to improve the public road leading from the village of H. to the bank of a creek within the village of H., and thence, along or near the bank of said creek, to the village of M., must be reasonably construed with reference to the subject-matter; and it appearing that, unless it was adjudged to include some part of the village of H., the object of the grant could not be accomplished, nor the entire road be made, the word “from” is to be taken inclusively, and so construed that the commissioners will be allowed to enter upon lands within the limits of the village of H. Smith v. Helmer (N. Y.) 7 Barb. 416, 420.

In the charter to a railroad company granting the privilege of constructing a road from a certain city to a certain place, “from” should be construed inclusively, and to mean that in the construction of the road they have the right to enter the corporate limits of such town or city. Tennessee & A. R. Co. v. Adams, 40 Tenn. (3 Head) 596; Appeal of Western Pennsylvania R. Co., 99 Pa. 155, 161.

A charter giving a railroad company power to construct and operate a railroad “from the city of Chicago to any point in the town of Evanston,” and prohibiting the railroad from using certain streets in the city of Chicago, cannot be construed as meaning that the terminus of the road was to be the boundary of the city of Chicago, but it should be construed to mean that the road may run from any point in the city of Chicago. The words "from" and "to" a place, in the charter of a railroad company, have been frequently construed to mean "from" and "to" a point within the place from and to which the corporation was authorized to construct its road. McCartney v. Chicago & E. R. R. Co., 112 Ill. 611, 626; Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Chicago & E. Ry. Co., 112 Ill. 589, 598.

The word "from," in the charter of a railroad company, requiring it to build a railroad from the borough of Erie at a time when the borough is within certain limits, requires the railroad to be constructed within such limits, although the borough is enlarged before the road is constructed, and therefore the mere building of the road to the enlarged portion of the borough is not a sufficient compliance with the charter. Commonwealth v. Erie & N. E. R. Co., 27 Pa. (3 Casey) 339-352, 67 Am. Dec. 471.

In an ordinance authorizing the grading, etc., of C. avenue from D. street to K. street, C. avenue having been graded to about the middle of D. street, would authorize the grading of C. avenue from the center of D. street; that is, from the part of the street which had been previously graded. The word as used, when saying "from" a street, does not necessarily mean from its nearest line, but may mean from any part of the street, according to existing circumstances. City of Pittsburg v. Cluley, 74 Pa. (24 P. F. Smith) 259, 261.

When used in a conveyance "from" is generally a term of exclusion; but, where the land conveyed is bounded on a river or stream where the tide does not ebb or flow, the boundaries by construction of law extend to the center or thread of a stream. Bradley v. Rice, 13 Me. (1 Shep.) 198, 201, 29 Am. Dec. 501.

Where an indictment for burglary charged that defendant feloniously took and carried away certain chattels "from a dwelling," instead of "in a dwelling," as the offense is described in Code, § 3170, the words "from a dwelling" do not have the same import as "in a dwelling," but might be treated as surplusage, or at least as a matter of description. Moore v. State, 40 Ala. 49, 51.

As inclusive as to time.

The words "from," "to," and "at" are taken inclusively, according to the subject-matter. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 343, 346, 23 L. Ed. 428.

Where a computation of time is to be made from any particular act or time, the word "from" means that the day on which the act is done, or the day of the date, is to be included. Swift v. Tousey, 5 Ind. 196, 198.

The word "from," in the computation of a date, is not necessarily exclusive, and in computing the time of a contract of service from a certain date, if it appears that plaintiff entered into the service under the contract on the day of its date, such day will be included. Wilkinson v. Gaston, 9 Q. B. *137, 145.

In a lease of premises from a certain day, such day is included in the term. Reg. v. St. Mary, Warwick, 18 Eng. Law & Eq. 309, 314; Hopkins v. Helmore, 8 Adol. & E. 463; Deyo v. Bleakley (N. Y.) 24 Barb. 9, 11; Meeks v. Ring, 4 N. Y. Supp. 117; Mallory v. Hiles, 61 Ky. (4 Metc.) 53; People v. Clark, 1 Cal. 406.

The word "from," in a lease of land for one year from the 1st day of April, does not show that the lessee is entitled to the term until the expiration of the 1st day of April on the succeeding year; but the term includes the 1st day of April of the year when the term commenced, and expires on the last day of March of the succeeding year. "It is undeniably true that there has not been entire uniformity in the rules laid down by courts in reference to the computation of time, but the diversity in the rule appears to have been caused by a desire so to apply it as not to work injustice. The parties to this transaction doubtless had in view the universal understanding of the country that, where one rents lands or tenements for a year from the 1st day of April, the tenant has the right to enter on the day named, and that term ceases on the last day of March ensuing." Marys v. Anderson, 24 Pa. (12 Harris) 272, 276.

A note for a certain sum, with interest "from 1835," means from the beginning of the year 1835, and not from or after its expiration. Evans v. Sanders (Ala.) 8 Port. 497, 499.

"From," as used in the by-laws of an association providing that a suspended member, to become reinstated, must pay all sums called for before the date of reinstatement within 60 days from the date of suspension, includes the day of date. Supreme Council A. L. H. v. Gootee, 89 Fed. 941, 946, 32 C. C. A. 436 (citing Best v. Polk, 85 U. S. [18 Wall.] 112, 21 L. Ed. 805).

Act Feb. 13, 1867, declaring that there is "levied a uniform levy tax in a certain district, payable annually on or before May 1st in each year from May 1, 1868," means that the first payment should be on May 1, 1868, and not on May 1, 1869. Carlisle v. Yoder, 12 South. 255, 69 Miss. 384.

A statute relative to the title to Indian land provided that it should be inalienable for five years "from the day of the date" of the patent therefor. Held, that the land could be alienated on the fifth anniversary of the date. Taylor v. Brown, 40 N. W. 525, 526, 5 Dak. 335.

In Rev. St. § 3331, providing that, where labor or services are continuous from the 1st day of November, or the day prior thereto, to a date beyond the 1st day of May following, the claim for a lien shall be filed, etc., "from" is used inclusively. McGinley v. Laycock, 68 N. W. 871, 872, 94 Wis. 205.

Separation implied.

A grant to take, use, and appropriate water from a pond does not vest title to all the water in the pond, but the language implies a separation, and requires the act of taking or appropriating, and hence such grant did not constitute a surrender of the right to grant similar franchises. Rockland Water Co. v. Camden & R. Water Co., 15 Atl. 785, 790, 80 Me. 544, 1 L. R. A. 388.

The word "from," in an agreement to deliver at a certain place a quantity of water through and from a pipe, flume, or conduit, simply expresses the general idea of separation, and would not change the meaning of the contract if omitted, as no water running in the obligor's pipe could possibly be delivered in any manner whatever without being taken from said pipe. Some of the definitions of "from" given by Webster are "out of the neighborhood of; leaving behind; out of; the antithesis and correlative of to." Sefton v. Prentice, 37 Pac. 641, 642, 103 Cal. 670.

FROM AND AFTER.

In devise of remainder

"From and after," as used in a bequest to a person from and after his attaining a given age, makes the bequest prima facie contingent. Post v. Herbert's Ex'rs, 27 N. J. Eq. (12 C. E. Green) 540, 543.

The words "from and after," or like expressions used in wills as relating to the termination of the life estate, do not postpone the vesting of the estates in remainder until the death of the life tenant, but rather refer to the period when the remaindermen would become entitled to the estates in possession. Corse v. Chapman, 47 N. E. 812, 813, 153 N. Y. 466; Hersee v. Simpson, 48 N. E. 890, 891, 154 N. Y. 496; McGillis v. McGillis, 49 N. E. 145, 147, 154 N. Y. 532; Moore v. Lyons (N. Y.) 25 Wend. 119, 144; Ackerman v. Gorton, 67 N. Y. 63, 66; Taggart v. Murray, 53 N. Y. 233; Gibson v. Walker, 20 N. Y. 476, 484; In re Crossman, 1 N. Y. Supp. 103, 104, 48 Hun. 617; Nelson v. Russell, 31 N. E. 1008, 1009, 135 N. Y. 137; Livingston v. Greene, 52 N. Y. 118, 123; Haug v. Schumacher, 64 N. Y. Supp. 310, 313, 50 App. Div. 562; Lyons v. Weeks, 61 N. Y. Supp. 441, 443, 29 Misc. Rep. 714; Bailey v. Love, 11 Atl. 280, 283, 67 Md. 592.

In Corse v. Chapman, 153 N. Y. 466, 47 N. E. 812, the words "from and after," as relating to the termination of a life estate, were considered, and it was held that an absolute estate in remainder vested at the time of testator's death, subject to open and let in any grandchild or grandchildren born after the death of the testator. Manhattan Real Estate & Building Ass'n v. Cudlipp, 80 N. Y. Supp. 993, 995, 80 App. Div. 532.

"The cases are common which hold that adverbs of time, such as 'when,' 'then,' 'after,' 'from and after,' etc., in the devise of a remainder limited upon a life estate, are to be construed merely as relating to the time of the enjoyment of the estate, and not to the time of its vesting in interest, and that the law favors such a construction of a will as will avoid the disinheritance of remaindermen who may happen to die before the determination of the precedent estates." In Connelly v. O'Brien, 60 N. E. 20, 168 N. Y. 406, the Court of Appeals carried this doctrine so far as to hold that where testator gave his property to his widow during her life, and to such of her children that may then be alive, the adverb was intended by him to refer to the time of his own death, and not to that of his widow, and that consequently a daughter who survived him, but died before the widow, took a vested share. Ackerman v. Ackerman, 71 N. Y. Supp. 780, 781, 63 App. Div. 370.

As exclusive as to time.

"From and after" have no certain or legal meaning that can be accepted as a guide under all circumstances, but it is generally accepted as a rule that they exclude the day from which the reckoning is to be made, and in order to avoid the application of it as a rule of construction there must be something in the act, or the result of a literal application of the words to the subject treated by it, to indicate a contrary intent; and they are so used in an act providing that it shall "take effect and be in force from and after its passage and publication." O'Connor v. City of Fond du Lac, 85 N. W. 327, 330, 109 Wis. 253, 53 L. R. A. 831 (citing Stewart v. McSweeney, 14 Wis. 468; McGinley v. Laycock, 94 Wis. 205, 68 N. W. 871); Parkinson v. Brandenburgh, 28 N. W. 919, 920, 35 Minn. 294, 59 Am. Rep. 326; State v. Messmore, 14 Wis. 163; Duncan v. Cobb, 32 Minn. 460, 21 N. W. 714; Arnold v. United States, 13 U. S. (9 Cranch) 104, 107, 3 L. Ed. 671; Leavenworth Coal Co. v. Barber, 27 Pac. 114, 115, 47 Kan. 29.

A statute providing that it shall take effect from and after the passing thereof does not mean that it shall take effect immediately, without waiting for the expiration of the day on which it passed, though it is a general rule that, where the computation is to be made from an act done, the day on which it is done is to be included; but to apply such a rule in computing the time when a statutory enactment shall take effect would include the whole of the day on which it was enacted, and thereby give the statute a retroactive effect, which cannot be allowed. Bemis v. Leonard, 118 Mass. 502, 505, 19 Am. Rep. 470.

Act Sept. 1, 1871, regulating interest, provides "this act shall take effect and be in force from and after" the 1st day of September, 1871. Held, that the words "from and after," used in such connection, fixed the date named as a point or period of time, after which the rule prescribed by the act is to prevail, and that the 1st day of September, 1871, was to be excluded, since, if the intention had been to include that day, the language would have been "on and after." "The rule in regard to the computation of time is that, when the computation is to be made from an act done, the day on which the act was done must be included, but when the computation is to be from the day itself, and not from the act done, then the day on which the act was done must be excluded." Handley v. Cunningham's Trustee, 75 Ky. (12 Bush) 401, 403; Wood v. Commonwealth, 74 Ky. (11 Bush) 220, 221; Chiles v. Smith's Heirs, 52 Ky. (13 B. Mon.) 461; Bellasis v. Hester, 1 Ld. Raym. 280.

The Pennsylvania act of assembly, directing that from and after the passing of the act no person should be subject to prosecution for libel by indictment, refers to indictments found after the law was enacted; the expressions of the Legislature being in the future sense and not retrospective. Commonwealth v. Duane (Pa.) 1 Bin. 600, 609.

A statute providing that from and after the year 1900 certain property should be liable to a city tax rate can only be interpreted as excluding the year 1900. A point of time cannot be within the year 1900 when its beginning is fixed as from and after the year 1900. No moment of time can be said to be after a given year until that year has elapsed and passed. In its grammatical sense the word "from," when referring to a certain point as a terminus a quo, always excludes that point. Sindall v. City of Baltimore, 49 Atl. 645, 647, 93 Md. 528.

As inclusive as to time.

"From and after," if used in reference to an act done, is inclusive of the day, but, if "from" a day, it is exclusive, so that, if it is from and after an act done, the time commences immediately upon the act being done. Chicago Title & Trust Co. v. Smyth, 62 N. W. 792, 793, 94 Iowa, 401 (citing Wadsworth v. Smith, 43 Iowa, 439).

Where a statute provides that it shall take effect from and after the passing of the act, it takes effect immediately. Arnold v.

United States, 13 U. S. (9 Cranch) 104, 120, 3 L. Ed. 671. It is a general rule that, when computation of time is to be made from an act done, the day on which the act is done is to be included. Taylor v. Brown, 13 Sup. Ct. 549, 551, 147 U. S. 640, 37 L. Ed. 313. Act April 18, 1883 (80 Ohio Laws, p. 169), amending Rev. St. § 6710, providing that it should "take effect and be in force from and after its passage," should be construed to include the date on which it was enacted. When the computation is to be made from an act, the day on which it is done is included. Arrowsmith v. Hemmering, 39 Ohio St. 573, 578. A statute providing that it should take effect from and after the passage of the act means that it shall go into operation on the day on which it is approved, and has relation to the first moment of that day, and, so far as it concerns the commencement or termination of public laws, a day is an indivisible portion of time. In re Welman, 20 Vt. 654, 658, 29 Fed. Cas. 681; In re Howes, 21 Vt. 619, 12 Fed. Cas. 715; The Ann, 1 Fed. Cas. 927; Lapeyre v. United States, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 191, 198, 21 L. Ed. 606.

An act of Parliament which is to take effect "from and after the passing of the act" operates by legal relation from the first day of the session. Latless v. Patten, 4 Term R. 660.

An act laying duties on goods imported "from and after the passage of the act" takes effect the beginning of the day on which it is passed, and not from the time of its being signed by the President. United States v. Williams, 28 Fed. Cas. 677.

FROM AND THROUGH THE MOTHER.

"From and through the mother," as used in Rev. St. Tex. art. 1657, providing that illegitimate children shall be capable of inheriting from and through the mother, confines the general right of inheritance to the mother and her lineal ascendants, so that it will not go to the mother's brothers and sisters. Blair v. Adams (U. S.) 59 Fed. 243, 246.

FROM AND TO.

Where a release of a legacy given in a will is in full of all demands "from the beginning of the world to the day of its date," it will not discharge a claim of the releasor against the estate of testator which did not exist at the time the release was given. Rapp v. Rapp, 6 Pa. (6 Barr) 45, 50.

A contract for the shipment of freight "from and to N. and C., with stations on the line of said road between those points," refers to the carriage of goods from and to N. and C., and from and between interme-date points and N. and C., and does not include the carriage of freight from one intermediate point to another such station. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Pittsburg, C. & St. L. R. Co. (U. S.) 55 Fed. 701, 702.

A contract for the sale and delivery at a certain place of "from 1,000 to 3,000 bushels of potatoes" implies that the seller has the right to deliver any quantity he chooses within the range of the terms of the contract—that is, between 1,000 and 3,000 bushels—and is not bound to make his election until they arrive at the place of delivery. Small v. Quincy, 4 Me. (4 Greenl.) 497, 500.

An agreement as to certain goods, "from 200 to 600 tons," for delivery between two certain dates, should be construed to mean that the purchaser would accept any amount of such goods between the two limits. Wheeler v. New Brunswick & C. R. Co., 5 Sup. Ct. 1061, 1065, 115 U. S. 29, 29 L. Ed. 341.

"From," as used in Gen. Laws, c. 112, § 4, making it an offense for any person to have in his possession any ruffed grouse from the 1st day of January to the 1st day of October, should be construed as equivalent to "between." State v. Stone, 38 Atl. 654, 20 R. I. 269.

A marine policy on a voyage described as "from Boston to St. Thomas and a market in the West Indies" is to be construed as covering a voyage from Boston to St. Thomas, and from thence to other ports in the West Indies, until the vessel finds a market in which it can dispose of its cargo. Deblois v. Ocean Ins. Co., 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 303, 308, 28 Am. Dec. 245.

FROM DATE.

"From the date" was said by Lord Mansfield, in Pugh v. Duke of Leeds, Cowp. 714, to be synonymous with the phrase "from the day of the date." Kimm v. Osgood's Adm'r, 19 Mo. 60, 61; Oatman v. Walker, 33 Me. 67, 70; Bigelow v. Willson, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 485, 494.

As exclusive.

"From the date," as used in a contract reciting the conveyance of real estate by deed dated November 25, 1848, and covenanting that if, at the expiration of one year from the date of such deed, the grantee should prefer to reconvey the land and house, and should offer to do the same, the grantor should accept such reconveyance, paying therefor a certain sum, has precisely the same meaning as "from the day of the date." The date of a deed is not the hour or minute when the deed was executed, but a memorandum of the day when the deed was delivered. This day in a legal sense is an indivisible point of time, there being no fraction of a day. On this principle the day on which the instrument is dated, in the computation of time, is excluded. November 26, 1849, was the day on which the grantee was bound to make the offer of a reconveyance of the estate. Oatman v. Walker, 33 Me. 67, 70.

A guaranty of all the notes of the prospective debtor, discounted by the guarantee, which are presented to the guarantee "from time to time from date" of contract, means after date hereof, and hence does not cover a note discounted on the day of the contract. Peoria Savings, Loan & Trust Co. v. Elder, 45 N. E. 1083, 1085, 165 Ill. 55.

"From date," when used in a lease to designate the commencement of a term, has precisely the same meaning as from the day of the date, and excludes such day. Bigelow v. Willson, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 485, 494.

As inclusive.

"From the date," as used in a contract which contemplates that a present interest is to commence from the date, will be construed as including the date of the day; but, where it is used merely to fix a terminus from which to compute time, the day is in all cases excluded. Pearpoint v. Graham, 19 Fed. Cas. 60, 65. And it is accordingly held that where a bond was dated on the 22d of July, 1818, payable in five years from the date, a scire facias quare executio non might issue on the 22d day of July, 1823. Lysle v. Williams, 15 Serg. & R. 135, 136.

"From the date," as used in a life insurance policy providing that the full amount of the policy should only be paid in the event insured died after one year "from the date" of the policy, and where the policy took effect on the day of its date, should be construed inclusively, rather than exclusively, and in computing the year the day of the date of the policy should be excluded. Walker v. John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co., 45 N. E. 89, 90, 167 Mass. 188.

As used in articles of copartnership to continue for four years from the date of the contract, "from" is equivalent to the statement, in a declaration in an action relating to such contract, that the commencement of the four years of its continuance was to be with the day of the date of the contract. "A datu" does not exclude the date, and it was the same with "cum datu"; but "a datu" and "a die datus" are not the same. Seignoett v. Noguire, 2 Ld. Raym. 1241, 1242.

FROM THE DAY.

The term "from the day" is equivalent to "from the day of the date," and the day on which the act is done is included in counting from that act. Cromellen v. Brink, 29 Pa. (5 Casey) 522, 524.

As exclusive.

"From the day of the date," when used in a lease to designate the commencement of a term, has precisely the same meaning as "from the date," and excludes such day. No moment of time can be said to be after a given day until that day has expired. Bigelow v. Willson, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 485, 494.

A policy of insurance, insuring the life of one for one year from the day of the date thereof, excludes the day of the date of the policy. In re Sir Robert Howard, 2 Salk. 625.

As inclusive.

In written leases the phrase "from the day of the date," or "from the date," may be inclusive or exclusive according to the context or subject-matter. Where there is no stipulation postponing the commencement of the lease, the day of the demise is made inclusive, and is to be considered in computing the time of the commencement and termination of the lease. Donaldson v. Smith (Pa.) 1 Ashm. 197.

18 Stat. 420, providing that the title to lands acquired by any Indian by virtue thereof shall not be subject to alienation or incumbrance, either by voluntary conveyance or the judgment, decree, or order of any court, and shall be and remain inalienable for a period of five years "from the day of the date" of the patent thereof, should be construed to include the day of the issuance of the patent, and hence the land may be alienated on the fifth anniversary of such date. Taylor v. Brown, 40 N. W. 525, 526, 5 Dak. 335.

FROM THE FIELD.

The term "from the field," in a statute making it criminal to steal from the field any grain or cotton not yet severed, was used "to point out a particular kind of property, to wit, the products of or outgrowth from the field of the kind designated before they were gathered by the owner, and not the stealing of that kind of property in any particular locality." Thus the word "from" is material, and an indictment charging the stealing of corn in the field is fatally defective. State v. Shuler, 19 S. C. 140, 141.

The words "from the field," in a statute describing the offense of stealing grain or cotton from the field, has a technical and special significance, bound to and indicating products or outgrowth from the field. An indictment which alleges the stealing of the corn "in the field" is an insufficient charge of the crime. State v. Nelson, 4 S. E. 792, 793, 28 S. C. 16.

FROM THE GRASS ROOTS DOWN.

In an action for the price of mines sold where the defense was fraudulent representations, in that plaintiff represented that the mines would yield in gold not less than 10 cents per yard "from the grass roots down," it was contended that the expression "from the grass roots down" meant in mining parlance from the grass roots to the bed rock, and that it was so understood by miners; but the court said that the expression "from the grass roots down" in its literal sense means to the center of the earth, and that if it has a signification peculiar to the locality or to a particular industry the court would not take notice of it, and it should be set up in the pleadings. Martin v. Eagle Creek Development Co., 69 Pac. 216, 219, 41 Or. 448.

FROM THE PERSON.

Comp. St. § 710, providing punishment for larceny from the person, means on the person, or in the immediate charge and custody of the person, from whom the theft is made. For instance, should a cane or umbrella be taken from the hand of a person, or a barrow that he was wheeling, or tool with which he was employed, or horse that he was driving, leading, or holding by the bridle, the theft would be "from the person." In each of these cases the rights of the person to inviolability would be encroached upon, and his personal security endangered, quite as much as if his watch or purse had been taken from his pocket. State v. Eno, 8 Minn. 220, 222 (Gil. 44).

"From the person," as used in section 59 of an act concerning crimes and punishments, defining robbery to be the felonious and violent taking of money, goods, etc. from the person of another by force or intimidation, means what the words naturally import, and an allegation in an indictment that the property was taken from another person is not equivalent to the term "from the person of another," as used in the statute. People v. Beck, 21 Cal. 385.

The phrase "from the person of another," as embraced in the definition of robbery, does not require that the taking must necessarily be from the actual contact of the body, but if it is from under the personal protection that will suffice; but the sudden snatching up and carrying away of a pistol with intent to steal is not robbery, where there was no intimidation of the owner, who was near the pistol, and no resistance was offered by him to the taking. Jackson v. State, 40 S. E. 1001, 114 Ga. 826, 88 Am. St. Rep. 60.

Within the meaning of a statute declaring that if any person by force or violence, or by putting in fear, steal or take from the person of another any property that is the subject of larceny, he is guilty of robbery, the preposition "from" does not convey the idea of contact or propinquity of the person and property. It does not imply that the property is in the presence of the person. The thought of the statute as expressed in the language is that the property must be so in the possession or under the control of the individual robbed that violence or putting in fear was the means used by the robber to take it. If it be away from the owner, yet under his control in another room of the house, it is nevertheless in his personal possession; and if he is deprived thereof it may well be said it is taken from his person. Goods are called "personal property" in the law, and presumed to accompany the person. If taken from the owner, this relation of owner and property is surrendered, and the goods are separated from the person; and so in the case where defendant by violence bound the prosecuting witness, and thereby put her in fear, and by this violence extorted from her information of the place where she kept her money and watch in another room of the house, and, leaving her bound, went into that room and took the property, it was taken "from her person," in the sense of the words as used in the statute. State v. Calhoun, 34 N. W. 194, 196, 72 Iowa, 432, 2 Am. St. Rep. 252.

"Theft from the person," within Pen. Code, § 763, means a taking of property from the person of another without his knowledge, or so suddenly as to preclude resistance. Wilson v. State, 3 Tex. App. 63, 64.

Pen. Code, art. 745, provides that, in order to constitute the offense of "theft from the person," it is necessary that the following circumstances concur: (1) The theft must be from the person. It is not sufficient that the property be merely in the presence of the person from whom it is taken. (2) The theft must be committed without the knowledge of the person from whom the property is taken, or so suddenly as not to allow time to make resistance before the property is carried away. (3) It is only necessary that the property stolen should have gone into the possession of the thief. It need not be carried away in order to complete the offense. Under this statute it is held that evidence that the owner of stolen money felt some one touch his pocket containing his purse, and that upon looking around quickly he saw defendant's hand, holding the purse, pass from his to defendant's own pocket, is sufficient to prove theft from the person. Green v. State, 13 S. W. 784, 785, 786, 28 Tex. App. 493.

In Dukes v. State, 22 Tex. App. 192, 2 S. W. 590, it is said that in "theft from the person" as in other thefts, the offense is complete when the property has gone into the possession of the thief. It is not essential to the completion of the offense that the property be carried away by the thief. The taking of the property includes the carrying away thereof, within the meaning of the statute. Green v. State, 13 S. W. 784, 786, 28 Tex. App. 493.

FROM PLACE TO PLACE.

"From place to place," as used in St. 1855, c. 215, § 20, prohibiting the transportation of spirituous liquors from place to place in the state, does not mean only from towns or counties, or such other territorial divisions or districts as have been or may be established by a law or by authority of the commonwealth. It is not every possible removal of spirituous liquor which comes within the statute. If the removal were only on the premises of the owner, or from one to another of his warehouses, or from one to another part of his shop, it would not be from place to place within the meaning of the statute; but the transportation from one place, whether it be a shop, warehouse, railroad depot, or building used for any purpose whatever, of which the owner has no possession and in which he has no interest, to a store of his own in which he transacts his usual business, is a thing altogether different in itself, and is a transportation from place to place. Commonwealth v. Waters, 77 Mass. (11 Gray) 81, 84.

"From place to place," as used in St. 1786, c. 67, § 4, relative to the laying out of roads, and authorizing the establishment of roads from town to town and from place to place, means from one place in a town to another place in the same town. Commonwealth v. Inhabitants of Cambridge, 7 Mass. 158, 162.

Where statutes regulating hawkers and peddlers (Laws 1846, c. 200; Laws 1848, c. 63) required a license for all peddlers traveling from place to place, the term "from place to place" did not mean from a place in one town to a place in another town, but included persons traveling about from one place to another within the same town. Andrews v. White, 32 Me. 388, 389.

FROM THENCE.

Where insurance was on a ship "at and from Liverpool to ports and places in China or Manila, all or any, during the ship's stay there for any purpose, and from thence to her port of discharge in the United Kingdom," the words "from thence" meant, not only from Manila, but from ports or places in China or Manila, all or any. Ashley v. Pratt, 16 Mees. & W. 471, 481.

"From thence hither," as used in a description of a grant as certain "lots of meadow ground lying over against ye springe, where a passage hath been used to ford over from this island to the maine and from thence hither," do not apply to any boundary. They are descriptive of the ford. Obbents v. Creeth (U. S.) 67 Fed. 303, 305.

FROM THENCEFORTH.

The expression "from thenceforth," as used in Act March 2, 1875, § 4, providing for the making of an order prohibiting the sale or giving away of spirituous liquors within three miles of an academy, institute of learning, or university, and from thenceforth it should not be lawful to loan or give away spirituous liquors within such limits, indicated the beginning, and not the duration, of the operation of the act. Wilson v. State, 35 Ark. 414, 421.

FROM THE RENDITION OF JUDGMENT.

The phrases "from the rendition of judgment," "next after judgment," "next after the rendition of judgment," "from the time of rendering judgment," "after entering up final judgment," and "after judgment entered of record," occurring in various statutes providing that certain proceedings may be had within fixed times after the event designated by such phrase, all refer to the same time, and this, according to an intendment at law and the practice of the New Hampshire courts, is the last day of the term in which the record shows the judgment to have been rendered, unless the true time of entering the judgment appears upon the record. New Hampshire Strafford Bank v. Cornell, 2 N. H. 324, 331.

FROM TIME TO TIME.

Where a deed conveyed all the right, title, and interest which the grantor had in a certain invention as secured to him by letters patent, and also all rights which might be secured to him for alterations and improvements from time to time, the phrase "from time to time" imported all patents which might be issued thereafter on alterations and improvements. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Trimble, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 387, 379, 19 L. Ed. 948.

The expression "from time to time" is not equivalent to "from term to term," as used in Acts 1892, p. 38, requiring a recognizance to bind a defendant to appear before the trial court from term to term. Forbes v. State (Tex.) 25 S. W. 1072.

"The Century Dictionary defines the phrase 'from time to time' to mean 'occasionally'; and the Universal Dictionary defines 'from time to time' to mean, 'at intervals; now and then.' The phrase is used in such meaning in Acts 1898, c. 123, § 96, which directs the police commissioners of Baltimore, at the request of the park commissioners, to detail from time to time members of the regular police force for the preservation of order in the parks. Upshur v. City of Baltimore, 51 Atl. 953, 955, 94 Md. 743.

The phrase "from time to time," as used in the Constitution, authorizing the Legislature to increase the number of judges of the Supreme Court from time to time, means occasionally; that is, as occasion requires, and therefore the words cannot be held to mean that the Legislature may not decrease the number of judges after an increase thereof. State v. McBride, 70 Pac. 25, 27, 29 Wash. 335.

FROM WHATEVER CAUSE.

See "Whatever Cause."

FRONT.

See, also, "In Front of."

In a deed describing a tract of land the language used was "front thirty rods," and the contention was as to whether the land included all of the land up to a navigable stream or not. The court held that a lot of land may be said to front on water, but not usually to front on another piece of land; but it may front on a road. But in this case there did not appear to be any road, so that it appeared to front on the water. Proctor v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 52 Atl. 933, 935, 96 Me. 458.

As adjoining or bordering.

"Fronting," as used in Act March 22, 1895, § 8 (P. L. p. 424), requiring a petition for review of an improvement assessment to be signed by the owners of at least two-thirds either in lineal feet or in area of the lands and real estate "fronting" on the road or section of road to be improved, means adjoining at some point the road or section of road involved. Erisman v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of Burlington County, 45 Atl. 998, 999, 64 N. J. Law, 516.

Lots separated in a city street by a five-foot strip are not fronting on the street, within the meaning of the Kansas City charter of 1875, providing that land fronting on the street, etc., shall be subject to assessment for improvements thereon. Crane v. French, 50 Mo. App. 367, 369.

Where property mortgaged was described as being on the left bank of a river and as having a certain front to the river, the expression "front to the river" was intended to denote a riparian estate bordering on the river. La Branch's Heirs v. Montegut, 17 South. 247, 248, 47 La. Ann. 674; Morgan v. Livingston (La.) 3 Mart. (N. S.) 19, 226.

"Front to the river," as used in a sale of a certain and limited part of a tract of real estate taken from a whole tract owned by the vendor, leaving another part between the premises sold and the river, are merely descriptive of the position of the land sold, and no land passes beyond the expressed limits. Cambre v. Kohn, 8 Mart. (N. S.) 572, 579.

"Front," as ordinarily used in reference to lands or property on the lands, refers to the street frontage or facing according to the manner in which the property is improved and used, and hence a deed describing land as "the front 31 feet of the rear 82 feet, lots 6 and 7," etc., and the improvements fronted on the side of lot 6, which was the corner lot, is too ambiguous and uncertain to render the deed valid. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Ingarrison, 78 N. W. 10, 11, 75 Minn. 429.

The phrase "front of the lot," as used in a lease in which the lessee agreed to keep up the sidewalks in front of the lot in accordance with the city ordinances, means that part of the lot which faces a street or streets. It may front on one street only, or it may front on two. What is the front of a lot is a question determinable by its facing on a public street or streets. A lot standing on a corner, with a street on two sides of it, has two fronts, because its face is opposite to and fronts on two different streets. City of Des Moines v. Dorr, 31 Iowa, 89, 93.

FRONT AND REAR BUILDINGS.

An insurance on "front and rear buildings" includes connecting walls. Monteleone v. Royal Ins. Co., 18 South. 472, 47 La. Ann. 1563, 56 L. R. A. 784.

FRONT FOOT.

Under Rev. St. § 2264, providing that, in case of an improvement made to an existing street, the expense might be assessed by the front foot on the property bounded and abutting upon the improvement, in making such an assignment the council must have regard to what the front of the lot is. It may abut, and yet not front on, the improvement for its full length, or any part of it. Hence, where a lot fronted 37½ feet on one street, and the side of the lot, extending 75 feet, abutted on the street which was improved, it should be deemed or regarded as fronting breadthwise on the improvement, and the assessment on the lot should be for the number of feet it would then have; that is, in such case, 37½ feet, and no more. It may be said that this is assessing according to a fiction. Admit this to be true, and still it must be remembered that equity many times resides in fictions, and that they have been frequently resorted to for the purpose of working out justice against the hard lines of law. Haviland v. City of Columbus, 34 N. E. 679, 680, 50 Ohio St. 471.

By the front-foot rule the total cost is ascertained, as well as the total frontage of the property chargeable with a special tax, then the former item is divided by the number of feet of frontage, and the rate per foot is thus ascertained. Each lot is then assessed by multiplying the rate per foot of cost by the front feet it exhibits, and the total is the assessment against each lot. Mound City Const. Co. v. Macgurn, 71 S. W. 460, 462, 97 Mo. App. 403 (citing Farrar v. City of St. Louis, 80 Mo. 379, 393).

FRONT PART.

A contract to finish the "front part" of a basement cannot be limited necessarily to mean only the external front part, but may well include both sides of the front wall of the building. Bedard v. Bonville, 15 N. W. 185, 186, 57 Wis. 270.

FRONTAGE.

A statutory requirement that, in making local assessments for street improvement work, each lot shall be charged in proportion to the frontage thereof, does not contemplate that the work in front of each lot shall be necessarily charged to that lot, but that the amount of the whole work shall be ascertained, and each lot charged in the proportion that its frontage bears to that of all the lots. Neenan v. Smith, 50 Mo. 525, 531.

FRONTAGE ASSESSMENT.

An assessment on lots fronting on a highway is a "frontage assessment" to the same extent as if the words had been used, so that a contention that where a statute makes property liable to a frontage assessment in case of sidewalks, and provides for an assessment on lots fronting on the street of other improvements, does not provide for a frontage assessment on such lots, is untenable. Lyon v. Town of Tonawanda (U. S.) 98 Fed. 361, 366.

FRONTIER.

In Act Cong. 1838, commonly called the "Neutrality Act," authorizing the collectors and other officers therein mentioned to seize and detain vessels having arms, etc., on board, passing toward a foreign state or colony coterminous with the United States, when they had reason to believe that the vessels, etc., were to pass the frontier and were to be employed in a military expedition or operation against said state or colony, the term "frontier" means something more than the boundary line. It means a tract of country contiguous to the line, and it is not material whether such vessels were actually intended to be passed across the boundary line into the plaintiff's territory. Stoughton v. Mott, 15 Vt. 162, 169.

FROST.

The term "frost," as used in a charter party providing for demurrage over and above the lay days, except in case of frost or floods, revolutions or wars, or any unavoidable accidents hindering the loading or discharging, means freezing, and includes any freezing that would hinder or obstruct the loading or unloading of the ship, and an obstruction in moving a lighter used in unloading caused by ice is within the exception. Aalholm v. A Cargo of Iron Ore (U. S.) 23 Fed. 620, 623.

FROZE.

"Froze" is a term used in the iron trade to designate bundles or bars of iron which are so stuck or run together with rust that no use can be made of them until they are unrolled. The Nith (U. S.) 36 Fed. 86, 87.

FRUCTUS.

In the civil law, fruit; fruits; produce; profit or income; the organic productions of a thing. "Fructus fundi," the fruits of the land. "Fructus pecudum," the produce of flocks. The right to the fruits of a thing belonging to another. The compensation which a man receives from another for the use or enjoyment of a thing, such as interest or rent. Black, Law Dict.

FRUCTUS INDUSTRIALES.

"Fructus industriales" are those products of the earth which are annual, and are raised by yearly manurance and labor, and essentially owe their annual existence to the cultivation of man. The manner, as well as the purpose, of planting, is an essential element to be taken into consideration. If the purpose of planting is not the permanent enhancement of the land itself, but merely to secure a single crop, which is to be the sole return for the labor expended, the product would naturally fall under the head of "fructus industriales." Sparrow v. Pond, 52 N. W. 36, 49 Minn. 412, 16 L. R. A. 103, 32 Am. St. Rep. 571.

The term "fructus industriales" is used to designate grain, vegetables, or other kinds of crops which are the product of periodical planting and culture. Purner v. Piercy, 40 Md. 212, 223, 17 Am. Rep. 591.

The term "fructus industriales" is used to designate crops raised by yearly cultivation. The term includes a growing crop of fruit requiring periodical expense, industry, and attention in its yield and protection. Thus apples, peaches, and blackberries, which require the manurance and industry of man for their annual production, are included within the term. Smock v. Smock, 37 Mo. App. 56, 64.

At the common law growing crops, produced by manual labor and cultivation, are called "fructus industriales," and for some purposes form a part of the real estate to which they are attached, and unless there has been a severance of them from the land, actual or constructive, they follow the title thereto. For other purposes they are regarded as personalty, and so do not pass with the land, but go to the planter. Phillips v. Keysaw, 56 Pac. 695, 696, 7 Okl. 674.

FRUCTUS NATURALES.

"Fructus naturales" is the term applied to the fruit of trees, perennial bushes, and grasses growing from perennial roots, in contradistinction to those products of the earth which are annual, and are raised by yearly manurance and labor, and essentially owe their annual existence to the cultivation of man, to which the term "fructus industriales" is applied. Sparrow v. Pond, 52 N. W. 36, 49 Minn. 412, 16 L. R. A. 103, 32 Am. St. Rep. 571.

FRUIT.

See "Annual Fruit"; "Natural Fruits." As chattel, see "Chattel."

Fruit covers a large family, and the adjectives "green," "ripe," or "dried" indicate the three great groups into which that family may be divided; and a citron is a dried fruit, within such subdivision as used in the tariff act. United States v. Nordlinger (U. S.) 121 Fed. 690, 691, 58 C. C. A. 438.

The term "fruit," in legal acceptance, is not confined to the produce of those trees which in popular language are called "fruit trees," but applies also to the produce of oak, elm, and walnut trees. Bullen v. Denning, 5 Barn. & C. 842.

"Fruits in brine," in Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 2, Free List, par. 559, 30 Stat. 198 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1683], does not include lemons cut in two and placed in casks of brine, the pulp of which, on reach ing this country, has left half of the lemon, and the fruit of which has been destroyed; but it is properly dutiable under par. 267, schedule G, § 1, c. 11, 30 Stat. 172 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1651], as "lemon peel, preserved." Hills Bros. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 113 Fed. 857.

Cherries of an inedible variety, imported in casks in a surrounding fluid containing alcohol, added for the purpose of resisting fermentation and decay, such being intended for use in the manufacture of cherry juice, are dutiable under paragraph 263, schedule G, § 1, c. 11, Tariff Act July 24, 1897, 30 Stat. 171 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1651], as "fruits preserved in spirits," and not under paragraph 299, schedule H, § 1, c. 11, 30 Stat. 174 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1655], as "cherry juice," etc. Voight v. Mihalovitch (U. S.) 125 Fed. 78, 82.

The term "fruit," in a marine policy on goods from Bordeaux to Charleston, excluding fruit from average unless general, was construed to include dried prunes. De Pau v. Jones (S. C.) 1 Brev. 437, 438.

Oranges.

The term "fruit," in a marine policy exempting the underwriter from particular average or partial losses on fruit, includes oranges. Humphreys v. Union Ins. Co. (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 876, 880.

Pineapples.

"Fruits preserved in their own juices," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 304, include pineapples, peeled, sliced, and placed in cans filled with cold water, and hermetically sealed; their juice permeating the water. Johnson v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 725, 726.

"Fruits, green, ripe, or dried," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 580, does not include pineapples, peeled, sliced, and placed in cans filled with water, and hermetically sealed; their juice permeating the water. Johnson v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 725, 726.

"Fruit," as used in Rev. St. § 2517, as amended by chapter 4531, Acts 1897, denouncing punishment against whoever takes and carries away from any farm, garden, orchard, etc., any farm products, fruit, etc., while possibly sufficient to include the unsevered fruit of the pineapple plant, is not sufficient to include the growing plant; that being part of the realty. Long v. State, 28 South. 775, 777, 42 Fla. 509.

Tomatoes.

"Fruit" is defined as the seed of plants, or that part of the plant which contains the seed, and especially the juicy, pulpy products of certain plants, covering and containing the seed; and the term as used in Tariff Act March 3, 1883, does not include tomatoes. Nix v. Hedden (U. S.) 39 Fed. 109, 110, on appeal, 13 Sup. Ct. 881, 882, 149 U. S. 304, 37 L. Ed. 745.

In Robertson v. Salomon, 130 U. S. 412, 9 Sup. Ct. 559, 32 L. Ed. 995, and Nix v. Hedden, 149 U. S. 304, 13 Sup. Ct. 881, 37 L. Ed. 745, tomatoes were shown in the language of botany to be included in the term "fruit"; but it was held that they were also included in the term "vegetables," as the latter term was used in the tariff act. United States v. Buffalo Natural Gas Fuel Co. (U. S.) 78 Fed. 110, 112, 24 C. C. A. 4.

FRUITLESS.

The word "fruitless," when applied to an investigation by Congress, characterized to be fruitless, means that it can result in no valid legislation on the subject to which the inquiry refers. Kilbourne v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168-195, 26 L. Ed. 377.

FUCK.

In an action for slander, where the charge was carnal knowledge of an animal, the word "fuck" being used to convey the imputation, the court said: "Because the modesty of our lexicographers restrains them from publishing obscene words, or from giving the obscene signification to words that may be used without conveying any obscenity, it does not follow that they are not English words, and not understood by those who hear them, or that chaste words may not be applied so as to be understood in an obscene sense by every one who hears them." Edgar v. McCutchen, 9 Mo. 768.

The words "I've f——d her" have no other meaning than "did have carnal knowledge," so that the slander, alleged in the indictment in a prosecution for slander of a female as "the said J. B. had had carnal intercourse with her, the said B. H.," is proved by showing that defendant said, "I've f——d her." Barnett v. State, 33 S. W. 340, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 280.

The word "f——ked," used in reference to relations between unmarried persons, is equivalent to a charge of whoredom. Linck v. Kelley, 25 Ind. 278, 87 Am. Dec. 362.

FUEL.

See "Patent Fuel."

FUERO.

"A fuero (forum) is a use and custom combined which has the force of law."

Strother v. Lucas, 37 U. S. (12 Pet.) 410, 446, 9 L. Ed. 1137.

FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

A fugitive from justice is one who, having committed a crime within one jurisdiction, goes into another in order to evade the law and to avoid punishment. State v. Hall, 20 S. E. 729, 730, 115 N. C. 811, 28 L. R. A. 289, 44 Am. St. Rep. 501 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.); Jones v. Leonard, 50 Iowa, 106, 108, 32 Am. Rep. 116. And the Constitution of the United States defines such a person to be "one who flees from justice." Jones v. Leonard, 50 Iowa, 106, 108, 32 Am. Rep. 116.

A fugitive from justice is one who commits a crime in a state and withdraws himself from such jurisdiction without waiting to abide the consequences of such act. In re Voorhees, 32 N. J. Law (3 Vroom) 141, 150.

To be a fugitive from justice it is not necessary that the party charged should have left the state in which the crime is alleged to have been committed after an indictment found, or to avoid a prosecution, but simply that, having committed in the state that which by its laws is a crime, when he is sought to be subjected to its criminal process, he has left its jurisdiction. Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U. S. 80, 6 Sup. Ct. 291, 29 L. Ed. 544. A person who commits a crime within a state, and withdraws himself from such jurisdiction without waiting to abide by the consequences of such act, must be regarded as a fugitive from justice of the state whose laws he has infringed. In re Voorhees, 32 N. J. Law, 141. That a man is charged with a crime in one state and is afterwards found in another has generally been regarded as prima facie evidence that he is a fugitive. State v. Clough, 53 Atl. 1086, 1089, 71 N. H. 594 (citing Drinkall v. Spiegel, 68 Conn. 441, 36 Atl. 830, 36 L. R. A. 486).

A person who commits a crime and withdraws himself from such jurisdiction without waiting to abide the consequences of such act must be regarded as a "fugitive from justice" of the state whose laws he has infringed. People v. Kuhn, 35 N. W. 88, 89, 67 Mich. 463 (citing In re Voorhees, 32 N. J. Law [3 Vroom] 141).

A person who, while under indictment, escapes from his proper custodians, and succeeds thereafter for years in eluding capture, will be conclusively presumed to be a fugitive from justice, and if he leaves the jurisdiction his intention in so doing is not open to controversy. Howgate v. United States (D. C.) 7 App. Cas. 217, 247.

What constitutes a fugitive from justice has been the subject of much discussion by eminent text-writers, and of many decisions by the courts and by the Governors of the several states. There seems to be a substantial unanimity in all the authorities on one proposition: that, to be a fugitive from justice, a person must have been corporeally present in the demanding state at the time of the commission of the alleged offense. So that a person who was only constructively present in a state demanding his extradition at the time of the commission of the alleged crime cannot be said to be a fugitive from justice; his actual presence being required. People v. Hyatt, 64 N. E. 825, 826, 172 N. Y. 176, 60 L. R. A. 774, 92 Am. St. Rep. 706. See, also, State v. Hall, 20 S. E. 729, 730, 115 N. C. 811, 28 L. R. A. 289, 44 Am. St. Rep. 501; Jones v. Leonard, 50 Iowa, 106, 108, 32 Am. Rep. 116; Hartman v. Aveline, 63 Ind. 344, 345, 30 Am. Rep. 217; In re Mitchell, 4 N. Y. Cr. R. 596, 601; Hyatt v. People, 23 Sup. Ct. 456, 462, 188 U. S. 691, 47 L. Ed. 657.

To make one a fugitive from justice it must first appear that he was within the state when the crime charged is alleged to have been committed; second, that, being subject to criminal process, he either concealed himself or avoided it, so that he could not be served, or that he departed from the state to avoid service. Bruce v. Rayner (U. S.) 124 Fed. 481, 485.

Inquiry as to guilt.

It is sufficient to constitute a person a fugitive from justice, within the meaning of the provisions of the federal Constitution relating to the extradition of fugitives from justice, that a crime has been properly charged, that the prisoner is a fugitive, and a requisition has been properly made. The words do not mean that the guilt of the alleged fugitive should be inquired into. Kingsbury's Case, 106 Mass. 223, 227.

Purpose or time of flight.

The expression "fugitive from justice," as used in Rev. St. § 5278 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3597], regulating the extradition of fugitives from justice, means that a person having within the state committed that which by its laws constitutes a crime, when he is sought to be subjected to its criminal process to answer for his offense, has left its jurisdiction, and is found in the territory of another state. It is not necessary that the party charged should have left the state in which the crime is alleged to have been committed after an indictment found, or for the purpose of avoiding a prosecution, anticipated or begun, and the fact that the person does not leave the state for any such purpose or with any such intent does not exclude him from the meaning of the term "fugitive from justice" as used in the statute. Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U. S. 80, 97, 6 Sup. Ct. 291, 29 L. Ed. 544; Ex parte Brown (U. S.) 28 Fed. 653, 654; In re Cook (U. S.) 49 Fed. 833, 839; State v. Richter, 37 Minn. 436, 35 N. W. 9. In other words, there need be in his departure from the state no element of conscious flight. It suffices that after the commission of the offense he has merely departed from the jurisdiction of the state. In re Cook (U. S.) 49 Fed. 833, 839.

The term "flee from justice," in Const. art. 4, § 2, includes cases where a citizen of one state commits a crime in another and then returns home. Hess v. Grimes, 48 Pac. 596, 598, 5 Kan. App. 763 (citing Ex parte Swearingen, 13 S. C. 74); In re Roberts (U. S.) 24 Fed. 132, 134.

Departure from the jurisdiction of the state after the commission of an act in furtherance of a crime subsequently consummated is a flight from justice, within the meaning of the law, where a resident of North Carolina, who while in Pennsylvania procured by a false representation a contract for the shipment of goods from that place to his residence, and then returned there and received the goods, and is indicted in Pennsylvania for false representation. In re Sultan, 20 S. E. 375, 376, 115 N. C. 57, 28 L. R. A. 294, 44 Am. St. Rep. 433.

FULFILLED.

Rev. St. 1881, § 84, provides that, in pleading the performance of a condition precedent in a contract, it shall be sufficient to allege generally that the party performed all the conditions on his part. A complaint in an action on an insurance policy alleged that the plaintiffs duly fulfilled all the conditions of said agreement. It was held that "fulfilled" is sufficiently synonymous with the word "performed," as used in the statute, to hold that its use is a sufficient compliance with the statutory provision for pleading generally the performance of conditions precedent. Ætna Ins. Co. v. Kittles, 81 Ind. 96, 98.

See "In Full."

In a statute conferring "full legislative powers" on the board of commissioners of education in regard to school matters, "full" meant ample, complete, perfect, not wanting in any essential quality, and conferred authority to legislate in any manner in which the Legislature might have done, had such authority not been conferred. Mobile School Com'rs v. Putnam, 44 Ala. 506, 537.

An agreement whereby one of the parties thereto was to retain the "full and peaceable possession" of certain property during his lifetime, means complete, entire, and peaceable possession. Reed v. Hazleton, 15 Pac. 177, 180, 37 Kan. 321.

One of Webster's definitions of the word "full" is "complete, entire, without abatement, mature, perfect," and, as used in an instruction holding a physician to be liable unless he uses "his full skill and ability," is erroneous. Quinn v. Donovan, 85 Ill. 194, 195.

FULL AGE.

A person is of full age on the day preceding the twenty-first anniversary of his birth. Hamlin v. Stevenson, 34 Ky. (4 Dana) 597.

FULL AMOUNT.

The phrase "full amount of the sum so payable," as used in Rev. St. § 2739, prescribing the rule for valuing tangible personal property, and declaring that every credit for a sum payable either in money or property of any kind, etc., shall be "valued at the full amount of the sum so payable," means the sum payable by the terms of the instrument, and is equivalent to payable on the face of the instrument. As thus construed it requires the owner of a promissory note, bank account, or other credit payable in money to list the same for taxation at its face value, without regard to the solvency of the debtor; and as thus construed the provision conflicts with that clause of Const. art. 12, § 2, which declares that all property subject to taxation shall be listed at its true value in money, since the value of a promissory note or bank account held against the insolvent is not its "true value in money" in any fair sense of that term. McCurdy v. Prugh, 55 N. E. 154, 156, 59 Ohio St. 465.

FULL AND COMPLETE CARGO.

The meaning of the words "full cargo," in a charter party requiring the charterer to furnish a full cargo, "is a question which can only be solved by experienced shipmasters. What is a full cargo for the ship to carry in safety is not a fact which can be settled by any rule of law or mathematical computation, and the court must necessarily rely upon the opinions of those who have experience, skill, and judgment in such matters." Ogden v. Parsons, 64 U. S. (23 How.) 167, 169, 16 L. Ed. 410.

A charter party requiring a ship of 261 tons to load a "full and complete cargo" requires the ship to put on board as much goods as she is capable of carrying with safety, not necessarily 261 tons. Hunter v. Fry, 2 Barn. & Ald. 421, 426.

A charter party requiring the defendant to load on board a vessel "a full and complete cargo of sugar, molasses, and produce." is to be construed that the vessel was to be loaded according to the usual mode of stowage of sugar and molasses or other produce, so that the charterer would have the option of loading sugar and molasses, either with or without other produce. Cuthbert v. Cumming, 11 Exch. *405, 408.

FULL AND COMPLETE POSSESSION.

A lease requiring the lessee, on the termination of the term, to deliver up to the lessor full and complete possession of the lands, should be construed to mean full and complete possession of the lands, including the buildings and improvements thereon, in as good a condition as they were at the time the agreement was made, natural decay and inevitable accidents excepted. Streeter v. Streeter, 43 Ill. 155, 161.

FULL ANSWER.

The term "full answer," in Clay's Dig. p. 251, § 39, providing that no decree pro confesso shall be set aside, but on filing a full and complete answer to the bill, is as extensive a term as the words "complete answer," as therein used, and therefore the use of the latter words is unnecessary. Bentley v. Cleveland, 22 Ala. 814, 817.

Under Code, § 77, authorizing a judgment entered upon service by publication to be opened on presenting a full answer to the complaint and payment of costs, if required by the court, a full answer means not wanting in any essential requisite, a meritorious answer, and where the answer filed fails to show complete defense it is not a full answer. Durham v. Moore, 48 Kan. 135, 136, 29 Pac. 472.

FULL CASH VALUE.

The term "full cash value," as used in the title on Taxation, means the amount at which the property would be taken in payment of a just debt due from a solvent debtor. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2505; Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 3782, cl. 4; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 3680, subd. 5; Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3617, subd. 5.

"Full cash value," as used in Pol. Code, § 3627, providing that all taxable property must be assessed at its "full cash value," means the amount for which the property would be taken in payment of a just debt from a solvent debtor, and they are not equivalent to "actual value for agricultural purposes," since the value for the purposes named may be, and often is, less than it would be taken for in payment of a just debt from a solvent debtor. Ballerino v. Mason, 23 Pac. 530, 83 Cal. 447.

By St. 1891, pp. 137, 138, it is directed that all property shall be assessed at its full cash value, and that the term "full cash value" means the amount at which the property would be appraised if taken in payment of a just debt due from a solvent debtor. A railroad, the same as every other class of property, is to be assessed at its true cash value at such an amount as it would be appraised if taken in payment of a just debt due from a solvent debtor. But this does not necessarily mean that the same rules and principles are to be applied to all the different kinds of property in determining what their true cash value is. The true value of each class is to be determined by evidence applicable to that class. Wherever property has a well-defined market value, which is usually the case with personal property, or with town and farm property, the market value is usually the best criterion of its value for purposes of taxation. It is fair to presume that property to be taken in payment of a just debt from a solvent debtor would be appraised at what it is reasonably worth in the market—at what it would probably bring. So one rule is really the equivalent of the other. But there are many other kinds of property to which this test would be entirely inapplicable. It cannot be said, although sometimes bought and sold, that they have a market value. Such, for instance, is a water ditch, a salt marsh, a borax field, or a mine of any kind. A toll road is another instance. Take, for example, the famous "Geiger Grade," which must have cost many thousands of dollars, and have been, at one time, a wonderfully productive piece of property, but which now would probably not pay the wages of a toll keeper. The market cannot be appealed to to fix a value upon such property, but its value may be and must be fixed by other obvious considerations. A railroad comes within this class. Railroads are bought and sold so seldom, and the value of each road depends so entirely upon its surroundings, that in determining the amount at which such property would be appraised, if taken in payment of a debt, we must resort to other principles. Railroads are usually constructed and operated for profit. They are not valued, as men sometimes value a beautiful home, a horse, or a diamond, for the pleasure that comes from their ownership, but for the returns that can be obtained from them as a business investment. Neither are they usually held for speculative purposes, as much other property, particularly unimproved lands and town and city property, is so often held. The value of a railroad is generally strictly prosaic and utilitarian. To obtain any return from it, either present or prospective, a railroad must be operated, expense must be constantly incurred, and the result is that its true value as a railroad depends very largely, or almost entirely, upon what its net income can be expected to be. State v. Virginia & T. R. Co., 46 Pac. 723, 23 Nev. 283, 35 L. R. A. 759.

FULL COMPENSATION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2736, providing that, when the personal estate of a decedent amounts to $100,000 or more over all debts, each executor, not exceeding three, is entitled to full compensation, means that he is entitled to full statutory commissions. In re Kenworthy's Estate, 17 N. Y. Supp. 655, 656, 63 Hun, 165.

The appropriation by Congress in 19 Stat. 294, of $2,600 each "in full compensation" for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, for salaries of the chief justice and two associate judges of the territory of Wyoming, being wholly inconsistent with so much of Rev. St. § 1879, as fixed such salaries at $3,000 each per annum, necessarily operated as a repeal thereof, and limited the compensation of such officers for that year to the amount so appropriated. United States v. Fisher, 3 Sup. Ct. 154, 155, 109 U. S. 143, 27 L. Ed. 885.

FULL CONFIDENCE.

"Full confidence," as used in a will providing that the testator's wife should have the use, benefit, and profits of the testator's real estate during her natural life, and also all his personal estate, absolutely, having full confidence that she will leave the surplus to be divided at her decease justly among the testator's children, was not sufficient to create a trust in favor of the testator's children, and the personal property vested absolutely in the widow. In re Pennock's Estate, 20 Pa. 268, 279, 59 Am. Dec. 718.

A will providing that the husband of the testatrix should have the use and income of a certain estate, in the full confidence that he would give her children by a former marriage such comfort and support as they might stand in need of, was sufficient to subject the income to a trust in favor of her children by the former marriage, which could be enforced in equity. Warner v. Bates, 98 Mass. 274, 279 (cited and approved in Handley v. Wrightson, 60 Md. 198, 202).

FULL CONVICTION.

"Full conviction" is not the criterion of the degree of proof necessary to a conviction. It is a loose phrase. It has no distinct legal import, and is without accuracy to the common understanding. It is vague, indefinite, and inexact. It may be the equivalent of sincere or conscientious belief. It may mean that full conviction, when the facts proven satisfy the judgment as to the truth of the charge. There is but one rule and one law in this state as to the measure and sufficiency of proof which will warrant conviction. It is that the evidence must engender a certainty of belief beyond a reasonable doubt. Lipscomb v. State, 23 South. 210, 212, 75 Miss. 559.

FULL COPY.

A full copy of a bill in chancery means not only a full transcript of the bill, with all its indorsements, but one including a copy of every exhibit. If counsel could witness or realize the perplexity and the hazard of their clients' rights occasioned by omitting to furnish such full copy to the chancellor, such omissions would cease to occur. Finley v. Hunter (S. C.) 2 Strob. Eq. 208, 210, note.

FULL COSTS.

"Full costs," as used in St. 17 Car. II. c. 7, § 2, entitling the successful party in replevin to full costs, means ordinary costs as between party and party, and not costs as between attorney and client. Jamieson v. Trevelyan, 10 Exch. 748, 752, 28 Eng. Law & Eq. 535, 536.

An order allowing plaintiff to file an amended complaint after reversal on appeal to the General Term, on condition that plaintiff pays to defendant's attorney a "full bill of costs and disbursements to date," means "such costs as would go to the party against whom the amendment was allowed, in case there had been a determination favorable to him at the date of the order granting leave to amend." It includes the costs made at the general term. Bowen v. Sweeney, 20 N. Y. Supp. 733, 66 Hun, 42.

FULL CREAM CHEESE.

All cheese manufactured, sold, or offered for sale in the state at retail or wholesale, made from milk or cream of same, which tests not less than 3 per cent. of butter fat, shall be deemed to be a full cream cheese. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 4756.

FULL FAITH AND CREDIT.

The full faith and credit which the Constitution declares shall be given by each state to the public acts, etc., of every other state, implies such full force and effect as they have by law or usage in the state from whence they are taken. Gibbons v. Livingston, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 236, 275.

The expression "full faith and credit," in Const. U. S. art. 4, § 1, means that the record, when duly authenticated, shall have in every other court of the United States the same faith and credit as it has in the state court from whence it was taken, and does not merely mean that such record shall be admitted as evidence without declaring its effect. Speaking of the act, Judge Story says: "If a judgment is conclusive in the state where it is pronounced, it is equally conclusive everywhere in the courts of the United States." Christmas v. Russell, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.) 290, 302, 18 L. Ed. 475.

The phrase "full faith and credit," as used in the United States Constitution, only requires the recognition of the rights of parties as settled in a suit in the foreign state, and only closes all investigation of the merits where it appears the court from which the record comes had jurisdiction of the parties. It does not mean that all the effects and consequences of the litigation in one state shall follow it to another. Shelton v. Johnson, 38 Tenn. (4 Sneed) 672, 682, 70 Am. Dec. 265.

The phrase "full faith and credit" is not to be construed or received in the fullest import of the term, but is to be held only to refer to such records, etc., as pleadings and evidence, since any other construction which would give the same effect to a foreign judgment as to a domestic judgment would be to give to the laws of one state complete operation in another, and would make the judgment of one state bind property in another, which could not be permitted. Joice v. Scales, 18 Ga. 725, 727.

"Full faith and credit," as used in Const. art. 4, § 1, declaring that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state, and the Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved and the effect thereof, and Act Cong. May 26, 1790, declaring that the records and judicial proceedings of one state shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from whence said records are or shall be taken, means that the judgment of another state shall have the same conclusive effect and obligatory force in every state in the Union that it had in the state where it was rendered. It means that such a judgment has the same faith and credit as it has in the state court from which it is taken. If in such court it has the faith and credit of the highest nature—that is to say, of record evidence—it must have the same faith and credit in every other court. If a judgment is conclusive in the state where it was pronounced, it is equally conclusive everywhere. If re-examinable there, it is open to the same inquiries in every other state. It is, therefore, put upon the same footing as a domestic judgment. The term "faith and credit," as used in the Constitution and act of Congress, point to the attributes and qualities which such records and judicial proceedings shall have as evidence. That a judgment shall have full faith and credit does not mean that, because by the laws of a state it is entitled to a preference in the distribution of assets, it shall have the same effect and a similar priority in the distribution of assets in another state. The possession of such a quality is not essential to that full faith and credit and absolute verity with which it was the intention of the Constitution and act of Congress to invest it. Brengle v. McClellan (Md.) 7 Gill & J. 434, 438.

"Full faith and credit," as used in Const. U. S. art. 4, § 1, providing that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state, means such faith and credit as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from whence the records were taken. Therefore, if a judgment is conclusive in the state where pronounced, it is equally conclusive everywhere in the Union; but, if it is re-examinable where rendered, it is open to the same inquiry in every other state. It is, therefore, put on a footing of a domestic judgment, by which is meant not having the operation and force of a domestic judgment beyond the jurisdiction declaring it to be a judgment, but a domestic judgment as to the merits of the claim or subject-matter of the suit; that is, that the judgment of a state court should have the same credit, validity, and effect in every other court of the United States which it had in the state court where it was pronounced, and that whatever pleas would be good to a suit thereon in such state, and none others, could be pleaded in any court in the United States. It has been well said "that the Constitution did not mean to confer the power of jurisdiction, simply to regulate the effect of the acknowledged jurisdiction over persons and things within the state." McElmoyle v. Cohen, 38 U. S. (13 Pet.) 312, 326, 10 L. Ed. 177.

Jurisdictional questions.

The clause of the federal Constitution requiring full faith and credit to be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of another state does not preclude an inquiry into the action or the jurisdiction of the court rendering the judgment. The judgment of a court of another state has no force or effect, unless the court rendering the same had acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person. In re Norton's Estate, 66 N. Y. Supp. 317, 319, 32 Misc. Rep. 224.

Proceedings after judgment.

The expression "full faith and credit," as used in Const. U. S. art. 4, § 1, which provides that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state, would apply to judgments entered in a state court, but not to subsequent acts under the judgment, such as the issuing and returning of executions. Carter v. Bennett, 6 Fla. 214, 242.

FULL FORCE.

The averment in a plea "that a decree continues in full force" imports only that it has not been reversed. It is not equivalent to an averment that it has not been satisfied. Dorsey v. Sands, 28 Ky. (5 J. J. Marsh.) 37, 38.

FULL INCOME.

The words "full income," as used in a will written by one not a lawyer, will ordinarily be understood to mean annual interest upon securities and property. McLouth v. Hunt, 48 N. E. 548, 550, 154 N. Y. 179, 39 L. R. A. 230.

FULL INDORSEMENT.

A "full indorsement" is that by which the indorser orders the money to be paid to some particular person by name. Kilpatrick v. Heaton (S. C.) 3 Brev. 92, 93; Lee v. Chillicothe Branch of State Bank (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 151, 153. It differs from a blank indorsement, which consists only of the name of the indorser, as where the indorser simply writes his name on the back of negotiable paper. Lee v. Chillicothe Branch of State Bank (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 151, 153.

"An indorsement is said to be in full when the name of the assignee or transferee is stated, without any words of limitation. The usual form of a full indorsement is 'Pay to A. B., or order.'" Lee v. Chillicothe Branch of State Bank (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 151, 153.

FULL INVENTORY.

"Full inventory," as used in the attachment law of Montana, requiring a full inventory in the sheriff's return after seizure, means a reasonably brief and certain naming of the articles seized. Silver Bow Min. & Mill. Co. v. Lowry, 6 Pac. 62, 64, 5 Mont. 618.

A schedule which merely states that it is a schedule of the creditors of the assignor, verified by his affidavit that the schedule is just and true, is not a full and complete inventory of all indebtedness of the assignor, within the requirements of Acts 1884-85, pp. 100, 101, that no assignment shall be valid unless accompanied by a sworn full and complete schedule of the assignor's indebtedness. The schedule may be just and true as far as it goes, and still not be a full and complete schedule. Fort v. Martin Tobacco Co., 1 S. E. 223, 224, 77 Ga. 111.

FULL JURISDICTION.

The act passed in 1833, which provided that it shall be competent for any person or persons, deeming themselves to have a full claim against the state of Mississippi, to exhibit and file a bill in equity against the state, is not invalid under Const. art. 4, § 16, providing that a separate superior court of chancery shall be established, with "full jurisdiction" in all matters of equity. This provision does nothing more than to create the court. It leaves its jurisdiction to the determination of the common law, and neither enlarges nor limits the powers which it derives from that source. "The full powers in all matters of equity," which are secured to it by the provision for its establishment, were intended to embrace such subjects of jurisdiction as the chancery court has possessed by immemorial usage or particular legislative enactments. It follows that, whenever the Legislature creates a new subject of chancery jurisdiction, it becomes immediately one of those "matters of equity" of which that court has full jurisdiction by the Constitution. It is not the subject of the suit which determines the criterion of the jurisdiction of a court of chancery, so much as the particular mode in which it proceeds, differing, then, from a court of law principally in the mode of proof, of trial, and of relief. Farish v. State, 5 Miss. (4 How.) 170, 175.

Under the Mississippi Constitution of 1832, giving to chancery courts "full jurisdiction in all matters of equity," the statute of 1853, giving a remedy by scire facias on the bond of a receiver of a bank, is valid. The words "full jurisdiction" imply that nothing is reserved. Whatever is a matter of equity, as to that the power to adjudge is full. This court was established to preside over and administer that system of equity jurisprudence which then existed, unwritten and positive, and such enlarged dimensions as it might attain to by an ample development of its principles and a more enlarged application of them to the new circumstances of an advancing society and civilization. Equity jurisprudence is especially the product of English tried reason and conscience, perhaps their highest and most beneficent achievement. From small germs it has been of rapid growth, especially in the last century. However the system may expand, the "full jurisdiction" conferred gives the court capacity to fully administer it. Bank of Mississippi v. Duncan, 52 Miss. 740-745.

FULL KNOWLEDGE.

In an answer in an action against a railroad company to recover damages for personal injuries caused by a defect in the track, an allegation in the answer, being that the person injured had "full knowledge" of such defect and had had such knowledge for a long time, means such knowledge as would fairly apprise the employé of the danger. Worden v. Humeston & S. Ry. Co., 33 N. W. 629, 632, 72 Iowa, 201.

FULL MEASURE OF CARE AND DILIGENCE.

The words "full measure of care and diligence, all that could be expected," cannot be held to mean less than extraordinary diligence, and therefore an instruction that such a measure of care and diligence is required is erroneous in a case where extraordinary diligence is not required. Western & A. R. R. v. King, 70 Ga. 261, 263.

FULL NAMES.

"The expression 'full names' of persons composing the association, as employed in the limited partnership act, means the names in form habitually used by those persons in business, and by which they are generally known in the community, and does not mean that given names must necessarily be spelled out in full in every case." Gearing v. Carroll, 24 Atl. 1045, 1046, 151 Pa. 79.

The full names of partners, required by the limited partnership act to be signed to articles of association, is satisfied by a signature only consisting of initials of the given names and the last names in full, when the persons so signing are in the habit of signing their names in such manner, and are generally known in the community by the names as thus signed. Lafin & Rand Powder Co. v. Steytler, 29 Wkly. Notes Cas. 230, 232, 146 Pa. 434, 23 Atl. 215, 14 L. R. A. 690.

FULL PARTICULARS.

"Full particulars," as used in an insurance policy requiring that, as a condition precedent to a recovery, the insured shall deliver full particulars of the loss or damage, together with an inventory of the property destroyed or damaged, etc., means the best particulars the assured can reasonably give. It means that the assured will, within a convenient time after the loss, produce to the company something which will enable them to form a judgment as to whether or not he has sustained the loss. Bumstead v. Dividend Mut. Ins. Co., 12 N. Y. 81, 95; Mason v. Harvey, 8 Exch. 819, 820.

FULL PAYMENT.

In a will leaving certain property to trustees, with directions to divide into three equal shares, and out of such shares pay to each of three children a certain amount at the end of one year, a further sum at the end of three years, and the balance of such shares at the end of five years, provided that, should either of such children die before the full payment of the whole of his or her share of such residue, then the executors should pay the remainder of such share to the issue of such child, if any, or to the remaining children, the term "die before full payment" of the whole means before the share becomes payable, and where a daughter died after the expiration of five years, but before the whole of her share had actually been paid to her, the amount remaining should be deemed as having been paid, within the meaning of the will, and it descended to her personal representatives, and not to her son. Finley v. Bent, 95 N. Y. 364, 368.

FULL PERFORMANCE.

Under Gen. Laws 1883, c. 100, providing a penalty if a mortgagee neglects to discharge a mortgage after "full performance" of the conditions of the mortgage, the penalty is not incurred by refusal to execute a discharge after a mere offer to perform or tender of performance. A tender of performance is not full performance. Crumbly v. Bardon, 70 Wis. 385, 386, 36 N. W. 19, 20.

FULL PRIVILEGE.

A deed granting a certain lot, and the "full and free privilege" of ingress, egress, and regress over a certain alley, owned by the grantor, signifies not only a unity but an equality of enjoyment, both in manner and quantity, between the grantee and the grantor and his assigns. Kirkham v. Sharp (Pa.) 1 Whart. 323, 335, 29 Am. Dec. 57.

FULL PROOF.

Mr. Starkie says: "Evidence which satisfies the minds of the jury of the truth of the fact in dispute to the entire exclusion of every reasonable doubt constitutes full proof of the fact. * * * The distinction between full proof and mere preponderance of evidence is in its application very important. In all criminal cases whatsoever it is essential to a verdict of condemnation that the guilt of the accused should be fully proved. Neither a mere preponderance of evidence, nor any weight of preponderant evidence, is sufficient for the purpose, unless it generate full belief of the fact, to the exclusion of all reasonable doubt. But in many cases of a civil nature, where the right is dubious and the claims of the contesting parties are supported by evidence nearly equipoised, a mere preponderance of evidence on either side may be sufficient to turn the scale." Kane v. Hibernia Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 38 N. J. Law (9 Vroom) 441, 450, 20 Am. Rep. 409 (quoting 1 Starkie, Ev. *478).

FULL PROSECUTION.

The expression "full proof," as used in a charge authorizing a jury to consider the nature of facts regarding the disposition of goods in payment of debts, with reference to their susceptibility of full proof, would be understood by a jury to mean a higher degree of weight of evidence than a preponderance. Baines v. Ullmann, 9 S. W. 543, 545, 71 Tex. 529.

The term "full prosecution," within the rule that for a suit to constitute lis pendens there must be a full prosecution of such suit, means a full prosecution of the case from the commencement to the final determination thereof. It must appear that there has been no such negligent intermission as may appear to have been inexcusable and which cannot be satisfactorily explained. The ground upon which to place the invalidity of lis pendens for want of prosecution is not, as in many cases seems to be supposed, negligence merely as such, but estoppel, as warranted by such negligence and from conduct on the part of those seeking the enforcement of the lis pendens. Tinsley v. Rice, 31 S. E. 174, 176, 105 Ga. 285.

FULL QUORUM.

The words "full quorum," in the minutes of the commissioners' court, reciting that the full quorum of the court was present when the county tax was levied, is to be construed as showing that the full bench was present, and therefore the record shows a compliance with the statute requiring such a levy to be made by a full bench. Halpin v. State, 18 Tex. App. 410, 413.

FULL RELEASE.

The term "full release," in an assignment for the payment of creditors who will execute a full release and discharge of their debts, imports that such releases shall be absolute. Agnew v. Dorr (Pa.) 5 Whart. 131, 136, 84 Am. Dec. 539.

FULL SETTLEMENT.

Settlement means an adjustment of accounts or claims and liquidation or payment, and the term "full settlement," in the statement of a receipt of certain money in full settlement of a claim, means payment of the claim. Hoopes v. McCan, 19 La. Ann. 201, 202.

FULL SUPPLY.

A contract for the sale of ice, providing that, in case of the inability of the parties of the first part to lay up a "full supply" of ice, they should be bound only to deliver and supply such proportion of the amount of ice as the quantity of ice laid up be to the fully supply, should be construed as referring to the capacity of the icehouses belonging to the seller. Kemp v. Knickerbocker Ice Co., 69 N. Y. 45, 52.

FULL TERM.

A "full term," within the meaning of Const. art. 9, § 3, providing that the same person shall not be elected sheriff for two consecutive full terms, does not include a vacancy of the last half of a term after the first half has been filled by others. Gorrell v. Bier, 15 W. Va. 311, 321.

FULL VALUE.

See "True and Full Value."

FULL WAGES.

The expression "full wages," in the seventh article of the Laws of Oleron, which declares that a sick mariner who is left behind is entitled to his full wages if he recover, etc., means the aggregate amount of wages for the voyage; that is, the same wages which the mariner would have been entitled to, had he served out the whole voyage. Sims v. Jackson (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 183, 184.

FULL YEAR.

Poor Act (Revision, p. 834) § 1, requiring a pauper to dwell on the estate or in the township in which the estate lay "for one full year" to obtain a legal settlement, meant the full space of one year continuously and without interruption. Inhabitants of Eatontown v. Inhabitants of Shrewsbury, 6 Atl. 319, 49 N. J. Law, 188.

FULLEST CONFIDENCE.

The words "fullest confidence," as used in a will, according to 1 Perry, Trusts, c. 4, § 112, in a clause stating that the testator has fullest confidence in a legatee to make a certain disposition of the fund bequeathed, is a word of intention, which the court will carry into effect, as if the testator had used an absolute word of devise in trust, and the court will direct the donee or first taker to hold as a trustee for those whom the donor intended to benefit. Cockrill v. Armstrong, 31 Ark. 580, 589; Major v. Herndon, 78 Ky. 123, 129.

FULLY.

See "As Fully As."

The provision of Bill of Rights, art. 12, which secures to the accused person the right to have his crime or offense "fully, plainly, substantially, and formally described to him," only requires such particularity of allegation as may be of service to him in enabling him to understand the charge and to prepare his defense. Commonwealth v. Robertson, 38 N. E. 25, 26, 162 Mass. 90.

FULLY ACCOUNTED.

Where plaintiff shipped goods to defendant, which the latter was to sell, and return those unsold, and fully account for the proceeds, and in an action for account rendered defendant pleaded "fully accounted," such term could not be construed so as to be sustained by evidence of accounts current rendered to plaintiff by defendant, which contained an account, but which did not contain a full account, showing a completion of the enterprise. Read v. Bertrand (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 347, 348.

FULLY ADMINISTERED.

Until the executors of an estate have discharged the debts of a deceased which have been reduced to judgments, they have not fully administered the estate. Ryans v. Boogher, 69 S. W. 1043, 1051, 169 Mo. 673.

FULLY BELIEVE.

"Fully" is usually defined as meaning "sufficiently," "clearly," or "distinctly," and, when used in this its ordinary sense, the statement that, to justify a conviction in a criminal case, the jury must fully believe in the guilt of the accused, is not an equivalent to the usual form of statement that they must believe beyond a reasonable doubt. Riley v. State (Miss.) 18 South. 117, 118.

FULLY CURED.

A contract that a patient should be "fully and permanently cured" of the morphine habit means that the patient shall be restored to that normal condition of body and mind, with the same power to resist the desire to indulge in the use of the drug that he possessed and enjoyed before the habit was acquired, and not that the patient should be put into a condition where he could never again taste the drug. Wellman v. Jones, 27 South. 416, 418, 124 Ala. 580.

"Fully cured," as used in a contract for the sale of fully cured meat, means meat salted for 35 days; such being the meaning of the term in the trade. Featherston v. Rounsaville, 73 Ga. 617, 619.

FULLY DETERMINED.

Act Cong. March 3, 1875, c. 137, 18 Stat. 470 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 508], authorizes removal of causes to the United States courts when there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states and which can be fully determined between them, and either one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants actually interested may remove the cause. Held that the clause "a controversy which can be fully determined between them" must be read in connection with the words "actually interested in such controversy," and as so read implies that there may be other parties to the suit who may not be entitled to remove it, which parties must be indispensable to the determination of the controversy which is wholly between the citizens of different states; and hence a next friend, suing in behalf of a feme covert, was not an actual party to the controversy wholly between him and the defendant, so as to authorize a removal. Ruckman v. Pallsade Land Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. 367, 369 (citing Taylor v. Rockefeller, 18 Am. Law Reg. 307).

FULLY SATISFIED.

An instruction in a criminal prosecution that the jury must be "fully satisfied of defendant's guilt before they could convict," etc., is not prejudicial to the defendant on the ground that the words "fully satisfied" were used, instead of the phrase "satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt." The term "fully satisfied" is at least as favorable for the defendant as "satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt." The latter phrase implies that there may be a conviction, although there be ever so many doubts, other than reasonable, but "fully satisfied" is to the exclusion of all doubts, reasonable or other. State v. Sears, 61 N. C. 146, 147.

FULLED CLOTH.

"The term 'fulled cloth' is understood in common parlance with us to imply woolen fulled cloth." An allegation in a declaration that a note was payable in fulled cloth is supported by a note showing that it is payable in woolen fulled cloth. Wead v. Marsh, 14 Vt. 80, 83.

FUNCTION.

See "Judicial Function"; "Official Function."

"Functions," as used in Const. art. 3, § 1, dividing the powers of the government into the legislative, executive, and judicial, and providing that no person charged with official duties under one shall exercise any of the functions of another, except as in the Constitution expressly provided, means "duties." State v. Hyde, 22 N. E. 644, 646, 121 Ind. 20.

FUNCTIONAL DISEASE.

A function is a peculiar or appointed action; the word is derived from one which signifies to perform. "Functional disease" of the brain is some disease of that organ which prevents or interferes with the performance of its operation. Higbee v. Guardian Mut. Life Ins. Co. of New York (N. Y.) 69 Barb. 462, 472.

FUNCTUS OFFICIO.

Where there has been no levy under an execution, and the return day has expired, the writ is "functus officio," and confers no authority whatever, and any attempted levy and sale by virtue of it are nullities. Faull v. Cooke, 19 Or. 455, 26 Pac. 662, 664, 20 Am. St. Rep. 836.

FUND.

See "Assessment Fund"; "Bankable Funds"; "Canal Fund"; "Common School Fund"; "Current Funds"; "General Fund"; "Guaranty Company"; "Lawful Funds"; "New York Funds"; "Public Funds"; "Reserve Fund"; "Residuary Fund"; "School Fund"; "Sinking Fund"; "Statehouse Fund"; "Trust Fund."

Any other funds, see "Any Other."

The word "fund," in its broader meaning, may include property of every kind. In re Tatum, 70 N. Y. Supp. 634, 635, 61 App. Div. 513 (citing And. Law Dict.).

The use of the word "fund," in a devise of a life estate of all of testator's property, real and personal, to his wife, and directing that all the property remaining at her death shall constitute a fund for the support and maintenance of certain beneficiaries, savors of personality, which means something that can be invested and reinvested. It includes the intent that if, for the increase of income, any sales of realty shall become necessary, such sales could be lawfully made; the proceeds taking the place of the land sold as part of said fund. Bierce v. Bierce, 41 Ohio St. 241, 254.

Act April 11, 1866, concerning taxes, provides that the "endowment or fund" of any religious society, college, academy, seminary of learning, or public library shall be exempt from taxation. Held, that the words "endowment" and "fund," as used in this section, are words ejusdem generis, and are employed to signify property other than land; "fund," as a general term, including the endowment, which is that particular fund or part of a fund bestowed for its more permanent use. Nevin v. Krollman, 38 N. J. Law (9 Vroom) 574 (citing First Reformed Dutch Church of New Brunswick v. Lyon, 32 N. J. Law [3 Vroom] 360, 361).

Appropriation or collection of money.

The ordinary meaning of the word "fund," according to Webster, is a stock or capital, a sum of money appropriated as the foundation of some commercial or other operation, undertaken with a view to profit, and by means of which expenses and credits are supported. Bouille v. Tompkins (N. Y.) 5 Redf. Sur. 472, 477.

A fund is a deposit of resources, or money appropriated as the foundation of some commercial operation, or a store laid up to draw from. Lane v. Madgeburg, 51 N. W. 562, 563, 81 Wis. 344.

A "fund" is merely a name for a collection or an appropriation of money. It may be nothing but a designation of one branch of the accounts of the state, or of a certain amount of money, when collected, to be applied to a particular purpose. It may have no property and represent no investments, and what are called its revenues may include all the moneys appropriated or directed to be paid to it, or for its benefit, or that of the objects it represents. People v. New York Cent. R. Co. (N. Y.) 34 Barb. 123, 135.

The word "fund," as used in Const. art. 7, § 2, providing for the establishment of a perpetual school fund, means the entire property from which money is to be derived for maintenance of public free schools, the foundation on which rests the support of the system of schools which it is made the duty of the Legislature to establish and maintain. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. State, 13 S. W. 618, 623, 77 Tex. 367.

The term "fund" in Act June 2, 1859, § 11, requiring the Secretary of State to examine and determine the claims of all persons against the state in cases where provisions for the payment thereof shall have been made by law, and to indorse upon the same the amount due and allowed thereon, and from what fund the same is to be paid, does not mean a fund specially appropriated and set aside by the Legislature for the payment of the designated claim, or of a designated class of which it constitutes one. With much greater reason we may infer that it had reference to some one of the few funds that are provided for under general laws in pursuance of fundamental enactments. The term "fund" is not synonymous with "appropriation," and as a matter of fact there are not many separate funds in the treasury; but there may be appropriations, and most of the latter are payable out of the general fund. Shattuck v. Kincaid, 49 Pac. 758, 762, 31 Or. 379.

In Ketchum v. City of Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 356, Selden, J., says: "The term 'fund' was originally applied to a portion of the national revenue set apart or pledged to the payment of a particular debt." Under the title of "National Debt," the Encyclopædia Britannica says: "In the early days of the English national debt, a special tax or fund was appropriated to the payment of the interest on each particular loan. This was the original meaning of 'funds,' a term which has now come to signify the national debt generally." In Bouv. Law Dict. (Rawle's Ed.) p. 862. it is said: "The national debt of England consists of many different loans, all of which are included in the term 'funds.' People v. Carpenter, 52 N. Y. Supp. 781, 783, 31 App. Div. 603.

Checks, notes, bills, stocks, and bonds.

"Funds" include moneys and much more, such as notes, bills, checks, drafts, stocks, and bonds. United States v. Greve (U. S.) 65 Fed. 488, 490; Hasbrook v. Palmer (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 766; Ayres v. Lawrence, 59 N. Y. 192, 198.

Webster defines the word "funds" as "the stock of a national bank; public securities; evidences of money lent to government, for which interest is paid at prescribed intervals." This is a general ordinary meaning of the term. Treasury certificates may be regarded as funds. Ramsey v. Cox, 28 Ark. 366, 368.

A will by which testator desired that his executor should purchase annuities for each of his two sisters of £100 a year each, the said annuities to be purchased in the "British funds," meant nothing more than that it was to be British security, and not any private security, nor security of any foreign state. Kerr v. Middlesex Hospital, 17 Eng. Law & Eq. 66, 70.

In an action on a note payable in "Philadelphia funds," it was said that Philadelphia funds were not money, but consisted of notes, checks, or bills upon banks or individuals in Philadelphia, or of other means of procuring money there. It was held that an action of debt would not lie, as such action is limited to the recovery of a certain and determinate sum of money. January v. Henry, 19 Ky. (3 T. B. Mon.) 8.

The word "funds," or money and proceeds of sale, which a county treasurer is required to keep safe under the statutes, should not be confined in their meaning to coin and bank bills. State v. Krug, 12 Wash. 288, 41 Pac. 126; Byrom v. Brandreth, 16 L. R. Eq. 475. And checks or certificates of deposit received in good faith by the board of revenue and delivered to the treasurer would be funds or money or the proceeds of the sale of bonds in the hands of the treasurer. Montgomery County v. Cochran, 121 Fed. 17, 21, 57 C. C. A. 261.

Credits or debts due.

"Funds," as used in the acceptance of a bill by which the acceptor agreed to pay when in "funds" of the drawer, means cash, and does not include demands which were good and available and subject to his control as treasurer. These, until collected, were not "funds," within the meaning of the acceptance. Campbell v. Pettengill, 7 Me. (7 Greenl.) 126, 129, 20 Am. Dec. 349.

In Laws 1872, c. 161, authorizing actions against public officers for the purpose of preventing waste or injury to any property, funds, or estate of the county "upon a fair and reasonable interpretation, the term 'funds' embraces, not only property and funds in possession, but the credit and power of borrowing money in anticipation of taxation and other processes and means by which the municipal corporation may be charged pecuniarily, or the taxable property within its limits burdened." Ayres v. Lawrence, 59 N. Y. 192, 198.

A bequest of all the rest and residue of testator's funds, after providing for the discharge of certain legacies and payment of debts, to his two sons, means and includes debts due to the testator. Webster says the term "funds" means, among other things, money lent to government; constitutional and national debt. It is not a legal term with a settled meaning, but is a term in common use. It does not mean a chattel, or furniture, or the like, but money and securities, more especially government securities. Perry v. Hunter, 2 R. I. 80, 87.

As used in an order to pay when in funds, drawn by a consignor on his consignee in favor of a third person, the term "funds" is equivalent to "in debt to the drawer," which, by reason of the factor's right of absolute appropriation, cannot be while the principal is indebted to the factor. Funds in the consignee's hands, subject at his discretion to be applied in discharge of balances due to him, can scarcely be said to be funds belonging to the principal, or, at all events, within the meaning of such a contract as this. The factor cannot be in funds to discharge the debts of third persons. Gillespie v. Mather, 10 Pa. (10 Barr) 28, 33.

"Funds," as used in Code, § 1072, providing a penalty for the diversion of the "funds" of the corporations to other objects than those mentioned in their charters, is not limited to cash on hand, but includes all the resources of corporations. Miller v. Bradish, 23 N. W. 594, 595, 69 Iowa, 278.

The word "funds," as used in a statement by a surveyor to a committee formed for the purpose of organizing a railroad company, that he would make no claim for his services until there should be sufficient funds of the company to meet any demand he might be entitled to make, does not apply to deposits made with the committee by the prospective shareholders. Landman v. Entwistle, 7 Exch. *632, *636.

Money.

The term "funds," as employed in commercial transactions, according to its usual acceptation and signification, means money. Galena Ins. Co. v. Kupfer, 28 Ill. (18 Peck) 332, 335, 81 Am. Dec. 284; Hatch v. First Nat. Bank, 47 Atl. 908, 909, 94 Me. 348, 80 Am. St. Rep. 401.

The expression "in funds," as used in an acceptance of a bill, to be paid as soon as the acceptor should find himself "in funds," means that he must have had money in hand to pay it, which condition is not fulfilled by his having other property in his hands of greater value than the sum named in the bill. Carlisle v. Hooks, 58 Tex. 420, 421 (citing Marshall v. Clary, 44 Ga. 511, 513; Gentry v. Owen, 14 Ark. 396, 60 Am. Dec. 549; Nagle v. Homer, 8 Cal. 353; Liggett v. Weed, 7 Kan. 273; Gallery v. Prindle [N. Y.] 14 Barb. 186, 190; Daniel, Neg. Inst. 508, 514; Mitchell v. Clary, 8 Tex. 443, 446; Salinas v. Wright, 11 Tex. 572; Rowlett v. Lane, 43 Tex. 274).

An indictment charging the embezzlement of "moneys and funds" means moneys and some other species or character of funds. The word "funds" is not used in the alternative as a synonym. It is used in the conjunctive. United States v. Greve (U. S.) 65 Fed. 488, 490.

Within the meaning of the statute providing that, in the payment of creditors of an insolvent corporation and in the distribution of the corporation funds, the creditors shall be paid proportionately, etc., the term "funds" means the proceeds of sales of real and personal estate and the proceeds of any other assets converted into funds. Everything is supposed to be converted into money, and there was no authority for distribution of equitable assets. Doane v. Milville Mut. Marine & Fire Ins. Co., 43 N. J. Eq. (16 Stew.) 522, 533, 11 Atl. 739, 742.

A fund is a deposit or collection of resources from which supplies are drawn, or out of which expenses are provided, or which may be available for the payment of debts or the discharge of liabilities. As used in Rev. St. Ind. 1881, § 5850, which provides that the clerks of the several courts throughout this state are hereby authorized to receive money in payment of all judgments, dues, and demands of record in their respective offices, and all such funds may be ordered to be paid into the respective courts, of which they are clerks, by the judges thereof, etc., "funds" has a much broader meaning than the word "moneys," as ordinarily used, and, while the two words are often used as convertible terms, the former is much more than the equivalent of the latter. Jewett v. State, 94 Ind. 549, 551.

In Laws 1879, c. 14, providing that each order drawn on a school district treasurer shall specify whether the money is to be paid from the teacher's fund, the contingent fund, or schoolhouse fund, and, in case the treasurer has no money in the fund drawn on to pay such school warrant, he shall indorse on it, "Not paid for want of funds," "funds" should be construed as meaning moneys generally, and not any special fund, as distinguished from all others. Capital Bank of St. Paul v. School Dist. No. 53, 48 N. W. 363, 366, 1 N. D. 479.

As put into interest-bearing obligations.

To fund "is to put into the form of bonds or stocks bearing regular interest, and to provide and appropriate a fund or permanent revenue for the payment of the interest." Merrill v. Town of Monticello (U. S.) 22 Fed. 589, 596 (citing Webst. Dict.; Bouv. Law Dict.).

"Fund," as used in a will directing executors to settle up and fund testator's estate within a certain period, should be construed, as it is ordinarily understood in such connection, to signify capitalizing with a view to the production of interest. Stephen's Ex'rs v. Milnor, 24 N. J. Eq. (9 C. E. Green) 358, 376.

FUNDAMENTAL ERROR.

That error is a "fundamental error" which goes to the merits of the plaintiff's cause of action, and will be considered, whether assigned as error or not, where the justice of the case seems to require it. Hollywood v. Wellhausen, 68 S. W. 329, 331, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 541.

FUNDED DEBT.

Within Laws N. Y. 1853, c. 603, § 6, prohibiting a municipal corporation from contracting any funded debt, except in the mode prescribed, a funded debt is a debt for the payment of the principal or interest of which some fund was appropriated. Bouvier says: "'Funded debt' is that part of the national debt for which certain funds are appropriated toward the payment of the interest." And this definition corresponds with that given by all writers on the subject. The term, even in common parlance, is never made use of to describe an ordinary debt growing out of a transaction with one individual and represented by a single instrument. It is essential to the idea of a funded debt, even under the broadest use of the term, that the debt should be divided into parts or shares, represented by different instruments, so that such parts or shares may be readily transferable. A debt incurred by the purchase of market grounds on credit is not a funded debt. Ketchum v. City of Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 356, 367.

The term "funded debt," as used in the Constitution, providing that no funded debt should be contracted for a municipal corporation, unless for a specific object, should be construed in its proper etymological sense, and means a debt requiring a variety of things to create it, and certain provisions to be made before it can be contracted, which insure the payment of the interest thereon and provide a second fund for the redemption of the principal of the debt, if it is protected by a law of the Legislature binding on the corporation, or which in effect pledges all the taxable property for the payment of interest and principal, and which may be enforced by mandamus. Ketchum v. City of Buffalo (N. Y.) 21 Barb. 294, 305.

Within the meaning of the general municipal law relating to the different kinds of debts of a municipality, of which the headings of the sections are: (4) "Temporary Loans"; (5) "Funded Debt"; (6) "Payment of Municipal Bonds"; (7) "Funded and Bonded Debts"—a temporary loan seems to be one which is to be paid with and by the taxes of a current fiscal year, while the funded debt seems to be one where provision is to be made for the annual raising by tax of the sum necessary to pay the interest and principal as they respectively mature. As thus used, the term "funded debt" includes all municipal indebtedness embraced within or evidenced by a bond, the principal of which is payable at a time beyond the current fiscal year of its issue, with periodical terms for the payment of interest, and where provision is made for payment by raising of the necessary funds by future taxation and the quasi pledging in advance of the municipal revenue. People v. Carpenter, 52 N. Y. Supp. 781, 783, 31 App. Div. 603.

The term "funded debt," as used in a will directing the payment from the proceeds of the sale of certain property of testator's funded debt, though not ordinarily used in connection with the debts of an individual, must, when so used, necessarily refer to debts which are embodied in securities of a permanent character and to the payment of which certain property has been applied or pledged. The funded debts are mortgage debts. Wells v. Wells, 24 N. Y. Supp. 874, 875, 30 Abb. N. C. 225.

FUNDING.

The term "funding" has been sometimes applied in this country to the process of collecting together a variety of outstanding debts against corporations, the principal of which was payable at short periods, and borrowing money on the bonds or stocks of the corporation to pay them off; the principal of such bonds or stocks being made payable at periods comparatively remote. Ketchum v. City of Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 356, 367; People v. Carpenter, 52 N. Y. Supp. 781, 783, 31 App. Div. 603.

Within the meaning of Laws 1898, p. 84, authorizing executors and administrators to mortgage real property of the states for the purpose of funding the estate debts, the word "funding" was evidently designed to mean the borrowing of a sufficient sum of money to discharge the claims against an estate by creating another debt in lieu thereof; and, while an estate may owe only one person a certain sum, it is just as much an indebtedness, and equally as susceptible of being funded as though the claim were divided into a given number of parts and held by several creditors. Lawrey v. Sterling, 69 Pac. 460, 465, 41 Or. 518.

FUNDING SYSTEM.

"Funding system" is defined to be a plan which provides that on the creation of a public loan funds shall immediately be formed and secured by law for the payment of the interest, and also for the gradual redemption of the capital itself. Merrill v. Town of Monticello (U. S.) 22 Fed. 589, 596.

FUNDS IN HAND.

The term "funds in hand," in a will directing the education of testator's children from the proceeds of his plantation and the funds in hand, means cash on hand and money due the estate by bond, note, or other security. Marrow v. Marrow, 45 N. C. 148, 156.

Where a correspondent was limited in his purchases for shipment by vessel to the application of funds in his hands, such term includes in mercantile language the balance due by the correspondent on general account. Parsons v. Armor, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.) 413, 430, 7 L. Ed. 724.

FUNERAL.

The term "funeral," as used in a petition alleging that by the negligence of defendant plaintiff was unable to attend the funeral of his mother, seems to have been used to convey the same meaning as obseques, a rite or ceremony pertaining to burial, where plaintiff admits that he was present at the burial. Graddy v. Western Union Tel. Co. (Ky.) 43 S. W. 468, 469.

FUNERAL CHARGE OR EXPENSE.

Funeral expenses have been held not to be a debt against the estate of decedent or a charge upon his estate. Sullivan v. Horner, 7 Atl. 411, 413, 41 N. J. Eq. 299 (citing Patterson v. Patterson, 59 N. Y. 574, 17 Am. Rep. 384; Schouler, Ex'rs, § 421).

Funeral expenses are not a debt, but properly a charge on the estate of the deceased, and if the executor voluntarily pays them he shall be allowed such payment before all others, because it is a work of charity and piety. Gregory v. Hooker's Adm'r, 8 N. C. 394, 402, 9 Am. Dec. 646.

Under Rev. St. § 6090, providing that "every executor shall proceed with diligence to pay the debts of the deceased, and shall apply the assets in payment of debts: (1) The funeral expenses, those of last sickness, and the expenses of administration; (2) the allowance made to the widow and children for their support," etc., funeral expenses are to be considered as debts of the deceased, though manifestly they cannot be treated as contract debts, and in the settlement of the estate of a married woman such expenses are claims against her estate, to be paid by the executor, and not claims against her surviving husband. McClellan v. Filson, 44 Ohio St. 184, 188, 5 N. E. 861, 862, 58 Am. Rep. 814.

Funeral charges are those which are incurred for the interment of a person deceased. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3192.

Attendance on interment.

"Funeral expenses," as a charge on a decedent's estate, do not include a charge by the plaintiff, with whom decedent lived at the time of his death, for dinner and horse feed furnished to persons who had attended the funeral of the deceased. Shaeffer v. Shaeffer, 54 Md. 679, 684, 39 Am. Rep. 406.

The funeral expenses which an administrator may properly allow include the necessary charges attending the interment of the deceased and the executor's traveling expenses in taking the remains to the place of interment. Hasler v. Hasler (N. Y.) 1 Bradf. Sur. 248, 249.

Burial or mourning clothing.

The duty of burying the deceased devolves upon the personal representative, if there be one duly qualified, and in his absence any friend may see to the due performance of the funeral rites, and a personal representative will be liable to him for the expenses incurred, though he neither ordered the expenditure nor even knew of it. A suit of clothes in which deceased was buried was held properly included in the item of funeral expenses, although not purchased by the executor. Steger v. Frizzell, 2 Tenn. Ch. 369, 371.

A funeral embraces, not only the solemnization of interment, but the ceremonies and accompaniments attending the same. Such ceremonies are prompted by affection, and their character is to some extent determined by the religious faith and sentiment of the friends of the deceased, and the station in life which had been occupied by the deceased. The wearing of suitable mourning apparel is commonly regarded, not only as a proper, but almost indispensable, mark of affection and evidence of grief, and hence the cost of mourning costumes for the widow will be included in the term "funeral expenses." In re Wachter's Estate, 38 N. Y. Supp. 941, 944, 16 Misc. Rep. 137; Allen v. Allen (N. Y.) 3 Dem. Sur. 524, 525.

The cost of mourning apparel for the widow is not regarded as a part of the funeral expenses. Macknet's Ex'rs v. Macknet, 24 N. J. Eq. (9 C. E. Green) 277, 296; Appeal of Flintham (Pa.) 11 Serg. & R. 16, 17.

Improvement of cemetery lot.

The term "funeral expenses" does not include a debt incurred by decedent's widow in inclosing the burial lot. In re Meyer's Estate (Pa.) 18 Phila. 42.

The expenses, amounting to $2,400, for inclosing and curbing the cemetery lot, were improvements of real estate, and could not be allowed as funeral expenses. In re Barclay's Estate (Pa.) 33 Leg. Int. 108, 11 Phila. 123.

Monument.

The expense of erecting a suitable monument over the grave of deceased is to be classed among the funeral expenses. Pease v. Christman, 64 N. E. 90, 91, 158 Ind. 642; Lutz v. Gates, 17 N. W. 747, 62 Iowa, 513; Crapo v. Armstrong, 17 N. W. 41, 42, 61 Iowa, 697; Ferrin v. Myrick, 41 N. Y. 315, 325; Laird v. Arnold (N. Y.) 42 Hun, 136, 138; In re Howard's Estate, 23 N. Y. Supp. 836, 841, 3 Misc. Rep. 170; Owens v. Bloomer (N. Y.) 14 Hun, 296, 297; Cornwell v. Beck (N. Y.) 2 Redf. Sur. 87, 90; In re Barclay's Estate (Pa.) 35 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 108, 11 Phila. 123, 2 Wkly. Notes Cas. 447; In re Meyer's Estate (Pa.) 18 Phila. 42; Sheetz's Estate (Pa.) 2 Woodw. Dec. 407, 409; Griffiths' Estate (Pa.) 1 Lack. Leg. N. 311; In re Webb's Estate, 30 Atl. 827, 828, 165 Pa. 330, 44 Am. St. Rep. 666, 36 Wkly. Notes Cas. 571; Hatchett v. Curbow, 59 Ala. 516, 521; Van Emon v. Superior Court of Tulare County, 18 Pac. 877, 76 Cal. 589, 9 Am. St. Rep. 258; Donald v. McWhorton, 44 Miss. 124, 129.

Funeral expenses should be construed to include the cost of tombstones, which are not a necessary part of the expenses of settling an estate, for the estate can well be settled and closed without procuring them. Tombstones are connected with the burial, and properly belong to that part of the expenditures. Expenditures for digging and filling the grave certainly are, and the stones placed at each end of the grave are so placed to mark, define, and protect it. The inscription on the stone may be more extended than is necessary for that purpose, but that is the principal object. They are not set up at the time of the burial, because not then prepared, but they are, when set up, fixtures of the grave, as bounds and fences are fixtures of land, and the sums paid for them should be considered a part of the funeral expenses. Appeal of Fairman, 30 Conn. 205, 209.

Portrait of deceased.

The funeral expenses properly allowable as claims against the estate of a deceased properly include a tombstone, but do not include a portrait of deceased, painted after the death for his widow. If the widow desires a memorial of this kind, she should pay for it. Appeal of McGlinsey (Pa.) 14 Serg. & R. 64, 66.

Post mortem examination.

Funeral expenses do not include a liability incurred for the services of physicians in performing a post mortem examination; such examinations being only in the interest of the advancement of science or the enforcement of criminal laws, and having nothing to do with the settlement of the decedent's estate or his interment. Smith v. McLaughlin, 77 Ill. 596, 597.

Removal of body to place of burial.

Where deceased died in Florida, whither he had gone in quest of health, from his domicile in Philadelphia, and out of respect for family associations he was buried in Connecticut, the expenses of taking the body from Florida to the place of burial were properly included and allowed the executor as funeral expenses. In re Carpenter's Estate (Pa.) 16 Phila. 290.

Wake.

The expenses of a wake preceding the burial of a deceased person, where the same simply consisted of the performance of a custom of watching at night over the corpse, and where it was not given merely as a pretense for pandering to the appetites of the living, the fare furnished for the watchers, consisting merely of cheese, crackers, and tobacco, were properly allowed against a decedent's estate as funeral charges. In re Johnson's Estate, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 1, 3.

FUR.

In Astor v. Union Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 202, 204, evidence was held to be properly admitted showing that by the usage of the trade skins valuable chiefly on account of the fur were called "fur," while "skins" was a term appropriated to those which were valuable chiefly for the skin, by which we understand the skin with the hair removed. Seeberger v. Schlesinger, 14 Sup. Ct. 729, 731, 152 U. S. 581, 38 L. Ed. 560.

Hat bodies, which are made partly of the soft substance which is taken from the skin of rabbits and partly from the wool of sheep, are not "fur," within the meaning of the Carriers' act (St. 11 Geo. IV and 1 Wm. IV, c. 68). Mayhew v. Nelson, 6 Car. & P. 58.

"Fur skins of all kinds not dressed in any manner," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 588, includes raw Angora goat-skins, with the hair on, being for all commercial purposes undressed fur skins; it being unprofitable to separate the hair from the skin and to use the hair as wool. United States v. Bennet (U. S.) 66 Fed. 290, 300, 13 C. C. A. 446.

FURNACE.

The word "furnace," in a claim for a patent, implies something which may be properly called a furnace. The prominent indispensable concept of such a structure is some sort of an inclosed combustion chamber with top, sides, and bottom, or floor. Indeed, such term would not be applicable to a structure without a floor. Bryce Bros. Co. v. National Glass Co. (U. S.) 116 Fed. 186, 190, 53 C. C. A. 611.

"Furnace," as used in a lease restricting the lessee from using the premises for the purpose of a forge or furnace for the manufacture of iron, means an establishment or mechanical contrivance by which iron is made or manufactured from the ore. A blast furnace makes cast iron direct from the ore. Rogers v. Danforth, 9 N. J. Eq. (1 Stockt.) 289, 293.

A furnace may have one stack or more, in which case it is sometimes called "furnaces," and sometimes "a furnace" with stacks of a specified number. Negaunee Iron Co. v. Iron Cliffs Co. (Mich.) 96 N. W. 468, 475.

Forge distinguished.

The difference between a "forge" and a "furnace," so far as the ordinary use of those words in connection with actual work is concerned, is this: A furnace is used to melt ores in making metals, or to melt metals in working them, while a forge is used to heat metals to hammer them into a desired form, and not to melt them; and hence a forge in which a fire is maintained for the purpose of carrying on the ordinary business of a blacksmith is not a furnace, within the meaning of Laws 1892, c. 419, §§ 116, 117, providing that no furnace, except for the purpose of heating, shall be placed in any building without a permit from the department for the inspection of buildings. City of Boston v. Sarni, 56 N. E. 607, 175 Mass. 357.

A "furnace for the manufacture of iron" is defined to be an establishment or mechanical contrivance by which iron is made or manufactured from the ore. A forge manufactures or makes malleable iron direct from the ore. A blast furnace makes cast iron direct from the ore. Rogers v. Danforth, 9 N. J. Eq. (1 Stockt.) 289, 296.

FURNACE PLANT.

A lease requiring the lessees to keep the furnace plant in proper and sufficient repair covered six salt wells used in connection with the entire plant; the word "plant" from a commercial point being defined by Webster as the whole machinery and apparatus employed in carrying on a trade or mechanical business, also sometimes including real estate and whatever represents investment of capital in the means of carrying on the business, but not including material worked upon or finished products, as the plant of a foundry, a mill, or a railroad. Clifton v. Montague, 21 S. E. 858, 860, 40 W. Va. 207, 33 L. R. A. 449, 52 Am. St. Rep. 872.

FURNISH.

Supplies furnished, see "Supplies."

A contract letting a farm for a year on equal shares, the lessor agreeing to furnish 20 cows, a horse and harness, and all the farming tools, including dairy utensils, imposes an obligation on the lessor as continuous as the lease, by which he undertook to supply the lessee with 20 cows, not only at the commencement of the term, but during the term. Gregory v. Tomlinson, 35 Atl. 350, 351, 68 Vt. 410.

To furnish means to supply or provide, so that a contract assuming debts incurred in furnishing a hotel covered debts incurred in the purchase of liquor supplied to the hotel. Delp v. Bartholomy Brewing Co., 15 Atl. 871, 873, 123 Pa. 42.

A contract between a user of water and an irrigation company provided that "the said company agrees that when it shall have sold and have outstanding and in force a number of water rights equal to the estimated capacity of the company's canal to furnish water it will then issue and deliver to the holder of each water right who shall have complied with the terms and conditions of this contract, without further consideration, four shares of the stock of the said company for every water right hereby sold, which the purchaser hereof agrees to accept." Held, that the word "furnish," taken alone, might be deemed the equivalent of the word "supply," but inasmuch as the clause in which it occurs is continuous, not separated by punctuation, and the word "furnish" is modified, explained, and controlled by the preceding words "estimated capacity," it was evident that the contracts were predicated on the estimated carrying capacity of the canal, and not on the supply of water, which would necessarily be fluctuating. Wyatt v. Larimer & W. Irr. Co., 29 Pac. 906, 913, 1 Colo. App. 480.

The word "furnish," in a bond by defendant to plaintiff, who resided together in the same house, to furnish keeping for the plaintiff's cattle both winter and summer, was construed to mean "provide for," and not to require defendant to feed the cattle. Erskine v. Erskine, 13 N. H. 436, 443.

The word "furnished," as used in Syracuse City Charter, § 199, providing that the city marshal may be removed for cause on charges duly furnished, implies that the charges shall be furnished to some official or body. In re Freeman, 50 N. Y. Supp. 520, 522, 27 App. Div. 593.

"To furnish" means to provide for use, to supply, and to furnish or supply necessarily carries with it the idea of ownership, property in, or dominion over the thing furnished by the one who furnishes; and a carrier who transports for hire a package containing spirituous liquors, and whose only undertaking is to carry the goods to destination, does not by delivery violate Laws 1884-85, c. 541, § 1, providing that it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to sell "or furnish at any place of business or any other public place" any intoxicating, alcoholic, spirituous, or malt liquors within the limits of a certain county. Southern Exp. Co. v. State, 33 S. E. 637, 638, 107 Ga. 670, 46 L. R. A. 417, 73 Am. St. Rep. 146.

The word "furnish," as used in the chapter relating to traffic in intoxicating liquor, shall apply to cases where a person knowingly brings into or transports within the state for another person intoxicating liquor intended to be sold or disposed of contrary to law, or to be divided among or distributed to others. V. S. 1894, 4461.

"Furnish" and "convey" are words of widely different meaning. To furnish a thing and to convey it signify very different acts. To furnish is to provide or supply anything wanted by another; to convey is to bear, carry, or transport the thing to another person or place. A person at a distance may furnish the article desired upon request by letter or otherwise, and another may convey it, to the person for whom it is intended. One may furnish, provide, or supply a person confined in jail with food, which another may convey into the jail to the person therein confined. Therefore to furnish a person who is confined in jail with anything may, and ordinarily does, mean quite a different act from what we understand by the words "shall convey into jail." Thus an indictment charging the defendant with "furnishing" certain articles to a person confined in jail is not sufficient to describe the crime created by Pen. Code, art. 321, which makes it criminal to convey into jail any disguised instrument, etc. Francis v. State, 21 Tex. 280, 285.

As deliver.

A contract in terms to furnish coal on the cars at a particular place is in effect an agreement to there deliver the coal to the buyer, though by the terms of the contract it was to be weighed at another place, to which it was to be conveyed. Watson Coal & Mining Co. v. James, 72 Iowa, 184, 33 N. W. 622, 623.

The word "furnished," in a contract by a contractor with a subcontractor that, in event of the cancellation of the contract of the principal contractor, the subcontractor shall be paid for labor done and materials furnished up to the day of such cancellation, is not equivalent to the word "delivered," and the right of the subcontractor to recover for materials furnished is not restricted to such materials as have been delivered, inspected, and received at the time of the cancellation of the contract, but he is also entitled to pay for materials procured or prepared to be furnished for the work. Dickinson v. Gray (Ky.) 8 S. W. 876, 880.

The furnishing of materials, within the meaning of a mechanic's lien law giving a lien on goods furnished, does not import that the material man has delivered the materials in the building in the construction of which they are furnished, but only means that the person selling the materials has delivered, or has them ready for delivery, at the place where he had agreed to deliver them under his contract. Tibbetts v. Moore, 23 Cal. 208, 214.

Mechanic's Lien Law, § 8, requiring that the statement filed shall contain the time when the first and last items of labor or material were furnished, and providing that the statement, when filed, shall operate to continue such lien during all the period of time from the time of the furnishing of the first item of such labor until the expiration of one year after the time of furnishing the last item of the same, means furnished on the premises, and the liens of mechanics or material men all attach as of the date of the performance of the first work or the delivery of the first material on the ground. Wentworth v. Tubbs, 55 N. W. 543, 544, 53 Minn. 388.

"Furnished," as used in How. Ann. St. Mich. § 8236, declaring that every water craft, etc., shall be subject to a lien for all debts contracted by the owner, etc., on account of work done or materials furnished by mechanics, tradesmen, or others in and about the building, repairing, fitting, furnishing, or equipping of such craft, means "ordered for and delivered to" or near the vessel. It is immaterial to the validity of the lien if they are subsequently diverted and used for other vessels. The James H. Prentice (U. S.) 36 Fed. 777, 782.

A contract for goods to be "furnished along the line of" a certain railroad contemplates their shipment over such railroad and delivery by it to the purchaser. Silvestri v. Missocchi, 43 N. E. 114, 165 Mass. 337.

A contract to furnish coal on cars at a particular place is in effect an agreement to deliver the coal there to the purchaser, though by the terms of the contract it is to be weighed at another place, to which it is to be conveyed. Watson Coal & Min. Co. v. James, 33 N. W. 622, 623, 72 Iowa, 184.

As furnish at own expense.

The first part of a contract for the building and completion of a church edifice provided that the contractor was to complete the same by a day named, "weather permitting, and stone for front and footing being furnished." Subsequently the church authorities covenanted to pay the contractor a certain sum of money, in consideration that he would furnish all materials and faithfully and fully execute the work, etc. Held, that the word "furnish" should be construed to include all the materials necessary to complete the work, which the other party had not previously contracted to furnish, namely the stone for front and footing, since the first clause, standing alone, would obligate the other party to furnish the stone for the front and footing. Vermont St. M. E. Church v. Brose, 104 Ill. 206, 211.

A contract for the repair of a building, which provides that the contractor is to "furnish all the material therefor," should be construed to mean that the contractor is to furnish the same at his own expense. Mackenzie v. Board of School Trustees of Edinburg, 72 Ind. 189, 196.

As give away or permit to be given.

As used in Act 1852, providing that any person shall not sell or furnish intoxicating liquors, etc., to other persons, etc., "furnish" is synonymous with "give away." Literally, the word "furnish" would include both selling and giving away, and every other mode of putting spirits in the power of another. Selling seems to be one distinct mode of offense by itself. Furnishing was intended only to include such furnishing as was done by dealers in the article, where it was not in terms sold. It may include other modes of affording it to others besides giving away, but clearly does include this. State v. Freeman, 27 Vt. 520.

The word "furnishing," in Acts Mich. 1877, p. 72, No. 92, making the furnishing of intoxicating liquors to minors a crime, is somewhat broader than the word "giving," and means letting a minor have liquor, and therefore a saloon keeper, who without protest allows an adult to buy intoxicating liquor and give it to the minor to drink, is guilty of a violation of the statute. People v. Neumann, 48 N. W. 290, 85 Mich. 98.

"Selling or furnishing liquor," within the meaning of the statute making it criminal to sell or furnish intoxicating liquor, includes the selling or giving away of a quart of whisky for the use of a sick person. Dukes v. State, 77 Ga. 738.

As obtain or procure.

"Furnish," as used in Code Iowa, § 4727, providing that the keeper of each jail must furnish necessary clothing, bedding, fuel, and medical aid for all persons under his charge, means to obtain or procure. Feldenheimer v. Woodbury County, 9 N. W. 315, 56 Iowa, 379.

Sale or transfer of title imported.

A contract to furnish a team of horses or mules, wagons, gear, etc., necessary for country peddling, for which there should be paid $5 weekly until 200 payments had been made, when the owner of the property should relinquish his title thereto, was a contract of bailment, and not a conditional sale. The use of such a word as "furnish," vague as it is in its signification, would leave the clause in which it occurs of ambiguous import, if there was nothing beside to indicate the sense in which it was employed. It might imply a sale, a lease, a loan, a gift, or a delivery of chattels in payment of a debt, in accordance with its context and its subject-matter. Enlow v. Klein, 79 Pa. (29 P. F. Smith) 488, 490.

The term "furnish," in Laws 1885, p. 78, § 3, providing that all persons having claims unaudited by the state board of drainage directors for materials furnished under the act to promote drainage, approved April 8, 1880, may present the same and have them allowed, etc., imports a taking and a paying of compensation sufficient to divest the title from the owner, and therefore such land cannot be said to be furnished in such a sense as to entitle the owner to damages, in the absence of the proper proceedings and paying of compensation. Callahan v. Dunn, 20 Pac. 737, 738, 78 Cal. 366.

As sold and delivered.

Laws 1889, c. 200, § 1, provides that one who furnishes material for a building shall have a lien thereon. Held, that in the ordinary understanding of the term the material is "furnished" when it is sold and delivered for the purpose of the erection. Burns v. Sewell, 48 Minn. 425, 51 N. W. 224.

Furnish a building or hotel.

As used in Act April 20, 1830, § 1, providing that every mechanic or workman performing any work toward the "erection, construction, or furnishing" of any building, etc., does not include work performed in flagging sidewalks, yards, and areas of buildings in the process of erection. McDermott v. Palmer, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 383, 386.

A bill of sale of a leasehold interest in a hotel, containing an agreement that purchaser would assume and pay all "debts made in furnishing said hotel," would include a debt for liquor bought for use in said hotel. Delp v. Bartholomay Brewing Co., 15 Atl. 871, 873, 123 Pa. 42.

Furnish evidence.

As used in the Constitution of Massachusetts providing that no subject shall be compelled to "furnish evidence against himself," the quoted phrase should be construed as protecting the person from being compelled to disclose the circumstances of his offense or the sources from which or the means by which evidence of its commission or of his connection with it may be obtained or made effectual for his conviction without using his answers as direct admissions against him. For all practical purposes such disclosures would have the effect to furnish evidence against the parties making them. They might furnish the only means of discovering the names of those who could give evidence concerning the transaction, the instrument by which a crime was perpetrated, or even the corpus delicti itself. This protection extends as well to investigations before a legislative body as to proceedings in a court of justice. In re Emery, 107 Mass. 172, 182, 9 Am. Rep. 22.

Furnish labor.

Act Ky. March 27, 1888, which gives a lien on a railroad, etc., in favor of persons "furnishing labor or materials for the construction or improvement" of any railroad, canal, etc., includes supplying laborers and teams by a contractor for the construction and repair of a railroad, and hence the contractor is entitled to a lien therefor. Tod v. Kentucky Union Ry. Co. (U. S.) 52 Fed. 241, 3 C. C. A. 60, 18 L. R. A. 305.

"When the law says the material man shall have a lien for all 'materials furnished or used' in and about the construction of bridges, it means such materials as ordinarily enter into or are used in the construction of bridges, and which are fairly within the express or implied terms of the contract between the owner and the contractor. It does not mean the machinery that may be used for the manufacture of the materials themselves. The machinery thus used is the plant of the contractor, and can in no sense be said to be materials furnished or used in building the bridges." Basshor v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 3 Atl. 285, 286, 65 Md. 99.

Under Comp. St. c. 54, § 1, art. 2, granting a lien for labor performed or material furnished in the construction, repair, and equipment of the railroad, lumber sold to a subcontractor on a railway for the erection of shanties for his employes and stables for his teams will not be included. Stewart Chute Lumber Co. v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 49 N. W. 769, 33 Neb. 29.

"Furnishing material," within the meaning of the laws relating to mechanics' liens, includes work done or prepared at the yard or shop of the contractor. Howes v. Reliance Wire Works Co., 48 N. W. 448, 449, 46 Minn. 44.

Pub. St. c. 177, § 1, gave a lien only for materials used in the construction, erection, and reparation, which had been furnished by the person contracted with or requested by the owner of the estate improved. Held, that the word "furnished" might be thought to cover materials furnished to the contractor on general account, as well as materials furnished to him for use in the performance of his contract. We think, however, that the word, taken in connection with its context, must receive the more limited interpretation; that is, for the lien to attach for the benefit of the materialman, the materials must not have only been "used in the construction, erection, or reparation," but must also have been furnished by him to be used so. Gurney v. Walsham, 16 R. I. 698, 700, 19 Atl. 823, 825.

"Furnished," as used in a resolution of the City of Detroit passed October 1, 1864, declaring that the city would pay $100 to each person or persons who furnished satisfactory evidence that he or they had furnished a person who had been mustered into the service of the United States, etc., is not to be construed strictly, so that only a person who had hired another to enlist in the army could claim the benefit of the bounty, but is to be so construed that a party who enlists may claim the benefit of the bounty. Roberts v. Field, 27 Mich. 337, 345.

Furnish supplies.

A cook for a logging crew furnishes supplies, within the meaning of Tayl. St. p. 1768, § 25, giving a lien to any person who shall furnish any supplies, or do or perform any work or labor, in cutting, driving, booming, etc., any logs or timber, and therefore such person is entitled to a lien as "he who cooks the food furnishes the supplies equally with the person who furnishes raw materials. The acts of both are essential to the supplying of the men with food." Winslow v. Urquhart, 39 Wis. 260, 268.

Furnish a vessel.

As used in Rev. St. § 5283 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3599], making it a crime to furnish or fit out a vessel with intent to commit hostilities against a state with whom United States is at peace, and providing for the forfeiture of the vessel, etc., "furnishing" has no legal or technical meaning different from its ordinary acceptation in maritime and commercial parlance, which is to supply with anything necessary or needful. It does not mean arming. In re The City of Mexico, 28 Fed. 148, 151.

FURNISHED COMPLETE.

The words "furnished complete," in a contract for the sale of premises in consideration of machinery to be furnished complete in a mill, means not only that all the machinery is to be furnished, but requires the person furnishing the machinery to supply the labor and material necessary to place it in its proper position for operation. Grove v. Miles, 58 Ill. 338, 339.

FURNISHER.

A furnisher is one who supplies or fits out. Southern Exp. Co. v. State, 33 S. E. 637, 638, 107 Ga. 670, 46 L. R. A. 417, 73 Am. St. Rep. 146.

FURNISHING.

The existence of the word "furnishing" as a noun is not recognized at all by Webster, while Worcester speaks of it as meaning a sample. In the absence of evidence that the term is in general use in the community to designate furniture, it is insufficient, in a mortgage on the furnishing of a hotel, to impart notice to a third person that it is on the furniture of the hotel. Attaway v. Hoskinson, 37 Mo. App. 132, 136.

FURNITURE.

See "Fixed Furniture"; "Household Furniture"; "Kitchen Furniture"; "Necessary Furniture."

Of business.

As tool, see "Tools—Tools of Trade."

Furniture ordinarily means that with which anything is supplied; the equipment or outfit of a trade or business; whatever may be supplied to a stock of goods or to a business to make it convenient, useful, or gainful; and hence an instruction that the machinery, tools, apparatus, appliances, implements, instruments, and such like articles used in carrying on the business would not be furniture is erroneous. Brody v. Crittenden, 76 N. W. 1009, 1010, 106 Iowa, 524.

Furniture or produce exempted from execution, when applied to a barber, includes two barber chairs, a mirror, and a table accompanying each, which are used and are necessary to the barber in carrying on his trade. Fore v. Cooper (Tex.) 34 S. W. 341, 342.

"Furniture," as used in a fire policy covering specified contents of a saloon and such other "furniture and fixtures as is usual to saloons," does not include a safe. Moriarty v. United States Fire Ins. Co., 49 S. W. 132, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 669.

Of house.

The word "furniture" is a very comprehensive term, embracing about everything with which a house or anything else is or can be furnished. As used in Gen. St. p. 473, § 3, exempting from execution and attachment in favor of the head of a family certain designated articles and all other household furniture, not exceeding in value $500, it "means everything with which the residence of the debtor is furnished." Rasure v. Hart, 18 Kan. 340, 344, 26 Am. Rep. 772.

Furniture "means all personal chattels which may contribute to the use or convenience of the householder or the ornament of the house." Marquam v. Sengfelder, 32 Pac. 676, 679, 24 Or. 2.

"The word includes that which furnishes or with which anything is furnished or supplied; whatever must be supplied to a house, a room, or the like, to make it habitable, convenient, or agreeable; goods, vessels, utensils, and other appendages necessary and convenient for housekeeping; whatever is added to the interior of the house or apartment for use or convenience." Bell's Adm'x v. Golding, 27 Ind. 173, 179.

The word "furniture," made use of in the dispositions of the law or in the conventions or acts of persons, comprehends only such furniture as is intended for the use and ornament of apartments, but not libraries, which happen to be there, nor plate. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 477.

Same—Billiard tables.

A chattel mortgage, mortgaging "all the furniture in and belonging to the summer house," would include all articles such as were in the house, belonging to it, being there for common use or ornament. Hence it might include billiard tables, pianos, pictures, etc. Sumner v. Blakslee, 59 N. H. 242, 243, 47 Am. Rep. 196.

Same—Books.

"Furniture," as used in a will providing that testator's furniture should go to a certain party, does not include a library of books, though it is a small library. Bridgman v. Dove, 3 Atk. 201, 202.

Furniture held not to include books. Porter v. Tournay, 3 Ves. 310, 313. Contra, see Dayton v. Tillon, 24 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Rob.) 21, 28; Ruffin v. Ruffin, 16 S. E. 1021, 1022, 112 N. C. 102.

Same—Carpets.

"Furniture" is a word of very broad meaning, and includes carpets, stoves, ranges, rugs, and dishes, so that, in a prosecution for failure to procure license to deal in secondhand goods, evidence that defendant dealt in such articles is admissible under an indictment alleging that defendant dealt in secondhand furniture. State v. Segel, 62 N. W. 1134, 60 Minn. 507.

Same—China and glassware.

The term "furniture," as used in an insurance policy, has been held to include plate, china, linen, bronzes, statuary, and pictures. Patrons' Mut. Aid Soc. v. Hall, 49 N. E. 279, 282, 19 Ind. App. 118.

China and glassware are furniture. Ruffin v. Ruffin, 16 S. E. 1021, 1022, 112 N. C. 102; State v. Segel, 62 N. W. 1134, 60 Minn. 507; Endicott v. Endicott, 3 Atl. 157, 158, 41 N. J. Eq. 93.

Same—Linen.

Where a testator gives his household furniture, plate, linen, wines, liquors, etc., it cannot be argued that, because he specially enumerated plate and linen, he did not consider that they did not pass under the word "furniture." It was natural that for greater certainty he should enumerate them specifically. Cremorne v. Antrobus, 5 Russ. 312, 320. See, also, Endicott v. Endicott, 3 Atl. 157, 159, 41 N. J. Eq. 93.

Same—Piano.

"Furniture," as used in Rev. St. c. 134, § 31, subd. 6, providing that certain specified articles of household furniture shall be exempt from sale on execution, and all other household furniture not herein enumerated, not exceeding $200, does not include a piano, though its value is less than $200. "The obvious design of this provision was to enable the debtor to select from the usual articles of furniture, such as chairs, tables, stands, etc., to the amount of the value mentioned; but a piano is a thing so peculiar and distinct in character that it is clear, from the manner in which this statute is drawn, that if the Legislature had designed to exempt it they would have specifically mentioned it." Tanner v. Billings, 18 Wis. 163, 164, 86 Am. Dec. 755.

"Furniture," as used in Rev. St. art. 2335, providing that all household and kitchen furniture shall be reserved to every family exempt from attachment or execution, or other forced sale for the payment of debts, is a word of very broad signification, and according to lexicographers embraces a supply of necessary, convenient, or ornamental articles with which a residence is equipped, and would therefore include a piano. It is not confined in its meaning to such things as are necessities to a family. Alsop v. Jordan, 6 S. W. 831, 833, 69 Tex. 300, 5 Am. St. Rep. 53.

A contract for the sale of all the furniture in a certain hotel, used in the business of innkeeping, should be construed to include a piano kept by the vendor in the parlor of the hotel for the use of his guests. Crossman v. Baldwin, 49 Conn. 490, 491.

A piano is included in the term "furniture and other household effects," as such phrase is used in St. 1884, c. 313, which provides that all contracts for conditional sales of "furniture and other household effects" shall be in writing, and that a copy of the contract shall be furnished to the vendee. Lee v. Gorham, 42 N. E. 556, 557, 165 Mass. 130. See, also, Sumner v. Blakslee, 59 N. H. 242, 243, 27 Am. Rep. 196.

Same—Pictures and statuary.

"Furniture is not to be confounded with cabinet makers' ware, for which it is frequently used, but implies anything that furnishes or equips. Books, wines, curiosities, mineralogical or other specimens, and even pictures and statues, as well as plate, come under the designation of 'household furniture' in that sense, when they are employed in domestic use or as ornaments of a residence." Dayton v. Tillou, 24 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Rob.) 21, 28; Patrons' Mut. Aid Soc. v. Hall, 49 N. E. 279, 282, 19 Ind. App. 118.

Pictures are included in the term "furniture." Patrons' Mut. Aid Soc. v. Hall, 49 N. E. 279, 282, 19 Ind. App. 118; Ruffin v. Ruffin, 16 S. E. 1021, 1022, 112 N. C. 102; Endicott v. Endicott, 3 Atl. 157, 159, 41 N. J. Eq. 14 Stew. 93; Sumner v. Blakslee, 59 N. H. 242, 243, 27 Am. Rep. 196.

Same—Plate.

"That which fits a house for use is its furniture, just as the lock, etc., of a musket, which enables one to use it, are designated in the same way. In its ordinary signification, the word has not been understood to include silverware, china, glassware, books, or portraits attached to the wall, that are not generally essential to the comfort of housekeepers." As used in a devise of furniture, the term "must be always construed by taking the surrounding circumstances into consideration." Ruffin v. Ruffin, 16 S. E. 1021, 1022, 112 N. C. 102.

A will wherein testator directed that his entire estate, real, personal, and mixed, including the "furniture," should be occupied by his wife for her natural life, meant everything about the house that had usually been enjoyed therewith, including plate, linen, china, and pictures. Endicott v. Endicott, 3 Atl. 157, 159, 41 N. J. Eq. 14 Stew. 93.

"Furniture," as used in a conveyance of household goods and furniture, includes plate used in the family. Bunn v. Winthrop (N. Y.) 1 Johns. Ch. 329, 338.

Furniture was held to include plate in the following cases: Patrons' Mut. Aid Soc. v. Hall, 49 N. E. 279, 282, 19 Ind. App. 118; Dayton v. Tillou, 24 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Rob.) 21, 28; Cremorne v. Antrobus, 5 Russ. 312, 320; Porter v. Tournay, 3 Ves. 310, 313.

Same—Provisions and wine.

"Furniture," as used in a petition in an action for damages to furniture, etc., cannot be construed to include coffee, sugar, and apples. Whitmore v. Bowman (Iowa) 4 G. Greene, 148, 149.

A bequest of the use of a house, with all the furniture, should be construed to include plate, but does not include wine and books. Porter v. Tournay, 3 Ves. 310, 313. See, also, Dayton v. Tillou, 24 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Rob.) 21, 28.

Same—Safe containing money.

A will devising testator's dwelling house, the furniture, and all contents thereof, should not be construed to include a safe containing money, since, according to the rule that in the construction of wills, when certain things are mentioned or enumerated in a bequest, followed in the same clause by a more general description, that description is taken to cover only things of a like kind with those mentioned or enumerated, "contents" should be considered as referring only to articles of the nature of furniture, and bonds, mortgages, bank books, and cash in a safe cannot be regarded as furniture or articles of the same nature. Fenton v. Fenton, 71 N. Y. Supp. 1083, 1087, 35 Misc. Rep. 479.

Same—Stoves.

Furniture was held to include a stove and ranges in State v. Segel, 62 N. W. 1134, 60 Minn. 507.

Of schoolhouse.

The term "furniture," as used in Act 1893, § 81, authorizing school trustees to buy furniture for schoolhouses, embraces only such articles as were generally understood to be in general use in schoolhouses as a part of the furniture of the house, as distinguished from appliances and apparatus that may be used in instructing the scholars. McGee v. Franklin Pub. Co., 39 S. W. 835, 338, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 216.

Under a statute authorizing the school trustees to purchase furniture for a schoolhouse, they were not authorized to purchase a grammar chart. The statute authorizing the purchase of furniture clearly indicates that it was furniture for the house or building that was intended, so as to make it habitable and comfortable, and not appurtenances and appliances and supplies that may be useful to the school as a part of its system of instruction, or as an aid thereto. The grammar chart may be useful in furtherance of the system of instruction that prevails in the schools where used, but it serves no necessary or useful purpose as an article of furniture to a schoolhouse, in order that it may with comfort be used and occupied as a schoolhouse. The term "furniture," used in the statute, was evidently intended to embrace only such articles as were generally understood to be in general use in schoolhouses as a part of the furniture of the house, as distinguished from appliances and apparatus that may be used in instructing the scholars. McGee v. Franklin Pub. Co., 39 S. W. 335, 338, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 216.

"Furniture," as used in an insurance policy on a ship and its furniture, includes provisions sent out for the use of the crew. Brough v. Whitmore, 4 Term R. 206, 211.

"Furniture," as used referring to the furniture of a ship, includes provisions for the use of the crew. In fact, furniture of ships includes everything with which a ship requires to be furnished or equipped to make her seaworthy. Weaver v. The S. G. Owens, 29 Fed. Cas. 489, 492.

As used in a rule providing that, in suits in rem against a ship, her "tackle, sails, apparel, furniture, and boats," if in the possession of a third person, may be ordered to be turned over to the marshal, such terms will be construed to "include everything belonging to the vessel as a navigating ship." In re The Witch Queen, 30 Fed. Cas. 396, 397.

As used in the legal phrase that "the tackle, apparel, and furniture" of a vessel is liable for the wages of seamen, such terms will be construed to include special apparatus or appliances on board a vessel engaged in a particular occupation, which is necessary to the prosecution of the business in which it is engaged. In re The Edwin Post (U. S.) 11 Fed. 602, 606.

"The word 'furniture' relates ordinarily to movable personal chattels. It is very general both in meaning and application, and its meaning changes so as to take the color of or be in accord with the subject to which it is applied. Thus, we hear of the furniture of a parlor, of a bedchamber, of a kitchen, of shops, of various kinds of a ship, of a house, of a plantation, etc. The articles, utensils, implements, etc., used in these various connections, as also those used in a drug or other store, as the furniture thereof, differ in kind according to the purposes which they are intended to subserve; yet, being put and employed in their several places as the equipment thereof, for ornament, or to promote comfort, or to facilitate the business therein done, and being kept or intended to be kept for those, or some or one of those, purposes, they pertain to such places respectively, and collectively constitute the furniture thereof." As used in a contract for the sale of a drug store, its fixtures, and furniture, it includes movable furnishings in addition to fixtures. Fore v. Hibbard, 63 Ala. 410, 412.

A chattel mortgage on the furniture of a boot and shoe store includes a wooden elephant, kept in the store at night, but standing in front thereof in daytime, decorated with shoes, and used for a sign. Curtis v. Martz, 14 Mich. 506, 512.

FURTHER.

"The word 'further' is not a word of strict legal or technical import. It may be used to introduce a negation or qualification of some precedent matter, but generally, when used as an adverb, our lexicographers (Webster, Walker, and others) inform us it is a word of comparison; that it means 'additional,' and is equivalent to 'moreover, or furthermore; something beyond what has been said; or likewise or also.' In this sense it is frequently used in statutes or legal instruments." Jones v. Creveling's Ex'rs, 19 N. J. Law (4 Har.) 127, 133.

The term "item," or "further," or "moreover," is commonly used in the beginning of a new devise or bequest in a will, without indicating any particular intention in the disposition of the property. After a testator had devised certain houses in fee, he inserted another separate clause in the following language: "Further, I wish to give to W. one other three-story house," which was properly described. In construing the will it was held that the word "further" was not used in connection with the preceding clause of the will, and thus the grant of a fee by the first clause could not be held to apply to the latter, and therefore W. was held only to take a life estate. Burr v. Sim (Pa.) 1 Whart. 252, 264, 29 Am. Dec. 48.

As limited to ejusdem generis.

In Railroad Law, Laws 1890, c. 565, § 93, as amended by Laws 1892, cc. 305, 676, and Laws 1893, c. 434, relating to the consent of local authorities to the construction or extension of street surface railroads, which provides that the franchise of using any street, etc., shall be sold by public auction to the bidder who will agree to give the city the largest percentage of the gross receipts of such corporation, etc., and that the local authorities may attach to their consent any "further conditions" respecting security, further than that provided in the act, suitable to secure the construction, completion, and operation of the railroad within the time prescribed, etc., "further" relates to matters ejusdem generis with those specially enumerated, and does not authorize the local authorities to impose as a condition of their consent that the existing railroad, if it purchases the right to construction and extension, shall pay into the city treasury a lump sum of money in addition to the percentage of gross receipts bid at the sale; and sale under such conditions vests no right in the purchaser. Beckman v. Third Ave. R. Co., 47 N. E. 277, 282, 153 N. Y. 144.

As denoting order of sequence.

"Further," as used in a subdivision of a will beginning with the words, "Further, my said executors and trustees shall then pay over the following gifts and bequests, namely," etc., does not denote anything more than an order of sequence, and will not be construed of itself to make the legacies following them residuary, nor to import a preference. Porter v. Howe, 54 N. E. 255, 257, 173 Mass. 521.

As additional.

In an agreed case that after a certain time no further credit was asked by or given to a certain company, "further" is employed as an adjective in the sense of additional, limiting "credit," and is not to be construed as an adverb of time, qualifying the verb "given." London & S. F. Bank v. Parrott, 53 Pac. 164, 166, 125 Cal. 472, 73 Am. St. Rep. 64.

"Further," as used in a third proviso of an act relating to the building of branch roads by a railroad, introduced by the words "provided further," describes the scope and character of the proviso as also intended to be an additional proviso applicable to the branches included in the previous provisos, and not as a new or independent proviso intended to reach branches which were not included at all within the previous provisos. Attorney General v. Greenville & H. Ry. Co., 46 Atl. 638, 644, 59 N. J. Eq. 372.

"Further compensation" means additional compensation to some compensation before mentioned, and as used in an agreement between an attorney and client that the attorney should contest the case in a Court of Appeals, and should have such further compensation as might be agreed on, refers to a compensation in addition to that which the attorney was to receive for conducting the case in the lower court. Hitchings v. Van Brunt, 38 N. Y. 335, 338.

The expression "further civil and criminal jurisdiction," as used in the Constitution, providing that certain state courts should be continued with the powers and jurisdiction they then had, "and such further civil and criminal jurisdiction as may be conferred by law," meant jurisdiction over subject-matters and causes of action in addition to those of which they already had jurisdiction, and did not refer to the extension of territorial jurisdiction. Landers v. Staten Island R. Co., 14 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 346, 353, 53 N. Y. 450, 457.

In circuit court rule 97, providing that "the bill of exceptions shall be made up and signed during the term of the court, unless by special order further time is allowed," the phrase "further time" means time beyond the expiration of the term, for without an order the bill of exceptions can, under the well understood practice, be settled at any time during the term, and where, in an order refusing a motion for new trial, the defendant is allowed 30 days in which to make up his bill of exceptions and perfect his bill, the 30 days begins to run at the end of the term; the intent of the order being to give the appellant 30 days which he would not have had without it. Lewis v. Meginniss, 6 South. 167, 169, 25 Fla. 589.

One meaning of the word "further" is "additional," and in a complaint, the second count of which claimed the further sum of $1,900 as damages, implied a sum in addition to the amounts claimed in the former counts. Thompson v. Southern R. Co. (U. S.) 113 Fed. 890, 891.

The phrase "further term of one, two, and three years," in a lease of property for a certain term with the privilege of a "further term of one, two, and three years," is to be construed as only giving a privilege of one additional term, and not to entitle the lessee to three different terms, amounting to six years in all. Austin v. Stevens (N. Y.) 38 Hun, 41, 42.

As also.

In a will devising real estate to testator's wife for life, and providing that at her decease it should be sold, and that from the proceeds of the sale a certain sum should be paid to a certain person, and that he further gave and bequeathed out of the proceeds of such sale a certain sum to be paid over to a missionary society, "further" will be held to mean "also," and not to indicate that the legacy to the society is to be given from the fund from which another legacy has been taken. Sumner v. American Home Missionary Soc., 10 Atl. 616, 617, 15 R. I. 553.

As any.

"Further," as used in a lease which provides that, in case the rent is not paid when due, the lessor may enter without further notice or demand and divest the lessee of his estate, means "any." Fifty Associates v. Howland, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 214, 218.

Comp. St. 1893, § 127, providing that a tax deed made by the county treasurer shall vest in the grantee the title to the property "without further acknowledgment or evidence" of such conveyance, should not be construed to read "without any acknowledgment or evidence" of such conveyance, since the holder of a void tax deed is subrogated to the lien of the public for taxes on the land, and is authorized to foreclose his lien in equity against the property, and thus acquire, if the property be redeemed, a large return on his investment, and, if not redeemed, an indefeasible title to the property. Therefore the statute did not authorize the execution of a tax deed without any acknowledgment whatsoever. Larson v. Dickey, 58 N. W. 167, 171, 39 Neb. 463, 42 Am. St. Rep. 595.

As future.

"Further," as used in a release of a lessee by the lessors in the following words: "We do hereby severally release the said D. N. from further liability under the covenants of said original lease"—means "future." O'Fallon v. Nicholson, 56 Mo. 238, 241.

As other.

The word "further," in Act June 1, 1889, §§ 1, 21, imposing a tax on mortgages held by corporations, and a tax on the capital stock of corporations, and providing that corporations liable to tax on capital stock shall not be required to pay further taxes on the mortgages, etc., constituting any portion of their assets within the appraised value of their capital stock, means "other"; and therefore, under the statute, the capital stock of the corporations is first to be taxed at its appraised value, and then their mortgages, not included in the appraised value of the capital stock, are to be taxed. Pennsylvania Co. for Insurance v. Loughlin, 21 Atl. 163, 165, 139 Pa. 612.

FURTHER ASSURANCE.

See "Covenant for Further Assurance."

FURTHER CONVEYANCE.

See "Awaiting Further Conveyance."

FURTHER NOTICE.

Milwaukee City Charter, c. 10, § 1, requires that all work for the city or any of the wards shall be let by contract to the lowest bidder, and due notice shall be given of the time and place of letting such contract. Chapter 7, § 6, provides for the publication of notice to the lot owners to do the work within a reasonable time before the street commissioners should be authorized to let the work on the contract. Priv. Laws Wis. 1856, c. 158, § 13, amends chapter 7, § 6, of the charter, above referred to, by adding: "And if said work be not done within the time limited in such contract, the state commissioner may relet such work without further notice." Held, that the further notice dispensed with was the notice to the lot owners. The commissioner is still bound to give notice of a reletting of the contract. Mitchell v. City of Milwaukee, 18 Wis. 92.

FURTHER PROCEEDING.

The mere filing of the remittitur and record by the clerk does not constitute "further proceedings," within the meaning of Comp. Laws, § 5239, providing that a case remanded by the Supreme Court for new trial or further proceeding in the trial court shall be dismissed if no proceedings are had therein within a year, etc. Root v. Sweeney (S. D.) 95 N. W. 916, 917.

FURTHER SECURITY.

A steamship company in New York, in order to obtain letters of credit to disburse their ships in Brazil, hypothecated all freights, and agreed to give further security when required. It was held that the agreement for further security was too indefinite to constitute a lien on the vessels; that it would have been as truly fulfilled by giving further personal security, as by giving a further maritime lien. In re The Allianca (U. S.) 63 Fed. 726, 729.

FURTHER WASTE.

The term "further waste," within the meaning of the statute authorizing an injunction to restrain further waste by persons in possession of real estate, was construed not to include the removal of wood or timber already cut. Trustees of Episcopate v. Matteson, 12 N. Y. St. Rep. 370, 371.

FURTHERANCE.

The word "furtherance," as applied to the act of one accomplished in the furtherance of a criminal project, has a well-defined and generally accepted meaning. It is the act of furthering, or helping forward, or promotion, or advancement. Powers v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 70 S. W. 644, 652.

FURTUM.

"Furtum" is simple theft, as distinguished from that which is accomplished by violence. Spinetti v. Atlas S. S. Co., 80 N. Y. 71, 78, 79, 86 Am. Rep. 579.

FUSE.

A "fuse," such as is used in an electric car, consists of a piece of metallic alloy similar in nature to soft solder, one or more inches in length, connected at each end with a small circular piece of copper. These pieces of copper are called the "terminals," and they are so cut that they can be easily slipped under the thumbscrews and clamped in place. The fuse and thumbscrews are held in what is called the "fuse box." Casady v. Old Colony St. Ry. Co., 68 N. E. 10, 184 Mass. 156, 63 L. R. A. 285.

A "fuse," as used in connection with electrical appliances, is a piece of wire about six inches in length, made of very soft material, which melts when it comes in contact with a high potential current of electricity. Chicago Tel. Co. v. Northwestern Tel. Co., 65 N. E. 329, 340, 199 Ill. 324.

FUSION.

"Fusion" is the act of coalescing two political parties, or the state of coalescence; used, also, attributively, as a fusion ticket, so that, where voters mark the word "Fusion" upon ballots, they will be held to have intended to vote for the candidate of the Fusion party. Nicholls v. Barrick, 62 Pac. 202, 206, 27 Colo. 432.

FUTURE.

The word "future," in Bankr. Act 1841, c. 9, § 2, by which it is provided that all future payments, securities, conveyances, etc., made or given by any bankrupt in contemplation of bankruptcy and for the purpose of giving any creditor, etc., any preference, should be deemed void, was held in In re Chadwick, 5 Fed. Cas. 398, to refer to the day when the act took effect. "But a contrary construction was given to this clause by Judge Story in the case of Hutchins v. Taylor, 12 Fed. Cas. 1079, and we all concur in his construction of that clause. The act, as Judge Story remarks, became a law by the very term of the Constitution of the United States as soon as it was approved by the President, although its operation was suspended until the 1st of February, 1842. The act, therefore, might effectually prohibit the doing of any acts between the time of its passage and the time when it was to go into operation, if such was the intention of its framers, and we cannot doubt that such was their intention." Swan v. Littlefield, 58 Mass. (4 Cush.) 574, 576; Day v. Bardwell, 97 Mass. 246, 255. The contrary rule was also held in Welner v. Farnum, 2 Pa. (2 Barr) 146.

"Future time" usually means a period of time to come after present time, and would vary, of course, with what was considered present time. State v. Rose, 1 Pac. 817, 820, 30 Kan. 501.

FUTURE ACTION OR PROCEEDING.

In Rev. St. c. 32, §§ 29, 30, providing that an action may be maintained by one town against another to recover for the expenses incurred for the support of a pauper whose legal settlement is established in such town, and that a recovery in such action shall bar the town against which it shall be had from disputing the settlement of such pauper with the town thus recovering in any future action brought for the support of such pauper, the term "future action" is not necessarily confined to an action commenced after the action was commenced in which the judgment was rendered; but where two actions are pending at the same time, and after the first one is tried, pending an application for a new trial, the other one is tried and final judgment rendered therein in favor of the defendant, on the retrial of the first action such judgment is a bar to a recovery in the first action. Inhabitants of Bangor v. Inhabitants of Brunswick, 33 Me. 352, 355.

Code Civ. Proc. § 3334, subd. 5, provided that the repeal of the provisions of the Revised Statutes respecting appeals from the surrogate courts does not effect the power and authority of the supreme court, superior court, marine court of the city of New York, or a county court in an action or special proceeding, nor effect any "future proceeding" taken pursuant to law in such action or special proceeding. Held, that an appeal in a proceeding for the proof of a will, pending in the surrogate's court when the repealing act took effect, should be held to be a "future proceeding" in an action or special proceeding, and not a mere continuation of the original action, and hence such appeal is not effected by the repealing act. In re Gates' Will (N. Y.) 26 Hun, 179, 180.

FUTURE CONTINGENT INTEREST.

A future interest is contingent while the person in whom or the event upon which it is limited to take effect remains uncertain. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3294; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 210.

FUTURE EDITION.

At the time of testator's death an edition of a work of which he was the author had been partly printed, and was in progress, but unfinished, at the time of his death, and his will contained a specific bequest of the work, "with the right of renewal of all previous and future editions," according to law. Held, that "future editions" meant the edition which was then in progress. Hone v. Kent, 6 N. Y. (2 Seld.) 390, 394.

FUTURE ELECTION.

Other future election, see "Other."

FUTURE ESTATE.

See "Vested Future Estate."

A future estate is an estate limited to commence in possession at a future day, either without the intervention of a precedent estate, or on the determination, by a lapse of time or otherwise, of a precedent estate created at the same time. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 8792; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 4371; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 2034; 1 Rev. St. N. Y. p. 722, § 10; Leslie v. Marshall (N. Y.) 31 Barb. 560, 564; Griffin v. Shepard, 26 N. E. 339, 340, 124 N. Y. 70; Palmer v. Dunham, 6 N. Y. Supp. 46, 47, 52 Hun, 468; Tilden v. Greene, 7 N. Y. Supp. 382, 387, 54 Hun, 231; Sabledowsky v. Arbuckle, 52 N. W. 920, 50 Minn. 475. At common law the intervention of a precedent estate created at the same time was essential to the validity of a conveyance of an estate of freehold to commence at a future time, which is an estate in remainder. Ferguson v. Mason, 60 Wis. 377, 383, 384, 19 N. W. 420. Where a will provides that immediately after the death of the life tenants all the real estate shall go to the grandchildren of the testator, to be equally divided between them per capita, valid future estates vesting at the time of the testator's death are created in the grandchildren in being at such time. Haug v. Schumacher, 166 N. Y. 506, 517, 60 N. E. 245.

"Future estates" are either vested or contingent. They are vested when there is a person in being who would have an immediate right to the possession of lands upon the ceasing of the intermediate or precedent estate. They are contingent while the person to whom or the event upon which they are limited to take effect remains uncertain. 2 Rev. St. (9th Ed.) p. 7090, § 13; Hersee v. Simpson, 46 N. Y. Supp. 755, 756, 20 App. Div. 100; In re Davis' Estate, 36 N. Y. Supp. 822, 825, 91 Hun, 53; Wadsworth v. Murray, 51 N. Y. Supp. 1038, 1043, 29 App. Div. 191; See, also, Rev. St. Wis. § 2037; Ford v. Ford, 33 N. W. 188, 201, 70 Wis. 19, 5 Am. St. Rep. 117.

A future estate is described by the statutes to be one commencing at a future day; and, though it be capable of being vested, that vesting is determined by the question of whether there is a person in being who would have an immediate right to the premises. Townshend v. Frommer, 125 N. Y. 446, 468, 26 N. E. 805.

Every future estate, whether vested or contingent, is void in its creation which suspends the absolute power of alienation for a larger period than a continuance of two lives in being at the creation of the estate. Rev. St. Wis. § 2037; Ford v. Ford, 33 N. W. 188, 201, 70 Wis. 19, 5 Am. St. Rep. 117.

Where a future estate is dependent on a precedent estate, it may be termed a "remainder," and may be created and transferred by that name. 1 Rev. St. p. 722, § 11; Palmer v. Dunham, 6 N. Y. Supp. 46, 47, 52 Hun, 468.

FUTURE INCREASE.

A bequest of slaves and future increase "only embraces such increase as are born after the bequest is made, and cannot be extended to embrace prior-born increase." Marlin v. Marlin, 11 Tenn. (3 Yerg.) 540; Robinson v. Robinson, 5 Ky. (2 Bibb) 76, 77; Fightmaster v. Beasley, 30 Ky. (7 J. J. Marsh.) 410, 411.

FUTURE INTEREST.

See "Vested Future Interest."

A future interest entitles the owner to the possession only at a future period. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1111; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3289; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 205. This interest is created by will, and in such case the death of the testator is to be deemed or taken as the time of the creation of the interest. A future interest is void in its creation which by any possibility may suspend the absolute power of alienation for a longer time than during the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the creation of such interest. Civ. Code Cal. §§ 716, 749; Goldtree v. Thompson, 22 Pac. 50, 52, 79 Cal. 613.

FUTURES.

As gambling contract, see "Gambling Contract."

"Futures," are contracts for the sale of margins or products for future delivery, in which either seller or buyer may elect to make or demand delivery of the goods agreed to be sold and bought, but where uniformly no such delivery is made, and final settlements are made by payment and receipt of the difference in price at the time of delivery from that prevailing at the time the sale was made. Lemonius v. Mayer, 14 South. 33, 34, 71 Miss. 514.

A purchase of cotton to be delivered as required is not a "dealing in futures," in the speculative use of the term. Contracts relating to merchandise to be delivered in the future are an essential element in business methods, and the fact that one may gain or lose by the fluctuations of market prices does not render them illegal. The term "futures" has grown out of those purely speculative transactions in which there is a nominal contract to sell for future delivery, but where in fact none is ever intended or executed. The nominal seller does not have or expect to have a stock of merchandise he purports to sell, nor does the nominal buyer expect to receive it or to pay the price. Instead of that, a percentage or margin is paid, which is increased or diminished as the market rates go up or down, and accounted for to the buyer. This is simple speculation, gambling, mere wagering on prices within a given time. It is not buying and selling, and is illegal as against public policy. King v. Quidnick Co., 14 R. I. 131, 138.

The words "dealing in options, futures, or margins" are well understood to mean a mere speculative contract, in which the parties speculate in the rise or fall of prices, and imply a contract in relation to the price of the contract, and not the article itself. A contract for the sale and purchase of grain to be delivered at a future time, if entered into without an intention of having any grain pass from one party to another, but with an understanding that at the appointed time the purchaser is merely to receive or pay the difference between the contract and the market price, is a transaction which the law will not sustain. Plank v. Jackson, 28 N. E. 568, 569, 128 Ind. 424.

Where a contract is made for the delivery or acceptance of securities at a future day at a price named, and neither party at the time of making the contract intends to deliver or accept the shares, but merely to pay the differences according to the rise and fall of the market, the contract is a gaming one and is void as contrary to public policy. Justh v. Holliday (D. C.) 2 Mackay, 346, 348.

G

GAG.

A "gag," in dramatic language, is a word or sentence, or a passage of two or more sentences, not in a drama as composed by the author, but interpolated and uttered on the stage by a player. Gags, in general, are violations of dramatic propriety. Sometimes gags are sanctioned by the manager's approval at the rehearsal of the play. They are occasionally, in comedies of the lighter kind, licensed more or less, if not encouraged, by dramatic authors who attend rehearsals of their own plays. Keene v. Wheatley (Pa.) 5 Clark, 501, 523.

GAIN.

"Gain" means that which is acquired or comes as a benefit. Thorn v. De Breteuil, 83 N. Y. Supp. 849, 856, 86 App. Div. 405.

The term "gaining jurisdiction" has been applied to cases where two courts have concurrent jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the cause or proceeding. When so applied it means gaining jurisdiction by proceedings had in one of the courts. Bolton v. Jacks, 29 N. Y. Super. Ct. (6 Rob.) 166, 195.

As extort.

In 2 Rev. St. p. 678, § 59, which provides that every person who shall knowingly send or deliver, etc., any letter or writing, etc., threatening therein to accuse any person of any crime, etc., with a view or intent to extort or gain any money or property of any description belonging to another, shall, upon conviction, etc., "gain" is synonymous with "extort," and means something more than merely to obtain or get possession of. The statute is intended to embrace only acts where the intent is to obtain that which in justice and equity the party is not entitled to receive. The end, as well as the means employed to obtain it, must be wrongful and unlawful. People v. Griffin (N. Y.) 2 Barb. 427, 430.

In an indictment for blackmailing, alleging that defendant charged another with a crime with the intent to extort and gain, the word "gain" must be used, in connection with the word "extort," as referring to a mode of acquisition equally objectionable. Mann v. State, 26 N. E. 226, 228, 47 Ohio St. 556, 11 L. R. A. 656.

As successful termination.

An agreement for an exchange of lands, which provided that if H., one of the parties, should gain a law suit pending against him, the cause of such action being for 21 acres of land, he should receive in the exchange

$1,000 more, should be construed to mean that it was the intent of the parties to regard the suit as a test of title, and that the suit should be brought to a successful termination on the question of title, which would not include a nonsuit. Crossman v. Hamilton, 18 Atl. 634, 635, 130 Pa. 320.

The use of the term "gained," in a contract in which a defendant in ejectment agrees to pay his attorneys a certain sum if the suit is gained by them, does not require that there be a trial in court; but the suit is gained, within the meaning of the contract, if the attorneys discover that the plaintiff has no title to the land, but that it is in a third person, and it is then purchased from the latter by defendant, which purchase is followed by a dismissal of the suit, and therefore the attorneys are entitled to recover on the contract, though the reasons which caused plaintiff to dismiss the action are not shown. Moss v. Richie, 50 Mo. App. 75, 77.

GAINS.See "Net Gains."

Mere advance in value in no sense constitutes the "gains" specified in the revenue law as gains of the owner for the year in which the sale of the property was made. Such advance constitutes and can be treated merely as increase of capital. Gray v. Darlington, 82 U. S. (15 Wall.) 63, 65, 21 L. Ed. 45 (cited in In re Graham's Estate, 47 Atl. 1108, 1110, 198 Pa. 216).

Act Cong. March 2, 1867, provides that there shall be levied, collected, and paid annually, on the "gains, profits, and income" of every person from any source whatever, a tax of 5 per cent. on the amount so derived over $1,000, and that such tax shall be assessed, collected, and paid on the "gains, profits, and income" for the year ending the 31st of December next preceding the time for levying, collecting, and paying said tax. Held, that "gains," as so used, means such gains or profits as may be realized from a business transaction begun and completed during the preceding year. The mere fact that property has advanced in value between the date of its acquisition and sale does not authorize the imposition of the tax on the amount of the advance. Mere advance in value in no sense constitutes the "gains, profits, and income" of the statute above referred to. Gray v. Darlington, 82 U. S. (15 Wall.) 63, 65, 21 L. Ed. 45.

GALE.

"A gale is a wind blowing at the rate of 40 to 60 miles an hour; a storm at the rate of 60 to 80 miles." A wind blowing at the rate of 22 miles an hour was only a brisk wind, and not a gale. In re The Snap (U. S.) 24 Fed. 292, 293.

A gale is defined as a wind having a velocity of 40 to 70 miles an hour. Stand. Dict. Webster defines a heavy gale as a wind having a velocity of 80 miles an hour. Thus, where it appeared that injury to a locomotive engineer was caused by the blowing of heavy doors on the track by a heavy gale, such gale was the probable and proximate cause of the injury. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Columbia, 69 Pac. 338, 341, 65 Kan. 390, 58 L. R. A. 399.

GALLEIN.

Gallein is a dye which produces blue and purple shades, and is made of two molecules or parts of pyrogalllic acid and one molecule or part of phthalic acid. The source of commercial supply of pyrogalllic acid is from nutgalls or other vegetable matter. The present source of commercial supply of phthalic acid is from coal tar. Pickhardt v. United States (U. S.) 67 Fed. 111, 112, 14 C. C. A. 341.

GALLON.

When used to describe a measure for wines and liquors, a "gallon" means a measure containing 231 cubic inches. Hollender v. Magone (U. S.) 38 Fed. 912, 914.

"Gallon," as used by Rev. St. § 2504, schedule D, imposing a custom duty on ale, porter, and beer of a certain amount per gallon, refers to the gallon of commerce, which is the wine gallon, containing 231 cubic inches of measurement. Nichols v. Beard, 15 Fed. 435, 437.

Under a statute imposing a penalty for the sale without license of intoxicating liquors in quantities less than five gallons, an indictment charging the selling of one pint of brandy is sufficient. Gen. St. c. 108, § 10, provides that an indictment is sufficient if it can be understood therefrom that the act or omission charged as the offense is clearly and distinctly set forth in the ordinary and concise language without repetition; and, as held in State v. Munch, 22 Minn. 67, the meaning which ordinary use attaches to words not technical will be given to them in an indictment. In common understanding a charge of a sale of a pint of brandy means a sale of that particular quantity, and not of more. That a pint is less than five gallons is a part of the English language. State v. Lavake, 6 N. W. 339, 340, 26 Minn. 526, 37 Am. Rep. 415.

The word "gallon," wherever used in the internal revenue law, relating to beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquors, shall be held and taken to mean a wine gallon, the liquid measure containing 231 cubic inches. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2188.

In all sales of spirits a gallon shall be held to be a gallon of proof spirit, according to the standard prescribed in Rev. St. § 3249, set forth and declared for the inspection and gauging of spirits throughout the United States. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2108.

Gallons of proof spirit.

The expression "gallons of proof spirit" is not intended to be descriptive of the kind or strength of the spirit distilled, but only of the quantity according to the statute standard. United States v. Fox, 25 Fed. Cas. 1196, 1197.

GAMBIA.

"Gambia" is synonymous with "terra japonica." Hallett v. Smythe, 11 Fed. Cas. 289.

GAMBLE.

The word "gamble" is a derivation from the Anglo-Saxon "gamen," signifying to play. People v. Todd, 6 N. Y. Cr. R. 203, 224, 4 N. Y. Supp. 25, 28.

"The word 'gamble' as defined by lexicographers means to game or play for money." Buckley v. O'Neil, 113 Mass. 193, 18 Am. Rep. 466.

"The word 'gamble' is perhaps the most apt and substantial to convey the idea of unlawful play that our language affords. It is inclusive of hazarding and betting as well as play." Bennett v. State, 10 Tenn. (2 Yerg.) 472, 474.

GAMBLER.

See "Common Gambler."

In common parlance a gambler is one who follows or practices games of chance or skill with the expectation and purpose of thereby winning money or other property. Buckley v. O'Neil, 113 Mass. 193, 18 Am. Rep. 466; Stearnes v. State, 21 Tex. 692, 694.

GAMBLING—GAMING.

See "Illegal Gaming."

As disorderly conduct, see "Disorderly Conduct."

As infamous crime, see "Infamous Crime."

As nuisance, see "Nuisance."

Gaming is an agreement between two or more to risk money or other thing of value on a contest or chance of any kind, where one must be the loser and the other gainer. Bell v. State, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 507, 509.

Gaming is the use of cards, dice, billiards, or other instruments according to certain rules, with a view to win money or other thing waged upon the issue of the contest. In re Stewart (U. S.) 21 Fed. 398.

"To constitute unlawful gaming, there must be a game played, and upon its result some article of value must be lost or won." Alexander v. State, 99 Ind. 450, 451.

Gaming at common law "consisted in playing for certain stakes, as, added to the amusement, made the consequences dangerous to society." State v. Records (Del.) 4 Har. 554.

Gambling is defined as a contract between two or more, by which they agree to play by certain rules at cards or some other contrivance, and that one shall be the loser and the other the winner. People v. Todd, 4 N. Y. Supp. 25, 28, 51 Hun. 446; People v. Fuerst, 34 N. Y. Supp. 1115, 1117, 13 Misc. Rep. 304; Ansley v. State, 36 Ark. 67, 68, 38 Am. Rep. 29.

Whenever money or other valuable thing is hazarded and may be lost, or more than the value obtained, and depended upon chance, the transaction is gambling. State v. Smith, 10 Tenn. (2 Yerg.) 272, 281.

Gambling is the risking of money or anything of value between two or more persons on a contest of chance of any kind, where one must be the loser and the other the gainer. State v. Shaw, 39 N. W. 305, 307, 39 Minn. 153; State v. Grimes, 77 N. W. 4, 5, 74 Minn. 257.

"Anything which induces men to risk their money or property without any hope of return, and to get for nothing any gift of another, is gambling." First Nat. Bank v. Carroll, 45 N. W. 304, 305, 80 Iowa, 11, 8 L. R. A. 275 (quoting Appeal of Brua, 55 Pa. 294).

Any contest or course of action commenced and prosecuted in consequence of a bet or wager, and with a view to determine the bet or wager upon the event of such contest or course of action, is gaming. To constitute gaming there must not only be a betting upon the termination of an event, but the course of action to bring about such event must have been originated with a view to determine the bet. State v. Smith, 19 Tenn. (Meigs) 99, 101, 33 Am. Dec. 132; Ansley v. The State, 36 Ark. 67, 68, 38 Am. Rep. 29.

Gaming may be done by other means or devices as well as cards. State v. Morgan, 45 S. E. 1033, 1034, 133 N. C. 743.

As all forms of gambling.

Within the provisions of an excise bond for the orderly conduct of the liquor business conditioned that the principal will not suffer or permit any gambling to be done in the place where liquor is to be sold, the word "gambling" is not limited to those forms of gambling only which are made criminal by the Penal Code, but includes all forms of gambling. Lyman v. Shenandoah Social Club, 57 N. Y. Supp. 372, 373, 39 App. Div. 459.

A statute providing that if any person shall keep a room, building, arbor, booth, shed, tenement, boat, or float to be used or occupied for gambling he shall be fined, is not applicable alone to such gambling as is carried on by the use of gaming tables or other apparatus used and appropriate to gambling purposes. Its language is sufficiently comprehensive to, and it does, embrace all descriptions of gambling. Roberts v. Commonwealth, 50 Ky. (11 B. Mon.) 3, 5.

Backgammon.

See "Backgammon."

Betting distinguished.

See "Bet."

Betting on foot race.

Betting upon a foot race between two persons is gaming within the meaning of Pub. St. c. 99, § 1. Jones v. Cavanaugh, 21 N. E. 306, 149 Mass. 124.

Betting on a horse race is gaming within the meaning of a statute providing for recovering back money lost in gaming. Garrison v. McGregor, 51 Ill. 473, 474; State v. Shaw, 39 N. W. 305, 307, 39 Minn. 153; Dyer v. Benson, 69 Ga. 609, 610; Thrower v. State, 45 S. E. 126, 127, 117 Ga. 753.

Code, § 5701, as amended by Act 1891, c. 115, § 1, authorizes betting on horse races, and section 2 of such act makes it unlawful to bet on any horse race unless the race track on which the race is run is inclosed by a fence, and the bet is made within such inclosure on a race to be run within such inclosure. Held, that betting in Tennessee on a horse race to be run on a race track in another state, in which it is lawful to bet on races on such track, is gambling. Williams v. State, 21 S. W. 662, 663, 92 Tenn. 275.

Prior to Act 1817, c. 61, § 7, betting on a shooting match was indictable. By that act it was provided that "nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent shooting matches." Act 1821, c. 68, § 1, declares that "any person or persons who shall shoot at a mark within the bounds of any town or within 200 yards of any public road shall be subject to a fine." All the statutes on the subject of gaming are to be taken together as one law, and, as shooting within 200 yards of a public road is unlawful, the wager of a watch on, as described in the indictment, a "contest of skill and hazard commonly called 'shooting,' which was then and there unlawfully contested, had and shot at a mark nearer than 200 yards of a certain public road, of the second class," was gaming within the prohibition of the statute. Myers v. State, 35 Tenn. (3 Sneed) 98, 106, 107.

Betting on election.

It is not gaming to bet on the result of an election. State v. Henderson, 47 Ind. 127, 128; People v. Weithoff, 16 N. W. 442, 445, 51 Mich. 203, 47 Am. Rep. 557; contra, Mitchell v. Orr, 64 S. W. 476, 477, 107 Tenn. 534.

Buying or selling pools.

The term "gambling" includes the buying of pools on horse races. Bride v. Clark, 36 N. E. 745, 161 Mass. 130.

It is gaming to sell a pool on a horse race run on a track in another state, for a pool is a bet. Edwards v. State, 76 Tenn. (8 Lea) 411, 412.

Horse racing is a game, and the betting of money or selling pools or making books on the result of a horse race is gaming, because it is betting on a game, and unlawful and void, although the game in itself is not unlawful. A game which is not in itself unlawful may be contested without its constituting gaming, but, if money is staked upon it, it becomes gaming and unlawful. Swigart v. People, 50 Ill. App. 181, 190.

"Gambling," as used in Act 1882, c. 271, making it penal to keep any gaming table or other place of gambling, means playing at any game of chance for money or any other thing. "It was playing at that kind of a game which gave a criminal character to the table at which it was played. If we could suppose that the term 'gambling' included other games besides those which were forbidden, we should reach this singular anomaly; we should hold that the Legislature intended to permit some games at a gaming table which were forbidden in other places; hence the selling of pools on horse races, and the keeping of rooms where such pools are sold, do not constitute gambling within the meaning of the statute." James v. State, 63 Md. 242, 252.

Cockfighting is gaming within Act 1799, c. 8, making void all contracts the consideration of which is money lost by playing at cards, dice, billiards, horse racing, or any other species of gaming whatever. Bagley v. State, 20 Tenn. (1 Humph.) 486, 489.

Under Act 1799, c. 8, § 2, declaring that any game or match of hazard or address for money or other valuable thing is gaming, the act of cockfighting for money or other valuable thing constitutes gaming. By the same act all who encourage or promote any game, etc., are involved in the same guilt with the actors or bettors. How could any one more effectually promote and encourage a match of this kind than by not only giving it countenance by his presence, but actually paying his money to support and sustain it? The preparations are made by the principal offenders; notice is given of the time and place; the public are called upon to attend, and pay money for the privilege of participating in the enjoyment of the sport; and one who accepts the invitation and contributes his money to the extent of the fee demanded is actively and efficiently aiding, abetting, and encouraging the unlawful thing. Johnson v. State, 36 Tenn. (4 Sneed) 614, 621.

Dealing in options.

In common speech "gambling" is applied to plays with stakes at cards, dice, or other contrivance, to see which shall be the winner and which the loser. A contract for purchase of option is not gambling within the meaning of this term. Boyce v. O'Dell Commission Co. (U. S.) 109 Fed. 758, 761 (citing Shaw v. Clark, 13 N. W. 786, 787, 49 Mich. 384, 43 Am. Rep. 474).

A contract between two persons by which one for a consideration paid is allowed the privilege of buying or selling to the other shares of stock agreed upon if he should elect to do so before the stock reaches a given per cent. of advance or diminution in value from the contract price, it not being intended to deliver the shares, but to settle the transaction by payment of the difference between the contract price and the value reached by the stocks, is not gambling, within the meaning of Pen. Code, c. 9, prohibiting any one to keep or use any table, cards, dice, or other apparatus commonly used in gambling; for here there is no contest to be decided, no game eo nomine to be played. The result is to be determined by such fluctuations in the legal disposition of securities as marked their value or their price by sale or purchase at the stock exchange. People v. Todd, 4 N. Y. Supp. 25, 28, 51 Hun, 446.

A transaction in stocks by way of margin, settlement of difference and payment of gain or loss without intending to deliver stocks, is a mere wager. It is a gambling or wagering operation. Waugh v. Beck, 6 Atl. 923, 924, 114 Pa. 422.

Determining by chance at what price an article shall be bought or sold does not render the transaction gaming if there is an actual bona fide intent on the one part to deliver and on the other to receive and pay for the article at the price fixed; but where the transaction shows intent merely to traffic in differences which are determined by chance it is gaming, by whatever method the price may be fixed. Dealings were carried on by the aid of a device called a clock. This is a piece of machinery that works automatically. The quotations are printed on cards ranging from one-eighth to one-half cent, there being an equal number of each. A large number of these quotations are placed in the machine after having been first thrown together and mixed up on a table. At half past 9 o'clock in the morning the machine begins to give the market. The quotations appear one above the other, the upper showing the rise, and the lower the decline of the market, the upper being called first and the lower one next. As soon as called, the quotations are placed on a blackboard. On some of the cards are printed, as well as the fractions above stated, the word "Wheat," on others the name of some stock. The regular market price of each commodity supposed to be dealt in is placed on the blackboard every morning, and the cards having the name of the particular article would, as they came from the upper or lower aperture of the clock, show the advance or the depreciation of the commodity. The clock gave quotations every half minute, and those who dealt bought or sold at the price which, for the time being, was shown on the blackboard, and the usual practice was to close out the deal on the next quotation that changed the price by the payment of differences. That this kind of dealing was gaming, within the prohibition of our statute, can scarcely be doubted. The quotations on the blackboard were determined by the chance operation of the clock, instead of any actual sales of the particular article in the market, and each deal was in essence and effect a bet as to what the next card that issued from the clock bearing the name of the article dealt in would show. New York & Chicago Grain & Stock Exch. v. Mellen, 27 Ill. App. 556, 557.

Gambling and gaming synonymous.

The word "gambling" is equivalent to and interchangeable with the word "gaming." They both have the same meaning and signification. State v. Dyson, 39 Mo. App. 297, 301; Evans v. Cook, 11 Nev. 69, 75; Bennett v. State, 10 Tenn. (2 Yerg.) 472, 474; In re Smith, 39 Pac. 707, 708, 54 Kan. 702; McBride v. State, 22 South. 711, 712, 39 Fla. 442.

An indictment charging that one kept a house to be used and occupied for gambling is equivalent to a charge of keeping a gaming house as such, and is indictable as a misdemeanor under the rule that anything which would be a nuisance at the common law is indictable as a misdemeanor under the statute. State v. Crowder, 39 Tex. 47.

The word "gaming" has two significations, one of which refers to what is illegal, and the other to what is legal and proper. Where the statute provides that there shall be assessed against each person keeping a billiard table an annual direct tax, it authorizes any person to keep for the purpose of gaming a table called a billiard table. "Gaming" is here used in a different sense from "gambling." The "gaming" contemplated as illegal is synonymous with "betting." Wolz v. State, 33 Tex. 331, 335. See, also, Thrower v. State, 45 S. E. 126, 127, 117 Ga. 753.

As used in an indictment charging the unlawful keeping of a room to be used for gambling, and permitting such room to be used and occupied for gambling, "gambling" is not synonymous with "gaming," as used in Paschal's Dig. art. 2055, providing for the punishment of permitting illegal gaming. State v. Bullion, 42 Tex. 77.

Horse racing.

Horse racing is gaming within the meaning of the statute authorizing the recovery of money lost at any games or playing at cards, dice, or any other game of cards. Stone v. Clay (U. S.) 61 Fed. 889, 890, 10 C. C. A. 147 (citing Tatman v. Strader, 23 Ill. [13 Peck] 493; Mosher v. Griffin, 51 Ill. 184, 99 Am. Dec. 541; Garrison v. McGregor, 51 Ill. 473; West v. Carter, 129 Ill. 249, 21 N. E. 782).

Rev. Laws 1825, p. 409, providing that all promises, notes, bills, bonds, etc., made or entered into by any person where the whole or any part of the consideration thereof shall be for money won by gaming or playing at cards, dice, or any game or games, shall be void, should be construed to include horse racing. Shropshire v. Glascock, 4 Mo. 536, 539, 31 Am. Dec. 189; Boynton v. Curle, 4 Mo. 599.

Running a horse race along a public road is not within the meaning of the word "gaming" as used in a statute allowing the grand jury to send for witnesses whenever they suspect a violation of the laws against gaming, etc. Harrison v. State, 44 Tenn. (4 Cold.) 195, 198.

Lottery or gift enterprise.

While in some states all games upon the result of which the right to money or property is made dependent altogether upon skill or chance, or upon both, are classified under the general head of "gaming" or "gambling," yet in this state a distinction has been made between "gaming" and "lotteries"; a lottery being defined to be a scheme for the distribution of property by chance among persons who have paid or agree to pay a valuable consideration for the chance, whether called a lottery, raffle, gift enterprise, or by some other name. People v. Fuerst, 34 N. Y. Supp. 1115, 1117, 13 Misc. Rep. 304.

The sporting artifice commonly called a "gift enterprise," by which a merchant or tradesman sells his wares for their market value, but by way of inducement gives to each purchaser a ticket, which entitles him to a chance to win certain prizes, to be determined after the manner of the lottery, is included within the term "gaming." Bell v. State, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 507, 509.

Moral turpitude involved.

Gambling is an act beyond the pale of good morals, and is an evil practice under any circumstances, though it does not necessarily involve moral turpitude within the provision authorizing the disbarment of an attorney when he has committed a felony or a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude. In re Voss, 90 N. W. 15, 20, 11 N. D. 540.

Playing game for use of table or alley.

Playing billiards where the loser of the game pays money to the owner of the table is "gambling" or "gaming." State v. Miller, 4 N. W. 900, 901, 53 Iowa, 154; State v. Bishel, 39 Iowa, 42, 43; Hamilton v. State, 75 Ind. 536, 537. Contra, Breninger v. Town of Belvidere, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 350, 351; Blewett v. State, 34 Miss. 606, 614.

Playing in a public tenpin alley, where one of the terms of the establishment is that the loser is to pay for the use of the alley, is not gaming or gambling. It is obvious that the parties did not play for gain. They played simply for amusement, and it seems like putting a false gloss on the affair to call this gaming. State v. Hall, 32 N. J. Law (3 Vroom) 158, 165.

Playing game or throwing dice for treats.

The playing at cards under an agreement that the party who loses shall treat the others to cigars is gambling. State v. Wade, 43 Ark. 77, 78, 51 Am. Rep. 560.

"Playing cards for beer constitutes gaming. It is just as clearly gaming to play cards for a glass of beer as it is to play for a barrel or ten barrels of beer. The difference is only in the value of the stake played for." Brown v. State, 7 Atl. 340, 341, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 61.

Gambling is gambling whether it is for five cents or for a larger sum, and the loser at cards who buys the other party a drink or a cigar as a penalty for losing the game is engaged in gambling the same as if he paid in money. Hay v. Reid, 85 Mich. 296, 303, 48 N. W. 507, 509.

Revision 1860, § 4363, providing for the punishment of any person keeping a house, shop, or place resorted to for the purpose of gambling, should be construed to include the playing of a game called "pigeon hole" on a sort of a table, the loser paying for the use of the table and for beer, oysters, or cigars. State v. Bishel, 39 Iowa, 42, 43.

Laws 1799, c. 8, § 2, declaring gaming to be a playing at any match or matches at cards, dice, billiards, or any other game of hazard or address for money or other valuable thing, includes playing tenpins where the loser was to treat to a bottle of champagne, notwithstanding the treat was to be a voluntary thing. Walker v. State, 32 Tenn. (2 Swan) 287, 289.

It is gaming to play any game of hazard for money or other article of value. A game of hazard to determine who shall pay for the beer or other liquor to be drank is, strictly, playing for money. It is to determine which party shall pay a sum of money for the other. Commonwealth v. Taylor, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 26, 29.

Throwing dice to determine who shall pay for liquor or for any other article bought is gaming. Commonwealth v. Gourdier, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 390, 391; McDaniel v. Commonwealth, 69 Ky. (6 Bush) 326, 327.

Playing game on which others are betting.

A person is guilty of gaming who engages in a game of hazard or address on which he knows persons are betting, though he may not bet anything himself. Smith v. State, 24 Tenn. (5 Humph.) 163, 164.

Playing keno.

Gaming is the risking of money between two or more persons on a contest or chance of any kind where one must be loser and the other gainer. Some games depend altogether on skill, others on chance, and others are of a mixed nature. Billiards are an example of the first, lotteries of the second, and backgammon of the last. Each person putting up money in the game of keno in effect bets that the card he has selected contains the numbers which will entitle him to the money of the others engaged in the game, which bet is determined by the globes, balls, and cards connected with the game, which is purely a game of chance, and constitutes gaming. Portis v. State, 27 Ark. 360, 362.

Playing policy.

"Gambling" is defined as "gaming," "playing for money"; "gaming" is defined as the practice of staking property beyond the purposes of mere sport on the hazards of cards or dice; and all these definitions hinge back on the word "game," which is defined as any sport or amusement, public or private, as the game of checkers, baseball, etc. No definition which the court has been able to and includes within the terms "gambling," "gaming," or "game" lotteries, or the scheme of chance commonly called "policy." Hence, under an information for gambling a person cannot be prosecuted for playing policy or some kind of lottery. State v. Lark, 4 Ohio Dec. 241, 242, 3 Ohio N. P. 155.

It is a question of fact for the jury whether policy is a form of illegal gaming. Commonwealth v. Baker, 29 N. E. 512, 155 Mass. 287.

Selling lottery tickets.

It is not gaming to sell foreign lottery tickets. Commonwealth v. Chubb (Va.) 5 Rand. 715, 723.

Selling prize packages.

The selling of prize candy packages, in which a certain amount was put, at risk on the chance of getting more or less than its value, is gaming. Eubanks v. State, 50 Tenn. (3 Heisk.) 488, 490 (citing Bell v. State, 37 Tenn. [5 Sneed] 407).

Single transaction.

The offense of gaming is complete by playing once, and it does not require a repetition of it. Cameron v. State, 15 Ala. 383, 384; Swallow v. State, 20 Ala. 30, 32.

Speculation.

Speculation is not necessarily gambling. A purely speculative contract is not necessarily a wagering contract. Speculation and speculators may serve a useful purpose in providing a continuous market and in differentiating a special class to assume the hazards of fluctuations in prices, and thus relieve the regular trader or purchaser of that risk. So long as there is a real transaction—so long as something is actually bought or sold or is actually contracted for, either for purchase or sale—there is no wagering, not even if the thing contracted for does not then exist. Nor does a subsequent change in or cancellation of the contract affect its original validity. When, however, there is no real transaction—no real contract for purchase or sale—but only a bet upon the rise or fall of the price of a stock or article of merchandise in the exchange or market, one party agreeing to pay if there is a rise and the other party agreeing to pay if there is a fall in price, the agreement is a pure wager; no business is done; nothing is bought or sold or contracted for. There is only a bet. Dillaway v. Alden, 33 Atl. 981, 982, 88 Me. 230.

Sunday laws.

The word "gaming" in Act 1723, c. 16, § 11, prohibiting Sabbath breaking, which provides that no housekeeper shall suffer any drunkenness, gaming, or unlawful recreations in his or her house, is synonymous with the words "betting on games." It cannot be supposed to mean unlawful gamings, which is the usual signification given to the term, for such would be a violation of the law whether practiced on Sunday or any other day of the week, or, if they were not, the policy of the law would prohibit such practices alike on every day of the week as well as on Sunday; and therefore we cannot suppose that the Legislature designed to give such a construction to the word "gaming." We are to regard the act as designing to make that unlawful on a Sunday which would be deemed in law as innocent on any other day of the week. State v. Fearson, 2 Md. 310, 312.

Taking chance in raffle.

It is not gaming by an individual who takes a chance in a raffle at $20 a chance, or any smaller sum, where the property raffled for exceeds $20 in value, and the raffling takes place in a private house. Commonwealth v. Garland (Va.) 5 Rand. 652, 654.

GAMBLING APPARATUS.

A billiard table is not a gaming apparatus. State v. Hope, 15 Ind. 474, 475.

Under a statute providing that any gaming apparatus or implements used or kept and provided to be used in unlawful gaming in any gaming house are required to be burned or otherwise destroyed under the direction of the court, the words "implements" and "apparatus" have the same meaning, and are so defined, and do not include fighting cocks. No one ever did or would call a living animal an apparatus, nor is there any reason to suppose that the Legislature intended to authorize a magistrate to burn or destroy any living animal. Coolidge v. Choate, 52 Mass. (11 Metc.) 79, 83.

GAMBLING BANK.

See "Bank (In Gaming)."

GAMBLING CONTRACT.

"A gaming contract is a contract in which both parties agree to a game." Alsop v. Commercial Ins. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 564, 569.

All contracts between two or more persons, whereby they agree to risk their money or property upon a contingency or chance, which, in the nature of things, may or may not happen, and whereby the one party will be a gainer and the other a loser, are gambling contracts. Jacobus v. Hazlett, 78 Ill. App. 239; State v. Stripling, 21 South. 409, 410, 113 Ala. 120, 36 L. R. A. 81.

A gambling contract is a fictitious contract, in which neither of the parties are bound, and which has none of the elements of good faith; and it is a matter of no consequence where the contract was made, whether on the board of trade or elsewhere. Osgood v. Bauder, 39 N. W. 887, 890, 75 Iowa, 550, 1 L. R. A. 655.

Contract for future differences.

"Contracts for the sale and purchase of commodities, where neither party intends to deliver or accept the property sold, but where they are merely to pay the differences in price according to the rise and fall in the market, are gambling contracts." Lowry v. Dillman, 18 N. W. 4, 59 Wis. 197.

All bargains for the purchase and sale of things where it is the understanding of the parties, whether expressed or not, that the things are not to be delivered, but at the agreed time the differences between the market values at the two periods are to be adjusted, constitute wagers or gambling contracts. Lester v. Buel, 49 Ohio St. 240, 255, 30 N. E. 821, 34 Am. St. Rep. 556.

A contract relating to stocks or other commodities, to be performed at a future day, by which the parties contemplate only the payment of the difference in the market value by one or the other, as the case may be, is a mere gaming contract, and void. Hatch v. Douglas, 48 Conn. 116, 127, 40 Am. Rep. 154.

A deal in grain in which there is no intention on the part of either party that any grain is to be delivered or received, is a gambling contract. Doxey v. Spalds, 8 Ill. App. (8 Bradw.) 549.

The distinction between a gambling contract, which is forbidden by law, and a bona fide contract, is that in a gambling contract or transaction no actual property is dealt with, no actual goods are bought and sold. The parties merely agree to settle their mutual wagers with reference to the price of stock or goods by agreeing to pay the difference between the price at the time of making the agreement and the price at the agreed time of settlement; while in a bona fide transaction the actual property is bought and sold, the parties merely speculating upon the rise and fall of the market. Smith v. Bouvier, 70 Pa. (20 P. F. Smith) 325, 331.

A contract to give to another the privilege to deal in options, and settled on the differences as indicated or determined by the fluctuations of the market, is a gambling contract within the meaning of a statute providing that "whoever contracts to have or to give the option to sell or buy at a future time any grain or other commodity" shall be subject to a fine, and that "all contracts made in violation of this section shall be considered gambling contracts, and shall be void." Of course, the party who contracts to have the option is equally guilty with the party who contracts to give it, and his ignorance of the statute in that respect does not change the character of the contract. Pearce v. Foote, 113 Ill. 228, 235, 55 Am. Rep. 414.

Contract to repurchase conditionally.

An agreement between the seller and buyer of stock that after the expiration of a certain time, if the buyer is then willing, the seller will repurchase at the price specified in the agreement of sale, makes the contract one of conditional sale, and not a gambling contract, within Cr. Code, § 130, inflicting a punishment on him who contracts to have or give to himself or another the option to buy or sell at a future time any stock of any railroad or other company, and declaring contracts made in violation thereof gambling contracts. Ubben v. Binnian, 55 N. E. 552, 553, 182 Ill. 508; Wolf v. McNulta, 52 N. E. 896, 897, 178 Ill. 85.

Guaranty of certain price.

An agreement by which a person, in consideration of a certain sum, paid him by the owner of cattle, then on the road to market, guaranties that they shall sell for a certain price, and promises to make good the deficit in case they shall sell for less, and the owner promises on his part to pay such person the overplus in case they shall sell for more, is a gambling contract. The absence of the purpose to deal with actual property marks the distinction between a legal and a gambling contract. First Nat. Bank v. Carroll, 45 N. W. 304, 305, 80 Iowa, 11, 8 L. R. A. 275.

GAMBLING DEN.

The term "gambling den" means "a place at which gambling is practiced, and includes the idea that the place is resorted to for that purpose." Buckley v. O'Neil, 113 Mass. 193, 18 Am. Rep. 466.

GAMBLING DEVICE.

Any other gambling device, see "Any Other."

Other gambling device, see "Other."

A "gambling device" is the same thing as a "gaming device" as the latter term is used in the statute prohibiting gaming devices. State v. Mohr, 55 Mo. App. 329, 331; State v. Nelson, 10 Mo. 393, 395.

A gambling device is defined to be anything which is used as a means of playing for money or other thing of value, so that the result depends more largely on chance than skill. In re Lee Tong (U. S.) 18 Fed. 253, 257.

A gambling device is something formed by design, and has reference to something worked out for exhibition or show. Portis v. State, 27 Ark. 360, 362.

Any table or the device, when necessarily adapted to the use and necessarily used in carrying on any gambling game, is a gambling device in contemplation of law, although such table may have been originally designed for and ordinarily adapted to lawful uses. Jones v. Territory, 49 Pac. 934, 935, 5 Okl. 536.

Gambling devices are the tools, implements, and machinery of professional gamblers, and are adapted, designed, and devised for the purposes named; and articles which may be and often are used merely for purposes of amusement, such as playing cards, chessmen, billiards, dominoes, etc., are not used exclusively for gambling purposes, and hence are not gambling devices within the meaning of the statute. State v. Hardin, 1 Kan. 474, 477.

Billiard or pool table.

A table used for playing pool and billiards, though such games are games of science and skill, is a gambling device. State v. Jackson, 39 Mo. 420, 423.

Bookmaking.

By Act Cong. Jan. 31, 1883, it was provided that every person who shall set up or keep any gaming table or any kind of gambling table or gambling device shall be fined, etc. Section 4 of the act declares "that all games, devices or contrivances at which money or any other thing shall be bet or wagered, shall be deemed a gaming table within the meaning of this act." Held, that bookmaking on a horse race was a game of chance or gambling device within the meaning of section 4, and therefore came within the meaning of a gaming table as used in the act. Miller v. United States (D. C.) 6 App. Cas. 6, 11.

Cards.

A deck of cards is a gambling device within a statute providing a penalty against any person who shall suffer any gaming table or gambling device on which any game of chance is played to be set up or used in his or her house. State v. Purdom, 3 Mo. 114, 115; State v. Herryford, 19 Mo. 377, 379. And also within a statute prohibiting the betting of money at or upon any gambling device. State v. Trott, 36 Mo. App. 29, 34; Eubanks v. State, 5 Mo. 450, 451; State v. Torphy, 66 Mo. App. 434, 436; State v. Bates, 10 Mo. 166; State v. Dyson, 39 Mo. App. 297, 301; State v. Mohr, 55 Mo. App. 329, 331.

A pack of cards is not a gambling device within a statute prohibiting the keeping of any kind of gambling table or gambling device adapted, devised, and designed for the purpose of playing any game of chance for money or property. State v. Hardin, 1 Kan. 474, 477. Nor within a statute making it an offense for any one to bet on any gambling device or any game played with such a device. State v. Stillwell, 16 Kan. 24, 25 (cited in Commonwealth v. Kammerer, 13 S. W. 108, 109, 11 Ky. Law Rep. 777, 779).

"Gaming device," as used in Rev. St. p. 970, punishing any one who allows any game or games to be played for gain upon his premises by means of any gaming device, does not mean a device used exclusively for gaming, but refers to any device which may be, or in fact is, used for that purpose, thus including cards and other devices which may be used for other purposes than gambling, but which are sometimes in fact used for such purposes. State v. Lewis, 12 Wis. 434, 436.

Chips.

The dice and chips used in a game of craps are gambling devices. State v. Oswald, 53 Pac. 525, 59 Kan. 508.

Crack loo.

The game of crack loo is a gambling device within the provisions of an ordinance providing that whoever shall set up or keep a gambling device in which a game of chance shall be played for money shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. Town of Canton v. Dawson, 71 Mo. App. 235, 239, 240 (citing State v. Flack, 24 Mo. 378).

Contract for delivery of futures.

Though a contract for the delivery of goods in the future, where the real purpose of both parties is merely to speculate in the rise or fall of prices and to adjust the difference between the contract and market prices without the delivery of any goods, is a wager, it is not a game or gambling device within the meaning of Rev. St. 1879, §§ 5721, 5723, making all notes void where the consideration is money or property won at any game or gambling device. Crawford v. Spencer, 4 S. W. 713, 716, 92 Mo. 498, 1 Am. St. Rep. 745.

Dice.

The dice and chips used in a game of craps are gambling devices within the meaning of the statute. State v. Oswald, 53 Pac. 525, 59 Kan. 508.

Election.

Rev. Code 1835, p. 290, §§ 1, 3, relating to gaming, and prohibiting the betting on games and gambling devices, should not be construed to include a presidential election. An election is a political institution, essential to the existence and operation of our government, and recognized by the Constitution and laws. It is difficult to see how such an institution could have been in the contemplation of the Legislature when they enacted laws against games and gambling devices. Hickerson v. Benson, 8 Mo. 8, 10, 40 Am. Dec. 115.

Horse race.

A horse race is a gambling device within a statute providing that notes, the consideration of which is money won at gambling or at any game or gambling device, shall be void. Joseph v. Miller, 1 N. M. 621, 626.

A horse race is not a gambling device within the meaning of the act concerning crimes and punishments. State v. Hayden, 31 Mo. 35, 36; State v. Lemon, 46 Mo. 375.

Pen. Code, §§ 294, 295, prohibiting gambling or the keeping of a gambling house in which gambling is conducted by means of cards, dice, gaming table, or other gambling device whatever, cannot be construed to include a horse race, or a descriptive list of such races, or statements or announcements of the particulars thereof, from which those desiring to bet on the race may more conveniently obtain information in respect to the same. There is no element of chance in their use, which is the test. The use of such list, statement, or announcement undoubtedly serves to facilitate gambling, and so does the fact that a place for gambling is kept open, and the same may be said also of the published schedules of races and games; but they cannot be denominated gambling devices within the meaning of the statute, the betting being on the races exclusively, and the result in no way determined by the use of the instrumentalities in question, and no additional element of chance being introduced thereby. State v. Shaw, 39 N. W. 305, 307, 39 Minn. 153.

Keno.

The game of keno, which is a game at which money or property may be won or lost, and is played by a device containing figures, the players paying an equal amount for the cards, which are numbered and registered, the first number registered completing a line of figures getting all the money paid for the cards except an amount which goes to the keno keeper, is a gambling device within a statute providing that every person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor who shall set up, keep, or exhibit any gaming table or gambling device of any description adapted, devised, or designed for the purpose of playing any game of chance at which money or property may be won or lost. Trimble v. State, 27 Ark. 355, 357; Portis v. State, Id. 360, 362.

Loto.

Loto is a gambling device, when played for money, within a statute providing for the punishment of any person permitting or suffering any gambling device at which any game of chance is played or money or property won or lost to be set up or used in his or her house. The gambling device meant by the statute must be used for games of chance, and there must be a betting and winning and losing. Lowry v. State, 1 Mo. 722, 723; State v. Foster, 2 Mo. 210.

Pico.

The game of pico, which is the same in principle and detail as the game of keno, and is played and carried on in the same manner, except that in pico common playing cards were used both on the balls and on the pico cards sold to the players, instead of numbers, as in keno, and that there were but four cards to fill out on the pico card instead of five numbers, as in keno, in order to be the winner, the exhibitors of the game betting nothing on the game, but, as in the game of keno, receiving and taking a commission out of the money paid by the players, is a gambling device. Euper v. State, 35 Ark. 629, 630.

Poker.

Under a statute prohibiting all gambling with cards and all gambling devices, where several persons met with defendant in his store and made up a game of what is familiarly known as "poker," half a dollar ante, played with common playing cards on a card table, playing all night, such gaming with cards constituted a gambling device. Frisbie v. State, 1 Or. 264, 266.

The term "gambling device" in Code Cr. Proc. § 666, prohibiting all gambling devices, of whatever name or nature, adapted, devised, or designed for the purpose of playing any game of chance, does not include the game of cards commonly called "poker," because, in order to constitute a gambling device, there must be some tangible adapted device or design for the purpose of playing a game of chance for money. A game is nothing tangible, and is not adapted nor can it be used in playing a game of chance. The game is the result produced by the use of the device, and the prohibition of the action is evidently against the use of the device instead of the result of it. The term "gambling device" has no settled and definite meaning, and is nowhere defined in the Code nor by the common law; and therefore the statute is void for uncertainty. State v. Mann, 2 Or. 238, 240.

Rondo is a gambling device. Glascocock v. State, 10 Mo. 508.

Dig. c. 51, §§ 1, 8, providing that gambling devices adapted, devised, or designed for the purpose of playing any game of chance, or in which any money or property may be won or lost, are liable to seizure and confiscation, and the owners or keepers of them denounced as vagrants, etc., should be construed to refer to banking games and all devices of the like kind, and not to embrace the game of rondo, which is a game played with balls by rolling them upon a billiard table, at which the players bet against each other, but not against the keeper or exhibitor of the table, who merely receives from the players a commission upon the amount bet between them for the use of his table. "The court has repeatedly held that the statute relates exclusively to the banking games, so called, whether played with cards or by means of any other contrivance, whether called by the name specified or by any new name or device, and the distinguishing feature of which is that they are set up and exhibited to be bet against by all comers." State v. Hawkins, 15 Ark. 259, 260 (citing Stith v. State, 13 Ark. [8 Eng.] 680; Johnson v. State, 13 Ark. [8 Eng.] 684, 685).

Six-wheel.

A device known as a "six-wheel," whereby money is won and lost, is a gambling device. Atkins v. State, 32 S. W. 391, 95 Tenn. 474.

Slot machine.

A nickel slot machine is a gambling device. The mechanism of the machine is such that, when a five-cent piece is dropped into one of the several slots representing several colors, a disk is made to revolve, on which are painted corresponding colors, and when it ceases to revolve the color upon its face opposite to a finger determines whether the player has won or lost. Each color has a different value, from 10 cents up to $1, and, if the player has won upon the color selected, the sum won is by a mechanical device delivered to him in a cup. The machine is a contrivance or apparatus by which it is determined who, as between the player and the proprietor, is the winner or loser of the money hazarded. The player stakes or hazards his money on a chance which is sufficient to make out the gambling. Within the general understanding such a machine is a gambling device. Lyman v. City Trust, Safe-Deposit & Surety Co., 59 N. E. 903, 905, 166 N. Y. 274; Lyman v. Brucker, 56 N. Y. Supp. 767, 770, 26 Misc. Rep. 594; Kolsborn v. State, 23 S. E. 829, 830, 97 Ga. 343; State v. Grimes, 52 N. W. 42, 49 Minn. 443; Portis v. State, 27 Ark. 360, 362; Jeffries v. State, 32 S. W. 1080, 1081, 61 Ark. 308; Bobel v. People, 173 Ill. 19, 20, 50 N. E. 322, 64 Am. St. Rep. 64.

Stock clock.

A gambling device is an invention or contrivance to determine the question as to who win and who lose their money on a contest of chance. Thus, a stock clock so constructed that cards representing well-known and marketable stocks were dropped by the mechanical contrivance contained therein from one of two slots, one at the top of the clock and the other at the bottom, and so constructed that, if the card purchased by a customer was dropped from the top slot, the stock represented thereby would be considered as having risen, and the customer would win an amount equal to one-half of the amount invested, and, if it dropped from the lower slot, he lost a corresponding amount, the transaction being a mere bet on which slot the clock would force the particular card from, which depended entirely on chance, was a gambling device within such definition. State v. Grimes, 52 N. W. 42, 49 Minn. 443.

Tenpins.

A game of tenpins is not a gambling device within the statute. According to Webster the word "device" in one sense means artificial contrivance, stratagem. "He disappointeth the devices of the crafty." Job, v. "They imagined a mischievous device." Psalms, xxi. Crow v. State, 6 Tex. 334, 336.

GAMBLING HELL.

The term "gambling hell," by the practice of good writers and by common use has "acquired the meaning of a notorious place and public resort for the purpose of gaming; a place devoted to business of that description." Buckley v. O'Neil, 113 Mass. 193, 18 Am. Rep. 466.

GAMBLING HOUSE.

See "Common Gaming House"; "Public Gaming House."

As disorderly house, see "Disorderly House."

As public house, see "Public House."

A gaming house is defined to be a house or part of a house where gaming is carried on as a business. The gaming must be so continuous and frequent that it can be said that it is the business or occupation carried on in the house. If the house is used for other purposes mainly, then one or more acts of gaming, or, indeed, several acts of gaming, would not necessarily constitute it a gaming house. Anderson v. State (Tex.) 12 S. W. 868, 869.

A gaming house is defined as a house where gaming is practiced, a gambling house. In People v. Weithoff, 51 Mich. 203, 213, 16 N. W. 442, Judge Cooley says: "A house or room whose use is intended to facilitate gambling purposes, and where sporting characters are invited to congregate for illegal amusement and gambling, or to take money and other things of value upon trials of chance, skill, or endurance. The house or room must be specially set aside and devoted to the purpose of gaming." We understand that a gaming house is one that is set apart and run or conducted by its owner or proprietor for the profits to be derived from the game there played, whether lawful or unlawful. Miller v. State, 34 S. W. 959, 960, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 650.

A gaming house is a house where gaming is practiced; a gambling house; a house or room whose use is intended to facilitate gaming purposes, and where sporting characters are invited to congregate for illegal amusement and gaming, or to bet money or other thing of value upon trials of chance. The house or room must be specially set apart and devoted to the purpose of gaming. Morgan v. State, 60 S. W. 763, 764, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 422.

Where the evidence shows that the accused was an officer of a social club, that gaming with cards for money was carried on in a room thereof, that a portion of the losses on the games played were appropriated to the use of the club, and that accused, knowing these facts, collected and received the same for its benefit, a verdict finding him guilty of keeping a gaming house was warranted. Cochran v. State, 29 S. E. 438, 102 Ga. 631.

"Gaming house" is synonymous with "gaming table," and means a house, hall, or room kept for the purpose of gambling, and supplied with materials for that purpose. Hardaway v. Lilly (Tenn.) 48 S. W. 712, 717.

Billiard room.

The term "gaming house," as used in the common law of nuisance, did not include a house kept for games of chance conducted for mere recreation. The term does not include a billiard room, though the loser pays for the use of the table. People v. Sergeant (N. Y.) 8 Cow. 139, 140.

Place where lottery tickets are sold.

The term "gaming house" cannot be applied to a place where tickets in unauthorized lotteries are sold. People v. Jackson (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 101, 102, 45 Am. Dec. 449.

GAMBLING IMPLEMENT.

Within St. 1887, c. 448, § 2, which makes it an offense to be present in a common gaming house when gaming implements are found there, any material instrument in ascertaining whether a player shall win or lose in a game as actually carried on is an implement of gaming, regardless of the fact that it is susceptible of a lawful use, or that the game can be played without its use. Commonwealth v. Adams, 35 N. E. 851, 160 Mass. 310.

Rev. St. c. 142, §§ 1, 2, authorizing the issue of warrants to search for and seize any gaming apparatus or implements, is to be construed in a strict sense, and does not authorize the seizing of a game cock. Coolidge v. Choate, 52 Mass. (11 Metc.) 79, 82.

GAMBLING PLACE.

The term "gambling place" means "a place at which gambling is practiced, and includes the idea that the place is resorted to for that purpose." Buckley v. O'Neil, 113 Mass. 193, 18 Am. Rep. 466.

GAMBLING ROOM.

A gaming room is any room in which games for money are habitually played, or which is kept or maintained for the purpose of gaming, even though the room may be put to other uses, and though such other use is for some other and lawful object than a gaming room. Toll v. State, 23 South. 942, 943, 40 Fla. 169.

A room where pools are sold on the result of base ball games and horse races for profit and gain is a gaming room within a statute providing for the punishment of any person who shall for hire, gain, or reward keep or maintain a gaming room. People v. Weithoff, 16 N. W. 442, 444, 51 Mich. 203, 47 Am. Rep. 557. Likewise a room in which a telegraph operator was kept by the defendant, who, for a commission paid by any person, telegraphed the amount of money such person desired to bet on a horse race at another place, an order being signed by the person desiring to send the money, stating that he had made defendant his common carrier, and put in his charge the money to be placed on the horse therein named; the day of the race, the place, and the odds that would be accepted being also specified in the order; a blackboard being kept in the room, on which was recorded at brief intervals the position of the horses in the race, and, if the person betting won, he received the money in the room, and, if he lost, the knowledge of the loss was brought to him there. People v. Weithoff, 53 N. W. 784, 93 Mich. 631, 32 Am. St. Rep. 532.

GAMBLING TABLE.

Other gaming table, see "Other."

Code 1876, § 4208, providing for the punishment of any person keeping or exhibiting any "table for gaming" should be construed to include any table used for gaming, without regard to its appliances or adaptation to any particular game. Bibb v. State, 4 South. 275, 276, 84 Ala. 13.

The term "gaming table" in the statute prohibiting the maintenance of gaming tables, etc., is not to be construed literally as meaning any table or structure, whatever it may be, on which the game is played, as giving the character and designation of a gaming table, but it is rather from the character of the play or the game which is played that it receives its specific designation. Estes v. State, 10 Tex. 300, 307.

"Gaming table," as used in Pen. Code, arts. 358, 359, punishing any person who keeps any gaming table, does not mean literally a table or structure, but refers to any species of table, bank, or game device resembling either that is kept for gaming. Chappell v. State, 11 S. W. 411, 27 Tex. App. 310.

Code 1876, § 4208, providing for the punishment of the keeping, exhibiting, or being interested in, etc., any table for gaming, of whatsoever name, kind, or description, not regularly licensed under the laws of this state, etc., should not be construed as meaning gaming tables, if there be such, as distinguished from other tables. It is not the character of the table—that is, whether it contains devices or any appliances adapted and essential to particular gaming—that makes it a table for gaming. It is the use to which the table is appropriated and the absence of a license for that use which renders the keeping or exhibition, etc., indictable. Toney v. State, 61 Ala. 1, 3.

"Gaming table" is synonymous with "gaming house," and means a house, hall, or room kept for the purpose of gambling, and supplied with materials for that purpose. Hardaway v. Lilly (Tenn.) 48 S. W. 712, 717.

A statute punishing any party "permitting a gaming table to be set up or kept" is not violated by merely permitting games of cards to be played, although such games are unlawful. Ervine v. Commonwealth, 35 Ky. (5 Dana) 216.

Billiard table.

The keeping of a billiard table is a violation of a bond conditioned not to keep a gambling table. People v. Harrison (N. Y.) 28 How. Prac. 247, 248.

A billiard table is not a gambling table, even though the loser pays for its use. People v. Forbes, 4 N. Y. Supp. 757, 52 Hun. 30.

Articles 412, 418, of the chapter relating to gaming, do not mention billiard tables among the games specified by name as included within the intention of the articles, but, after enumerating the games intended to be prohibited, the same article provides that any game played for money upon a billiard table, other than the game of billiards licensed by law, is punishable under the provisions of this chapter. Held, that an indictment alleging that the defendant played "on a certain gaming table, such table being a billiard table," was defective, which did not also allege that the table was being used as a gambling device to evade the law, and that the game played was not the usual game of billiards. State v. Bristow, 41 Tex. 146, 147.

Chuck-a-luck table.

Though a particular table was not a part of, or essential to, the playing of chuck-a-luck, if the defendant kept and exhibited it for use in the playing of that game, he was guilty of keeping a table for gaming. Toney v. State, 61 Ala. 1, 3.

Crap table.

A crap table is within the Texas statute prohibiting the keeping and exhibiting a gaming table. Harmon v. State (Tex.) 22 S. W. 1038.

A table specially designed for gaming, and exhibited as such, is a gaming table within the meaning of Pen. Code, art. 358, prohibiting the maintenance of gaming tables. A table specially provided for the game of craps, and exhibited to attract all the bettors by a person who presides at and keeps his money on such table, against whom all patrons bet, and who takes every bet offered, is a gaming table within the meaning of the statute. Bell v. State, 22 S. W. 687, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 187.

Dice or domino table.

"Gaming table," as used in Pen. Code N. Y. arts. 358, 359, prohibiting the keeping of a gaming table, means a table constructed with a view to certain specific games, in which the table is not only part of the gaming device, but is also necessary to the proper playing of the game. In other words, the table is an essential to the game, and from its peculiar construction, and the manner in which it is operated, forms part of the game. A table on which the game of dice is thrown for drinks and money, and on which a game of dominoes is played, is not a gaming table. Whitney v. State, 10 Tex. App. 377, 378.

Faro bank.

Keno table.

A keno table is a gaming table, the game of keno being one at which money or property may be won or lost, and persons playing such games, betting and hazarding certain sums of money which goes into a pool, less 10 per cent. of which goes to the keeper of the table, and the successful player taking all the money which has been staked and bet on a chance of winning the game, being a game of chance and hazard. Overby v. State, 18 Fla. 178, 180.

A table used for the playing of the game keno is a gaming table within Rev. Code, § 3621, providing that any person who keeps, exhibits, or is interested or concerned in keeping or exhibiting, any table for gaming, of whatever name, kind, or description, not regularly licensed under the laws of this state, must, etc. Whenever a game is kept or exhibited by one person, who is said to run the game, or is the conductor or manager and presides over the same, and it is carried on by means of instruments, as in this case by a wheel, balls, cards, etc., that necessarily require the use of a table or something in the place of it, and is kept or exhibited and third persons may gamble at it, whatever be its name or description, it is a gaming table, or a table for gaming, within the meaning of the statute. Miller v. State, 48 Ala. 122, 128.

A table on which or over which is a hollow globe containing balls or numbers, the drawing out of which determines which of several parties shall take a "pot" to which each has contributed, is a gaming table under section 4465 of the Code, providing that any person who shall preside and deal at any faro table "or other table of like character" for the purpose of playing and betting at the same shall be guilty of keeping a gaming table. Brown v. State, 40 Ga. 689, 690.

Poker table.

A table upon which draw poker is played is not a gaming table within Code, c. 194, § 1, which declares that a person who shall keep or exhibit a gaming table commonly called "ABC" or "EO" table, or "faro bank," or "keno table," or table of the like kind, etc., shall be confined in jail, etc. Nuckolls v. Commonwealth (Va.) 32 Grat. 884, 885.

A table on which poker is played, and which has a hole in the center, into which the players put a chip for the proprietor when they hold threes, flushes, or full hands, was not a gaming table within the meaning of Pen. Code, art. 358. It is rather from the character of the playing or game which is played that it receives its specific designation. The table, to come within the meaning of the statute, must be such as can be bet at by some one besides the keeper or exhibitor, for it must be kept or exhibited for the purpose of obtaining bettors. Lyle v. State, 16 S. W. 765, 30 Tex. App. 118, 28 Am. St. Rep. 893.

"Gaming table," as used in Code, § 4208, prohibiting the keeping or exhibition of a gaming table, is not confined to tables on which banking games are played, such as faro, roulette, etc., but includes tables for games of cards, such as draw poker, checks being used as the representative of money in playing the game, which were sold to the players by the keeper of such table. It is the use for which a table is kept or exhibited that makes it a gaming table. If the use is gaming in any of its forms, or by any of its names, or with any of its appliances, it is a gaming table. Wren v. State, 70 Ala. 1, 3.

Rondo.

It is held that the court will take judicial notice, without averment, that rondo is a gaming table within the meaning of the statute prohibiting gaming tables. State v. Mann, 13 Tex. 61, 63.

Raffle.

The leading elements of a gaming table is that it is a game and has a keeper, dealer, or exhibitor. It is based on the principle of one against the many, the keeper, dealer, or exhibitor against the bettors, directly or indirectly; and it must be exhibited—that is, displayed—for the purpose of obtaining bettors. "The raffle, which is in common use, is not a gaming table, for it is a game of perfect chance, in which every participant is equal with every other in the proportion of his risk and prospect of gain. The element of one against the many, the keeper against the bettors, either directly or indirectly, is not to be found in it. It has no keeper, dealer, or exhibitor. Grand raffle is a gaming table, there being fifty prizes of jewelry placed on the numbers from ten to sixty, the whole amount amounting to over $500 in value, every person paying 50 cents being entitled to a throw of ten dice; which, when thrown, will exhibit numbers in the aggregate not less than 10 nor more than 60, the prizes not being less than 25 cents and not more than $125 each. At every throw the bettor must get a prize of 25 cents at least; and in that case, if he does not want the prize, the keeper hands him back 25 cents in money, and retains the jewelry. The effect of the whole contrivance is that the bettor gives the keeper 25 cents for the improbable chance of winning some of the tempting prizes. The jewelry is the lure to the crowd. The real fund which the bettor stakes his money against is the money in the keeper's pocket or on his table, as he may choose to keep it. On the side of the bettors it is a game of perfect chance; on the side of the keeper there are both chance and skill, and his skill is exercised in so placing the prizes in value that the bettor will have but a remote possibility of winning them. The bettors, however numerous, may all throw in turn for the same prizes, which may still remain on the table, being paid for by the keeper if accidentally won by any bettor.

Here is found the leading characteristic of a common gaming table—one against the many; the exhibitor, with an interest in the game, against the bettors, and that not disguised even." Stearnes v. State, 21 Tex. 692, 694.

Wheel of fortune.

In Smith v. Commonwealth, 3 Ky. Law Rep. 249, it is stated that Judge Hargis, affirming a conviction for permitting a machine or contrivance used in betting and other games of chance to be set up and exhibited, etc., held that the words "gaming table," as used in section 7, c. 47, of the General Statutes, include any sort of machine or contrivance used in betting or other game of chance. It would appear, though it is not clearly stated, that a wheel of fortune was held to come within this definition. Smith v. Commonwealth, 3 Ky. Law Rep. 249.

GAMBLING TRANSACTION.

It is a gambling transaction where one person purchases cotton futures or futures in cotton with the understanding between all the parties concerned that no cotton should actually be received or delivered, but that the sale or purchase was to be completed and finished by the paying or receiving of the difference in the price at which the cotton was sold or purchased, and the price that cotton bore on the date fixed for delivery. A note given for a debt arising out of such a transaction is void. Seeligson v. Lewis, 65 Tex. 215, 219, 57 Am. Rep. 593.

A purchase of stocks on margin is not necessarily a gambling transaction. Stocks may be bought on credit, just as flour or sugar or anything else, and the credit may be for the whole price or for a part of it, and with security or without it. Margin is security, nothing more; and the only difference between stocks and other commodities is that, as stocks are more commonly made the vehicle of gambling speculation than some other things, courts are disposed to look more closely into stock transactions to ascertain their true character. Hopkins v. O'Kane, 32 Atl. 421, 169 Pa. 478.

GAMBLING VERDICT.

Where a jury added together the number of years which each thought the prisoner should be confined in the penitentiary, and divided the aggregate by 12, and the result was agreed upon and returned by the jury as the sentence, the verdict was not a "gambling verdict," there being no agreement or understanding, express or implied, before the result was determined, that that result should be the verdict. It is the fact of the agreement or understanding before the result is adopted that vitiates the verdict. Gildewell v. State, 83 Tenn. (15 Lea) 133, 136.

GAME.

See "Banking Game"; "Confidence Game"; "Unlawful Game."

Any game, see "Any."

Any other game, see "Any Other."

"Game" is defined by the Century Dictionary as a contest for success or superiority in a trial of chance, skill, or endurance, or any two or all three of these combined, and is very comprehensive, and embraces every contrivance or institution which has for its object to furnish sport, recreation, or amusement. Desgain v. Wessner (Ind.) 67 N. E. 991 (citing People v. Weithoff, 51 Mich. 203, 16 N. W. 442, 447, 47 Am. Rep. 557).

A game is a trial of skill or of chance, or of skill and chance, between two or more contending parties, according to some rule by which each one may succeed or fail in the trial. Of skill, as chess and billiards; of chance, as raffle and simple lottery; of chance and skill combined, as backgammon, whist, faro, etc. The instruments by which the chance may be developed and upon and about which the skill may be exercised are various—as cards, dice, balls, figures, letters, chessmen, checks, etc.; and these may be operated on singly, or in double, triple, or even quadruple combinations. Stearnes v. State, 21 Tex. 692, 694; Toler v. State, 56 S. W. 917, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 659.

"A game is a contest of chance or skill, where the party in whose favor the result appears wins or receives something by reason thereof which he would not otherwise have received, and for which he paid no consideration." Cheek v. Commonwealth, 79 Ky. 359, 362.

The word "game" in an indictment for gaming is as strong and expressive as the word "gamble," and therefore, the word "gamble" being sufficient to characterize unlawful gaming, the word "game" may be used in an indictment with the same effect. Bagley v. State, 20 Tenn. (1 Humph.) 486, 489.

"Game," as defined by Webster, is a single match at play, a single contest, and therefore, as used in an indictment in different allegations, might well indicate separate offenses. People v. Sullivan, 33 Pac. 701, 702, 9 Utah, 195.

The word "games," as used in a statute prohibiting games of any kind on Sunday, was intended to apply to such sports and contests as are exhibited as spectacles to the people, and not to such private diversions as card playing and chess playing, and the like. Rucker v. State, 67 Miss. 323, 329, 7 South. 223.

Baseball.

See "Base Ball."

Cockfight.

The term "game," within the meaning of Act 1799, c. 8, making void all contracts in consideration of money lost by playing at cards, dice, billiards, horse racing, or any other species of gaming whatever, and inflicting a penalty upon any person who shall promote any match or matches at cards, dice, billiards, or any other game of hazard or address for money or other valuable thing, includes cockfighting. We think that the question that cockfighting is gaming has been expressly determined by the courts of Great Britain in adjudicating upon the statutes of their own, very similar in verdict to ours. Under St. 33 Henry VIII, c. 61, inflicting a penalty for keeping a house for unlawful games, a cockpit is held out to be a gaming house. 2 Hawk. P. C. 478, 529. This could not be unless a cockfight were a game, because it is not specified by name in the statute, and therefore must be embraced by the word "game." Bagley v. State, 20 Tenn. (1 Humph.) 486, 489.

While horse racing and cockfighting may be classed generally as games, in the sense that they are amusements, diversion, or sports, yet they are not such games as are commonly understood may be played at, and therefore their particular designation in a statute prohibiting horse racing, cockfighting, or playing at cards or games of any kind on Sunday cannot be construed as calling for the application of the rule of ejusdem generis in construing the term games of any kind. State v. Williams, 35 Mo. App. 541-549.

Collection of execution.

Gen. Laws, p. 299, c. 24, § 140, providing that all contracts, promises, agreements, etc., given, etc., for money, property, or other valuable thing won by any "gaming," etc., shall be utterly void and of no effect, means physical contests, whether of man or beast, when practiced for the purpose of deciding wagers or for the purpose of diversion, as well as to games of hazard by means of instruments or devices, but does not include a wager as to whether an execution can be collected. Such a wager is not upon any game within the meaning of the statute. Boughner v. Meyer, 5 Colo. 71, 74, 40 Am. Rep. 139.

Contract for delivery of futures.

"Game," as used in 3 Burns' Rev. St. Ind. 1894, § 6676, providing that a person betting on a game and losing any money thereon may recover it by action, cannot be construed to embrace a bet or wager on the market price of the commodity, so that transactions in a bucket shop, consisting of fictitious contracts of sale or purchase for future delivery of stocks, grain profits, etc., with the intention that there should be no delivery, but a settlement by paying the difference of prices, are not a game. Boyce v. O'Dell Commission Co. (U. S.) 109 Fed. 753, 760; Lancaster v. McKinley (Ind.) 67 N. E. 947, 948.

Though a contract for the delivery of goods in the future, where the real purpose of both parties is merely to speculate in the rise or fall of prices and to adjust the difference between the contract and market prices without the delivery of any goods, is a wager, it is not a game or gambling device within the meaning of Rev. St. 1879, §§ 5721, 5723, making all notes void where the consideration is money or property won at any game or gambling device. Crawford v. Spencer, 4 S. W. 713, 716, 92 Mo. 498, 1 Am. St. Rep. 745.

Dog fight.

A dog fight on which money is wagered is a game, so that a person losing money betting on the result thereof may recover it. Grace v. McElroy, 83 Mass. (1 Allen) 563, 566.

Dog match.

A dog match is a coursing match between greyhounds, and is a game within 9 Anne, c. 14, § 3, making void the contracts or agreements for the playing of any game whereby the party losing pays the sum of £10 or more. Daintree v. Hutchinson, 10 Mees. & W. 85, 100.

Election.

The term "game" cannot be applied to an election, so as to make betting thereon gaming. State v. Henderson, 47 Ind. 127, 128; Hickerson v. Benson, 8 Mo. 8, 10, 40 Am. Dec. 115; and money lost by betting on an election cannot be recovered under a statute authorizing the bringing of an action for money lost by betting on a game. Woodcock v. McQueen, 11 Ind. 14; McHatton v. Bates (Ind.) 4 Blackf. 63, 65; Liehman v. Miller, 46 N. Y. Supp. 532, 20 Misc. Rep. 705; Graves v. Ford, 42 Ky. (3 B. Mon.) 113, 114.

A foot race is a lawful game, sport, or pastime. Batty v. Marriott, 5 C. B. 818, 831.

Rev. St. § 5720, provides: "Any person who shall lose any money or property at any game or gambling device may recover the same by civil action." It was early held that under that statute a horse race was a game (Shropshire v. Glascock, 4 Mo. 536, 31 Am. Dec. 189; Boynton v. Curle, 4 Mo. 599, 600), and the consistency between that holding and the subsequent holding that a horse race was not a gambling device within the meaning of our Criminal Code (State v. Hayden, 31 Mo. 35) was explained in Hayden v. Little, 35 Mo. 418, 420, and we must hold it to be the settled law of this state that a horse race is a game under that statute; and we think that it necessarily and logically follows that, if a horse race is a game, a foot race is also a game in the meaning of that statute, and that, therefore, money or property won in a wager on a foot race may be recovered back. Swaggard v. Hancock, 25 Mo. App. 596, 605.

Horse race.

A horse race is a game within the statute forbidding gaming. Richardson v. Kelly, 85 Ill. 491, 494; Ellis v. Beale, 18 Me. (6 Shep.) 337, 339, 36 Am. Dec. 726. Contra, Commonwealth v. Shelton (Va.) 8 Grat. 592, 596.

A horse race is a game within the statute providing that any person who shall lose any money or property at any game or gambling device may recover the same by civil action. Shropshire v. Glascock, 4 Mo. 536, 539, 31 Am. Dec. 189; Boynton v. Curle, 4 Mo. 599, 600; Swaggard v. Hancock, 25 Mo. App. 596, 605.

Horse racing is a game, and the betting of money or selling pools or making books on the result of a horse race is gaming, because it is betting on a game, and unlawful and void, although the game in itself is not unlawful. A game which is not in itself unlawful may be contested without its constituting gaming, but, if money is staked upon it, it becomes gaming and unlawful. Swigart v. People, 50 Ill. App. 181, 190.

A horse race is a game, and is within the statute enacting that any person legally called to give evidence against another for gaming shall be deemed a competent witness to prove such gaming, although such witness may have been concerned as a party. Cheesum v. State (Ind.) 8 Blackf. 332, 333, 44 Am. Dec. 771.

"While horse racing and cockfighting may be classed generally as games in the sense that they are amusements, diversion, or sports, yet they are not such games as are commonly understood may be played at"; and therefore their particular designation in a statute prohibiting horse racing, cockfighting, or playing at cards or games of any kind on Sunday cannot be construed as calling for the application of the rule of ejusdem generis in construing the term games of any kind. State v. Williams, 35 Mo. App. 641-649.

Pool selling.

Smith v. Commonwealth, 3 Ky. Law Rep. 249, states that Judge Hargis, reversing a conviction under an indictment for permitting gaming by knowingly allowing pools to be sold, alleged that pool selling was neither a wager nor a game. Smith v. Commonwealth, 3 Ky. Law Rep. 249.

Roulette.

Rev. Code, § 1874, providing that any person who has paid any money or delivered anything of value on any game or wager may recover such money or thing by action commenced within a certain time, should be construed to include roulette. Harris v. Brooks, 56 Ala. 388, 390.

Thimble.

The game called "thimble," or "thimbles and balls," is within the terms of the act of 1816 (6 St. at Large, p. 27) against gaming. State v. Red (S. C.) 7 Rich. Law, 8, 9.

Wager.

Money lost on a wager is not recoverable under Comp. St. c. 110, § 12, providing that money lost at a game or sport may be recovered. The statute refers to gaming only, and the word "sport" is added to "game" so as to show that game was intended to be used in its utmost extension; but yet it was only intended to include money lost at some game or play either of skill or chance. West v. Holmes, 26 Vt. 530, 534.

Wrestling match.

A wrestling match is a game within the statute authorizing the recovery of money lost by a bet on a game. Desgain v. Wessner (Ind.) 67 N. E. 991.

GAME FOR MONEY.

A game of pool, in which the loser pays for the use of the table or for drinks, is a game for money within a statute providing for the punishment of any person playing any game for money on a billiard table or table resembling a billiard table other than a game of billiards licensed by law. "It certainly was not what the parties might drink which was risked or bet on the game, it was not property or its representative, but it was money, which, instead of being paid by the loser to the winner, was paid to the dramseller." Tuttle v. State, 1 Tex. App. 364, 367; Stone v. State, 3 Tex. App. 675, 676.

GAME OF CARDS.

The words "game of cards," in an indictment that an innkeeper permitted persons to play at the game of cards in his dwelling house, is of no greater meaning than the word "cards," and therefore the words "at the game of" may be struck out as superfluous. Commonwealth v. Arnold, 21 Mass. (4 Pick.) 251.

GAME OF CHANCE.

Games are divided into two kinds; games of chance and games of skill, and a game which consists in the trial of strength or of speed is a game of skill and not a game of chance. Harless v. United States (Iowa) Morris, 169, 172.

A game of chance is "a game which is decided or some advantage therein lost or gained by the player or some third person doing an act which is required by some rule of the game to be done, the result of which is determined by chance, and not by the skill of the actor, and which is required to be done because of the accidental character of its consequence to the end that chance may enter as an element of the game. It is the character of such a game, and not the skill of the player, which brings it into or excludes it from the prohibition of the statute." Wortham v. State, 59 Miss. 179, 182.

Games of chance consist of but two kinds or classes—the first, where the chances are equal, all other things being equal; and the second, where, all other things being equal, the chances are notwithstanding unequal—that is, in favor of one side. Commonwealth v. Wyatt (Va.) 6 Rand. 694, 702.

It is a matter of universal knowledge that a game of chance, to wit, cards, means one that is played with an ordinary deck of cards; and no one would fail to understand that he was charged with hazarding money upon the result of a game played with such cards as the instrument from which neither skill nor intelligence could entirely eliminate the risk. State v. Taylor, 16 S. E. 168, 169, 111 N. C. 680.

Betting at cards.

Betting at cards is indictable under a statute prohibiting the playing of games of chance. Eubanks v. State, 5 Mo. 450, 451.

Billiards.

The game of billiards is a game of skill, and not a game of chance. Wortham v. State, 59 Miss. 179, 182.

Bookmaking.

By Act Cong. Jan. 31, 1883, it was provided that every person who shall set up or keep any gaming table or any kind of gambling table or gambling device shall be fined, etc. Section 4 of the act declares "that all games, devices or contrivances at which money or any other thing shall be bet or wagered, shall be deemed a gaming table within the meaning of this act." Helj, that bookmaking on a horse race was a game of chance or gambling device within the meaning of section 4, and therefore came within the meaning of a "gaming table," as used in the act. Miller v. United States (D. C.) 6 App. Cas. 6, 11.

Chuck-a-luck.

See "Chuck-a-luck."

Poker.

See "Poker."

Tenpins.

The game of tenpins is not a game of chance within the meaning of acts making it a misdemeanor for any person to play at a game of chance at which money, property, or any other thing of value is bet. State v. King, 18 S. E. 169, 170, 113 N. C. 631 (citing State v. Gupton, 30 N. C. 271).

Turkey raffle.

The putting up by each of several persons of a piece of money, and the deciding by throwing dice which of such persons should have a certain turkey, constitutes a game of chance within Acts 1891, c. 29, making it unlawful for any person to play at any game of chance at which money, property, or other thing of value is bet, whether the same be at stake or not, and those who play and those who bet thereon shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. This statute has no application to the long-prevailing custom of shooting for beef, or at turkeys, and other similar trials of skill. It is true there each participant pays for the privilege or so-called "chance" of shooting for the prize; but there is no chance in the sense of the acts against gambling. These are trials of skill, which the law has never discouraged, and not games of chance in any sense. Nor does the statute prohibit the social diversions in which the hostess offers prizes for the most successful player at cards or other games. In such cases the players bet nothing; they lose nothing, if unsuccessful; and pay nothing for the chance of winning. State v. De Boy, 23 S. E. 167, 168, 117 N. C. 702.

GAME OF HAZARD OR SKILL.

Gould, Dig. §§ 9, 10, p. 371, prohibiting the betting of money at any "game of hazard or skill," means only gaming banks, tables, cards, and other gambling contrivances and devices, and does not include horse racing, which is rather a test of endurance. State v. Rorie, 23 Ark. 726, 728.

GAME OF SKILL.

A game of skill is one in which nothing is left to chance, but superior knowledge and attention, or superior strength, agility, and practice gain the victory. Of these kinds of games chess, draughts, or checkers, billiards, fives, bowls, and quoits may be cited as examples; and it is true that in these latter instances superiority of skill is not always successful. The victory is not necessarily to the swift. Sometimes an oversight, to which the most skillful is subject, gives an adversary the advantage, or an unexpected puff of wind or an innocent gravel in the way may turn aside a quoit or a ball and make it come short of the aim. But, if those instances were sufficient to make the games in which they may occur games of chance, there would be none other but games of that character. Games of skill are distinguished from games of chance in that the latter are games dependent upon chance or luck, and in which adroitness has no office at all. State v. Gupton, 30 N. C. 271, 274.

A game of baseball is a game of skill within the statute making it a criminal offense to bet on such a game. Mace v. State, 22 S. W. 1108, 58 Ark. 79.

GAME WITH DICE.

A game with dice, within a statute making it a penal offense to play at any game with dice, is a game where the throw of the dice determines the result of the game between parties, who bet on the result. Wetmore v. State, 55 Ala. 198, 200.

GAME.

The term "game" includes all kinds of animals and birds found in the state of nature, and commonly so called. Code Miss. 1892, § 2118.

Fish.

"Game," as used in Const. art. 3, § 34, forbidding the enactment of any local or special law "to provide for the protection of game," includes fish. In Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 23, it is said "animals pursued and taken by sportsmen are designated as game," and in a note to that paragraph it is said "game includes wild bees and fish." State v. Higgins, 28 S. E. 15, 16, 51 S. C. 51, 38 L. R. A. 561.

Quail.

The word "game" means birds and beasts of a wild nature obtained by fowling and hunting. Quail and other wild fowl or birds fit for food are included within the meaning of the word "game." And such is its meaning when used in the statute for the protection of game, wild fowl, and birds. Meul v. People, 64 N. E. 1106, 1107, 198 Ill. 258 (citing People v. O'Neil, 71 Mich. 325, 39 N. W. 1).

GANANCIAL PROPERTY.

Ganancial property, in the Spanish law, is all that is increased or multiplied during marriage. By "multiplied" is understood all that is increased by onerous cause or title, and not that which is acquired by a lucrative one; as inheritance, donation, etc. Cutter v. Waddingham, 22 Mo. 206, 255.

Ganancial property is that which husband and wife, living together, acquire during matrimony by a common title, lucrative or onerous, or that which husband and wife or either acquire by purchase or by their labor and industry; as also the fruits of the separate property which each brings to the matrimony or acquires by lucrative title during the continuance of the partnership. Cartwright v. Cartwright, 18 Tex. 626, 634.

GANG.

The word "gang" is sometimes used to describe a body of men associated together for purposes entirely proper, as a gang of laborers, but is commonly used to describe a body of men banded together for improper or unlawful purposes, like a gang of thieves, or a gang of robbers; and such is its meaning when used in a newspaper article speaking of certain men as members of a gang who had entered into a scheme to obtain property by improper methods, and is libelous per se. Hatch v. Matthews, 31 N. Y. Supp. 926, 928, 83 Hun. 349.

GANGWAY.

The word "gangway," as used in St. c. 93, § 8, entitled "Mines," and requiring that all underground self-acting or engine planes or gangways on which coal cars are drawn and persons travel shall be provided with some proper means of signaling between the stopping places and the end of such planes or gangways, and sufficient places of refuge at the sides of such planes or gangways shall be provided at certain intervals, should be construed in its general signification, which is given by Webster as "a passageway or avenue into or out of any inclosed place." Sangamon Coal Min. Co. v. Wiggerhaus, 13 N. E. 648, 650, 122 Ill. 279.

GARBAGE.

The Century Dictionary defines garbage as follows: "(1) Originally the entrails of fowls, and afterwards of any animal; now, offal or refuse organic matter in general; especially the refuse animal and vegetable matter from a kitchen. (2) Any worthless, offensive matter." The trimmed heads, feet, and bones of beef cattle, from which the flesh and skin have been removed, and which are fresh and clean, and do not emit an offensive odor, do not come within the meaning of the term "garbage" as used in an ordinance regulating the hauling of the same through the public streets. City of St. Louis v. Robinson, 37 S. W. 110, 113, 135 Mo. 460.

Garbage is defined as that which is purged or cleansed away; the bowels of an animal, refuse parts of flesh, offal; hence refuse animal and vegetable matter from a kitchen; and is so used in a city ordinance authorizing the appointment of scavengers for removal of offal, cleansing cesspools, and removing garbage, and prohibiting any one else from doing so; and the ordinance is therefore unconstitutional. In re Lowe, 39 Pac. 710, 712, 54 Kan. 757, 27 L. R. A. 545.

In an ordinance prohibiting the deposit of garbage or offal in certain places, the words "garbage" and "offal" were defined to include every refuse accumulation of animal, fruit, or vegetable matter, liquid or otherwise, that attends preparation, use, cooking, dealing in or storing of meat, fish, fowl, fruit, or vegetable. City of Grand Rapids v. De Vries, 82 N. W. 269, 270, 123 Mich. 570.

"Garbage," as used in a city ordinance, is defined to mean all refuse matter, animal or vegetable; so that it would include all waste material, all accumulation of rubbish of whatsoever character, which in time, if allowed to accumulate in large quantities, would doubtless become a nuisance, to abate which the city might employ any lawful means. So that the ordinance prohibiting its removal by any one except a contractor is invalid, as not within the police powers of the city. Iler v. Ross, 90 N. W. 869, 870, 64 Neb. 710, 57 L. R. A. 895, 97 Am. St. Rep. 676.

GARDEN.

"A garden is a piece of ground appropriated to the cultivation of herbs or plants, fruits or flowers. It is usually a small plot of ground near a dwelling house, and used in connection therewith." And under a statute relative to laying out roads through gardens which have been cultivated for four years land merely inclosed in a garden, but not cultivated, is not included. People v. Town of Greenburgh Com'rs, 57 N. Y. 549, 550.

Whether a garden is always a field or not, it may be in a field; and hence an indictment for working in a field on Sunday is sustained by proof that defendant was seen working in his garden, which had a field adjoining. Commonwealth v. Josselyn, 97 Mass. 411, 412.

GARDEN SEEDS.

In common speech garden seeds are the seeds used either for planting or sowing in the gardens adjacent to dwelling houses, small spaces of land, and in the large spaces of land called "market gardens," lying about cities or other large places of numerous and condensed population. They are those seeds from which are raised, in the growing season of the year, the vegetable products, which, before complete maturity, are used upon the table as part of the customary food of mankind, in distinction from those seeds which, sowed or planted on a broader scale in the fields, produce the vegetables which are stored for winter use as food. As the word is used in the United States revenue laws, it would include beans and sugar beet seeds. Ferry v. Livingston, 6 Sup. Ct. 175, 179, 115 U. S. 542, 29 L. Ed. 489.

The term "garden seeds" in the tariff act of 1883 is a word which, in the abstract, may mean either seeds intended for use in the garden, or the class of articles known commercially as garden seeds; but the use of the word in the act has been considered by the Supreme Court in the case of Ferry v. Livingston, 115 U. S. 542, 6 Sup. Ct. 175, 29 L. Ed. 489, and the rule there laid down, which is controlling, was that it would not be sufficient to show that seeds were not garden seeds to show that they were used both in the garden and in the field; but, if it appeared that the seeds in question belonged to a variety not intended to be used to be consumed by man, then they could not be regarded as garden seeds. Clay v. Magone (U. S.) 40 Fed. 230-232.

GARDEN SQUARE.

The words "garden square," marked on a square in a town plat, do not necessarily imply a dedication of it to the public. City of Pella v. Scholte, 24 Iowa, 283, 288, 95 Am. Dec. 729.

GARNETTED WASTE.

Garnetted waste is the product of a garnett machine, which tears and ravel out the twist in thread, thus reducing it back to the original purified wool, by reason of taking out the twist which is originally given to the wool to make it yarn or thread. Standard Varnish Works v. United States (U. S.) 59 Fed. 456, 458, 8 C. C. A. 178.

GARNISHEE.

A garnishee is a trustee or one warned by legal process in respect to the interest of third parties in property held by him. Smith v. Miln (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 603, 606.

"A garnishee is a person in whose hands money or goods have been attached, and he is so called because he has had garnishment; that is, warning not to pay the money to the defendants in attachment." Welsh v. Blackwell, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 344, 348 (quoting 3 Jac. Law Dict. 175).

In case of conflicting claims, a garnishee is a stakeholder, who, after a full disclosure, shall be protected from a double liability. Hanaford v. Hawkins, 28 Atl. 605, 18 R. I. 432.

A garnishee, in the eyes of the law, is a mere stakeholder—a custodian of the property or funds in his hands attached. He has no pecuniary interest in the matter, he does not have to pay costs, and he has discharged his full duty when he has let the law take its course between the original litigants. He has no right to favor one party more than another, and he should stand and act indifferently and without prejudice to either party. See Schindler v. Smith, 18 La. Ann. 476. A garnishee must be a third person, so far as the parties to the attachment proceedings are concerned. Nevian v. Poschinger, 55 N. E. 1033, 1035, 23 Ind. App. 695 (citing Wade, Attachm. § 341; Crosby v. Harlow, 21 Me. [8 Shep.] 499, 38 Am. Dec. 276; Hoag v. Hoag, 55 N. H. 172).

GARNISHEE PROCEEDING.

"Garnishee proceeding" means this: the creditor takes the place of the debtor—only this and nothing more. The former takes only that which the latter could enforce. That which the garnishee owes, whether due or not, is appropriated, and the process has no future effect. Burlington & M. R. Ry. Co. v. Thompson, 1 Pac. 622, 625, 31 Kan. 180, 47 Am. Rep. 497.

GARNISHMENT.

See "Equitable Garnishment."
See, also, "Trustee Process."

The office of a garnishment is to apply the debt due by the third person to the defendant in judgment, to the extinguishment of that judgment, or to apply effects belonging to the defendant in the hands of a third person to its payment. Strickland v. Madrox, 4 Ga. 393, 394.

Garnishment is a proceeding by which the plaintiff in an action seeks to reach the rights and effects of the defendant by calling into court some third party, who has such effects in his possession or who is indebted to the defendant. Jeary v. American Exch. Bank, 80 N. W. 771, 772, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 657.

The object of garnishment is to enable a creditor to appropriate to the satisfaction of the debt due him the property of the debtor in the hands of the garnishee, or a debt owing by the garnishee to the debtor. It operates as a levy upon the property or debt in his hands, as a seizure by the officer does upon property in the possession of defendant. The service of the process upon the garnishee arrests the debt or property in his hands belonging to defendant, and gives the court jurisdiction to condemn it to the payment of plaintiff's demand. The garnishee is in the attitude of a mere stakeholder, supposed to be indifferent between the plaintiff and defendant. Georgia & A. Ry. Co. v. Stollenwerck, 25 South. 258, 259, 122 Ala. 539.

A garnishment may be regarded as a suit brought in the name of and on behalf of one who claims to be a creditor. Skelly v. Westminster School Dist., 37 Pac. 643, 645, 103 Cal. 652.

A garnishment proceeding is no more than a substitution of the plaintiff for the defendant debtor in the enforcement of any liability against the garnishee. And therefore the plaintiff can acquire no greater rights against the garnishee than the debtor himself possessed or could enforce. R. T. Davis Mill Co. v. Bangs, 49 Pac. 623, 629, 6 Kan. App. 38 (citing Rock Island Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. Equitable Trust & Inv. Co., 54 Kan. 124, 37 Pac. 983).

A garnishment, as it has often been defined and described in the course of judicial decision, is "the institution of a suit by a creditor against the debtor of his debtor, and is governed by the general rules applicable to other suits, adapted to the relative situation of the parties." 1 Brick. Dig. p. 173, § 276. Thus an order discharging a garnishee is final and appealable, under Code 1886, § 2900, relating to garnishment, and providing that an appeal lies at the instance of the plaintiff, and section 3611, providing that appeals may be taken from any final judgment or decree. Steiner v. First Nat. Bank, 22 South. 30, 31, 115 Ala. 379.

Attachment distinguished.

The difference between an attachment of personal property and a garnishment is very great. In the former, the property attached is actually taken into the possession of the officer holding the writ, and is under his custody and control, while in garnishment proceedings the property is left in the hands of the garnishee. Santa Fé Pac. R. Co. v. Bossut, 62 Pac. 977, 978, 10 N. M. 322.

As a form of attachment.

Garnishment is a form of attachment. It is an attachment by means of which money or the property of a debtor in the hands of third persons, which cannot be levied on, may be subjected to the payment of the debtor's claim. To subject the property or credit to attachment, and thus confer jurisdiction, it must be within the jurisdiction, so that the court may obtain legal control of the res; otherwise it could make no legal disposition of it, because it is an axiom of the law that the courts cannot change rights of property situate without the state. National Bank of Wilmington & Brandywine v. Furtick, 42 Atl. 479, 481, 2 Marv. 35, 44 L. R. A. 115, 69 Am. St. Rep. 99 (citing Insurance Co. of St. Louis v. Hettler, 37 Neb. 849, 56 N. W. 711).

Garnishment is a species of attachment, and the purging of the conscience of some one having knowledge of the facts is necessary to its successful administration. Ex parte Cincinnati, S. & M. Ry. Co., 78 Ala. 258, 259.

As a notice of attachment.

Bouvier defines the word "garnishment" to be a warrant to any one for his appearance in a cause in which he is not a party, for the information of the court, and explaining a cause. In other words, it is notice to the party in actual possession of the goods or choses in action of a debtor that an attachment has been issued against the debtor, and that the debtor's property in the hands of the party receiving a notice is to be held subject to the garnishment. Mathews v. Smith, 12 N. W. 821, 825, 13 Neb. 178.

As a civil action.

That a proceeding by garnishment to subject the funds of a defendant in attachment to the judgment or debt of a creditor in a suit is a proposition well sustained by authorities. Moore v. Stainton, 22 Ala. 831. The reasoning in support of this proposition is soundly convincing. The proposition of the proceeding is a legal investigation by the same means and through the same instrumentalities employed in an ordinary suit or action. The garnishee is brought into court by a summons. He has his day in court, issues of fact are made up by the pleadings, evidence may be offered, and a trial had by a court or jury as in other actions. Judgment is rendered, costs decreed, and execution issued on the judgment. A suit being a civil action, a garnishment proceeding is a civil action, within the provisions of Laws 1891, § 13, limiting the amount of justices' fees in any civil action. Nylan v. Renhard, 49 Pac. 266, 10 Colo. App. 46.

As creating a lien.

Garnishment is a seizure in the hands of a garnishee by notice to him creating an effectual lien upon the property garnished to satisfy whatever judgment the plaintiff may recover in the suit in which it is issued. Morawetz v. Sun Ins. Office, 71 N. W. 109, 110, 96 Wis. 175, 65 Am. St. Rep. 43.

A proceeding by garnishment is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and, for certain purposes, at least, a lien upon the res is created by the service of notice of garnishment. Garnishment is also, in effect, an action against the garnishee by the defendant in the name of, and for the benefit of, the plaintiff, and the garnisher may be made personally liable. Gilmore v. Cohn, 71 N. W. 244, 245, 102 Iowa, 254.

Garnishment is a mode of attachment. As a general rule, no lien is created on the property in the hands of the garnishee, although it partakes of the nature of a proceeding in rem. Some of the cases seem to hold that it is a matter of attachment, differing in no essential particular from an attachment by levy and seizure, except in the mode of enforcement. Bowen v. Port Huron Engine & Thresher Co., 80 N. W. 345, 109 Iowa, 255.

As an execution or process.

See "Execution (Writ of)"; "Process."

As a pleading.

Garnishment is a writ enabling a creditor to appropriate to the satisfaction of the debt due him the property of his debtor in the hands of the garnishee, or a debt owing by the garnishee to the debtor. It is a mere process, not a pleading, and serves its purpose when it brings the garnishee before the court. Consequently it is held that a demurrer to it is frivolous, and should be stricken out on motion. A garnishment may issue to any number of persons, whether they hold property, or are indebted jointly or severally to the debtor. It operates from its service to create a lien on the property in the possession of, or the debt due from, any or all of the garnishees. Curry v. Woodward, 50 Ala. 258, 260.

As a collateral proceeding.

A garnishment is not a separate or independent action, but is incidental to the original or main action against the defendant. S. E. Olson Co. v. Brady, 78 N. W. 864, 865, 76 Minn. 8.

Garnishment is simply a proceeding collateral to the main action in law, and is exceedingly informal. It cannot be made use of to compel the construction of a will after probate in the probate court. Duxbury v. Shanahan, 87 N. W. 944, 84 Minn. 353.

As a legal proceeding.

A garnishment is not an equitable proceeding. It is essentially legal, assimilated to an attachment of personal property, and, in its nature and operation, is the institution of a suit by a creditor against the debtor of his debtor. The creditor may reach and condemn by this remedy only such demands as the debtor can enforce by an action at law in his own name. Equitable demands cannot be reached, and, if a legal demand exists, complicated and involved with matters strictly and purely of equitable cognizance, which must be adjusted if full and complete justice be done, the parties will be remitted to a court of equity. 1 Brick. Dig. 175, §§ 313-314; Toomer v. Randolph, 60 Ala. 356. In accordance with this principle, where there has been a sale of land under a power contained in a mortgage, at which the mortgagee becomes the purchaser at a bid less than the mortgage debt, the portion of the debt covered by the bid is not subject to garnishment, since, though the sale may be disaffirmed by the mortgagee, until so disaffirmed it is binding on the mortgagor, and he cannot maintain an action at law to enforce the same. Harris v. Miller, 71 Ala. 26, 30.

As a proceeding in rem.

Garnishment is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, since its aim is to invest the plaintiff with the right and power to appropriate to the satisfaction of his claim against the defendant property of the defendant in the garnishee's hands, or a debt due from the garnishee to the defendant. Carter v. Koshland (Or.) 11 Pac. 292.

Garnishment is attachment in the hands of a third person, and is thereby a species of seizure by notice. The effect of garnishment is to place the personal property of the debtor in the garnishee's hands in the custody of the law from the date of service of the notice or summons. It is therefore a proceeding in the nature of an action in rem, as well as in personam. Beamer v. Winters, 41 Kan. 596, 21 Pac. 1078; Barton v. Spencer, 41 Pac. 605, 607, 3 Okl. 270.

Garnishment, like attachment, is a species of proceeding in rem; acquires jurisdiction of the person pro hac vice, by seizing his property, goods, or choses in action. If it cannot acquire jurisdiction or control of the res, it needs must fail to acquire, through such res, jurisdiction of the person. For jurisdiction of the person is acquired only through the res or thing. Louisville & N. Ry. Co. v. Dooley, 78 Ala. 524, 525.

As a statutory proceeding.

Garnishment is a special and extraordinary remedy, and it can be used only at the times and upon the grounds expressly authorized by statute. Garnishment is not now merely an incident to an attachment. Charles P. Kellogg & Co. v. Hazlett, 43 Pac. 987, 989, 2 Kan. App. 525.

Garnishment is a purely statutory proceeding, aiming to invest the plaintiff with the right and power to appropriate satisfaction of his claim against the defendant for debts due from the garnishee to the defendant. "It is, in fact," says Drake, "a suit of the defendant, in the plaintiff's name, against the garnishee, without reference to the defendant's concurrence, and, indeed, in opposition to his will." MacKelvey v. Crockett, 2 Pac. 386, 387, 18 Nev. 238 (quoting Drake, Attachm. § 452).

Proceedings in garnishment are statutory. If there be an answer admitting indebtedness, judgment may be entered on the answer, and, if there is no answer, a conditional judgment may be claimed, and under certain conditions made absolute; but where the garnishee answers, and the answer is controverted, default judgment can not be entered on the failure of the garnishee to appear, for the statute makes no such provision, and ordinary default and a writ of inquiry are not adapted to the administration of garnishment. Lehman Durr & Co. v. Hudmon Bros., 79 Ala. 532, 535.

It is generally held in this country that garnishment is a purely statutory proceeding, and cannot be pushed in its operation beyond the statutory authority under which it is resorted to. Duval County v. Charleston Lumber & Mfg. Co. (Fla.) 33 South. 531, 533, 60 L. R. A. 549.

GAS.

See "Natural Gas."

In the construction of a lease providing that the land should be worked for petroleum rock or carbon oil, and should not be used for any other purposes, it was held that "gas" and "oil" are not synonymous terms. Truby v. Palmer (Pa.) 6 Atl. 74.

Within the meaning of Const. art. 207, which declares that capital, machinery, and other property employed in the manufacture of fertilizers and chemicals are exempt from taxation, gas for illuminating purposes is not a chemical entitled to such exemption. The terms implied in the article of the Constitution should not be considered from the scientific point of view. Illuminating gas is not generally understood to be a chemical. Shreveport Gas, Electric Light & Power Co. v. Assessor of Caddo Parish, 16 South. 650, 651, 47 La. Ann. 65.

The word "gas," as used in a gas lease, is neither ambiguous nor uncertain in meaning, and it is well understood; and evidence is inadmissible, in construing the lease, to show that "gas," as so used, means gas derived from a gas well, and not from an oil well. Burton v. Forest Oil Co., 54 Atl. 266, 268, 204 Pa. 349.

The word "gas," as used in an act relating to gas, water, and water power companies, includes and means natural and artificial gas used for heating and illuminating purposes. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, vol. 3, col. 185, § 26.

GAS COMPANY.

See "Natural Gas Company."

The term "gas company," as used in the chapter relating to the listing of personal property for taxation, includes any person or persons, joint-stock association or corporations, wherever organized or incorporated, when engaged in the business of supplying artificial gas for lighting or heating purposes to consumers within this state. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 2780-17.

"A gas company is a public corporation. It cannot exercise functions without a franchise granted from the commonwealth, for public streets must be occupied, and private rights interfered with." Sanderson v. Commissioners, 3 Pa. Com. Pl. 1, 6.

Gas companies are somewhat public in their nature, and owe a duty to supply gas to all. Hagan v. Fayette Gas Fuel Co., 21 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 503, 508.

GAS FITTINGS.

The distinction between gas fittings and gas fixtures is well stated and explained in Vaughen v. Halderman, 33 Pa. (9 Casey) 522, 75 Am. Dec. 622. Houses are considered as finished by the builders when the gas fittings, consisting of the pipes connecting with the street main, and carried up through the walls and ceilings, are completed. The fixtures are put up in more or less expensive style, according to the taste and means of the persons who mean to occupy the houses, whether as tenants or owners. If the tenant puts them in, they are his, and he may remove them, or they may be sold as his personal property on an execution by the sheriff. If the owner sells the house, and there is no agreement to include the fixtures, the purchaser is not entitled to them, and they cannot be the subject of a mechanic's lien under a statute giving a lien for gas fittings. Jarechl v. Philharmonic Soc., 79 Pa. (29 P. F. Smith) 403, 405, 21 Am. Rep. 78.

There is a clear distinction between gas fittings and gas fixtures; the former term including all the piping down to the points of opening, where chandeliers, brackets, etc., used for lighting, are designed to be attached, and the latter only covering these attachments. National Bank v. North, 28 Atl. 694, 697, 160 Pa. 303.

GAS FIXTURES.

Gas fittings distinguished, see "Gas Fittings."

The pipes which connect with the street main, and are carried up through the walls and ceilings of the house, with openings at the points where it is intended to attach fixtures for the purpose of lighting the rooms and entries, are called "gas fittings," while the chandeliers and other substitutes for lamps and candles are called "gas fixtures," and are screwed onto the pipes and cemented only to prevent the escape of gas, and may be removed at pleasure, without injury either to the fittings or to the freehold. These gas fixtures, whether stoves, chandeliers, hall, and entry lamps, drop lights, or table lamps, are mere personal property, and do not pass by a sheriff's sale of the real estate. Vaughen v. Halderman, 33 Pa. (9 Casey) 522, 523, 75 Am. Dec. 622 (cited and approved in Jarechl v. Philharmonic Soc., 79 Pa. (29 P. F. Smith) 403, 405); National Bank of Catasauqua v. North, 28 Atl. 694, 697, 160 Pa. 303.

Whether the term "gas fixtures" includes gas meters, and therefore whether a contract to furnish gas fixtures includes a meter, is a question of fact, authorizing the admission of evidence of a gas fitter. Downs v. Sprague (N. Y.) 1 Abb. Dec. 550, 551.

GAS LEASE.

Gas being of a fugitive and volatile nature, a grant of it creates only an inchoate right, which will become absolute only upon its reduction to possession. A lease to mine gas is a mere incorporeal right to be exercised in the land of another. It is a profit à prendre, which may be held separate and apart from the land itself. Federal Oil Co. v. Western Oil Co. (U. S.) 112 Fed. 373, 375.

GAS MAINS.

Gas mains are merely pipes used for the purpose of distributing the gas and pressure to the point of illumination. Consolidated Gas Co. v. City of Baltimore, 62 Md. 588, 592, 50 Am. Rep. 237.

GAS PUFF.

A "Gas puff," as used in connection with dangers incident to a furnace stack, is caused by an accumulation of gas near the top of the stack, mixing with the air, taking fire and exploding. Giles v. Jones & Laughlins, 54 Atl. 280, 281, 204 Pa. 444.

GAS WELLS.

The sinking of gas wells, by the express provisions of Act Feb. 21, 1889, is included within the word "mining." State v. Indiana & Ohio Oil, Gas & Mining Co., 22 N. E. 778, 780, 120 Ind. 575, 6 L. R. A. 579.

GAS WORKS.

The term "gas works," as used in Rev. St. § 2485, providing that it shall not be lawful for any council to agree, by ordinance, contract, or otherwise, with any person or persons, for the extension of gas works for supplying the corporation or its inhabitants with gas, etc., if used for supplying gas at the lamp-posts in the village, includes the mains and pipes through which the gas is furnished by a company that owns the whole plant, including the right of way where the same are laid. Gas works used only for manufacturing gas may not, perhaps, include the mains and pipes that convey the gas to the lamp-posts and the consumer. Cincinnati Gaslight & Coke Co. v. Avondale, 1 N. E. 527, 531, 43 Ohio St. 257.

GASOMETER.

A gasometer is a huge, air-tight reservoir for the storage of gas. It works automatically, and rises or falls according to the supply and consumption of gas. Consolidated Gas Co. v. City of Baltimore, 62 Md. 588, 590, 50 Am. Rep. 237.

GASOLINE.

Gasoline is the most volatile of the different oils composing crude petroleum, and consequently the most explosive, and, in the process of distillation of petroleum, is the oil driven off at the lowest temperature, so that a prohibition in an insurance policy against keeping petroleum will include the keeping of gasoline. Kings County Fire Ins. Co. v. Swigert, 11 Ill. App. 590, 598.

Puroline and gasoline, as sold and used for illuminating purposes, are both petroleum products, and both are gas-generating fluids. From the testimony of chemists and other experts, and of dealers in such articles, it appears that the difference of danger between puroline and gasoline of 74 deg. gravity is so slight and insignificant that it is hardly measurable or even perceptible. It also appears that, in the trade, orders for puroline are frequently and almost usually filled by delivering 74 deg. gasoline, and circulars issued and distributed all over the state by different dealers in these articles contain the statement that 74 deg. gasoline is of the same gravity as puroline. In both, the danger is not from explosion while burning in lamps, but from handling in the proximity of a light, on account of the gas which they liberate and generate from packages which are not air-tight, and which gas is inflammable. Socola v. Chess-Carley Co., 1 South. 824, 826, 39 La. Ann. 344.

GATE.

See "Beast Gate"; "Tollgate"; "Safety Gates."

"A gate is a protection. It is a contrivance for passing through a fence. It is a part of the fence, which is defined to be a protection; an inclosed structure of wood, iron, or other material, intended to prevent intrusion from without, or straying from within. A gate is a necessary part of such inclosing structure. It is a part of the fence." Per Beck, J., in Mackie v. Central R. of Iowa, 6 N. W. 723, 54 Iowa, 540; Payne v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. Ry. Co., 33 N. W. 633, 634, 72 Iowa, 214; West v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 26 Mo. App. 344, 348; Poler v. New York Cent. R. Co., 16 N. Y. 476, 480; Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co. v. Pounder, 54 N. W. 509, 510, 36 Neb. 247; Wabash R. Co. v. Kinie, 42 Ill. App. 272, 274; Estes v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co., 63 Me. 308, 309.

GATHER.

A portion of the oath upon which perjury was assigned was that defendant "heard and saw M. getting and carrying away corn," and the negative averment was that defendant "did not see and hear M. gather and carry away corn." Held, that the use of the word "gather" to negative "getting" was not sufficient cause for an arrest of judgment, inasmuch as the substance and effect of the former were equivalent to the latter. State v. Raymond, 20 Iowa, 582, 585.

A clause of a lease reserving to the tenant the right to "gather the crop" after the expiration of the term means that the tenant should be entitled to either ingress and egress so far as is necessary to gather and remove the crop, but does not authorize him to hold over and exclude the landlord after the time at which he was to surrender. Stoddard v. Hewett, 30 Ark. 156, 159.

A will giving a certain person a tract of land, with the crops thereon, whether "gathered or growing" at the time of testator's death, means the crops made the year the testator died, and those of the preceding year remaining on the land, and those brought thither from other plantations to be stored. Carnagy v. Woodcock (Va.) 2 Munf. 234, 239, 5 Am. Dec. 470.

GAUFFRE LEATHER.

Where the appearance of gauffre leather indicates that it has been advanced from the condition of a skin to the condition of a leather, it is dutiable as leather not specially provided for, under Act Aug. 28, 1894, par. 340. United States v. Naday (U. S.) 92 Fed. 40.

GAVELET.

Gavelet was an ancient process of the common law, in use in the law of landlord and tenant, for the collection of rent from a tenant. It was a form of the writ of ces-savit, and was in use in Kent and London. By such process the landlord could seize the land itself for rent in arrear, and hold it until payment was made. It has been obsolete for ages, and exists only in the memory of legal antiquaries. Emig v. Cunningham, 62 Md. 458, 460.

GELDING.

A gelding is a castrated male horse. State v. Royster, 65 N. C. 539.

"A reference to Webster's Dictionary shows the noun 'gelding,' as used in our language, to be synonymous with the word 'gilding,' as used in the Danish language, and in all probability its meaning was derived from that word, which signifies a castrated animal, rather than the word 'gelding,' which is of Icelandic origin, and means castration." The use of the word "gilding" in an indictment for the theft of such an animal, instead of the word "gelding," does not vitiate the indictment. Thomas v. State, 2 Tex. App. 293, 294.

The words "mares, horses, or geldings," in Act March 15, 1821, providing for the payment of a reward to any person who shall pursue and apprehend any person who shall have stolen any mare, horse, or gelding, etc., do not include a mule. Commonwealth v. Davidson, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 172.

A gelding is not included in the term "horse," in a statute making it criminal to sell any horse, mare, or gelding, and therefore a conviction cannot be sustained in an indictment charging the stealing of a horse by evidence of the stealing of a gelding. If the descriptive term "horse" alone had been used, evidence that the gelding had been stolen would have been admissible; but, as the Legislature have thought proper to particularize and define their business, the conclusion is obvious from the reasoning employed that in an indictment under the statute it is necessary to be equally specific. State v. Plunket (Ala.) 2 Stew. 11, 12; State v. Buckles, 26 Kan. 237, 241.

"Gelding," as used in Pasch. Dig. art. 2409, providing for the punishment of any person who steals any horse, gelding, mare, colt, ass, or mule, specifically describes a particular species of property, discriminating between a horse, gelding, mare, colt, ass, or mule, as different species of property, and an allegation of theft of a gelding is not supported by proof of theft of a horse. "Horse" and "gelding" are not synonymous terms, nor is gelding included in the term "horse." Johnson v. State, 16 Tex. App. 402, 409; Jordt v. State, 31 Tex. 571, 572, 98 Am. Dec. 550.

In common parlance, the terms "gelding" and "horse" are often used interchangeably, so that, under an indictment charging the theft of a gelding, the refusal of an instruction that, if the proof showed the theft of a horse, the jury must acquit, was not error. State v. Ingram, 16 Kan. 14, 19.

The term "gelding" is included within the term "horse," and therefore an indictment for stealing a horse is supported by proof of the theft of a gelding. Baldwin v. People, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 304; State v. Donnegan, 34 Mo. 67; People v. Butler, 2 Utah, 504.

A gelding may be properly described in an indictment for larceny as a horse. Hooker v. State, 4 Ohio (4 Ham.) 348, 349.

Ridgling.

An indictment charging the theft of a gelding cannot be construed to include a ridgling, i. e., a half-castrated animal, so as to admit proof that the animal stolen was a ridgling. Webster defines "gelding" to mean a eunuch or castrated animal and the word "gelt" means the same thing. Brisco v. State, 4 Tex. App. 219, 221, 30 Am. Rep. 162.

GELT.

"Gelt" is defined by Webster as a eunuch or castrated animal. Brisco v. State, 4 Tex. App. 219, 221, 30 Am. Rep. 162.

GEM.

Gems are valuable stones kept for curiosity, only, as distinguished from jewels, which are valuable stones set and prepared for wear. Cavendish v. Cavendish, 1 Brown, Ch. 409.

GENERAL.

The term "general" is defined by Webster as follows: "Common to many or the greatest number; widely spread; prevalent; extensive, though not universal." Platt v. Craig, 63 N. E. 594, 595, 66 Ohio, 75; Keon v. State, 53 N. W. 595, 596, 597, 35 Neb. 676, 678, 17 L. R. A. 821; McCorkendale v. McCorkendale, 82 N. W. 754, 111 Iowa, 314; Van Horn v. Van Horn, 77 N. W. 846, 848, 107 Iowa, 247, 45 L. R. A. 93; Duffy v. Duffy, 87 N. W. 500, 501, 114 Iowa, 581; Watson v. Richardson, 80 N. W. 407, 414, 110 Iowa, 673.

"General," as used in the Code, relating to the effect of the general and notorious recognition of illegitimate children by a father, is not equivalent to "universal." Webster says that the word "general" means extensive, though not universal. A limited and partial recognition is a general one, for everything is limited and partial which is not universal. Blair v. Howell, 28 N. W. 199, 200, 68 Iowa, 619.

"General" means not specific, vague, indefinite. Cribbs v. Benedict, 44 S. W. 707, 711, 64 Ark. 555.

Notorious distinguished.

See "Notorious."

Public synonymous.

The terms "public" and "general" are sometimes used as synonymous, meaning merely that which concerns a multitude of persons. Stockton v. Williams (Mich.) 1 Doug. 546, 570 (citing Greenl. Ev. 152).

Unity imported.

The words "joint" and "general" import unity, as distinguished from the word "separate," which implies division and distribution. Merrill v. Pepperdine, 36 N. E. 921, 922, 9 Ind. App. 416.

GENERAL ACCEPTANCE.

A general acceptance of a bill is an acceptance according to the tenor of the bill, and not qualified by any statement or condition. Rowe v. Young, 2 Brod. & B. 180.

By a general acceptance, the acceptor undertakes to pay the bill at any place where he may be called upon. By a special acceptance, he undertakes to pay at the place named in the bill. Cowie v. Halsall, 4 Barn. & Ald. 197, 198.

"In Story on Bills, § 239, it is said that an acceptance is general when it imports an absolute acceptance precisely in conformity to the tenor of the bill itself. It is conditional or qualified when it contains a qualification, limitation, or condition different from what is expressed on the face of the bill, or from what the law implies upon a general acceptance. It is qualified when the drawee absolutely accepts the bill, but makes it payable at a different time or place, or for a different firm, or in a different mode from that which is the tenor of the bill." Todd v. Bank of Kentucky, 67 Ky. (3 Bush) 626, 628.

An acceptance to pay at a particular place is a general acceptance, unless it expressly states that the bill is to be paid there only, and not elsewhere. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 4542; Code Supp. Va. 1898, § 2841a; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1055.

GENERAL ACT.

See "General Law."

GENERAL ADMINISTRATOR.

General administrators are of two kinds: (1) When the grant of administration is unlimited, and the administrator is required to administer the whole estate under the intestate laws; (2) when the grant is made with the annexation of the will which is the guide to the administrator to administer and distribute the estate. Clemens v. Walker, 40 Ala. 189, 198 (quoting Bouv.).

GENERAL AFFIRMATIVE CHARGE.

The "general affirmative charge," strictly speaking, is without hypothesis, and imperatively directs the verdict; but, in the common parlance of the bench and bar, a charge with hypothesis, "if the jury believe the evidence," they will find so and so, is also known as the "general affirmative charge," though the phrase "with hypothesis" is often added in naming such an instruction. Hence an exception that the court refused to give the general affirmative charge in favor of defendant is too indefinite to authorize its consideration on appeal. Dannelley v. State, 30 South. 452, 130 Ala. 132.

GENERAL AGENCY OR AGENT.

A general agent is one who is employed to transact every business of a particular kind. Gibson v. J. Snow Hardware Co., 10 South. 304, 307, 94 Ala. 346; Edwards v. Home Ins. Co., 73 S. W. 881, 885, 100 Mo. App. 695 (citing Butler v. Maples, 76 U. S. [9 Wall.] 766, 19 L. Ed. 822); Lobdell v. Baker, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 193, 202, 35 Am. Dec. 358.

A general agent is an agent who is empowered to transact all the business of his principal of a particular kind or in a particular place. Baldwin v. Tucker (Ky.) 65 S. W. 841, 842, 57 L. R. A. 451; South Bend Toy Mfg. Co. v. Dakota Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 52 N. W. 866, 867, 3 S. D. 205; Sawin v. Union Bldg. & Sav. Ass'n, 64 N. W. 401, 403, 95 Iowa, 477; Robinson v. Aetna Ins. Co., 30 South. 665, 666, 128 Ala. 477; British & A. Mortg. Co. v. Cody, 33 South. 832, 834, 135 Ala. 622; Pacific Biscuit Co. v. Dugger, 67 Pac. 32, 40 Or. 362; Scott v. McGrath (N. Y.) 7 Barb. 53, 55; Ruby v. Talbott, 21 Pac. 72, 77, 5 N. M. 251, 3 L. R. A. 724; First Nat. Bank of Macon v. Nelson, 38 Ga. 391, 399, 95 Am. Dec. 400; Union Stockyard & Transit Co. v. Mallory, Son & Zimmerman Co., 157 Ill. 554, 41 N. E. 888, 891, 48 Am. St. Rep. 341; Halladay v. Underwood, 90 Ill. App. 130, 132.

"A general agency exists when there is a delegation to do all acts connected with a particular trade, business, or employment." Great Western Min. Co. v. Woodmas of Alston Min. Co., 20 Pac. 771, 773, 12 Colo. 46, 13 Am. St. Rep. 204; Western Homestead & Irrigation Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 47 Pac. 721, 724, 9 N. M. 1; Fishbaugh v. Spunaugle, 92 N. W. 58, 59, 118 Iowa, 337; Trundy v. Farrar, 32 Me. 225, 227.

By "a general agent" is understood not merely a person substituted in the place of another for transacting all manner of business, but a person whom a man puts in his place to transact all his business of a particular kind, as to buying and selling certain kinds of wares, to negotiate certain contracts, and the like. Jaques v. Todd (N. Y.) 3 Wend. 83, 90; Loudon Sav. Fund Soc. v. Hagerstown Sav. Bank, 36 Pa. (12 Casey) 498, 78 Am. Dec. 390; De Turck v. Matz, 36 Atl. 861, 863, 180 Pa. 347.

General agency implies authority in the agent to act generally in all the business usually conducted by the principal. Birmingham Mineral R. Co. v. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co., 28 South. 679, 682, 127 Ala. 137.

By Comp. Laws, § 3980, a general agent is defined as one who is intrusted by the principal with the possession of the thing sold, and who has authority to receive the price. Schull v. New Birdsall Co., 86 N. W. 654, 655, 15 S. D. 8.

Comp. Laws, § 6463, permitting a summons on a corporation garnishee to be served "on the president, cashier, secretary, treasurer, general or special agent, superintendent, or other principal officer," while very indefinite, does not mean every man who is intrusted with a commission or an employment, but means agents who, either generally or in respect to some particular department of the corporate business, have a controlling authority, either general or special. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. Hunt, 39 Mich. 469, 471.

The terms "general agent" and "special agent" are relative. An agent may have power to act for his principal in all matters. He is then strictly a general agent. He may have power to act for him in particular matters. He is then a special agent. But within the scope of such particular matters his powers may be general, and with reference thereto he is a general agent. The term "general agent" includes one authorized to make sales of his principal's machinery in certain localities, and hence notice to him of defects in a machine was notice to the principal. Springfield Engine & Thresher Co. v. Kennedy, 34 N. E. 856, 859, 7 Ind. App. 502.

General manager synonymous.

The terms "general manager" and "general agent," when applied to a railroad company, are synonymous. The general agent of such a company is virtually the corporation itself, and therefore has authority to bind the company for the expenses of board and attendance for an injured brakeman. Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. Reisner, 18 Kan. 458, 460.

Insurance company.

A general agent of an insurance company is one who is authorized to accept risks and settle terms of insurance, and to carry them into effect by issuing and renewing policies. Walsh v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 9 Hun, 421, 423.

In the insurance business an agent is termed a general agent rather with reference to the geographical extent of his authority, in contradistinction to a local agent, who may have original powers, though exercising them within more restricted limits. Syndicate Ins. Co. v. Catchings, 16 South. 46, 50, 104 Atl. 176.

The extent of territory which is to be the field of agency of an insurance agent is no test of the extent of the agent's authority within that field. His operations may include the whole United States, and yet his powers be special and limited. On the other hand, his field or operations may be confined to a single county or city, and yet his authority within that field be unlimited. Ermentrout v. Girard Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 63 Minn. 305, 65 N. W. 635, 30 L. R. A. 346, 56 Am. St. Rep. 481. The fact that a receipt for a premium given by an agent bore the words "district agent" did not show that he was a general agent. Cyrenius v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 46 N. Y. Supp. 549, 553, 18 App. Div. 599.

A general agent of an insurance company, within the meaning of Acts 1893, p. 80, taxing insurance agents, is one who represents any insurance company in the state, or who exercises general supervision over the business of such insurance company, or over local agents in the state, or subdivision of the state. Eichlitz v. State, 46 S. W. 643, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 486.

Agents appointed by an insurance company, and supplied with blank policies properly signed by the company, which they were authorized to fill up, countersign, and deliver to the assured, were constituted the general agents of the insurers in the matter of soliciting and accepting risks, agreeing upon and settling the terms of insurance, and carrying the same into effect by issuing the policies. Continental Ins. Co. v. Ruckman, 20 N. E. 77, 79, 127 Ill. 364, 11 Am. St. Rep. 121.

The powers of insurance agents to bind their companies are varied by the character of the functions they are employed to perform. Their powers in this respect may be limited by the companies. The parties dealing with them as to matters within the real or apparent scope of their agency are not affected by such limitations unless they had notice of the same. An insurance agent clothed with authority to make contracts and to issue policies stands in the stead of the company to the assured. His acts and declarations in reference to such business are the acts and declarations of the company. Rivara v. Queen's Ins. Co., 62 Miss. 720, 728. And such an agent is the general agent of the company. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Bowdre, 7 South. 596, 598, 67 Miss. 620, 19 Am. St. Rep. 326.

Partner.

Where a partnership was engaged in the purchase and sale of sheep, the purchases being intrusted to one of the partners, he was a general agent of the members of the firm, and his knowledge as to the condition of sheep purchased was the knowledge of all the partners; and the fact that he sold out his interest to his associates before they sold the sheep did not divest such associates of their previous knowledge, or affect their responsibility, on its being shown that the sheep were diseased, although they had no actual knowledge of such disease. Jeffrey v. Bigelow (N. Y.) 18 Wend. 518, 520, 28 Am. Dec. 476.

Power to sell.

A general and special agency to transact all manner of business does not necessarily include the power to sell real estate. Hodge v. Combs, 66 U. S. (1 Black) 192, 194, 17 L. Ed. 157.

The mere fact that one constitutes another his "general and special agent to do and transact all manner of business" does not necessarily authorize the agent to sell stocks or other property of the principal. If, however, it should appear that the paper was presented as a power of attorney to transfer the stock on the books, and if a transfer had been made on the faith of its sufficiency to one who had paid a valuable and full consideration, a case would have been presented which might have called for a liberal construction of the vague and indefinite instrument. In this case, however, none of these facts appeared, and consequently the court made no definite decision on what construction the paper might be constrained to yield under such circumstances. Hodge v. Combs, 66 U. S. (1 Black) 192, 194, 17 L. Ed. 157.

Special distinguished.

"The distinction between a general and special agent is well settled. The acts of the former bind the principal, whether in accordance to his instructions or not. Those of the latter do not, unless strictly within his authority. Rossiter v. Rossiter (N. Y.) 8 Wend. 494, 497, 24 Am. Dec. 62.

"The difference between a general and a special agent is said to be this: The former is appointed to act in the affairs of his principal generally, and the latter to act concerning some particular object. In the former case the principal will be bound by the acts of his agent within the scope of the general authority conferred on him, although the acts are violative of his private instructions and directions. In the latter case, if the agent exceeds the special authority conferred on him, the principal is not bound by the acts." Wood v. McCain, 7 Ala. 800, 804, 42 Am. Dec. 612.

The distinction between general and special agency is sometimes very unsatisfactory. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Butler v. Maples, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 766, 19 L. Ed. 822, defined the difference in these words: "The distinction between the two kinds of agencies is that the one is created by power given to do acts of a class, and the other by power to do individual acts only." Whether, therefore, an agency is general or special, is wholly independent of the question whether the power to act within the scope of the authority given is unrestricted, or whether it is restrained by instructions or conditions imposed by the principal relative to the mode of its exercise; and, where a general railroad attorney has power to employ local attorneys, he is a general agent, and his act in employing a local attorney at a yearly salary will be binding on his principal. Cross v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 42 S. W. 675, 679, 141 Mo. 132.

The distinction between a general and special agent, as stated by Walt in his work on Law and Practice, vol. 1, p. 215, is: "A general agent is one who is authorized to transact all the business of his principal, or all his business of some particular kind or at some particular place. The principal will be bound by the acts of a general agent, if the latter acted within the usual and ordinary scope of the business in which he was employed, notwithstanding he may have violated the private instructions which the principal may have given him, provided that the person dealing with such agent was ignorant of such violation, and that the agent exceeded his authority. The authority of an agent being limited to a particular business does not make it special. It may be as general in regard to that as though its range were unlimited. A special agent is one who is authorized to do one or more specific acts in pursuance of instructions, or within restrictions necessarily implied from the act to be done. The principal is not bound by the acts of a special agent if he exceeds the limits of his authority. It is the duty of every person who deals with a special agent to ascertain the extent of the agent's authority before dealing with him. If this is neglected, such person will deal at his peril, and the principal will not be bound by any act which exceeds the particular authority given." And hence an agent authorized to purchase wheat for his principal, using sacks belonging to such principal, and furnished with a warehouse owned or used by the principal, but privately instructed to purchase for cash only, is a general and not a special agent, and his principal is bound by his purchase of wheat on credit of one ignorant of the limitation on his authority. Cruzan v. Smith, 41 Ind. 288, 297.

A general agent is usually authorized to do all acts connected with the business or employment in which he is engaged, while a special agent is one authorized to do specific acts in pursuance of particular instructions, or with restrictions necessarily implied from the act to be done; but in either case, if the agent exceeds the authority conferred, his acts will not bind the principal. Godshaw v. J. N. Struck & Bro., 58 S. W. 781, 109 Ky. 285, 51 L. R. A. 668.

A general agency, as used in Code Civ. Proc. 1883, § 40, providing that, in a suit against a corporation, service may be made on the president, cashier, treasurer, or general agent, exists where there is a delegation to the agent to do all the acts connected with a particular trade, business, or employment. A special agency exists where there is a delegation of authority to do a single act, and, while the powers of a general agent may be liberally construed, those of a special agent are limited by the terms in which they are conferred, and he takes nothing by implication. The terms "general or special agent," as used in designating an officer of a corporation on whom service may be made, are very indefinite; but they evidently mean agents who, either generally, or in respect to some particular department of the corporate business, have a controlling authority, either general or special. A person employed by a mining corporation to oversee the laborers and to keep their time, and to perform the duties of shift boss, and who, in the absence of the general agent, employed men, and bought supplies for them, and paid them their wages, and reported his acts and doings to the general agent, but made no communications to the company direct, and kept no books and had no office, and was not held out by the company as an agent, and did not represent himself to be an agent, was not a general agent, within the meaning of the statute, as his duties and powers were limited, and not in any manner connected with the general management and supervision of the affairs of the company. Great Western Min. Co. v. Woodmas of Alston Min. Co., 20 Pac. 771, 773, 774, 12 Colo. 46, 13 Am. St. Rep. 204.

The word "general" has a very broad significance to the layman, and, when we recognize the difficulty which courts experience in their attempts to determine what is a general agent, and the extent and limitations of his powers, it can be very readily seen that the use of the term "general agency" in an instruction would tend to mislead the jury, and that they would naturally infer that the agent had a greater authority than the law would imply. Merchants' Insurance Co. v. New Mexico Lumber Co., 51 Pac. 174, 180, 10 Colo. App. 223.

Train conductor.

The conductor of a train, so far as concerns the direct and immediate management of the train when it is out on the road, is, in the absence of some superior officer, the general agent of the company, and, as such agent, is empowered to employ surgical assistance when a brakeman of his train is injured while the train is out on the road, and where there is no superior officer present, and there is an immediate necessity for surgical treatment. Terre Haute & I. R. R. Co. v. McMurray, 98 Ind. 358, 368, 49 Am. Rep. 752.

GENERAL APPEARANCE.

A general appearance waives all question of the service of process. It is equivalent to personal service. Creighton v. Kerr, 87 U. S. (20 Wall.) 8, 12, 22 L. Ed. 309. Where defendant stipulated, by its solicitor, to file an answer to an amended bill upon the merits in consideration of an extension of time given it for that purpose, and, in pursuance thereof, to file such answer, it voluntarily submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the court. Seattle, L. S. & E. R. Co. v. Union Trust Co. (U. S.) 79 Fed. 179, 187, 24 C. C. A. 512.

A general appearance is not of itself a waiver of the right to object to a defect in a process. In re Shelton St. Ry. Co., 39 Atl. 446, 447, 70 Conn. 329 (citing Payne v. Farmers' & Citizens' Bank, 29 Conn. 415).

An appearance to file an affidavit for defense, and argue a rule for judgment, is a general appearance. Hoffman v. Kramer, 3 Pa. Dist. R. 238.

Where the transcript of the justice of the peace showed an appearance by an attorney on a motion to quash the attachment, it will be regarded as an appearance in general, and the defendant will be estopped from a motion to dismiss the case when taken to the district court on an appeal for the want of personal service. Deshler v. Foster (Iowa) Morris, 403.

Taking an appeal or suing out a writ of error from an inferior court to an intermediate court, which tries the same de novo, constitutes a general appearance in the intermediate court. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. S. D. Chestnut & Bro. (Ky.) 72 S. W. 351, 353 (citing 3 Cyc. 510; Grace v. Taylor, 4 Ky. [1 Bibb] 330; Lillard v. Brannin, 91 Ky. 511, 16 S. W. 349).

Where a defendant appears and asks relief which can be granted only on the hypothesis that the court has jurisdiction, the appearance is general, and he submits to the jurisdiction. But if the granting of the relief would be consistent with a want of jurisdiction, the appearance is special. Therefore an appearance by a defendant in attachment, who has not been served with process, to move to discharge the attachment for want of jurisdiction, on the ground that the action was brought in the wrong county, is a special appearance, and hence is not a waiver of the failure to serve process. Belknap v. Charlton, 34 Pac. 758, 759, 25 Or. 41.

A motion to set aside a judgment on the ground that the summons was not served on defendant is not a general appearance, though defendant's attorney did not qualify his signature by saying, "Attorney for the purpose of this motion only." Noble v. Crandall, 2 N. Y. Supp. 265, 49 Hun, 474.

GENERAL APPRAISERS.

The term "general appraisers" is the name generally used to designate the appraisers appointed under Act Cong. March 3, 1851, directing that four appraisers should be appointed to afford aid and assistance in the appraisement of merchandise imported. Gibb v. Washington (U. S.), 10 Fed. Cas. 288, 289.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

As court, see "Court."

The term "Legislature" is synonymous with "General Assembly." State v. Gear, 5 Ohio Dec. 569.

GENERAL ASSIGNMENT.

A general assignment is not the conduct or management of the corporate business, but its termination and destruction. It is not the disposition of the corporate property which must be made from time to time to carry on the corporate business, but the termination and destruction of the power to make such disposition. It is not the payment of the corporate deed, but ordinarily it is an assertion that they cannot be paid, and hence does not hold within the implied powers of the board of directors. In re Bates Mach. Co. (U. S.) 91 Fed. 625, 628.

As a transfer of all property.

The term "general assignment," in its ordinary legal significance, means an assignment by a debtor transferring all of his property in general terms to an assignee in trust for all his creditors. Royer Wheel Co. v. Fielding, 101 N. Y. 504, 5 N. E.

431; Tiemeyer v. Turnquist, 85 N. Y. 516, 522, 39 Am. Rep. 674; Brown v. Guthrie, 18 N. E. 254, 255, 110 N. Y. 435; Knapp v. McGowan, 96 N. Y. 75, 87; People v. Mercantile Credit Guarantee Co., 67 N. Y. Supp. 447, 453, 55 App. Div. 594.

The term "general assignment" means a transfer to an assignee of all the property, or substantially all the property, of a failing or insolvent debtor for the benefit of his creditors at large, making no discrimination or preference among them. Halsey v. Connell, 20 South. 445, 111 Ala. 221.

A general assignment is one by which the grantor conveys substantially all his property which is subject to legal process from the courts of the state in which he resides. Longmire v. Goode, 38 Ala. 577, 578.

"A general assignment is an assignment of all one's assets to an assignee for the benefit of creditors. It is the completeness of the transfer that gives it character." Warner v. Littlefield, 50 N. W. 721, 725, 89 Mich. 329.

A general assignment, as known to the common law, is defined by Burrill as an assignment by which all, or substantially all, the debtor's property is appropriated for the benefit of either one or more preferred creditors, or of the creditors at large, made by a debtor in declining or insolvent circumstances. Anniston Loan & Trust Co. v. Ward, 18 South. 937, 938, 108 Ala. 85; Bank of Opelika v. Kizer, 24 South. 11, 13, 119 Ala. 194.

It is of the very nature and essence of a general assignment for the benefit of creditors that it shall pass all property and rights of property capable of assignment or transfer, whether the title or interest of the assignor be legal or equitable. If the assignor has property or rights which are legal assets (assets which may be reached by legal process and subject to the payment of debts), and he applies them to pay or to secure particular creditors, having and retaining assets of considerable value, which are equitable, in which he has a beneficial interest, the legal title outstanding in another, in trust for him, the assignment or transfer of the legal assets is but a partial, and not a general, assignment. Bank of Opelika v. Kizer, 24 South. 11, 13, 119 Ala. 194.

A general assignment, within the meaning of Pamph. Acts 1896-97, pp. 1089, 1090, entitled "An act to further define general assignments, and prevent fraudulent dispositions of property," is a voluntary transfer by a debtor of all, or substantially all, of his property subject to the payment of debts, for the security of one or more creditors in preference to others. Builders' & Paint- ers' Supply Co. v. Lucas, 24 South. 416, 417, 119 Ala. 202.

The term "general assignment," as used in St. 1843, providing that all general assignments hereafter made by debtors for the benefit of creditors shall be null and void as against debtors of such creditors, means an assignment of substantially all a man's property. It is not needful that an assignment should include absolutely all the debtor's property, but it should be substantially all, so that, for the purpose of continuing his business or paying his debts or future subsistence, he might just about as well include the part omitted. "The term 'general,' as applied to assignments, does not have reference probably so much to the proportion of creditors as to the proportion of property." Burrill, Assignm. § 122, lays down the rule as to the number of creditors thus: "A general assignment is understood to import a provision for a considerable number of creditors, or at least for several or more than one. If the property omitted was insignificant in amount, with reference to the whole, or if it was mainly beyond the reach of process or exempt from process, or of such a character as not readily to be made available either to the creditors or to the debtor, and the great mass of the debtor's available property, which constitute the basis of his business operations, and which could alone form no reliance to himself for support, or to his creditors for payment, was included in the deed, the deed should undoubtedly be regarded as a general assignment." Mussey v. Noyes, 26 Vt. 462, 471.

A conveyance by a debtor to a trustee for distribution of the proceeds among specified creditors, reciting in the conveyance that such goods are only a part of his property, is not a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, within a credit insurance policy insuring against any loss sustained by reason of the insolvency of debtors of the insured, and defining such losses as those arising on sales by the insured persons who have made a general assignment for the benefit of their creditors; and the words "general assignment" will not be held to mean any such disposition by a debtor of his property as induces insolvency, in the ordinary meaning of the term. Goodman v. Mercantile Credit Guarantee Co., 45 N. Y. Supp. 508, 511, 17 App. Div. 474.

An assignment purporting to transfer all the assignor's debts and book accounts for collection, the proceeds to go first toward paying two small debts named, and the balance, if any, to the assignor's wife, is not, in substance, a general assignment, since it does not profess to transfer all the assignor's property, nor to provide for all his debts. Tiemeyer v. Turnquist, 85 N. Y. 516, 522, 39 Am. Rep. 674.

Bill of sale or deed distinguished.

There is a broad and well-defined distinction between a general assignment for the benefit of creditors and a deed or bill of sale. The former is a transfer by a debtor of his property to another in trust to sell and convert into money, and distribute the proceeds among his creditors; and it implies a trust, and contemplates the intervention of a trustee. The other imports an absolute sale and transfer of the title, to be held and enjoyed by the purchaser without any attending trust. Young v. Stone, 70 N. Y. Supp. 558, 561, 61 App. Div. 364; Tompkins v. Hunter, 43 N. E. 532, 533, 149 N. Y. 117.

As an act of insolvency.

See "Act of Insolvency."

Pledge distinguished.

To constitute a general assignment, it must, in the first place, be general; that is, it must include all of the debtor's property. The assignee must be the trustee, and not the absolute owner, mortgagee, or pledgee. The essential difference between a general assignment to an assignee in trust and a pledge is that in one case the absolute title passes to the assignee, while in the case of a pledge the title remains in the pledgor; and it is the right of possession, and to hold or apply the pledge to secure the debt, that is vested in the pledgee. A transfer of property by a debtor to several creditors, which recites that it is security for the debts, and authorizes the creditor to sell the property, apply the proceeds to the debts, and return excess, if any, to the debtor, is not a general assignment, but a pledge. Maass v. Falk, 24 N. Y. Supp. 448, 450, 70 Hun, 598.

Appointment of receiver.

A general assignment is the voluntary act of a debtor, whereby he transfers his property to a trustee for the benefit of creditors. The appointment of a receiver to settle up the affairs of a firm which was unable to pay its debts, but the individual partners were not insolvent, is not a general assignment, so as to render it an act of bankruptcy, though the consequences which attached to the appointment of the receiver are similar to those which result to creditors from a general assignment. Vaccaro v. Security Bank (U. S.) 103 Fed. 436, 439, 43 C. O. A. 279.

Transfer to single creditor.

A transfer by an insolvent of all his property to one of several of his creditors, to be applied to the payment of a bona fide debt, is not a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, within the meaning of Laws 1887, c. 503, providing that, in all general assignments of estates of debtors for the benefit of creditors, no preference shall be valid, except to the amount of one-third of the value of the assigned estate. Tompkins v. Hunter, 43 N. E. 532, 533, 149 N. Y. 117; Tompkins v. First Nat. Bank, 18 N. Y. Supp. 234, 235.

As creating a trust.

In determining whether an instrument was in legal effect a general assignment, or only a chattel mortgage, it was held that an assignment contemplates the intervention of a trustee, and implies a trust. May v. Tenny, 13 Sup. Ct. 491, 494, 148 U. S. 60, 37 L. Ed. 368.

The material and essential characteristic of a general assignment is the presence of a trust; and, while it cannot be said that every transfer of property to trustees for the benefit of creditors is an assignment, yet, when a continuing trust is created, as by the conveyance by partners in failing circumstances of all their individual and partnership property in trust, to be collected, sold, and disposed of, and converted into money, and to be divided equally among certain designated creditors, and the surplus, if any, to be returned to them, in consideration of their release from all liabilities to such creditors, is a general assignment. Sabichi v. Obase, 41 Pac. 29, 31, 108 Cal. 81.

The material and essential characteristic of a general assignment is the presence of a trust. The assignee is merely a trustee, and not an absolute owner. He buys nothing and pays nothing, but takes the title for the performance of trust duties. Thus an agreement by defendant with a debtor, who owes him $980, to take a chattel mortgage on property worth about $2,500 to secure the debt, and $600 advanced on the assuming of debts amounting to $619, and to pay any surplus that might remain to the debtor on selling the property, was not a general assignment. Brown v. Guthrie, 18 N. E. 254, 255, 110 N. Y. 435.

GENERAL AVERAGE.

General average is a loss arising out of extraordinary sacrifices made or extraordinary expenses incurred for the joint benefit of the ship and cargo. The rule is that, where there is a common danger to the vessel and the cargo, everything which is saved by one continued, unremitted effort, shall pay the expense in proportion to its value. It means that what is given for the general benefit of all shall be made good by the contribution of all. Louisville Underwriters v. Pence, 19 S. W. 10, 12, 40 Am. St. Rep. 176. See, also, Simonds v. White, 9 E. C. L. 251, 253; Bargett v. Orient Mut. Ins. Co., 16 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Bosw.) 385, 395; Lee v. Grinnell, 12 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Duer) 400, 410; Wadsworth v. Pacific Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 4

(19 How.) 162, 176, 15 L. Ed. 584; Williams v. Suffolk Ins. Co. (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1406, 1407; Potter v. Ocean Ins. Co. (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 1173, 1177; The Joseph Farwell (U. S.) 31 Fed. 844; Bowring v. Thebaud (U. S.) 42 Fed. 794, 797; Emery v. Huntington, 109 Mass. 431, 435, 437, 12 Am. Rep. 725; Padelford v. Boardman, 4 Mass. 548, 550; Wilson v. Cross, 33 Cal. 60, 69; Louisville Marine & Fire Ins. Co. v. Bland, 39 Ky. (9 Dana) 143, 147; Lyon v. Alvord, 18 Conn. 66, 74; Broadnax v. Cheraw & S. R. Co., 27 Atl. 412, 413, 157 Pa. 140; The Bevan v. Bank of United States, 4 Whart. 301, 308, 33 Am. Dec. 64; Cheraw & S. R. Co. v. Broadnax, 109 Pa. 432, 439, 1 Atl. 228, 58 Am. Rep. 733.

In order to constitute a case for general average, three things must concur: (1) A common danger; a danger in which ship, cargo, and crew all participate; a danger imminent and apparently inevitable, except by voluntarily incurring the loss of a portion of the whole to save the remainder. (2) There must be a voluntary jettison or casting away of some portion of the joint concern, for the purpose of avoiding this imminent peril, or, in other words, a transfer of the peril from the whole to a particular portion of the whole. (3) This attempt to avoid the imminent common peril must be successful. The Congress (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 277, 278; British American Assur. Co. v. Wilson, 31 N. E. 938, 940, 132 Ind. 278; Son-smith v. J. P. Donaldson (U. S.) 21 Fed. 671, 674; Barnard v. Adams, 51 U. S. (10 How.) 270, 303, 13 L. Ed. 417.

The rule for contribution in general average is older than, and entirely aside from, the common law; is a rule both of equity and policy, which has come down through the centuries from an old Rhodian law, adopted in the Roman jurisprudence, and thence entered into the general maritime law. It appears to have been preserved in England without enforcement by statute. It applies only to shipping, and prescribes that, in all cases of imminent peril to the whole adventure, where release is obtained by intentional sacrifice of any part for the benefit of the residue, contribution shall be made by the saved portions for that which was so sacrificed. The common peril takes from the master of the vessel his paramount obligation to his vessel owners, and charges him with a joint agency for the owners of a cargo and vessel, to act impartially, decide when a sacrifice is necessary, and select for sacrifice that which will best serve the interest of all to avoid the peril. It is the safety of the property, and not of the voyage, which constitutes the true foundation of general average. The vessel is made to contribute as well as the cargo saved, not because of its undertaking to carry out, or out of any duty as carrier, but because it has encountered peril, and has been saved to the owners by a sacrifice of other property. The Roanoke (U. S.) 59 Fed. 161, 163, 8 C. C. A. 67.

"General average contribution is defined to be a contribution by all the parties in a sea adventure to make good the loss sustained by one of their number on account of sacrifice voluntarily made on account of the ship or cargo to save the residue and the lives of those on board from an impending peril, or for ordinary expenses necessarily incurred by one or more of the parties for the benefit and interest of all the parties embarked in the enterprise. Losses which give a claim to general average are usually divided into two grade classes: (1) Those which arise from sacrifice of part of the ship or part of the cargo, purposely made in order to save the whole adventure from perishing. (2) Those which arise out of extraordinary expenses incurred for the joint benefit of ship and cargo." Star of Hope v. Annan, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 203, 228, 19 L. Ed. 638.

A general average consists in a purpose, a means, and the result. It is a design to avert a common danger by the sacrifice voluntarily made, and a successful issue. Nimick v. Holmes, 25 Pa. (1 Casey) 366, 372, 64 Am. Dec. 710.

"General average," in maritime law, means the liability to contribution of the owners of a cargo, which arises when a sacrifice of a part of such cargo has been made for the preservation of the residue, or when money is expended to preserve the whole. Thus the loss occasioned by cutting away the mast or throwing goods overboard to lighten the ship in a storm, or money paid to redeem ship and cargo, which had been captured, are species of general average. Ship, cargo, and freight have been benefited, and therefore all must contribute. "To produce a general average, the agency and consent of man must intervene; but such agency and consent, though in one sense voluntary, are, upon the whole, involuntary. General average always arises from actions produced by necessity." Hence a promise made to the recaptors of a vessel, which prevented a sale of both ship and cargo, falls within the rule of general average, for it was for the benefit of all concerned. Sanson v. Ball (Pa.) 4 Dall. 450, 461, 1 L. Ed. 908.

A carrier by water may, when in case of extreme peril it is necessary for the safety of the ship or cargo, throw overboard or otherwise sacrifice any or all of the cargo or appurtenances of the ship. Throwing property overboard for such purpose is called "jettison," and the loss incurred thereby is called a "general average loss." Rev. Codes N. D. 1890, § 4214; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1567; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2148.

Sacrifice by stranger.

A sacrifice of vessel or cargo by the act of a stranger to the adventure, although authorized by the municipal law to make the sacrifice for the protection of his own interests or those of the public, gives no right of contribution either for or against those outside interests, or even as between the parties to the common adventure. Ralli v. Troop, 15 Sup. Ct. 657, 660, 157 U. S. 386, 39 L. Ed. 742.

Salvage distinguished.

"General average is commonly understood to arise from some voluntary act done, or sacrifice or expense incurred, for the benefit of all concerned in the voyage or adventure; and then it is apportioned on all the interests which partake of the benefit. But the mere fact that an apportionment is made of a loss between the different parties in interest, if the loss itself does not arise from some act or sacrifice or expense voluntarily incurred for the common benefit, does not make it necessarily a case of general average, by our law. Salvage is properly a charge apportionable upon all the interests and property at risk in the voyage which derive any benefit therefrom. But though it is often in the nature of general average, it is far from being universally true that, in the sense of our law, all salvage charges are to be deemed a general average. On the contrary, these charges are sometimes a simple average or partial loss." The Queen of the Pacific (U. S.) 18 Fed. 700, 701; Peters v. Warren Ins. Co. (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 370, 371.

Voluntary stranding.

General average, for which the property of a ship saved is bound to contribute, should be construed to include a voluntary stranding of a ship in a case of imminent peril for the preservation of the crew, the ship, and cargo, followed by a total loss of the ship. Columbian Ins. Co. v. Ashby, 38 U. S. (13 Pet.) 331, 341, 10 L. Ed. 186.

In order that the doctrine of general average may apply, a sacrifice of ship or cargo must be purely voluntary. Where a vessel, being in a position where she is certain to run ashore and be wrecked, is voluntarily headed for the shore and beached by the captain, in order that the lives of the crew and the cargo may be better saved, no case of general average can arise. Meech v. Robinson (Pa.) 4 Whart. 360, 363, 34 Am Dec. 514.

GENERAL BAD CHARACTER.

"General bad character," as used in reference to the impeachment of a witness, means that his general character for truth and veracity is bad. "A general bad character in other respects is of no consequence. All experience shows that the general characters of many men are bad, in the common acceptance of the word, while their veracity is unimpeachable. Indeed, most men term that man's general character bad who has one cardinal vice, although in other respects he may be irreproachable. In short, proof of general bad character, as the term is generally understood and used in society, does not necessarily and legally prove the fact that the witness' character for veracity was bad." Gilbert v. Sheldon (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 623, 626.

GENERAL BENEFITS.

The general benefits derived by the owner of a lot from the erection of an elevated railroad in the street are such as are bestowed upon other lands of similar character and situation in the same vicinity. Lake Roland El. Ry. Co. v. Frick, 37 Atl. 650, 651, 86 Md. 259 (citing 3 Elliott, R. R. § 989).

Within the rule that, in appraising the amount to be paid to the owner where a portion of a tract of land is taken by the exercise of the right of eminent domain for a railroad, there may be deducted from the damages the value of the special benefits of the improvement to the remainder of the tract, but not the value of any general benefits, a general benefit is an advantage conferred by the public work upon all property within range of its utility, while a special benefit is an advantage conferred upon a tract by reason of the maintenance of a public work upon it. Rand. Em. Dom. §§ 269, 270. As defined by Lewis, "General benefit consists of an increase of the value of land common to the neighborhood or community generally, arising from the supposed advantages which will accrue to the community by reason of the work or improvement in question." Lewis, Em. Dom. § 471. Switching privileges, such as are required by the statute to be provided, are only of advantage to those who own land near or within a reasonable distance of the railroad. The benefits are not common to all the land in the community generally, but are special to the land which is so situated that they can be used. St. Louis, O. H. & C. Ry. Co. v. Fowler, 44 S. W. 771, 775, 142 Mo. 670.

Benefits accruing from the construction of a railroad to an owner of lands through which it passes may properly and conveniently be divided into two classes, to wit: (1) General benefits, or such as accrue to the community or the vicinage at large, such as increased facilities for transportation and travel, and the building up of towns, and consequent enhancement of the value of lands and town lots. (2) Special benefits, or such as accrue directly and solely to the owner of the lands from which the right of way is taken, as when the excavation of the railroad track has the effect to drain a morass, and thus to transform what was a worthless swamp into valuable, arable land, or to open up and improve a water course. As to the first of these classes, we know from the debates of the convention which formed the Constitution, and from the discussions which preceded and followed the calling of that convention, as well as from the language of the Constitution itself, that it was the express design of the framers of the Constitution to exclude that class of benefits from the consideration of jurors in their assessment of compensation for rights of way appropriated by corporations. In adopting the language that "no right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation until compensation therefor be first made in money or first secured by a deposit of money to the owner irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation," whether the second class of special benefits are included within such provision has not been decided, and does not arise in this case. Little Miami R. Co. v. Collett, 6 Ohio St. 182, 184, 185.

GENERAL BUSINESS.

The general and ordinary business of a railroad is that of building and keeping in repair its road, furnishing rolling stock for the road, and operating it for the transportation of property and passengers; and hence an injunction restraining a holder of stock in a railway corporation from voting on such stock at an election of directors for the company did not restrain the ordinary business of the corporation. Reed v. Jones, 6 Wis. 680, 690.

Rev. St. c. 129, § 7, which provides that an "injunction to suspend the general and ordinary business of a corporation" shall not be granted, except by the court or judge, does not include an injunction to restrain the treasurer of a village from executing and delivering deeds of certain lots in such village which have been sold for the nonpayment of taxes. Doty v. Village of Menasha, 14 Wis. 75, 76.

An injunction to restrain a town from laying out and constructing a highway, without any funds in the treasury, and without authority to contract an indebtedness for that purpose, is not "an injunction to suspend the general and ordinary business of a corporation," which Rev. St. § 2730, declares "shall not be granted except by the court or presiding judge thereof." Bay Land & Imp.

Co. v. Town of Washburn, 48 N. W. 492, 79 Wis. 423.

GENERAL BUSINESS MANAGER.

The term "general business manager," as used in reference to corporations, does not furnish a fixed legal standard by which the powers of the party can be measured, and it does not put any definite limitations on such powers, and a general manager does not hold an office known to the law, the duties of which are prescribed with such certainty as to enable a court to assume judicial knowledge of them. The extent of the powers of a general manager to bind a corporation depends, in part, on its by-laws, and in part on the language of the vote of the directors appointing him, and in part on their knowledge and approval of, or the acquiescence of the corporation in, the acts performed by him, and in part on usages which may be shown to exist, controlling the matter. Swazey v. Union Mfg. Co., 42 Conn. 556, 559.

GENERAL CHARACTER.

Of building.

A city ordinance provided that no building should be erected without a permit being first obtained, and that the building should conform, in size, general character, and appearance, to the buildings previously erected in the same locality. It was held that the expression "general character of the buildings previously erected" was too vague and indefinite to render the ordinance valid, since there was nothing to define or fix this, and there was nothing to determine the locality as to the bounds of which the conformity of buildings provided for by the ordinance is required. Bostock v. Sams, 52 Atl. 665, 668, 95 Md. 400, 59 L. R. A. 282, 93 Am. St. Rep. 394.

"General character," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, requiring statements for mechanics' liens to state the general character of the work to be done, does not mean a special, particular minute, or detailed description of the work to be done. "General" means relating to a genus or kind; pertaining to a whole class or order; belonging to a whole rather than to a part; not restrained or limited to a precise or detailed import; and character means account; description. Hence a statement giving a size of the lot, and stating that a frame building already thereon is to be raised, repaired, and additions made thereto, and converted into flats for the purpose of being used as tenements, is sufficient. Joost v. Sullivan, 43 Pac. 896, 899, 111 Cal. 286.

Of individual.

General character is the estimation in which a person is held in the community where he has resided. Douglass v. Tousey (N. Y.) 2 Wend. 352, 354, 20 Am. Dec. 616.

"General character," as referring to the impeachment of a witness by proof of his general character, is used in contradistinction to particular facts or parts of character. Cline v. State, 10 S. W. 225, 226, 51 Ark. 140.

"General character," as used with reference to the impeachment of witnesses by evidence as to their general character, is not a term of absolutely definite meaning, but is sometimes vague and undefined, depending on the habits, condition of life, age, sex, etc., of the person referred to. As, for instance, no one would expect so high a degree of truthfulness from a child of tender years as from an adult person. General character may be regarded as the general view or opinion of the community in which a party lives. State v. Turner, 15 S. E. 602, 604, 36 S. C. 534.

"The general character of an accused is not what the majority of his neighbors think of him, and therefore a witness to such fact is not required to know what a majority of defendant's neighbors say or think of him, but the only test of his competency is whether he knows the general character of accused among his neighbors or those acquainted with him. The word 'majority' is usually understood in a less comprehensive sense than the word 'general,' and in case of doubtful reputation a bare majority might be sufficient to make the reputation good, when by regular rule it would be equivocal only. On the other hand, a person's position in a community may be so obscure that very few of his neighbors know anything of him, though his general character may be very circumscribed. To hold that he could not prove his general character, except by witnesses who could swear as to what the majority of his neighbors said or thought of him, would be to deprive him of the benefit of this species of testimony." Dave v. State, 22 Ala. 23, 38.

"General moral character," as used in the Code, providing that the general moral character of a witness may be proved for the purpose of testing his credibility, means general reputation, and not particular immoral acts. In Greenl. Ev. 1, § 461, it is said: "In impeaching the character of a witness, the examination must be confined to his general reputation, and not be permitted as to particular acts, for every man is supposed to be capable of supporting the one, but it is not likely that he should be prepared to answer to the other without notice." A person cannot be said to have a good moral character who has a reputation for any vice. The word "general," as used in the section of the statute, was designed to indicate the mode of proof, and not as implying that a person's general moral character is good, which is bad only in one respect. The moral character of a witness is to be shown in a general way, and that is by his general reputation. State v. Woodworth, 21 N. W. 490, 492, 65 Iowa, 141.

GENERAL CIRCULATION.

Under Cr. Code, § 47, the publication of a libel is a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment in the county jail, unless the libel is published in a newspaper having a general circulation, in which case the offender is punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary. To constitute "general circulation," within the meaning of this statute, it is not necessary that the newspaper circulate to any considerable extent, if at all, out of the state, nor that it circulate in every county of the state, but it must extend beyond the county where it is published, and have a general circulation. Keon v. State, 35 Neb. 676, 678, 53 N. W. 595, 596, 17 L. R. A. 821.

A newspaper of general circulation is a newspaper published for the dissemination of local or telegraphic news, and intelligence of a general character, having a bona fide subscription list of paying subscribers, and which shall have been established, printed, and published in the state, county, city, and county, or town where such publication, notice of publication, or official advertising, is given or made, for at least one year. A newspaper devoted to the interests or published for the entertainment of a particular class, profession, trade, calling, race, or denomination, or any number thereof, is not a newspaper of general circulation. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 4459.

GENERAL CONTRACT.

The words "general contract," as used in Gen. St. 1894, § 6235, providing that whenever a contractor furnishes labor, etc., and erects two or more buildings on contiguous lots, pursuant to the purposes of one general contract, it is not necessary to file a separate statement upon each building, nor to apportion the amount of the entire lien between the several buildings, do not mean an entire and indivisible contract, as to its consideration. The contract must be entire, in that it includes all of the buildings, and provides for the erection of all of them, or some portions of all of them, pursuant to the purposes of the one contract. Johnson v. Salter, 72 N. W. 974, 975, 70 Minn. 146, 68 Am. St. Rep. 516.

GENERAL CONTRACTOR.

The term "general contractor," as used in the mechanic's lien act of July 11, 1870, in reference to the means by which a general contractor may obtain a lien, "is one who contracts directly with the owner of the property, and whether his contract is to construct a part or the whole of a building, if his contract is made with the owner, he is a general contractor, in the meaning of the act." Merchants' & Mechanics' Sav. Bank v. Dashiell (Va.) 25 Grat. 616, 622.

GENERAL COUNT.

A general count is one stating in a general way the plaintiff's claim. Wertheim v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 47 Atl. 1071, 72 Vt. 326.

GENERAL COURSE.

A line in a deed described as running from a certain place on the edge of a branch to another certain point, the general course being up the said branch, should be construed to mean that the line followed the windings of the stream, and that it was not governed by a single straight line between the two points. Wharton v. Brick, 6 Atl. 442, 443, 49 N. J. Law, 289.

GENERAL COURT.

The term "general court" is used in Massachusetts to designate the legislative body of the state. Citizens' Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Topeka, 87 U. S. (20 Wall.) 655, 666, 22 L. Ed. 455.

GENERAL CREDIT.

The general credit of a witness in a legal proceeding, which the opposing counsel may assail for purposes of impeachment means the character of the witness as a credit-worthy man. Bemis v. Kyle (N. Y.) 5 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 232, 233.

GENERAL CREDITOR.

General creditors are persons who have given credit, and who have no lien or security for the payment of the debts so created. King v. Fraser, 23 S. C. 543, 545, 548.

A "general creditor" is one who has not procured a lien on the property by some legal process, as distinguished from a creditor who has obtained some process by which the property may be lawfully seized, and by which it is made liable either immediately or ultimately to be appropriated in satisfaction of his debt. Wolcott v. Ashenfelter, 23 Pac. 780, 784, 5 N. M. 442, 8 L. R. A. 691.

The term "general creditors," in the rule that general creditors cannot attack an unrecorded mortgage and obtain a preference over it, does not include general creditors after their debtor has made an assignment for creditors. Dempsey v. Pforzheimer, 49 N. W. 465, 468, 86 Mich. 652, 13 L. R. A. 388.

A holder of a claim against a city, who is entitled to payment only from and out of the funds appropriated to the payment of such claim, is not a general creditor of the city. Johnson v. City of New Orleans, 15 South. 100, 101, 46 La. Ann. 714.

Plaintiffs held both a secured claim and an unsecured claim against the defendant, and joined with other creditors of the defendant in a composition agreement in which they all designated themselves as general creditors, and agreed to take from the defendant a certain consideration for their respective claims, the amount of each of which claims was stated; the plaintiffs stating only the amount of their unsecured claim. Held, the term "general creditors" meant unsecured creditors, and by executing the agreement the plaintiffs did not release their secured claim. Noyes v. Chapman-Drake Co., 61 N. W. 901, 60 Minn. 88.

GENERAL CUSTOM.

A custom is general when the method of dealing is the universal method of those engaged in the business where the usage exists. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Harrington, 61 N. E. 622, 628, 192 Ill. 9.

A general custom which is binding is one that is followed in all cases by all persons in the same business in the same territory, and which has been so long established that the persons sought to be charged thereby, and all others living in his vicinity, may be presumed to have known of it and acted upon it as they had occasion. A general custom existing among those forwarding farmers' produce to New York, and selling it on commission, that when the property is delivered in casks, other casks than those given shall be returned to the farmer, and those given pass to the purchaser, is a reasonable custom, and, when established, will be binding. Sturges v. Buckley, 32 Conn. 265, 267.

A statement that the court takes notice of the general customs of the country, does not imply that the usages of business, as a general rule, lay within the judicial notice. Those customs that have been incorporated as part of the common laws, as defined by adjudicated cases, are, beyond question, subjects of judicial notice. It is not to be denied that customs may and do become so incorporated that they had their origin since the period of time to which the common law looks as the test of antiquity. It may well be questioned whether any modern question becomes incorporated in the common law until it has been established as a matter of fact by judicial authority. The change of status of such a question from one of fact to one of law is by gradual and almost insensible steps. Bonham v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co., 18 S. C. 267, 276.

A usage or custom must be certain and uniform and general. A custom is general when the method of dealing is the universal method of those engaged in business where the usage exists. When the custom of railroad companies in delivering cars to foreign yards to push the cars clear of the main track and close the switch is the universal method in making such deliveries, it may be said to be a general custom. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Harrington, 61 N. E. 622, 628, 192 Ill. 9.

As a general law.

A general custom is a general law, and forms the law of a contract on the subject matter. Though at variance with its terms, it enters into and controls its stipulations, as an act of Parliament or state Legislature. Addison v. Otway, 2 Mod. 233, 238; Dagget v. Snowdon, 2 W. Bl. 1224, 1225; Harlan v. People (Mich.) 1 Doug. 207; Rex v. Inhabitants of Cliviger, 2 Term R. 263, 264; Carson v. Blazer (Pa.) 2 Bin. 475, 486, 487, 4 Am. Dec. 463; Stultz v. Dickey (Pa.) 5 Bin. 285, 287, 6 Am. Dec. 411; Biggs v. Brown (Pa.) 2 Serg. & R. 14, 17; Johnson v. McIntosh, 21 U. S. (8 Wheat.) 543, 591, 592, 5 L. Ed. 681; Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 581, 584, 591, 6 L. Ed. 166; and the cases there cited from Jones v. Fales, 4 Mass. 245, 252; Lincoln & Kennebeck Bank v. Page, 9 Mass. 155, 6 Am. Dec. 52; Halsey v. Brown (Conn.) 3 Day, 346; Smith v. Wright (N. Y.) 1 Caines, 43, 2 Am. Dec. 162; Bank of Utica v. Smith (N. Y.) 18 Johns. 230; Cutter v. Powell, 6 Term R. 320; Peck v. Woodbridge (Conn.) 3 Day, 508, 511; McKeen v. Delancy's Lessee, 9 U. S. (5 Cranch) 22, 33, 3 L. Ed. 25.

The courts not only may, but are bound, to notice and respect general customs and usages, as the law of the land, equally with the written law; and, when clearly proved, they will control the general law. This necessarily follows from its presumed origin—an act of Parliament or legislative act. United States v. Arredondo, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 691, 715, 8 L. Ed. 547; Drew v. Chesapeake (Mich.) 2 Doug. 33, 37.

General customs are such as prevail throughout a country, which, by virtue of their prevalence and long existence, become the law of that country. Bodfish v. Fox, 23 Me. (10 Shep.) 90, 95, 39 Am. Dec. 611.

GENERAL DAMAGES.

General damages are such as the law implies or presumes to have accrued from the wrong complained of. W. C. Loftus & Co. v. Bennett, 68 App. Div. 128, 131, 74 N. Y. Supp. 290; Woodruff v. Bradstreet Co. (N.

Y.) 35 Hun, 16, 17; Brown v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 99 Mo. 310, 318, 12 S. W. 655; Barrett v. Western Union Tel. Co., 42 Mo. App. 542, 550; Nicholson v. Rogers, 31 S. W. 260, 261, 129 Mo. 136; State, to Use of McCracken, v. Blackman, 51 Mo. 319, 321; Bibb County v. Ham, 110 Ga. 340, 341, 35 S. E. 656; Bateman v. Blake, 45 N. W. 831, 833, 81 Mich. 227; Oldfather v. Zent, 14 Ind. App. 89, 100, 41 N. E. 555; Herfort v. Cramer, 4 Pac. 896, 901, 7 Colo. 483; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Rice, 14 Pac. 229, 234, 36 Kan. 593; Tyler v. Salley, 19 Atl. 107, 82 Me. 128; Treadwell v. Whittier, 22 Pac. 266, 268, 80 Cal. 574, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175; Root v. Butte, A. & P. Ry. Co., 51 Pac. 155, 156, 20 Mont. 354. They are such as naturally and necessarily result from the wrong. Thompson v. Webber, 29 N. W. 671, 673, 4 Dak. 240; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Rice, 14 Pac. 229, 234, 36 Kan. 593; Young v. Scheu, 9 N. Y. Supp. 349, 56 Hun, 307. This, however, does not mean that general damages must, a priori, inevitably and always result from a given wrong. It is enough in the particular instance that they did in fact result from the wrong, directly and approximately, and without reference to the special character, condition, or circumstances to the person wronged. The law then, as a matter of course, implies or presumes them as the effect which in a particular instance necessarily results from the wrong. Smith v. St. Paul, M. & M. Ry. Co., 14 N. W. 797, 798, 30 Minn. 169; Hunter v. Stewart, 47 Me. 419, 421.

General damages are such as the law presumes to flow from any tortious act, and may be recovered without proof of any amount. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3910.

Damages which are probable, and traceable to and necessarily result from the injury, are termed "general damages." North Point Consol. Irr. Co. v. Utah & S. L. Canal Co., 63 Pac. 812, 814, 23 Utah, 199.

Damages necessarily resulting from an injury, such as the loss of the value of an article of property which is carried away or destroyed, or of a sum of money which is not paid to the plaintiff according to the contract, or the loss of time and the endurance of pain consequent of having one's limb fractured, are called "general damages," and may be shown under ad damnum, and may be called "general damages." Bristol Mfg. Co. v. Gridley, 28 Conn. 201, 212.

General damages are those which the law in itself implies for the reason that they are the immediate, direct, and proximate result of the act complained of—as, for instance, injury to property or its value by its detention, deterioration, etc.; but damages caused by the neglect to deliver a telegram, resulting in plaintiff's loss of a fee, are not general damages. Mood v. Western Union Tel. Co., 19 S. E. 67, 68, 40 S. C. 524.

General damages are such as reasonably flow from the injuries complained of, and may be recovered under a general allegation that damages were sustained. General damages are such damages as the law implies upon proof of the injury. Lynch v. Third Ave. R. Co., 13 N. Y. Supp. 236, 238, 59 N. Y. Super. Ct. (27 Jones & S.) 71.

General damages for a breach of contract of sale of lumber are measured by the difference between what they had agreed to pay, and the sum for which they could have supplied themselves with lumber of the same character at the place of delivery, or, if not obtainable there, then at the nearest available market plus any additional freight resulting from the breach. The plaintiffs are entitled only to indemnity to a sum equal to the loss they have sustained as a consequence of the breach. Lawrence v. Porter (U. S.) 63 Fed. 62, 64, 11 C. C. A. 27, 26 L. R. A. 167.

The term "general damages," when applied to a libel suit, includes the damage which the law presumes from a publication of an article which is libelous per se. If such a libel be of such a character as to touch the person libeled in his business or profession, then, under a general allegation of damage thereto, evidence of a general falling off of business or income is admissible. This is so because the law presumes that a libel per se, which touches one in his business or profession, will cause such general damage, and therefore such evidence may be given to help to show its extent. Smid v. Bernard, 63 N. Y. Supp. 278, 281, 31 Misc. Rep. 35.

General damages, in an action for libel, are damages not pecuniary in their nature, such as reputation, etc. Clementson v. Minnesota Tribune Co., 47 N. W. 781, 45 Minn. 303.

To distinguish between general damages and special damages is sometimes difficult. In an action for defamatory words not actionable per se, special damages must be alleged and proved. Injury to the credit and reputation of any lawyer is not only a natural, but a necessary, consequence of his arrest and imprisonment for disorderly conduct, and the publicity given thereto. And this is within the allegation of a complaint that plaintiff "was greatly injured in his health, credit, and reputation," and may be considered general damages. Evins v. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co., 47 App. Div. 511, 524, 62 N. Y. Supp. 495.

GENERAL DEBILITY.

In denying specific performance of an agreement to take care and provide for complainant in case of her general debility or sickness. It is said that the court could not from time to time determine what is meant by "general debility or sickness." Mowers v. Fogg, 17 Atl. 296, 297, 45 N. J. Eq. 120.

GENERAL DEMURRER.

A general demurrer is one going to the merits of the case intended to be made by the bill, and, when no particular cause is assigned, except the formula required by the practice or rules of the court, that there is no equity in the bill, and it is always proper where the bill is defective in substance. Shaw v. Chase, 77 Mich. 436, 439, 43 N. W. 883; Taylor v. Taylor, 87 Mich. 64, 68, 49 N. W. 519, 521.

A general demurrer is one which excepts to the sufficiency of a previous pleading in general terms, without showing specifically the nature of the objection, and such demurrer is sufficient when the objection is on a matter of substance. Reid v. Field, 1 S. E. 395, 397, 83 Va. 26.

A general demurrer presents objections to the equities of the case, depending upon the facts alleged in the bill, and must be determined upon the assumption of truth in such allegations, and all legal inferences and conclusions of law are matters for the judicial notice of the court. United States v. National Bank (U. S.) 73 Fed. 379, 381.

The office of a general demurrer is not to make a petition more definite and certain, but goes to the question of whether any cause of action is stated, or whether the plaintiff is entitled to any relief. Darr v. Berquist, 89 N. W. 256, 257, 63 Neb. 713.

A general demurrer enables the party to assail every substantial imperfection in the pleadings of the opposite side after particularizing any of them in his demurrer. Martin v. Bartow Ironworks (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 888, 889.

A general demurrer, in chancery practice, is a demurrer which only raises the question of the equity of a bill. Such a demurrer does not exist in Alabama, but it is necessary to set forth the ground of the demurrer specially. An assignment that there is no equity in the bill is nothing more than a general demurrer. It is not an assignment of a special cause of demurrer. McGulre v. Van Pelt, 55 Ala. 344, 349.

A general demurrer reaches defects in substance only, and not in form. Darcey v. Lake, 46 Miss. 109, 117.

A demurrer is general when no particular cause is alleged. Christmas v. Russell, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.) 290, 303, 18 L. Ed. 475.

GENERAL DENIAL.

A general denial is one which puts in issue all the material averments of the complaint or petition, and permits the defendant to prove any and all facts which tend to negative those averments, or some one or all of them. Mauldin v. Ball, 1 Pac. 409, 411, 5 Mont. 96.

A general denial traverses all material averments of the pleading to which it is addressed. Hence, under an answer of a general denial, the defendant may prove any fact independent of those alleged in the complaint which is inconsistent therewith, and tends to overthrow plaintiff's cause of action. Goode v. Elwood Lodge, No. 166, K. P., 66 N. E. 742, 743, 160 Ind. 251 (citing Johnson v. Schloesser, 146 Ind. 509, 45 N. E. 702, 36 L. R. A. 59, 58 Am. St. Rep. 367).

GENERAL DEPOSIT.

A general deposit is where the money deposited is not to be returned itself, but an equivalent of money is to be returned. Such deposit is said to be equivalent to a loan. Talladega Ins. Co. v. Landers, 43 Ala. 115, 138.

A general deposit in a bank is so much money to the depositor's credit. It is a debt due to him by the bank, payable on demand to his orders; not property capable of identification and specific appropriation. Florence Min. Co. v. Brown, 8 Sup. Ct. 531, 534, 124 U. S. 385, 31 L. Ed. 424.

The mere deposit of money in a commercial bank on account of the depositor, without being complicated by any other transaction than that of the depositing and withdrawing of the money by the customer from time to time, is a general deposit. Collins v. State, 15 South. 214, 217, 33 Fla. 429.

"All sums paid into a bank on general deposit by the same or different depositors, form one blended fund. As soon as the money has been handed over to the bank, and the credit given to the payor, it is at once the proper money of the bank. It enters into the general fund and capital, and is indistinguishable therefrom. Thereafter the depositor has only a debt owing him from the bank. He has no right to any specific money, and, though the identical money deposited be stolen before it is in fact mingled with the other moneys of the bank, still the bank must make up the loss, and ordinarily, unless otherwise stated, a deposit of the current money of the country where the deposit is made will be assumed a general deposit." State v. Carson City Sav. Bank, 30 Pac. 703, 704, 17 Nev. 146.

A general deposit is one which is to be repaid on demand in money, and the title to the money deposited passes to the bank.

Prima facie every deposit is general. Bank of Blackwell v. Dean, 60 Pac. 226, 9 Okl. 626.

A general deposit is, in effect, a loan which a bank is obliged to pay when called upon by the draft of the customer, and there can be no default until the payment has been demanded and refused. Tobias v. Morris, 28 South. 517, 520, 126 Ala. 535.

"Deposits made with bankers are either general or special. Money received by a bank on general deposit becomes the property of the bank, and can be loaned or otherwise used by it as other money belonging to it. The bank becomes the debtor of the depositor, and its obligation is satisfied by honoring the depositor's checks to the amount of his deposit. The depositor's claim is a mere chose in action for so much money. He becomes a creditor of the bank." Alston v. State, 9 South. 732, 92 Ala. 124, 13 L. R. A. 659.

General deposit in bank is where money is deposited and entered on the books of the bank to the depositor's credit; such money not being returnable specifically, but a similar amount being payable to the depositor's order. Ruffin v. Orange County Com'rs, 69 N. C. 498, 509.

A general deposit amounts to a mere loan, and the bank is to restore not the same money, but its equivalent sum, whenever it is demanded. Keene v. Collier, 58 Ky. (1 Metc.) 415, 417.

In case of a general deposit the money deposited is mingled with the other money of the bank, and the entire amount forms a single fund, from which depositors are paid. The relation of debtor and creditor is created, and, in the event of a failure of the bank, all such creditors stand on an equality. A general deposit differs from a loan in that the money is left with the bank for safe-keeping, subject to order, and payable, not in the specific money deposited, but in an equal sum. Officer v. Officer, 94 N. W. 947, 948, 120 Iowa, 389.

Where money is left for safe-keeping with the understanding not that the identical money shall be kept and returned to the depositor, but only that a like sum shall be repaid, such a transaction does not constitute a bailment or a special deposit, but a general deposit in the nature of a loan. Shoemaker v. Hinze, 53 Wis. 116, 10 N. W. 86.

Special deposit distinguished.

The same deposit cannot be both general and special. The distinction between a general and a special deposit is manifest and material. A special deposit in a bank is where the whole contract is that the thing shall be safely kept, and the identical thing returned to the depositor. When the deposit is a general one, the bank has a right to mingle the money deposited with its own, and treat it as a debt due the depositor. Consequently, proof that an officer of the bank received money as a general deposit, knowing the bank to be insolvent, will not sustain a charge that he received it on deposit for safe-keeping. Koetting v. State, 60 N. W. 822, 823, 88 Wis. 502.

There is a wide difference between a special and general deposit, as those terms are understood not only by bankers but by the public, who are transacting business daily with banks. Thus, where money of any description is deposited in a bank, and the identical gold, silver, or bank bills which were deposited are to be returned to the depositor, and not the equivalent, the deposit will be special; while a general deposit is one which is to be returned to the depositor in kind. Mutual Acc. Ass'n of the Northwest v. Jacobs, 31 N. E. 414, 416, 141 Ill. 261, 16 L. R. A. 516, 33 Am. St. Rep. 302.

GENERAL DEPOSITOR.

A general depositor is merely a general creditor of a bank, and is not entitled to any priority of payment over other creditors in case of an assignment for the benefit of creditors or bankruptcy. Bank of Blackwell v. Dean, 60 Pac. 226, 9 Okl. 626.

GENERAL DEVISE.

The gift of a parcel of land, and not the estate in it, is called a "general devise" where no words are superadded to show how great an estate is meant to be given, such as a devise of "all the tract parcel of land belonging to or that I am possessed of." In such case the law holds the language to mean or import nothing but a life estate. Hitch v. Patten (Del.) 16 Atl. 558, 560, 8 Houst. 334, 2 L. R. A. 724.

GENERAL ELECTION.

See "Last General Election."

The words "general election," as used in the title relating to elections, shall mean any election of state and county officers, representative to the General Assembly, representative to Congress, or electors. V. S. 58.

The term "general election," as used in the chapter relating to elections, shall apply to any election held for the choice of national, state, judicial, district, county, or township officers. Code Iowa, 1897, § 1089.

The Ballot Law of 1891, § 2, defined the term "general election," as used in the act, as applying to any election held for the choice of a national, state, judicial, district, or county officer. Village of Ridgway v. Gallatin Co., 181 Ill. 521, 526, 55 N. E. 146.

The Missouri act of 1849 organizing McDonald county, and authorizing the immediate election of county officers, to serve until the general election, means the next general election for officers throughout the state, and not the several elections of the same county officers in other counties of the state. State ex rel. McGee v. King, 17 Mo. 511, 514.

Code, art. 51, § 61, providing that the clerk of county commissioners shall file with the clerk of the circuit court, not less than 20 days before the beginning of the second regular term of the court after each and every general election, a fair and complete list of the male taxable inhabitants of the county not under 25 years of age, means a general election for representatives of the state in the Congress of the United States and for President and Vice President of the United States, though it was not an election for members of the General Assembly and state officers generally. Downs v. State, 26 Atl. 1005, 78 Md. 128.

An election general throughout the state for both members of Congress and for judges was a general election within the meaning of a statute requiring a certain question to be submitted to the people at a general election, though it was not a general election as the term was used in the Constitution. Mackin v. State, 62 Md. 244, 247.

Election on expiration of full term.

A general election is an election to fill an office on the expiration of the full term thereof, as used in contradistinction from the term "special election" employed in the Political Code, relating to elections to fill vacancies. Kenfield v. Irwin, 52 Cal. 164, 169.

November election.

The term "general election," when used in statutes, refers to the election required to be held on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November in each year. Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 7342, subd. 26; State v. Cobb, 2 Kan. 32, 54; Bond v. White, 8 Kan. 333, 341; McIntyre v. Iliff, 68 Pac. 633, 634, 64 Kan. 747.

In determining the constitutionality of an act providing that there should be no election of certain officers in one specified year, it was contended that such act was in violation of the Constitution, which provided that a general election should be held annually on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday in November, but it was held that a November election provided for in the Constitution is the general election, whether few or many offices are to be filled, and is independent of the terms of the offices or the number of officers to be elected. Wilson v.

Clark, 63 Kan. 505, 65 Pac. 705, 706 (citing Morgan v. Pratt County Com'rs, 24 Kan. 71; State v. Foster, 36 Kan. 504, 13 Pac. 841).

The words "general election," when used in the statutes, shall be construed to mean the election required by law to be held in the month of November. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 50, subd. 19.

Const. art. 20, which provides that, when amendments have been agreed to in proper manner by the Legislature, the same shall be submitted to the electors at the next "general election" thereafter, etc., means the November elections, at which are elected all of the state officers. Westinghausen v. People, 6 N. W. 641, 643, 44 Mich. 265.

Under How. Ann. St. § 2, providing that the term "general election" means the election held in November, "unless such construction would be inconsistent with the manifest intent of the Legislature," a spring election cannot be regarded as a general election in determining the right to place a ticket in the first column of an official ballot, which is assigned to the ticket which received the highest number of votes at the last preceding general election. Edgar v. Board of Election Com'rs of Livingston County, 76 N. W. 972, 118 Mich. 418.

GENERAL EXECUTION.

A general execution is a writ commanding an officer to satisfy judgment out of any personal property of the defendant. An order commanding him to satisfy the judgment out of certain named personal property is not general execution. Pracht v. Pister, 1 Pac. 638, 30 Kan. 568.

GENERAL EXPECTATION.

The expression "general expectation," as used in an instruction that if a son remained at home and performed services and expended money under a general expectation that his father would make it right by will or otherwise when he died, and left to his father's judgment what would be right, and what provision should be made, and how it should be made, and the father did in fact make provision for his son, the son was bound by such provision, means an expectation that arose from no express understanding between the father and son in relation to the son's compensation for his services, but grew out of all the circumstances of the case, and from no one in particular. Appeal of Lee, 2 Atl. 758, 759, 53 Conn. 363.

GENERAL FORBEARANCE.

The term "general forbearance," when used in speaking of a general forbearance to sue, in which there is no time specified, means a perpetual forbearance. Clark v. Russell, 3 Watts, 213, 216, 27 Am. Dec. 348 (citing Hamaker v. Eberley, 2 Bin. 506, 510, 4 Am. Dec. 477); Sidwell v. Evans (Pa.) 1 Pen. & W. 383, 385, 21 Am. Dec. 387.

GENERAL FINDING.

A general finding in favor of the party is to be treated as a general verdict. Humphreys v. Third Nat. Bank (U. S.) 75 Fed. 852, 856, 21 C. C. A. 538.

GENERAL FUND.

Of city.

The general fund of a city is a miscellaneous fund for the payment of claims which will arise, and for which it is impossible to remit the exact amount which will be required. Kelley v. Broadwell (Neb.) 92 N. W. 643, 645.

Of county.

The general fund of a county, as its name implies, is one devoted to a variety of uses, and its expenditure is left mainly to the discretion of the county commissioners. Burlington & M. R. R. Co. v. Lancaster County Com'rs, 12 Neb. 324, 327, 11 N. W. 332; Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Scammon, 25 Pac. 858, 859, 45 Kan. 481.

Of fraternal order.

A "general fund" is the term applied to a fund within the control and management of the respective lodges of a fraternal order, raised in each lodge by contributions from its members, or donations made thereto, from which are paid the general expenses of the lodge, and benefits which the lodge may by its by-laws prescribe to be paid to members disabled by sickness or other disability from following their usual business or occupation. Lady Lincoln Lodge v. Faist, 28 Atl. 555, 52 N. J. Eq. 510.

Of state.

The term "general fund," as used to define a fund belonging to a state, is a fund created for the purpose of paying the salaries of state officers and defraying the general expenses of the state government. State v. Bartley, 58 N. W. 172, 173, 39 Neb. 353.

"General fund," as used in Laws 1855, directing that the money raised by a certain tax be paid into the treasury to the credit of the general fund of the state, is the collective designation of all the assets of the state which furnish the means for the support of the government and the defraying the discretionary appropriations of the Legislature; in other words, the necessary and contingent expenses of the government. People v. Orange County Sup'rs (N. Y.) 27 Barb. 575, 582.

GENERAL GUARANTY.

A general guaranty is a security for all persons who deal upon its credit. Everson v. Gere (N. Y.) 40 Hun, 248, 250.

A general guaranty is a guaranty in which none of the terms are fixed in writing, and therefore the law adds the usual conditions that there shall be due and unsuccessful diligence used by the creditor to collect the claim from the principal, unless it appears that all diligence would be hopeless. Kitchie v. Walter, 31 Atl. 334, 166 Pa. 604.

A general guaranty is one open for acceptance by the public generally. Thus a guaranty to a bank, which recited that they guaranteed payment of all indebtedness now due or hereafter to become due to the bank or its assigns occasioned by any act of the F. Co., was general, and inured to the benefit of plaintiffs, to whom notes discounted by F. Co. at the bank had been transferred. Tidioute Sav. Bank v. Libbey, 77 N. W. 182, 183, 101 Wis. 193, 70 Am. St. Rep. 907.

GENERAL GUARDIAN.

A general guardian is a guardian of the person or of all of the property of the ward within the state, or of both. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 239; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, §§ 2810, 2811; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, §§ 142, 143; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, §§ 3811, 3812; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 333; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 3983.

GENERAL IMPARLANCE.

A general imparlance is a prayer for time to plead, without reserving special exceptions. Colby v. Knapp, 13 N. H. 175, 177 (citing Com. Dig. Abatement; 1 Chit. Pl. 420).

A general imparlance in pleading at common law was the time allowed by a party for pleading upon an application in which no right of exception was reserved. Mack v. Lewis, 31 Atl. 888, 889, 67 Vt. 383.

GENERAL IMPROVEMENT.

The Austin city charter authorizes the raising of money on the credit of the city for current expenses and the general improvement of the city. Held, that "general improvement" meant ordinary improvement—that is, improvement which ordinarily recurs—but did not include all improvements of every character, so as to cover the expenses of the city for every purpose. City of Austin v. Nalle, 22 S. W. 668, 673, 85 Tex. 520.

GENERAL INDORSEMENT.

A general indorsement of a negotiable instrument is one by which no indorsee is named. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 2347; Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2874; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4872; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2187; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3611; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 3112; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4024.

GENERAL INSANITY.

A man may be mad on all subjects; and then, though he may have glimmerings of reason, he is not a responsible agent. This is general insanity. To excuse him of crime, the degree of it must be so great as to have controlled the will of its subject, and to have taken from him the freedom of moral action. Commonwealth v. Wireback, 42 Atl. 542, 545, 190 Pa. 138, 70 Am. St. Rep. 625; Commonwealth v. Mosler, 4 Pa. (4 Barr) 264.

If the prisoner at the bar at the time he committed the act had not sufficient capacity to know whether his act was right or wrong, and whether it was contrary to law, he is not responsible. That is in fact general insanity, so far as the act in question is concerned. And it must be so great in extent and degree as to blind him to the natural consequences of his moral duty, and must have utterly destroyed his perception of right and wrong. The test is the power or capacity of the prisoner to distinguish between right and wrong in reference to the particular act in question. Commonwealth v. Sayre (Pa.) 5 Wkly. Notes Cas. 424.

GENERAL INSURANCE.

A general insurance is where the perils insured against are such as the law would imply from the nature of the contract of a maritime insurance considered in itself and supposing none to be expressed in the policy. Vandenheuvel v. United Ins. Co., 2 Johns Cas. 127, 150

GENERAL ISSUE.

The general issue in common-law pleading operates as a denial of the whole substance of the declaration, and puts upon the plaintiff the necessity of establishing all the essential allegations in the narr. McAllister v. State, 50 Atl. 1046, 94 Md. 290; Eastern Advertising Co. v. McGaw, 42 Atl. 923, 924, 89 Md. 72.

The general issue is the denial of the allegation upon which a recovery is sought. It has a form, which varies with each action, but in any given action it is always the same. In debt on a simple contract it is nil debit; in debt on a specialty it is non est factum; in detinue, non detinet; in trover, trespass, and trespass on the case it is not guilty; in replevin it is non cepit; and in assumpsit it is non assumpsit. Standard Loan & Accident Ins. Co. v. Thornton, 40 S. W. 136, 138, 97 Tenn. (13 Pickle) 1.

GENERAL JUDGMENT.

A general judgment is a judgment in personam. Smith v. Colloty, 55 Atl. 805, 806, 69 N. J. Law, 365.

The phrase "general judgment of reasonable men" means a general judgment which is the common result of the reflection and reasoning of reasonable men. Patterson v. Nutter, 7 Atl. 273, 275, 78 Me. 509.

GENERAL JURISDICTION.

General means that which comprehends all; the whole. Webst. Dict. When applied to jurisdiction, it indicates legal authority extending to the whole, or to the particular subject; and when applied to a term of court means a term at which the entire authority or jurisdiction of the court may be exercised. Gracie v. Freeland, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 228, 232.

GENERAL LAW.

The term "general laws" is one which has been employed to designate different classes of laws. Examples of its various signification are given in Bouvier's Law Dictionary, where it is shown that its use is common with reference to the subject-matter of statutes, as well as to the extent of territory over which statutes are intended to operate. There it is shown to be in use as the antithesis of "private," also of "local," and also of "special" statutes, and it is said that, "in deciding whether or not a given law is general, the purpose of the act and the objects on which it operates must be looked to." Legal writings abound with instances where enactments of the general law-making department are mentioned as general laws by way of distinguishing them from municipal laws. Southern Express Co. v. City of Tuscaloosa, 31 South. 460, 461, 132 Ala. 326.

A law may take its general nature either from its territorial comprehensiveness, or from the nature of its subject-matter, or from both. A law may be of a general nature notwithstanding its subject-matter is of a local nature; its general nature being alone due to its territorial comprehensiveness. A law which is general by reason of its territorial comprehensiveness only can no more be limited in its operation territorially by a subsequent special law than one which is general in the nature of its subject-matter. Mathis v. Jones, 11 S. E. 1018, 1019, 84 Ga. 804.

Const. art. 11, § 6, declaring that cities or towns heretofore or hereafter organized, and all charters thereof framed or adopted by authority of this Constitution shall be subject to and controlled by general laws, does not mean the general laws, the Legislature is commanded to pass for the incorporation, organization, and classification in proportion to population of cities and towns, or amendments thereto, because it is by the Constitution left optional with cities and towns in existence when the Constitution was adopted to become organized under such general acts of incorporation or not, as they shall elect. It means such general laws as shall be passed by the Legislature other than those for the incorporation, organization, and classification of cities and towns. Thompson v. Ruggles, 11 Pac. 20, 26, 69 Cal. 465.

As relating to all of a class.

The word "general" comes from "genus," and relates to a whole genus or kind; or, in other words, to a whole class or order. Hence a law which affects a class of persons or things less than all may be a general law. Brooks v. Hyde, 37 Cal. 366, 376.

A statute which relates to persons or things as a class is a general law. Clark v. Finley, 54 S. W. 343, 345, 93 Tex. 171; Ewing v. Hoblitzelle, 85 Mo. 64, 78; State ex rel. Maggard v. Pond, 93 Mo. 606, 641, 6 S. W. 469, 471 (citing State ex rel. Lionberger v. Tolle, 71 Mo. 645); State ex rel. Harris v. Herrmann, 75 Mo. 340, 353; Hamman v. Central Coal & Coke Co., 56 S. W. 1091, 1092, 156 Mo. 232 (quoting Lynch v. Murphy, 119 Mo. 163, 24 S. W. 774); Van Riper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 1, 8; Sawyer v. Dooley, 32 Pac. 437, 440, 21 Nev. 390; Central R. Co. v. State Board of Assessors, 2 Atl. 789, 798, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 1, 57 Am. Rep. 516; Cox v. State, 8 Tex. App. 254, 289, 34 Am. Rep. 746; In re New York Elevated R. Co. (N. Y.) 3 Abb. N. C. 401, 417, 422.

The number of persons upon which the law shall have any direct effect may be very few, by reason of the subject to which it relates, but it must operate equally and uniformly upon all brought within the relations and circumstances for which it provides. A statute, in order to avoid a conflict with the prohibition against special legislation, must be general in its application to the class, and all of the class within like circumstances must come within its operation. Daily Leader v. Cameron, 41 Pac. 635, 639, 3 Okl. 677; Gay v. Thomas, 46 Pac. 578, 586, 5 Okl. 1.

A general act is one which has room within its terms to operate on all of a known class of things, present and prospective, and not merely on one particular thing, or on a particular class of things, existing at the time of its passage. City of Topeka v. Gillett, 4 Pac. 800, 803, 32 Kan. 431.

A general law is one framed in general terms, restricted to no locality, and operating equally upon all of a group of objects, which, having regard to the purposes of the legislation, are distinguished by characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them a class by themselves. Trenton Iron Co. v. Yard, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 357, 363; Van Riper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 123, 125, 29 Am. Rep. 210.

A law is general when it applies equally to all persons embraced in a class founded upon some natural or extrinsic or constitutional distinction. It is not general or constitutional if it confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome condition in the exercise of a common right upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law. Robinson v. Southern Pac. Co., 38 Pac. 94, 98, 105 Cal. 526, 28 L. R. A. 773 (citing City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604).

General laws are those which relate to or bind all within the jurisdiction of the lawmaking power, limited as that power may be in its territorial operation or by constitutional restraints. A law applicable to all the counties of a class as made or authorized by the Constitution is neither a local nor a special law. If it applies to all the counties of a class authorized by the Constitution to be made, it is general law; and whether there may be few or many counties to which its provisions will apply is a matter of no consequence. Cody v. Murphy, 26 P. 1081, 1082, 89 Cal. 522.

While it is true that a law which applies to all of a class in a state is held to be a general law, it is equally true that one which applies to only a part of a class is a special law. Thus, in Dundee Mortg. & Inv. Co. v. School Dist. No. 1 of Multnomah County (U. S.) 19 Fed. 359, it was said that an act providing for the assessment of mortgages is so far a general act; it comprehends the genus. But an act providing for the assessment of all mortgages for a sum exceeding $500, or not payable within one year from the date of their execution, is special; it comprehends only a species of mortgage. Hence a statute relating to the taxation of railroads, which does not comprehend all, but only two county railroads, is not a general law. People v. Central Pac. R. Co., 23 Pac. 303, 309, 83 Cal. 393.

A statute for the assessment and collection of taxes which applies to all incorporated cities and towns in the state is a general, and not a special, law within the meaning of the Constitution. People v. Wallace, 70 Ill. 680, 681.

A law embracing all cities or all townships is a general law within the meaning of the Constitution, because of their marked peculiarities. They are by common consent regarded distinct forms of municipal government, and so constitute a class by themselves. State v. City of Trenton, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 487. But where an act authorizing township trustees to pay for macadamizing streets, etc., excepts from its operation certain townships, it is not a general law. Dobbins v. Northampton Tp., 14 Atl. 587, 589, 50 N. J. Law, 496.

As relating to all in like circumstances.

A law is general and uniform if all persons in the same circumstances are treated alike. D. H. Davis Coal Co. v. Polland, 62 N. E. 492-496, 158 Ind. 607.

Laws are general and uniform not because they operate upon every person in the state, for they do not, but because every person that it brought within the relations and circumstances provided for is within the law. They are general and uniform in their operation upon all persons in the like situation, and the fact of their being general and uniform is not affected by the number of those within the scope of their operation. Arms v. Ayer, 61 N. E. 851, 855, 192 Ill. 601, 58 L. R. A. 277, 85 Am. St. Rep. 357; McAumich v. Mississippi & M. R. Co., 20 Iowa, 338; Iowa R. Land Co. v. Soper, 39 Iowa, 112, 116.

A law is to be regarded as general only when its provisions apply to all objects of legislation distinguished alike by qualities and attributes which necessitate the legislation, or to which the enactment has manifest relation. Such law must embrace all and exclude none whose conditions and wants render such legislation equally necessary or appropriate to them as a class. Warner v. Hoagland, 51 N. J. Law (22 Vroom) 66, 68, 16 Atl. 166; Randolph v. Wood, 7 Atl. 286, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 85, on error, 15 Atl. 271, 275, 50 N. J. Law (21 Vroom) 175; Helper v. Simon, 53 N. J. Law (24 Vroom) 550, 22 Atl. 120; Dexheimer v. City of Orange, 36 Atl. 706, 707, 60 N. J. Law, 111; Hoas v. O'Donnell, 37 Atl. 447, 449, 60 N. J. Law, 35.

"Without undertaking to discriminate nicely or define with precision, it may be said that the character of a law as general or local depends on the character of its subject-matter. If that be of a general nature, existing throughout the state in every county, a subject-matter in which all the citizens have a common interest, . . . then the laws which relate to and regulate it are laws of a general nature, and, by virtue of the prohibition referred to, must have uniform operation throughout the state." State v. Davis, 44 N. E. 511, 512, 55 Ohio St. 15 (quoting Kelley v. State, 6 Ohio St. 269).

A law framed in general terms, restricted to no locality, and operating equally upon all of a group of objects which, having regard to the purposes of legislation, are distinguished by characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them a class by themselves, is not a special or local law, "but a general law." Van Riper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 123, 29 Am. Rep. 210. To justify separate legislation for town or counties, there must be something in the subject-matter of the enactment to call for and necessitate such legislation. In re Cleveland, 19 Atl. 17, 19, 52 N. J. Law (23 Vroom) 188 (citing Hammer v. State, 44 N. J. Law [18 Vroom] 667).

Form or declaratory provision.

The term "general law" in Const. art. 7, § 21, providing that no general law shall be enforced until it is published, includes all public laws which are such by their own nature, but not laws which, by their own nature, are private, but by a provision therein are declared to be public. Burbop v. City of Milwaukee, 21 Wis. 257, 259.

An act is nevertheless general, though it may not operate on all cities of the state, if it is general and uniform throughout the state, operating on all of a certain class, or on all who are brought within the relations and circumstances provided in the act, it is not within the constitutional inhibition against special legislation. The form or profession of an act does not control; and although it is general in form or pretense, if it necessarily produces a special result, it can not be upheld. State v. Hunter, 17 Pac. 177, 184, 38 Kan. 578.

Number in class.

A law is general if nothing be excluded that should be contained. If the only limitation contained in a law is a legitimate classification of its objects, it is a general law. Hence, if the object of the law has characteristics so distinct as reasonably to form, for the purpose legislated upon, a class by itself, the law is general, notwithstanding it operates upon a single object only; for a law is not general because it operates upon every person in the state, but because every person that can be brought within its predicament becomes subject to its operation. Budd v. Hancock, 48 Atl. 1023, 1024, 66 N. J. Law, 133.

The fact that an act is really applicable to but one municipal corporation, or, in other words, that there is but one which, at the time of its enactment, comes under its provisions, is not sufficient to make a law special, and not general. But the question presents itself whether or not the Legislature can create a class on the basis of indebtedness, and define the amount and character of the indebtedness which shall characterize the class. We are unable to see any reason why it cannot do so equally as well as on the basis of population; and an act by its terms applicable only to a city having an indebtedness to the amount of $200,000, in the payment of which it has defaulted, is a general law. Ex parte Wells, 21 Fla. 280, 313.

Within the meaning of the Constitution forbidding the Legislature to pass special or local laws for the assessment and collection of taxes, and providing that all such laws shall be general and of uniform operation throughout the state, an act which is general in its terms, embracing all railroads in a similar condition in the state, is a general act, although there may not be but one railroad in the state to which the act applies. A statute which relates to persons or things as a class is a general law, while a statute which relates to particular persons or things of a class is special. The word "general," as distinguished from "special," means all of a class, instead of part of a class. Bloxham v. Florida Cent. & P. R. Co., 35 Fla. 625, 733, 17 South. 902, 924, 925.

Laws are general if they apply to a class, though the class may be very limited, or even where there is but one of the class; but the law must be general in its application, and embrace all of the given class, and not be specific in its application to a particular person or thing. In State v. Cooley, 58 N. W. 150, 56 Minn. 540, it is said another proposition that may be laid down as beyond the question is that, if the basis of the classification is valid, it is wholly immaterial how many or how few members there are in the class. One may constitute a class as well as a thousand, although, of course, the fewer the numbers, the closer the courts will scrutinize the act to see that it is not an evasion of the Constitution. Guthrie Daily Leader v. Cameron, 41 Pac. 635, 639, 3 Okl. 677.

A law formed in general terms, restricted to no locality, broad enough to reach every portion of the state, and abating legislative commissions for the regulation of municipal affairs wherever they exist, and operating equally upon all of them, is a general law without regard to the consideration that within the state there happens to be but one individual of a class or one place where it produces effects. Van Riper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 123, 125, 29 Am. Rep. 210.

General laws are those which relate to a whole class of persons, places, relations, or things, grouped according to some specified class characteristic, binding all within the jurisdiction of the lawmaking power, limited, as the power may be, by territorial operation or by constitutional restraint. It is none the less general though at the time of its passage there may be but one, or in fact not one, individual of the class thus created, provided it be reasonable, and not illusory in its generalization, and provided that the circle or ring of classification be such as to remain open to receive the potentials which may arise bearing the peculiar marks of the class. Groves v. Grant County Court, 26 S. E. 460, 463, 42 W. Va. 587.

As public act or law.

A general act is one which regards the whole community, and is used as synonymous with "public act." Ex parte Burke, 59 Cal. 6, 11, 43 Am. Rep. 231.

Statutes relating to all the municipal corporations of the state are general laws. Thomason v. Ashworth, 14 Pac. 615, 618, 73 Cal. 73.

Any statute which affects the public at large, though operating within the limits of a particular locality, is generally declared to be a public statute. The terms "general" and "public" law are frequently used synonymously, but they are not the equivalent of each other. Every general law is necessarily a public law, but every public law, as defined, is not a general law. A general law is a law which operates throughout the state alike upon all the people or all of a class. Any law affecting the public within the limits of the county or community would be a public law, though not a general law. The effect of the statute, more than its wording or phraseology, must determine its character as a public, general, special, or local statute. Holt v. City of Birmingham, 19 South. 735, 736, 111 Ala. 369.

A law is general, in the broad sense of the term, if it extends to the whole state, or the whole of a legislative class of localities legitimately created for the purpose of general legislation. A law is general in the restricted sense of the term as it is used in Const. art. 7, § 21, not only when it is general in the broad sense thereof, but also when it is of that character in the sense of being public; but if it applies only to a single subdivision of the state, as a county, town, city, or village, or a collection of such localities not constituting a legitimate class thereof for the purposes of legislation, it is local in character. Where a law is general and public in the sense indicated, the two terms are synonymous. Milwaukee County v. Isenring, 85 N. W. 131, 133, 135, 109 Wis. 9, 53 L. R. A. 635.

General law is synonymous with public law, and in this country means those laws that relate to and bind all within the jurisdiction of the lawmaking power, limited as that power may be in its theory or operation or by constitutional restrictions. As used in Const. art. 11, § 1, which provides that corporations without banking powers or privileges may be terminated under general laws, but shall not be created by special act, it is used only as opposite to special, and without any design of indicating the public or private character of the law; that is, it means those laws which relate to all of a class, instead of to one or a part of that class. But as used in Const. Wis. art. 171, § 21, which provides that no general law shall be enforced until published, it is used, not as contradistinguished from local or special, but in its usual meaning, namely, public law; the object of the prohibition being the protection of the people by preventing their rights and interests from being affected by laws of which they have no means of knowing. Clark v. City of Janesville, 10 Wis. 136, 179.

Territorial comprehensiveness.

A general act is one applicable to every part of the commonwealth; one that applies to the whole state. Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 377, 384, 15 Wkly. Notes Cas. 209, 210.

A general act is one which regulates the common good of all the inhabitants within the state. State v. Murray, 17 South. 832, 834, 47 La. Ann. 1424.

In Lorentz v. Alexander, 87 Ga. 444, 13 S. E. 632, it is said a law, to be general, must operate uniformly throughout the whole state upon the subject or class of subjects with which it purports to deal; so that an act relating to the power of municipalities and counties to grant liquor licenses, from which numerous places are excepted, is not a general law. Sasser v. Martin, 29 S. E. 278, 285, 101 Ga. 447.

In order that a law may be general, it must be of force in every county in the state, and while it may contain special provisions making its effect different in certain counties, those counties cannot be exempt from its entire operation. Carolina Grocery Co. v. Burnet, 39 S. E. 381, 384, 61 S. C. 205, 58 L. R. A. 687 (citing Dean v. Spartanburg Co., 59 S. C. 110, 37 S. E. 226).

A statute is not special or local merely because it authorizes or prohibits the doing of a thing in a certain locality. It is, notwithstanding this fact, a general law, if it applies to all the citizens of the state, and deals with a matter of general concern. State v. Corson, 50 Atl. 780, 785, 67 N. J. Law, 178.

Authorization of city to issue bonds.

A legislative act authorizing a city to issue bonds for stock in a railroad company is not a general law within a constitutional provision requiring that all general laws shall be published before going into effect. Luling v. Racine (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 1105.

Classification of municipal corporations.

A law framed in general terms, restricted to no locality, and operating equally upon all of a group of objects, which, having regard to the purposes of the legislation, are distinguished by characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them a class by themselves, is not a special or local law, but a general law. The classification must be just and reasonable, and not arbitrary. Under these principles the act of March 29, 1882, authorizing incorporated villages having within their limits a college or university, to provide against the evils resulting from the sale of intoxicating liquors therein, is not repugnant to the provisions of the Constitution that acts relating to municipal corporations must be of a general nature. Bronson v. Oberlin, 41 Ohio St. 476, 481, 52 Am. Rep. 90.

In discussing the validity of a law as being a general law organizing courts or a local and special one, the court said: "It is plain, therefore, that any change in the jurisdiction or practice of these courts must be made by general law, operative not in one county or state, but in all the counties and all the states in the commonwealth; and so confusion seems to exist in regard to the definition of 'general law,' and the theory has been advanced in several recent cases that the division of the cities of a state into classes, which was recognized as a necessary classification, requires us to hold any law to be general which embraces all cities without regard to the subject to which it relates. This theory overlooks the object and purpose of the classification set forth in the act. These are to make provision for municipal needs of cities which differ greatly in population. Difference in population makes it necessary to provide different machinery for the administration of certain corporate powers and duties of certain corporate officers corresponding with the needs of the population to be provided for. But an act relating to improvement of streets, which is limited to cities of second class, having no peculiar provisions which would not be applicable to other cities, is not a general law." Appeal of Wilbert, 21 Atl. 74, 75, 137 Pa. 494.

Act June 28, 1879 (Pub. Laws 1879, p. 182), providing for liens for labor and material on oil wells, and "that the act does not apply to counties having a population of over 200,000 inhabitants," is a local or special law, within the meaning of the Constitution prohibiting the passage of any local or special law authorizing the creation, extension, or impairing of liens. There is no dividing line between a local and a general statute. It must be either the one or the other. If it apply to the whole state, it is general; if to a part only, it is local. As a legal principle, it is as effectually local when it applies to sixty-five counties out of the sixty-seven as if it applied to one county only. The exclusion of a single county from the operation of the act makes it local. A general statute must be applicable to every part of the commonwealth. Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 377, 384.

A law is none the less general and uniform because it divides the subjects of its operation into classes, and applies different rules to the different classes. With respect to political subdivisions of the state, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania lays down the rule that the only proper classification is by population. We are satisfied the rule is altogether too narrow. A general law for the incorporation of villages that conferred certain powers and privileges on villages lying on rivers, but not on inland villages, if it operated alike upon all villages in that situation, could not be called special legislation. A law general in form, but special in operation, violates a constitutional inhibition of special legislation as much as though special in form. A law is general and uniform in its operation which operates equally upon all the subjects within the class of subjects for which the rule is adopted. Nichols v. Walter, 37 Minn. 264, 271, 33 N. W. 800.

An act providing for listing and assessing personal property in Indian reservations and unorganized territory at a different time from that fixed for listing and assessing such property in organized counties is a general law. Gay v. Thomas, 46 Pac. 578, 586, 5 Okl. 1.

By the provision of article 11, § 6, of the Constitution, cities are subject to control by the general laws. This includes the power to provide that in cities having a certain number of inhabitants every justice of the peace shall be provided by the city authorities with a suitable office in which to hold his court. Bishop v. Council of City of Oakland, 58 Cal. 572, 575.

An act providing that passenger railways in cities of the first class may use other than animal power whenever authorized by the city council, and repealing all limitations contained in charters of passenger railway companies restricting them to the use of horse power, is a general law. Reeves v. Philadelphia Traction Co., 25 Atl. 516, 517, 152 Pa. 153.

A bill that embraces all the villages of the state which may elect to take advantage of its provisions is a general, and not a local, act. Arthur v. Village of Glens Falls, 21 N. Y. Supp. 81, 83, 66 Hun, 136.

Laws 1881, c. 554, giving to the board of supervisors of any county containing an incorporated city of over 100,000 inhabitants, where contiguous territory in the county has been mapped out into streets and avenues, power to lay out, open, grade, and construct the same, and to provide for the assessment of damages on the property benefited, is not a local or private act, but a general law. It applies to a class, and not to the selected or particular elements of which it is composed. The class consists of every county in the state having within its boundaries a city of 100,000 inhabitants and territory beyond the city limits mapped into streets and avenues. How many such counties there are now or may be in the future we do not know, and it is not material that we should. Whether many or few, the law operates upon them all alike, and reaches them, not by a separate selection of one or more, but through the general class of which they are individual elements. In re Church, 92 N. Y. 1, 4, 5.

A general law must be one that operates uniformly throughout the whole state upon a subject or class of subjects with which it proposes to deal. Thus an act dealing with the establishment of county courts, in order to be general, and have uniform operation throughout the state, must affect each county in the state; so that an act providing for the establishment of a city court upon the recommendation of the grand jury of any county having a population of 10,000 or more, where a city court does not now exist, is not a general law. Thomas v. Austin, 30 S. E. 627, 628, 103 Ga. 701.

Section 20, art. 6, of the Constitution, provides that the General Assembly may provide for the establishment of a probate court "in each county having a population of over 50,000." Section 1 of article 6 provides that "all laws relating to the courts shall be general and of uniform operation and the organization, jurisdiction, powers, proceedings and practice of all courts of the same class or grade so far as regulated by law * * * shall be uniform." Held, that section 20 of article 6 authorized the General Assembly to establish probate courts in such counties having a population over 50,000 as it might deem best. The only effect intended to be given by the framers of the Constitution to section 1, art. 6, was to require that all laws relating to "the organization, jurisdiction, powers, proceedings, and practice of all courts of the same class or grades" should be uniform. Therefore neither section operated to render unconstitutional a law providing for the establishment of probate courts only in counties of over 70,000 population. Knickerbocker v. People, 102 Ill. 218, 222, 229.

Regulation of disposal of public funds.

An act regulating the disposal of a portion of the public funds of the state previously regulated and disposed of by a general law of the state is itself a general law. State v. Hoeflinger, 31 Wis. 257, 262.

Regulation of liability of employers.

An act providing that railroad corporations shall be liable to their employes for any neglect of their agents or any mistakes of the engineer or other employes is general and uniform within the meaning of the constitutional provision. McAunich v. Mississippi & M. R. Co., 20 Iowa, 838, 342.

Regulation of municipal elections and officers.

A statute which changes the powers and duties of municipal officers in important respects is a general law, and has uniform operation if it is made applicable to all citizens or to all of a class. Hellman v. Shoulters, 44 Pac. 915, 918, 114 Cal. 136.

An act entitled "An act relating to cities of the first class in this state, and providing for the holding of municipal or charter elections therein, and regulating the terms of elective and appointive officers therein," approved March 18, 1897, is a local and special law regulating the internal affairs of towns, and is not a general law, and for that reason is unconstitutional. Hoos v. O'Donnell, 37 Atl. 447, 449, 60 N. J. Law, 35.

Act Feb. 28, 1901, providing that all municipal officers required to be elected shall be voted for and elected on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November in each year, and on the same official ballots required by law for the election of state and county officers, and not otherwise, and fixing the terms of officers elected or appointed in cities and the manner of their appointment, is not unconstitutional as being special and local, regulating the internal affairs of cities, in contravention of Const. art. 4, § 7, par. 11, prohibiting private, local, or special laws regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties, since cities are a distinct class, and within the common-law classification laws relating to their internal affairs are general. Boorum v. Connelly, 48 Atl. 955, 958, 66 N. J. Law, 197, 88 Am. St. Rep. 469.

Regulation of oyster beds.

An act regulating the cultivation of oysters in certain tidal water lying wholly within the counties of the state is not special or local within the prohibition of Const. art. 4, § 7, par. 11, the matter regulated being of general concern, and applying to all citizens. State v. Corson, 50 Atl. 780, 785, 67 N. J. Law, 178.

Regulation of private corporations.

An act authorizing the incorporation of benevolent societies, and providing that corporations formed under this act shall be capable of taking real or personal property by devise or bequest, not applying to corporations previously organized or effected under other acts, is not a general law of the state.

Cole v. Frost, 4 N. Y. Supp. 308, 310, 51 Hun, 578.

A law applicable to existing and future corporations would be general, and one confined to existing corporations would also be general. Both laws would at the time of their enactment apply to precisely the same existing subjects, and until further companies came into existence would have precisely the same control. In re New York El. R. Co., 70 N. Y. 327, 350.

A statute which imposes certain legal duties upon corporations in general and makes provision intended to secure the performances of these duties by corporations is a general law. Skinner v. Garnett Gold Min. Co. (U. S.) 96 Fed. 735, 743.

Regulation of taxation.

The property of railroad and canal companies constitute a legitimate class of property for the purpose of taxation, and the law which extends to and operates equally upon all such property is a general law. State Board of Assessors v. State, 4 Atl. 578, 584, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 310.

Where various counties, school districts, and other municipal corporations owning judgments had levied special taxes to pay the same, a law declaring such judgment taxes to be legal and valid was a general law operating on every municipal corporation which had levied special taxes to pay such judgments. Iowa R. Land Co. v. Soper, 39 Iowa, 112, 116.

Regulation of saloons.

An act making it a misdemeanor for the proprietor or superintendent of a public house where liquor is sold to permit games of cards, dice, etc., to be played in his premises, is a general statute. Territory v. Cutinola, 14 Pac. 809, 810, 4 N. M. (Johns.) 160.

Repeal of general law.

The repeal of a public or general law can of necessity only be by a public or general law. State v. Hoefflinger, 31 Wis. 257, 262.

GENERAL LEGACY.

A general legacy is one so given as not to amount to a bequest of a particular thing or money of the testator, distinguished from all others of the same kind. Tift v. Porter, 8 N. Y. 516, 518; Crawford v. McCarthy, 54 N. E. 277, 278, 159 N. Y. 514; Osborne v. McAlpine (N. Y.) 4 Redf. Sur. 1, 4; Scofield v. Adams (N. Y.) 12 Hun, 366, 369; Graham v. Graham's Ex'r, 45 N. C. 291, 297; Kenaday v. Sinnott, 21 Sup. Ct. 233, 237, 179 U. S. 606, 45 L. Ed. 339; Perrine v. Perrine, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 133, 139, 10 Am. Dec. 392; Appeal of Smith, 103 Pa. 559, 561;

New Albany Trust Co. v. Powell, 64 N. E. 640, 641, 29 Ind. App. 494; Harper v. Bibb, 47 Ala. 547, 554.

A general legacy is one which does not necessitate delivering any particular thing, or paying money out of any particular portion of the estate. Evans v. Hunter, 53 N. W. 277, 86 Iowa, 413, 17 L. R. A. 308, 41 Am. St. Rep. 503; Getman v. McMahon (N. Y.) 30 Hun, 531, 533.

A legacy is general when it is so given as not to amount to a specific part of the testator's personal estate; as of a sum of money generally, or out of the testator's personal estate, and the like. Pell v. Ball (S. C.) 1 Speers, Eq. 48, 51, 56.

A general legacy is a bequest chargeable on the general estate, and not so given as to be distinguishable from other parts of the estate of the same kind. As otherwise defined, it is one of quantity merely, and includes all legacies not embraced within the definitions of specific and demonstrative legacies. Kelly v. Richardson, 13 South. 785, 790, 100 Ala. 584.

A legacy is said to be general when it is not answered by any particular portion of or article belonging to the estate, the delivery of which will alone fulfill the intent of the testator; and when it is so answered it is said to be a specific legacy, because it consists of some specific thing belonging to the estate, which is by the legacy intended to be transferred in specie to the legatee. Smith v. McKitterick, 2 N. W. 390, 392, 51 Iowa, 548.

Specific legacy distinguished.

A legacy is general where its amount or value is a charge upon the general assets in the hands of the executors, and where, if these are sufficient to meet all the provisions in the will, it must be satisfied. It is specific when it is limited to a particular thing, subject, or chose in action so identified as to render the bequest inapplicable to any other; as a bequest of a horse, a picture, or a jewel, or a debt due from a person named, and in special cases even of a sum of money. Langdon v. Astor's Ex'rs, 10 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Duer) 477, 543.

A specific legacy differs from a general legacy or pecuniary legacy in this respect: that, if the thing secured or money bequeathed is lost, paid, or destroyed in the lifetime of the testator, the legatee will not be entitled to any recompense or satisfaction out of his personal estate; whereas a general legacy is to be paid out of the assets of the testator when converted into money, if the same is sufficient for that purpose, and in the order prescribed in the will. Humphrey v. Robinson, 5 N. Y. Supp. 164, 166, 52 Hun, 200.

One of the attributes of a specific, as distinguished from a general, legacy, or a demonstrative legacy, is that, if the property given in specie does not exist at the death of the testator, there is nothing upon which the gift can take effect, and the legacy is necessarily lost. Johnson v. Conover, 35 Atl. 291, 293, 54 N. J. Eq. 333.

All personality.

A bequest of all testator's personality, with certain specific exceptions, is a general legacy. Kelly v. Richardson, 13 South. 785, 790, 100 Ala. 584. See, also, Appeal of Crone, 103 Pa. 571, 576.

Proceeds of realty.

A bequest in trust of a certain sum of money first to be taken out of the proceeds of the realty makes a general legacy; that is, one to be raised out of the proceeds of the realty first, or, if that fund be not enough, then the balance of the estate, except specific legacies, must supply the balance of such bequest. Hutchinson v. Fuller, 75 Ga. 88, 92.

Stock or bonds.

A legacy of so many shares of stock is a general legacy per se, Purse v. Snaplin, 1 Atk. 414; certainly when the number of shares given does not coincide with the number owned. Slade v. Talbot, 65 N. E. 374, 182 Mass. 256, 94 Am. St. Rep. 653 (citing Metcalf v. First Parish in Framingham, 128 Mass. 370, 373).

A mere bequest of quantity, whether of money or of any other chattel, is a general legacy—as of a quantity of stock; and where the testator has not such stock at his death such bequest amounts to a direction to the executor to procure so much stock for the legatee. Rankin v. Rankin, 36 Ill. 293, 300, 87 Am. Dec. 205.

A legacy is general when it is so given as not to amount to a bequest of a particular thing or money of the testator, distinguished from all others of the same kind. Thus a bequest of the sum of "$50,000 of the capital stock of B. & P. Co., or, in case I shall not hold that amount of such stock, I direct the executors to take from my other personal property to an amount sufficient to equal said sum," is a general, and not a specific, legacy. In re Pease's Estate, 43 N. Y. Supp. 1146, 1148, 19 Misc. Rep. 210.

Where testator gave his grandchild a certain number of shares of stock, and at the time of the making of the will he owned more than that number of shares of the stock, but at his death did not own such number, such legacy was not a general legacy, but a specific one. New Albany Trust Co. v. Powell, 64 N. E. 640, 641, 29 Ind. App. 494.

Where a testator bequeathes a sum of money, or of shares of stock, without further description or reference, and which may be satisfied by the delivery to the legatee of any stock of the kind designated, such a legacy is general. Kunkel v. Macgill, 56 Md. 120, 122.

A bequest of a certain sum of money in "Confederate state bonds" is a general legacy. It is not specific, for the words do not designate any particular bonds specified and distinguished from all others. Had the legacy been of a certain sum of money "in my Confederate state bonds" it would have been specific, but the mere fact that the testator at the time of making his will had an amount of that which was given equal or greater than the bequest would of itself be insufficient to change the class of legacy from general to specific. Neither is it a demonstrative legacy. It designates the article in which payment is to be made, not the source or fund from which the means of payment are to be derived. Gilmer's Legatees v. Gilmer's Ex'rs, 42 Ala. 9, 16.

GENERAL LETTER OF CREDIT.

A general letter of credit is one to any and all persons, without naming any one in particular, while a special letter of credit is addressed to a particular individual or firm by name. Birkhead v. Brown (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 634, 642.

A letter of credit is either general or special. When the request for credit in a letter is addressed to a specified person by name or description the letter is special. All other letters of credit are general. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4667; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2011.

GENERAL LIEN.

A general lien is the right to detain property for a general balance due from the owner, and arises by the usage of trade, the usage of the parties, or by express contract. Crommellin v. New York & H. R. Co., 23 N. Y. Super. Ct. (10 Bosw.) 77, 80.

A general lien is a right to retain a thing not only for charges specifically arising out of or connected with that identical thing, but also for a general balance of accounts between the parties in respect to other dealings of like nature. McKenzie v. Nevius, 22 Me. 138, 150, 38 Am. Dec. 291.

A general lien exists when the debt results from a general balance of account. It differs from a particular lien, which exists when the claim arises in respect to the very property retained. Butchers' Union Slaughter-House & Live-Stock Landing Co. v. Crescent City Live-Stock Landing &

Slaughter-House Co., 6 South. 508, 511, 41 La. Ann. 516.

A general lien by a judgment on land only confers a right to levy on the same to the exclusion of other interests subsequent to the judgment. Ashton v. Slater, 19 Minn. 347, 351 (Gil. 300, 303).

A general lien of a factor is the right to hold all the goods of his principal which come into and remain in his hands as such factor until the general balance—that is to say, all debts which his principal owes him, and which have arisen and become payable in the course of his business as factor—have been paid; whereas a particular lien is confined to the debt due for the specific article, as in ordinary sales for cash. Brooks v. Bryce (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 14, 16.

A general lien is one which the holder thereof is entitled to enforce as a security for the performance of all the obligations or all of a particular class of obligations which existed in his favor against the owner of the property. Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2787; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4675; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2019; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3440; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2874.

GENERAL MALICE.

General malice is wickedness and disposition to do wrong against mankind; a black and diabolical heart regardless of social duty, and fatally bent on mischief. Particular malice, as contradistinguished from general malice, means ill will, grudge, a desire to be revenged on a particular person. Brooks v. Jones, 33 N. C. 260, 261; State v. Long, 23 S. E. 431, 117 N. C. 791; Neal v. Nelson, 23 S. E. 428, 431, 117 N. C. 393, 53 Am. St. Rep. 590.

GENERAL MANAGER.

As laborer, see "Laborer."

The general manager of a corporation is "the person who really has the most general control over the affairs of a corporation, and who has knowledge of all its business and property, and who can act in emergencies on his own responsibility, and who may be considered the principal officer." Robert Lee Silver Min. Co. v. Omaha & Grant Smelting & Refining Co., 26 Pac. 326, 327, 16 Colo. 118; Kansas City v. Cullinan, 68 Pac. 1099, 1102, 65 Kan. 68.

"The term 'general manager' of a corporation, according to the ordinary meaning of the term, indicates one who has the general direction and control of the affairs of the corporation, as contradistinguished from one who may have the management of some particular branch of the business." Louis- ville, E. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. McVay, 98 Ind. 391, 398, 49 Am. Rep. 770.

A general manager of a business corporation is a person having general charge of those business matters for the carrying on of which the company was incorporated. These might include the buying of material, the employment of laborers, the supervision of their labor, and the manufacture and distribution of the articles contemplated in the organization of the company. Merely from the use of the term, a general manager of a gas company cannot be presumed to have had authority to write letters in behalf of the company to the publisher of a periodical in relation to testimony given by a witness before a congressional committee regarding the cost of producing gas, nor to authorize the publication of anything in such periodical. Washington Gaslight Co. v. Lansden, 19 Sup. Ct. 296, 301, 172 U. S. 534, 43 L. Ed. 543.

The term "general manager" imports that the person bearing that title is a general executive officer for all the ordinary business purposes of the corporation, but no presumption of law can be indulged in that he has power to bind his principal to contracts of an extraordinary nature, and of such character as would involve the corporation in enormous obligations, and for long periods of time. Camacho v. Hamilton Bank-Note & Engraving Co., 37 N. Y. Supp. 725, 727, 2 App. Div. 369.

The terms "general manager" and "general agent," when applied to a railroad company, are synonymous. The general agent of such a company is virtually the corporation itself, and therefore has authority to bind the company for the expenses of board and attendance for an injured brakeman. Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. Reisner, 18 Kan. 458, 460.

GENERAL MEETING.

Of creditors.

One of the definitions of the word "general" is "common to many," or "the greatest number." Another is "having relation to all," "common to the whole." A meeting of the creditors of a debtor is not general if it be confined to a particular class, those only of a particular class, and perhaps few in number. In re Bonnaffe, 23 N. Y. 169, 177.

Of corporation.

General meetings of a corporation are those at which any business may be transacted, subject only to such restrictions as the charter may impose. Mutual Fire Ins. Co. v. Farquhar, 39 Atl. 527, 528, 86 Md. 668.

In the case of Warren v. Mower, 11 Vt. 385, 387, 391, 392, 394, the court said that: "A manifest distinction obtains between general stated meetings of a corporation and special meetings. Stated meetings of a corporation are usually general; i. e., for the transaction of all business within the corporate powers." Jones v. Concord & M. R. R., 38 Atl. 120, 126, 67 N. H. 119.

GENERAL MERCHANDISE.

"General merchandise," as used in an insurance policy covering the goods in a country store, does not embrace gunpowder. Western Assur. Co. v. Rector, 3 S. W. 415, 416, 85 Ky. 294.

A policy of insurance on "general merchandise consisting of dry goods, clothing, and groceries" excluded all things not within the terms "dry goods, clothing, and groceries," and would not include articles such as gunpowder, which might be included within the term "general merchandise." Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Van Os, 63 Miss. 431, 442, 56 Am. Rep. 810.

GENERAL MORTGAGE.

A general mortgage is that which binds all property, present and future, of the debtor. Barnard v. Erwin (La.) 2 Rob. 407, 415.

GENERAL NOTORIETY OR INTEREST.

Facts of general notoriety or interest are facts of a public nature, either at home or abroad, not existing in the memory of men, as contradistinguished from facts of a private nature, existing within the knowledge of living men, and as to which they may be examined as witnesses. It is of such public facts, including historical facts, facts of the exact sciences, and of literature or art, when relevant to a cause, that proof may be made by the production of books of standard authority. Such facts include the meaning of words and allusions, which may be proved by ordinary dictionaries and authenticated books of general literary history, and facts in the exact sciences, founded upon conclusions reached from certain and constant data, by processes to be elucidated by witnesses when on examination. Bixby v. Omaha & C. B. Ry. & Bridge Co., 75 N. W. 182, 185, 105 Iowa, 293, 43 L. R. A. 533, 67 Am. St. Rep. 299 (citing Gallagher v. Market St. Ry. Co., 67 Cal. 13, 6 Pac. 869, 51 Am. Rep. 680, note; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Yates, 25 C. C. A. 103, 79 Fed. 584, 40 L. R. A. 553; Van Skike v. Potter, 73 N. W. 295, 53 Neb. 28).

GENERAL OBJECTION.

A general objection to evidence is an objection which goes to its competency or relevancy. Hicks v. Deemer, 58 N. E. 252, 253, 187 Ill. 164.

A general objection to an instrument offered in evidence raises questions of its relevancy or materiality only. It is not sufficient to raise the objection that it is not properly authenticated, as required by statute. Cantwell v. Welch, 58 N. E. 414, 415, 187 Ill. 275.

GENERAL OFFICERS.

The president, vice president, general manager, secretary, and treasurer of a railroad corporation, selected by it, through its board of directors, under Burns' Rev. St. 1894, §§ 5145, 5147 (Rev. St. 1881, §§ 3895, 3897), and invested with ostensible authority, are general officers, and may make any contract within the scope of the corporation. Bedford Belt Ry. Co. v. McDonald, 46 N. E. 1022, 17 Ind. App. 492, 60 Am. St. Rep. 154.

GENERAL OFFICES.

"General offices," as used in Sp. Laws 1879, c. 182, authorizing the issuance of bonds to a railroad, provided its eastern terminus, general offices, and headquarters should be in a certain city, should be construed to mean the general offices maintained for the purpose of operating the railroad. State v. City of Minneapolis, 21 N. W. 722, 723, 32 Minn. 501.

GENERAL OPPOSITION.

Defendant signed an instrument agreeing to pay a certain sum to the plaintiff as her contribution to the fund for the general opposition to the confirmation of the report of the commissioners of estimate and assessment in the matter of the opening of the Bowery in the city of New York. Held, that the term "general opposition" meant litigation brought in behalf of the property holders as a whole, and did not include any litigation which was peculiar to any one or more of the essential parties less than the whole. Hence defendant was not liable for the amount named in the instrument, where the opposition to the confirmation of the report of the commissioners both on the part of the plaintiff and of the defendant was brought separately, and not jointly, and at their individual expense, and for their individual benefit, and not by way of general opposition in behalf of property holders associated for the purpose of making such opposition. Dodge v. Gardiner, 31 N. Y. 239, 245.

GENERAL ORDER.

A general order is an order whereby the collector of customs allows the unloading of goods and the taking of possession of them before any entry of them is made by the individual owners or consignees. In re The Egypt (U. S.) 25 Fed. 320, 332.

GENERAL OWNER.

A general owner is one who has such dominion over a thing that he has the right to enjoy or do with it as he pleases, even to spoiling or destroying it, or that he has that right in it by which it belongs to him in particular to the exclusion of all others. To constitute ownership there must be at some time a right as ample and unrestricted as that. When that right once exists, he who has it is a general owner. He may then burden or limit that right, or subject it to rights created by him in others, and cease not to be the general owner, but he has not become the general owner, though he may have an interest in the property, until he has a right as great as that stated. Farmers' & Mechanics' Nat. Bank v. Logan, 74 N. Y. 568, 581.

GENERAL PARTNERSHIP.

General partnerships are properly such where the parties carry on their trade or business for their joint benefit and profit, and it is not material whether the capital stock be limited or not, or the contributions of the parties be equal or unequal. Bigelow v. Elliot, 3 Fed. Cas. 349, 351 (citing Willet v. Chambers, Cowp. 814).

To constitute a general partnership nothing more is necessary than that the parties agree to carry on or conduct a specified business and to share in its profits and losses. The business may be of a general nature, or it may relate and be confined to certain designated transactions. In every case the partnership is general; and hence, where parties agreed to carry on a business between Calcutta and New York on joint account, and the particular kind of business was the shipment of goods from Calcutta for sale in New York, and they provided for the mode of payment and the manner of sale, division of profits, and sharing of losses, but no period of duration was prescribed, and there was no limit to the amount or number of shipments, the partnership was general. Eldridge v. Troost (N. Y.) 3 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 20, 23.

Every partnership that is not formed in accordance with the law concerning special partnership, and every special partnership so far only as the general partners are concerned, is a general partnership. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4385; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1738; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3877; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2424; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 3220.

GENERAL PLEA.

General plea of non est factum, see "Non Est Factum."

GENERAL POWER.

A power is general when it authorizes the alienation in fee, by means of a conveyance, will, or charge of the lands embraced in the power, to any allenee whatever. Rev. St. Wis. 1899, § 2105; Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 8860; Coster v. Lorillard (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 265, 324; Jennings v. Conboy, 73 N. Y. 230, 234; Syracuse Sav. Bank v. Porter, (N. Y.) 36 Hun, 168, 170.

A power is general when it authorizes the alienation or incumbrance of a fee in the property embraced therein by grant, will, or charge, or any of them, in favor of any person whatever. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4103; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 324.

A general power is, in regard to the estates which may be created by force of it, tantamount to a limitation in fee, not merely because it enables the donee to limit a fee, but because it enables him to give the fee to whom he pleases. Thompson v. Garwood (Pa.) 8 Whart. 287, 305, 31 Am. Dec. 502.

GENERAL POWER IN TRUST.

A general power is in trust when any person or class of persons other than the grantee of such power is designated as entitled to the proceeds or any portion of the proceeds or other benefits to result from the alienation. Cutting v. Cutting (N. Y.) 20 Hun, 260, 264; Dana v. Murray, 122 N. Y. 604, 612, 26 N. E. 21, 23.

A general power is in trust when any person or class of persons other than its holder is designated as entitled to the proceeds or disposition or charge authorized by the power or to any portion of the proceeds or other benefits to result from its execution. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4107; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, §§ 3411, 3412; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, §§ 327.

A power given by a testatrix to her executor to sell at public or private sale, on such terms and for such price as he might deem expedient, and upon such sale to execute all necessary proper deeds and conveyances to the purchaser, which sale and conveyance should be a complete bar to all claims to the estate or interest in the said premises of her children and heirs, or any person claiming by or through them, was a general power in trust, as defined by the statute. Dana v. Murray, 122 N. Y. 604, 612, 26 N. E. 21, 23.

GENERAL PROPERTY.

The terms "general property" and "special property" are constantly used in the books to denote not the chattel itself, but the different interests which several persons may have in it. Stief v. Hart, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 20, 24.

At common law the property of the wife was divided into two general classes—her general property and her separate property. The goods and personal chattels of the wife, which were actually beneficially possessed by her in her own right at the time of her marriage, and such other goods and personal chattels as come to her during her coverture, belong to the first class, and these, at common law, vested absolutely in the husband. The separate property of the wife is that of which she has the absolute control. Independent of her husband, and the proceeds of which she may dispose of as she pleases. A gift of personal property to the wife is presumed, in the absence of testimony to the contrary, to be a gift, and as her general property. Alston v. Rowles, 13 Fla. 117, 126.

GENERAL PUBLIC LAW.

"Due process of law" is synonymous with 'law of the land,' and 'the law of the land' is 'general public law,' binding upon all the members of the community under all circumstances, and not partial or private laws affecting the rights of private individuals or classes of individuals." Eden v. People, 43 N. E. 1108, 1109, 161 Ill. 296, 32 L. R. A. 659, 52 Am. St. Rep. 365 (quoting Millett v. People, 117 Ill. 294, 7 N. E. 631, 57 Am. Rep. 869).

GENERAL PURPOSES.

A municipal charter authorizing the city to borrow money for general purposes on the credit of the city should be construed to limit the power to borrow money for ordinary governmental purposes, such as are generally carried out with revenues derived from taxation; and the presumption is that the grant of the power was intended to confer the right to borrow money in anticipation of the receipt of revenue taxes, and not to plunge the municipal corporation into a bonded debt on which interest must be paid at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, semiannually, for at least 10 years. The Legislature may confer upon a municipality, when it is constitutional to do so, the power to issue negotiable bonds, and any doubt as to the existence of such power should be determined against its existence. City of Brenham v. German-American Bank, 12 Sup. Ct. 559, 562, 144 U. S. 173, 36 L. Ed. 390.

GENERAL RECEIVER.

A general receiver is one appointed by a court of chancery independent of any statute. His authority is derived from, and his duty prescribed by, the order of appointment, and he is called a common-law receiver.

Boonville Nat. Bank v. Blakey (U. S.) 107 Fed. 891, 894, 47 C. C. A. 43.

GENERAL RECOGNITION.

Under Code 1873, § 2466, providing that illegitimate children may inherit from their father when they have been recognized by him as his children, but such recognition must have been general, or notorious, or else in writing, where a father generally called and treated a person as his son, and he was generally so recognized in the community, such recognition will be held general and notorious. Van Horn v. Van Horn, 77 N. W. 846, 848, 107 Iowa, 247, 45 L. R. A. 93. Thus where the child was born after the father's death, and during his life the mother and father endeavored most strenuously not only to conceal from the public and their relatives and acquaintances the fact that he was the father of the child, but also the fact that a child was to be born to her, there was not a "general and notorious" recognition, though by his acts he acknowledged to the persons with whom she boarded that he was the father. Duffy v. Duffy, 87 N. W. 500, 501, 114 Iowa, 581.

GENERAL REPLICATION.

A general replication, which alone is now used in equity, is a general denial of the truth of defendant's plea or answer, and of the sufficiency of the matter alleged in it to bar the plaintiff's suit, and an assertion of the truth and sufficiency of the bill. Formerly replications were either general or special, as they still are at law. Vanbibber v. Belrne, 6 W. Va. 168, 180 (citing Coop. Eq. Pl. 329, 330); Stewart v. Conrad's Adm'r, 40 S. E. 624, 626, 100 Va. 128.

GENERAL REPUTATION.

The general reputation of a person is what is generally said of him by those amongst whom he dwells, or with whom he is chiefly conversant. Sloan v. Edwards, 61 Md. 89, 103; State v. Miller, 6 S. W. 57, 61, 93 Mo. 263; State v. Conlan (Del.) 50 Atl. 95, 3 Pennewill, 218; Coates v. Sulau, 46 Kan. 341, 342, 26 Pac. 720.

The general reputation of a person is the estimate in which he is held by the community. Cunningham v. Underwood (U. S.) 116 Fed. 803, 811, 53 C. C. A. 99.

There must be general concurrence in an estimate of one's reputation to make it general reputation, or a reputation which is general. Pickens v. State, 61 Miss. 563, 566.

General reputation of a person is a fact. The question is a simple one of fact. Is there a general reputation? Has the subject been so much discussed and considered that there is in the public mind a uniform sentiment, which can be stated as a fact? By the public mind of course is not meant the mind of the whole public, but of that portion of the public which is interested. Walker v. Moors, 122 Mass. 501, 504.

According to common usage, the phrase "general reputation" refers to the general moral character of the person referred to. In an action for libel, a question as to whether a witness was acquainted with the plaintiff's general reputation was not objectionable as embracing other than moral traits of character. The expressions "bad character" and "general reputation" are constantly used to signify character and reputation with regard to morals. O'Brien v. Frasier, 1 Atl. 465, 469, 47 N. J. Law (18 Vroom) 349, 54 Am. Rep. 170.

As used in the rule that a common-law marriage cannot be presumed from evidence of cohabitation as husband and wife and general repute or reputation, by general reputation is meant the understanding among the neighbors and acquaintances with whom they associate in their daily life that they are living together as husband and wife, and not in meretricious intercourse. In its application to the fact of marriage it is more than mere hearsay. It involves and is made part of social conduct, recognition, giving character to an admitted and unconcealed cohabitation. Taylor v. Taylor, 50 Pac. 1049, 1050, 10 Colo. App. 303 (citing Badger v. Badger, 88 N. Y. 55, 42 Am. Rep. 263; In re Yardley's Estate, 75 Pa. [25 P. F. Smith] 211).

The words "general reputation," in reference to the admission of general reputation to prove boundaries, etc., in common sense and in law must mean that which is derived from the declarations of those who live or were living at a time, if not ancient, at least comparatively remote. Thus evidence that a certain tree was understood to be a corner tree in 1880 is not admissible as general reputation. Westfelt v. Adams, 42 S. E. 823, 825, 131 N. C. 379.

GENERAL RESIDUUM.

Testator, whose heirs at law were one son and two married daughters, in the first clause of his will devised and bequeathed to his son, subject to the limitations afterwards made in the will, one equal one-third part of all his estate, to wit, certain real estate particularly described, and so much of his other property not specifically devised as, with advancements to the son, should amount to such third part. In a subsequent clause he devised and bequeathed the general residuum of his estate, not before specifically devised, equally to be divided among his three children, their heirs and assigns. Held, that the phrase "general residuum" meant testator's personal estate, or any other estate he might acquire. Homer v. Shelton, 43 Mass. (2 Metc.) 194, 208.

GENERAL RESTRAINT.

A general restraint is defined to be an agreement not to carry on a certain business anywhere. It is against public policy, and void. Kellogg v. Larkin (Wis.) 3 Pin. 123, 138, 56 Am. Dec. 164.

A general restraint of trade is in England defined to be one which forbids a person from employing his talents, industry, or capital in any undertaking within the kingdom. An agreement in general restraint of trade is utterly void. Holbrook v. Waters (N. Y.) 9 How. Prac. 335, 337.

GENERAL RETAINER.

A general retainer merely gives a right to expect professional services when requested, but none which is not requested. It binds the person retained not to take a fee from another against his retainer, but to do nothing except what he is asked to do; and for this he is to be paid. Rhode Island Exch. Bank v. Hawkins, 6 R. I. 198, 206.

GENERAL REVENUE PURPOSES.

The words "general revenue purposes" in Gen. St. 1889, par. 788, authorizing the levy and collection for general revenue purposes of not to exceed 10 mills on the dollar in any one year on certain property, means the same as "ordinary purposes." Stevens v. Miller, 43 Pac. 439, 441, 3 Kan. App. 192.

GENERAL REVENUES.

"General revenues," as used in a will, by which the testator directed that his estate should not be divided and no devise or bequest should take effect until all his just debts were paid and fully discharged from the general revenues of his estate, means the rents and profits of the testator's real estate and the interest or profits arising out of the personal estate. Whitehead v. Gibbons, 10 N. J. Eq. (2 Stockt.) 230, 232.

GENERAL RULES OF PRACTICE.

The rules established by the justices assigned to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in convention, which rules are binding upon all the courts in the state and all the judges and justices thereof, except the court for the trial of impeachments and the Court of Appeals, are styled "the general rules of practice." Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 17.

GENERAL SELLING PRICE.

The general selling price is not to be shown in condemnation proceedings by evidence of particular sales of alleged similar lots, but is to be fixed in the mind of the witness from a knowledge of the price at which lots are generally held for sale, and at which they are sometimes actually sold, in the ordinary business in the neighborhood. Friday v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 54 Atl. 339, 204 Pa. 405.

GENERAL SERVICES.

By general services of an attorney are meant services not embraced in suits or in their settlement. People v. Bond St. Sav. Bank (N. Y.) 10 Abb. N. C. 15, 25.

GENERAL SHIP.

"A general ship is defined to be one in which the masters or owners engage separately with a number of persons unconnected with each other to convey their respective goods to the place of the ship's destination." Ward v. Green (N. Y.) 6 Cow. 173, 176, 16 Am. Dec. 437.

GENERAL STORE.

Where a policy was issued on a general store, it covered a limited quantity of gunpowder and petroleum to the extent that it was customary for such stores to carry in stock, though the policy provided against such articles. Barnard v. National Fire Ins. Co., 27 Mo. App. 26, 35.

GENERAL STRIKE.

Where a contract provided for the extension of the time for completion of a building if the contractors were unavoidably delayed by any "general strike," there was a general strike where operatives of planing mills in the city were on a strike from January 15 to August 8, 1892, only three out of twenty-eight of such mills being in operation, and such three being unable to secure skilled labor. Weber v. Collins, 41 S. W. 249, 250, 139 Mo. 501.

GENERAL SUPERINTENDENCY.

A contract providing different wages for general and special superintendencies "imports a superintendence which would be necessary and continuous throughout the whole duration of the agreement." Pressy v. H. P. Smith Mach. Co., 19 Atl. 618, 620, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 872.

GENERAL SUPERVISION.

A city ordinance giving the board of health a "general supervision over the health of the city" should be construed to grant an active efficient power to be exercised for the public good, and in its scope to reach to whatever may be necessary to the preservation of the public health. It should not be limited to devising measures which are reported to the council, or comprehend nothing more than a mere authority to examine into the condition of the health of the city, and advise the measures necessary for its preservation; hence the ordinance included the power to rent a building to be used as a hospital to protect the city from the infection of cholera. Aull v. City of Lexington, 18 Mo. 401, 402.

GENERAL SURFACE.

"General surface," in a deed providing that the grantee should have the right to flow the lands and privileges of the grantor on a river to the extent which a dam erected 28 feet high above the general surface of the bed of the river at the point where the excavations were made for the dam to flow the river, the term "general surface" refers to the bed of a river, and not to the narrow ridge of sandstone of the dam, so as to authorize the grantee to erect flashboards on the top of the dam. "General" refers to a surface more extended than a narrow ridge. Ludlow Mfg. Co. v. Indian Orchard Co., 58 N. E. 181, 177 Mass. 61.

GENERAL TAX.

A general tax is one imposed on all persons within the territorial limits according to the value of their property in consideration of the protection which the government affords alike to all. Gould v. City of Baltimore, 59 Md. 378, 380.

General taxes are defined to be a burden imposed on property for the common good and for the purpose of raising the ordinary revenues of the country, without regard to any special benefit to the owner except such as may be anticipated from the general administration of the laws for individual protection and the general good. They are exactions from a person for the purpose of either carrying on the general government or some subordinate department thereof. Meier v. Kelly, 25 Pac. 73, 76, 20 Or. 86.

General taxes are the exactions placed upon the citizens for the support of the government, paid to the state as a state, the consideration of which is protection by the state. They are to be distinguished from special taxes or special assessments, which are imposed on property within a limited area for the payment of all local improvements supposed to enhance the value of all property within that area. General taxes proceed upon the theory that the existence of the government is necessary, and that it cannot continue without means to pay its expenses; that for those expenses it has the right to compel all citizens and property within its limits to contribute; and that for such contribution it renders no special benefit to any property, but only secures to citizens that general benefit which results from protection to his person and property and the promotion of those various schemes which have for their object the welfare of all. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. City of Decatur, 13 Sup. Ct. 293, 147 U. S. 190, 37 L. Ed. 132.

General taxes are levied on the ground of general public benefits, while special assessment is a peculiar species of taxation to pay for local improvements, which recognizes the general public interest and benefit, but rests upon the supposition that a portion of such public are specially benefited in the increase of value to their property. Shurtleff v. City of Chicago, 60 N. E. 870, 871, 190 Ill. 473.

The words "general tax," as used in Laws 1891, c. 124, § 103, providing that all special assessments shall be carried out on the tax roll in a separate column, and the city treasurer shall have the same authority with reference thereto as if the kind of such lien was a general tax, is used with reference to the manner of imposing the tax upon the property in that it is levied upon it generally by a uniform percentage according to the value thereof. Taxes are spoken of as special if levied for a special purpose, general if levied for some ordinary purpose of municipal government; but, whether taxes be levied for a general or special purpose, if placed upon property as a whole in proportion to the value thereof, they are in the proper sense general taxes as distinguished from special assessments. State v. Hobe, 82 N. W. 336, 338, 106 Wis. 411.

A tax to defray the costs of laying water pipes, levied by a city upon adjacent property, is an assessment for local improvements, and not a general tax for municipal purposes. City of Philadelphia v. Union Burial Ground Soc., 36 Atl. 172, 173, 178 Pa. 533.

GENERAL TAXATION.

General taxation implies a distribution of the burden upon some general rule of equality. So a local assessment or tax for a local benefit should be distributed among and imposed upon all equally standing in like relation. But the equality can never be but an approximation. Allen v. Drew, 44 Vt. 174, 186.

Under Act Va. March 6, 1847, which was accepted by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, and under which it completed its road through Virginia, the provision that the stock, property, and profits of said company shall be subject to general taxation, does not, by the use of the word "general," or the phrase "general taxation," limit the right of taxation to general taxation for such purposes, and exempt it from liability for local or county taxes. To give the word "general" its plain and literal signification, its meaning is exactly the reverse. The definition of the word "general" found in Burrill's Law Dictionary is "that which comprehends all, the whole, as distinguished from 'special,' which signifies something designed for a particular purpose." Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Marshall County Sup'rs, 3 W. Va. 319, 332.

GENERAL TENANCY.

The words "general tenancies," as used in 2 Rev. St. 1876, p. 338, § 2, providing that all general tenancies in which the premises are occupied by the consent of the landlord shall be deemed tenancies from year to year, means such tenancies only as are not fixed and made certain in point of duration by the agreement of the parties. Rothschild v. Williamson, 83 Ind. 387, 389; Brown's Adm'rs v. Bragg, 22 Ind. 122, 123.

GENERAL TERM.

Rev. St. 1889, p. 2147, § 10, defines a general term as when the court sits as a court in bank. State ex rel. McCaffery v. Eggers, 54 S. W. 498, 499, 152 Mo. 485.

GENERAL TERMS.

In construing the statute permitting all matters of defense to be given in evidence under the general issue on the defendant filing a notice of all matter in avoidance and of any defense, "stating in general terms, and without unnecessary prolixity, and in a manner intelligible to a person of ordinary understanding, the true ground and substance of the defense relied upon," the court said: "The expression in 'general terms, concisely, comprehensively,' and the expression without 'unnecessary prolixity,' i. e.—unnecessary minuteness of detail—is unmeaning, for that is equally a fault in a special plea, although not demurrable in either, and the expression 'intelligible to a person of ordinary understanding,' evidently refers to the kind of language, and was doubtless intended to prevent the use of technical phrases. They all refer to the manner of stating the defense, and do not excuse an omission of substance." Merrill v. Everett, 38 Conn. 40, 48.

GENERAL TICKET.

Within the meaning of Const. art. 4, § 3, providing that when a township or city shall contain a population which entitled it to more than one representative, "then such township or city shall elect by general ticket the number of representatives to which it is entitled," the term "general ticket" is opposed to partial or special, and signifies that the whole number of representatives to which the town or city is entitled shall be placed upon the ticket. This signification corresponds with the primary meaning of the word "general" as defined by lexicographers. It is, moreover, consistent with the provision for electing representatives when only one is to be chosen, making the whole proceedings uniform throughout the state. Maynard v. Board of District Canvassers, 47 N. W. 756, 760, 84 Mich. 228, 243, 11 L. R. A. 332.

GENERAL VACCINATION.

St. 1889, p. 32, entitled "An act to encourage and provide for a general vaccination in the state of California," though sufficient in itself to apply to all the people in the state, is to be construed in connection with the general classes to which the statute is made to apply by the body of the act, and hence it is not in conflict with Const. art. 4, § 24, requiring that the subject of every act shall be expressed in its title, by the fact that the body of the act only applies to the vaccination of children in the public schools. Abeel v. Clark, 24 Pac. 383, 84 Cal. 226.

GENERAL VERDICT.

See "Separate General Verdict."

A general verdict is that by which the jury pronounced generally upon all or any of the issues, either in favor of the plaintiff or defendant. McCormack v. Phillips, 34 N. W. 39, 55, 4 Dak. 506; Egan v. Estrada (Ariz.) 56 Pac. 721, 722; Settle v. Alison, 8 Ga. 201-208, 52 Am. Dec. 393; Shipp v. Snyder, 25 S. W. 900, 901, 121 Mo. 155; Shadbolt & Boyd Iron Co. v. Camp, 45 N. W. 1062, 1063, 80 Iowa, 539; Childs v. Carpenter, 32 Atl. 780, 781, 87 Me. 114; Glenn v. Sumner, 10 Sup. Ct. 41, 132 U. S. 152, 33 L. Ed. 301; People v. Board of Police (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. 151, 155; Witty v. Chesapeake, O. & W. R. Co., 83 Ky. 21, 27; Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 5019; Code Civ. Proc. S. C. 1902, § 282; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5444; Code Civ. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 270; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4472; Ann. Codes & Sts. Or. 1901, § 152; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 5200; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 3162; Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 624; Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 1186.

A general verdict covers all the issues of the case. McCullough v. Martin, 39 N. E. 905, 906, 12 Ind. App. 165.

A general verdict determines the entire issue in favor of either plaintiff or defendant. Eisemann v. Swan, 19 N. Y. Super. Ct. (6 Bosw.) 608, 671.

A general verdict settles in favor of the prevailing party every question of fact. Soria v. Davidson (N. Y.) 9 Civ. Proc. R. 23, 27.

A general verdict is the jury's deduction from all the issuable facts in the case. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Charman (Ind.) 67 N. E. 923, 926.

A general verdict directly finds or negates all the facts in issue in a general form. Day v. Webb, 28 Conn. 140, 144.

A "general verdict" is a finding that all the facts necessary to establish the cause of action are true. American Tin-Plate Co. v. Guy, 58 N. E. 738, 739, 25 Ind. App. 588.

A general verdict necessarily includes the decision of every material fact well pleaded touching the prevailing party's right to recover. Wells v. Barnett, 7 Tex. 584, 586; Ackermann v. Ackermann, 55 S. W. 801, 803, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 612.

A general verdict embodies both the law and the facts. The jury, taking the law as given by the court, apply that law to the facts as they find them to be, and express their conclusions in the verdict. Walker v. New Mexico & S. P. R. Co., 17 Sup. Ct. 421, 422, 165 U. S. 593, 41 L. Ed. 837.

A general verdict is a direct statement of a conclusion of law and an indirect statement of the facts from which the conclusion is drawn. It expressly affirms the law and inferentially the facts. The jury are directed by the court to indicate the facts found from the evidence by the statement of a conclusion of law. The court states the law applicable to the facts which the evidence tends to prove, and, if the jury finds the facts, they state the conclusion as charged. Smith v. Ireland, 7 Pac. 749, 750, 4 Utah, 187.

A general verdict is the verdict upon the issues presented, and is sustainable, though some of the paragraphs were justified, if the justification did not cover all of them. Holmes v. Jones (N. Y.) 50 Hun, 345, 346, 3 N. Y. Supp. 156, 157.

Separate findings on separate causes of action are general verdicts. Robinson & Co. v. Berkey, 69 N. W. 434, 436, 100 Iowa, 136, 62 Am. St. Rep. 549.

Simple responses of yes or no to issues submitted constitute general, not special, verdicts, and in case of inconsistency between such responses the rule which requires a special verdict to prevail over a general one has no application. Porter v. Western North Carolina R. Co., 97 N. C. 63, 71, 2 S. E. 580.

In criminal proceeding.

A general verdict is defined by the Code of Criminal Procedure to be the verdict of guilty or not guilty. People v. McClure, 42 N. E. 523, 524, 148 N. Y. 95.

A general verdict upon a plea of not guilty is either "Guilty" or "Not guilty," which imports a conviction or acquittal of the crime charged in the indictment; and upon a plea of former conviction or acquittal of the same crime, the verdict is either "for the state" or "for the defendant." Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 1413.

At common law there was a settled distinction between a general verdict in civil and criminal proceedings. In the former case, if some of the counts were bad, when entire damages were given, it was necessary to arrest the judgment, because the court could not apportion the damages; while in the latter the court ascertained the penalty, and could apply it to the good counts which were supported by the bill; and therefore, where the defendant was found guilty of the charge in general, if there were any good counts the verdict was sufficient, and an entire judgment might have been given. Shiffet v. Commonwealth (Va.) 14 Grat. 652, 671 (citing 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 249, 640).

GENERAL WARRANTY.

See "Covenant of General Warranty."

GENERAL WELFARE.

The term "general welfare," when applied to the right of a municipal corporation to provide by ordinance for the general welfare, is synonymous with "corporate purposes." A statute authorizing the municipality to pass ordinances for the good government or good order or the suppression of vice is not an authority to pass all ordinances tending to the general welfare, as many things are essential to the public or general welfare which belong neither to the government or good order of, nor to the suppression of vice in, a municipality. City of Red Wing v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 75 N. W. 223, 224, 72 Minn. 240, 71 Am. St. Rep. 482.

GENERALLY.

A contract of sale, whereby the complainant agreed to give defendants immediate possession, and use of the woodland generally, and of all the wood they cut and corded in the woods, should be concluded to mean "all the woodland." Dale v. Smith, 1 Del. Ch. 1, 10, 12 Am. Dec. 64.

GENERALLY IMPROVE.

"Generally improve the property," as used in a covenant by a lessee of a farm to repair the buildings, build all fences, and to generally improve the property, "refers to the treatment of the lands in their use for agricultural purposes. The mode of cultivation, the proper and sufficient use of manures in enriching the land, and matters of this sort, are within the terms and meaning of this stipulation. To hold it to relate to improvements of any other character would leave the obligations of the tenant under it unbounded." Naye v. Noezel, 14 Atl. 750, 751, 50 N. J. Law (21 Vroom) 523.

GENERALLY KNOWN.

A person may universally be known—that is, by all who know him at all—by two names; and then, of course, he is generally known by each. It is sufficient if the party be as well known by the name mentioned in the indictment as by the true name. Whenever that is the case, it may properly be said that the party is generally known by both names. Taylor v. Commonwealth (Va.) 20 Grat. 825, 831.

GENERATION.

In Acts 1885, c. 51, as amended by Acts 1889, c. 60, providing separate schools for Indians, from which all negroes to the fourth generation are to be excluded, the word "generation" "means a single succession of living beings in natural descent. As the word 'generation' has no technical meaning, we must consider it as used in the sense of a succession—its ordinary import—rather than a degree of removal in computing descents." McMillan v. School Committee of Dist. No. 4, 12 S. E. 330, 332, 107 N. C. 609, 10 L. R. A. 823.

GENERIC.

Terms are generic which pertain to a class of related things, and which are of general application. Continental Ins. Co. v. Continental Fire Ass'n (U. S.) 96 Fed. 846, 848.

The words "generic" and "specific" are relative words. A name which is said, by comparison with some other name, to be specific, is so said because the definition given of the name alleged to be specific limits the subject under consideration more or further than the definition which is assigned to that name which is called "generic." Curiel v. Beard (U. S.) 44 Fed. 551, 553.

GENOESE LOTTERY.

The American Encyclopædia says that lottery may be distinguished into the Genoese or numerical and the Dutch or class lottery.

The former is described as a scheme by which, out of ninety consecutive numbers, five are to be selected or drawn by lot; the players having fixed on certain numbers, wagering that one, two, or more of them would be drawn among the five, or that they would appear in a certain order. In the Dutch or class lottery the number and value of the prizes are regularly estimated. All the ticket holders are interested at once in the play, and chance determines whether a prize or a blank shall fall to a given number. Fleming v. Bills, 3 Or. 286, 291.

GENTLE.

The word "gentle" in a warranty of a horse imports that he is docile, tractable, and quiet. It does not, in its ordinary legal sense, import that the horse has received any particular training or teaching. Bodurtha v. Phelon, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 347, 348.

GENTLEMAN.

A gentleman, according to Dr. Johnson, is, first, a man of birth, but not noble; second, a man raised above the vulgar by his character or post. Cresson v. Cresson, 6 Fed. Cas. 807, 809.

GENTLEMEN OF THE LAW.

A rule of court providing that no person shall be admitted to the bar unless he has served a regular clerkship to some practicing attorney, or gentleman of the law of known abilities, includes a judge of the Supreme Court or a judge of the court of common pleas. Commonwealth v. Judges of Court of Common Pleas (Pa.) 1 Serg. & R. 187, 192.

GENUINE.

As the word "genuine" is used when describing a note, it means that the note is not false, fictitious, simulated, spurious, counterfeit, or, in short, that the apparent maker did make and deliver the note. It imports nothing in regard to the collectibility or in regard to the legal effect or operation of the note. Baldwin v. Van Deusen, 37 N. Y. 487, 492.

A warranty of county bonds in a sale thereof by a private citizen that they were "genuine and regularly issued" does not merely mean that they are not forgeries and were not issued without consideration, and that they were ordered by the proper officers, but means that they are not subject to any defense founded on a want of legal form in the signature or seals. Smeltzer v. White, 92 U. S. 390, 392, 23 L. Ed. 508.

Where, in an action on a promissory note, there is evidence that the note was shown to the defendant to ascertain if his signature was genuine, and he informed the holder that his name had been forged to a number of notes, but to have no uneasiness as to this note, as it was all right, and would be paid when due, an instruction that it devolved on the plaintiff to prove that the signature of the defendant was genuine was erroneous, if it was intended thereby to signify that the name must have been written by the defendant himself with his own hand. It is competent for a person to make a note his own either by signing it with his own hand, or by adopting the signing made by another in his name, although without previous authority. Dow's Ex'r v. Spenny's Ex'r, 29 Mo. 386, 390.

GENUINENESS.

"Genuineness," as used in Civ. Prac. Act, §§ 53, 54, providing that when an action is brought on a written instrument, or a defense to an action is founded on a written instrument, and a copy thereof is contained in the complaint or answer, its genuineness and due execution shall be deemed admitted, unless the answer denying the same be verified in the one case, and unless the plaintiff file with the clerk an affidavit denying the same in the other case, goes to the question of its having been the act of the party, as represented, or, in other words, that the signature is not spurious, and that nothing has been added to it or taken away from it which would lay the party changing the instrument, or signing the name of the person liable for forgery. Cox v. Northwestern Stage Co., 1 Idaho, 376, 379.

The use of the word "genuineness," in an instruction that the defendant cannot be estopped from denying the genuineness of the alleged warehouse receipts unless the jury find, etc., "might suggest the question of authority of an agent to issue the receipts, to the mind of a trained lawyer; but it would not be apt to convey that impression to the jury, or lead them to suppose that such question was submitted to them to pass on." Corn Exchange Bank v. American Dock & Trust Co., 43 N. E. 915, 917, 149 N. Y. 174.

GENUS.

"Genus" signifies a class, embracing many species. The expression "an animal of the horse species" would therefore only include animals known as horses, mares, fillies, and colts, and it would not include an animal belonging to a distinct species, though of the same genus. The word "species" means a sort; a kind; a class subordinate to a genus. Smythe v. State, 17 Tex. App. 244, 251.

GEO.

"Geo." represents "George," by common consent. People v. Ferguson (N. Y.) 8 Cow. 102, 106.

GERMAN CYLINDER GLASS.

In an action for breach of a contract to furnish German cylinder glass, it would be competent to show that the article furnished was such as would be known in the market, and among those conversant with the trade, as glass of that description; but a question whether the glass furnished was merchantable, and not whether it was such as would be recognized by the trade as German cylinder glass, or in what respect it was defective or failed to conform to that description, would not be admissible. Mixer v. Coburn, 52 Mass. (11 Metc.) 559, 562, 45 Am. Dec. 230.

GERMAN EDUCATION.

A German education is one acquired through the medium of the German language. Powell v. Board of Education, 97 Ill. 375, 381, 37 Am. Rep. 123.

GERMANE.

"Literally, 'germane' means akin; closely allied. It is only applicable to persons who are united to each other by the common tie of blood or marriage. When applied to inanimate things, it is, of course, used in a metaphorical sense, but still the idea of a common tie is always present. Thus, when properly applied to a legislative provision, the common tie is found in the tendency of the provision to promote the object and purpose of the act to which it belongs. Any provision not having this tendency, which introduces a new subject-matter into the act, is not germane to it. It is an error to suppose that two things are, in a legal sense, germane to each other, merely because there is a resemblance between them, or because they have some characteristic common to them both." Legislation affecting the boundaries of cities and villages is not germane to that affecting the boundaries of townships. Where the Legislature had the right to provide for the change of township boundaries, this right did not carry with it, as an incident, the power to change the boundaries of cities and villages; the change of the latter not being necessary to effectuate a change of the former, or at least to promote such object. Dolese v. Pierce, 18 N. E. 218, 220, 124 Ill. 140.

"Gerrymander" is the unsavory but expressive name for a method of creating civil divisions of the state for improper purposes, as, for instance, creating school districts, so that children of certain religious beliefs or of the same nationality should be brought within one district, and those of a different nationality or different religion brought within another. State v. Whitford, 11 N. W. 424, 426, 54 Wis. 150.

GET.

"The word 'get,' in its common and ordinary sense, signifies to procure, obtain, according to Dr. Johnson. It may sometimes mean, he says, by force, where the attack will justify that meaning." The word "got," in a publication charging that plaintiff was a United Irishman, and got the money of the United Irishmen into his hands, and ran away with it, does not import a felony, but rather a breach of trust, and therefore such charge is not slanderous. McClurg v. Ross (Pa.) 5 Bin. 218, 222.

GET OFF.

The phrase "get off quickly," as used by the conductor of a railroad train to a party who assisted another onto the train, which started before he could alight, were words of advice, and did not constitute a requirement to leave the train. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Athon, 33 N. E. 469, 472, 6 Ind. App. 295, 51 Am. St. Rep. 303 (citing Lindsey v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 20 N. W. 737, 64 Iowa, 407).

An instruction that, if an accident occur to a passenger while he was in the act of getting off the car while it was in motion, then he could not recover, must be understood to have meant the act of the passenger in not merely going on the steps of the platform of the car, but jumping or alighting from the steps to the ground. Butler v. St. Paul & D. R. Co., 60 N. W. 1090, 59 Minn. 135.

GETTING OUT.

Within the meaning of a statute which gives a lien to tradesmen and others for "labor done in building, repairing, getting out, furnishing, or equipping a boat," the expression "getting out" is broad enough to cover all those services or expenses which might be necessary to put the boat afloat when finished, and to place her in a situation that would enable her to begin her business of navigating the river. They are not necessarily confined to building or repairing. Madison County Coal Co. v. The Colona, 36 Mo. 446, 449. Work and labor done, or services rendered, in unloading a boat in port, by persons not regularly employed on the vessel, was not labor done in "getting out" the boat within the meaning of the statute. Gibbons v. The Fanny Barker, 40 Mo. 253, 254.

GIANT UMBRELLA.

Giant umbrellas are many-colored, fantastically decorated articles imported from Japan and China, of huge size, the frames of which are covered with paper. They resemble ordinary umbrellas, substantially as the miniature ones similarly made and imported from the same countries, which are used by women for hairpins, resemble parasols. They are not the umbrella of trade and commerce, and dealers in these articles do not keep them. They are called umbrellas merely for convenience. United States v. China & Japan Trading Co. (U. S.) 71 Fed. 864, 865, 18 C. C. A. 335.

GIFT.

See "Absolute Gift"; "Original Gift"; "Pious Gift"; "Proper Gift."
Charitable gift, see "Charity."
Substitutional gift, see "Substitutional—Substitutionary."
Gift, grant, purchase, devise, or otherwise, see "Otherwise."

Gifts are of five kinds: (1) Absolute to the donee; (2) to one for delivery to another; (3) to one as a trustee; (4) inter vivos; and (5) causa mortis. Flaherty v. O'Connor, 54 Atl. 376, 377, 24 R. I. 587.

Three things are essential to every gift—a donor, a donee, and a thing to be given. Crawford v. Lockwood (N. Y.) 9 How. Prac. 547, 548.

A gift of a chattel is the act of transferring the right and possession thereto, whereby one man renounces and another acquires the right or title thereto. McWillie v. Van Vacter, 35 Miss. 428, 447, 72 Am. Dec. 127.

The word "gift," as used in a provision in the Penal Code prohibiting certain persons from accepting any gift, shall not be taken to include property received by inheritance, by will, or by gift in view of death. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 6940; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 137.

Acceptance.

A gift, to be complete, includes the element that it be accepted by the donee. Mace v. Thayer, 64 N. Y. Supp. 315, 318, 51 App. Div. 121; Crouse v. Judson, 84 N. Y. Supp. 755, 757, 41 Misc. Rep. 338; Appeal of Calburn, 51 Atl. 139, 140, 74 Conn. 463, 92 Am. St. Rep. 231.

To constitute a valid gift, there must be an assent of both parties. The necessary acceptance may often be presumed, but such presumption is founded not only on the beneficial character of the gift, but also on either the absence of dissent to the gift, or the presence of incapacity to assent or dissent. Carter v. Carter, 53 Atl. 160, 165, 63 N. J. Eq. 726.

Advancement synonymous.

See "Advancement."

Consideration.

A gift is a voluntary transfer of property by one to another, without any consideration or compensation therefor. Ingram v. Colgan, 38 Pac. 315, 316, 106 Cal. 113, 28 L. R. A. 187, 46 Am. St. Rep. 221 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 440; 2 Steph. Comm. 102; 2 Kent, Comm. 437); Knight v. Tripp, 54 Pac. 267, 268, 121 Cal. 674; Calkins v. Equitable Building & Loan Ass'n of the United States, 59 Pac. 30, 31, 126 Cal. 531; Kirchner v. Lenz, 87 N. W. 497, 498, 114 Iowa, 527; Hatfield v. State, 36 N. E. 664, 9 Ind. App. 296; Seymour v. Seymour, 51 N. Y. Supp. 130, 131, 28 App. Div. 495; Gray v. Barton, 55 N. Y. 68, 72, 14 Am. Rep. 181; Pickslay v. Starr, 27 N. Y. Supp. 616, 617, 76 Hun, 10; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 953; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1550; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1146.

A gift is a voluntary conveyance not founded on consideration of money or blood. Livingston v. Livingston, 45 N. W. 233, 236, 29 Neb. 167 (citing 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 633).

To discharge an obligation which rests upon full value received is not a gift or donation. Erskine v. Steele County (U. S.) 87 Fed. 630, 635.

A gift is a voluntary, gratuitous transfer of property by one to another. Williamson v. Johnson, 62 Vt. 378, 22 Am. St. Rep. 117. It is essential that it should be without a consideration. Martin v. Martin, 67 N. E. 1, 3, 202 Ill. 382.

A gift is a gratuity. Riddle v. Stewart (Pa.) 4 Penny. 113, 123.

The term "gift" signifies a gratuitous transfer, without any equivalent, and is not included within the word "sale" in Const. art. 16, § 20, requiring the Legislature to enact a law by which the qualified voters of any county, etc., may from time to time determine whether the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited within the prescribed limits, as the word "sale" means a transfer for valuable consideration. Holley v. State, 14 Tex. App. 505, 512.

The power given to a married woman by St. 1857, c. 249, § 2, to convey, with the assent of her husband, any real or personal property which might thereafter come to her by gift of any person, except her husband, includes land conveyed to her by a third person for a pecuniary consideration. The words "give" and "gift," as applied to conveyances of real estate, have never been limited to gratuitous conveyances. Chapman v. Miller, 128 Mass. 269, 270.

Parker, J., announcing the opinion of the court in Orton v. Orton, *42 N. Y. (3 Keyes) 486, approves the definition of a legacy which is to be found in Bacon's Abridgment, namely, a gift or bequest by testament, and declares that the word "gift" is not limited in its meaning to a gratuity, but has the more extensive signification of a thing given either as a gratuity or a recompense. In re Thompson's Estate, 7 N. Y. St. Rep. 762, 763.

As a contract.

"The civil law considers a gift as a contract, but the common law does not place it on any such ground, though it would be difficult generally to perceive the reason of the distinction, for an executed gift certainly contains all the essential requisites of a contract." Hynson v. Terry, 1 Ark. (1 Pike) 83, 87.

Debt distinguished.

Dedication distinguished.

See "Dedication."

Delivery.

To constitute a valid gift, there must be a delivery of the property to the donee, or to some person for his use. A gift is a contract executed. The act of execution is the delivery of possession. Without delivery, it is only a contract to give, and not binding, for the want of consideration. Scott v. Lauman, 104 Pa. 593, 595; Osthaus v. McAndrew (Pa.) 8 Atl. 436, 438; Clapper v. Frederick, 49 Atl. 218, 220, 199 Pa. 609; Appeal of Mechling (Pa.) 2 Grant, Cas. 157, 167; Crouse v. Judson, 84 N. Y. Supp. 755, 757, 41 Misc. Rep. 338; Commonwealth v. Williams, 72 Mass. (6 Gray) 1, 9; Spooner's Adm'r v. Hildish's Ex'r, 23 S. E. 751, 753, 92 Va. 333; Appeal of Colburn, 51 Atl. 139, 140, 74 Conn. 463, 92 Am. St. Rep. 231.

A gift is a contract executed, and, as the act of execution is delivery or possession, it is of the essence of a title. It is the consummation of a contract, which without it would be no more than a mere contract to give, and without efficacy for the want of a consideration. In re Schiehl's Estate, 36 Atl. 181, 185, 179 Pa. 308 (citing In re Campbell's Estate, 7 Pa. [7 Barr] 100, 47 Am. Dec. 503).

To consummate a gift, there must be such a delivery to the donee as places the property under his dominion, with the intent and purpose on the part of the donor to transfer the title absolutely. Simpson v. Harris, 21 Nev. 353, 362, 31 Pac. 1009 (citing Ide v. Pierce, 134 Mass. 264).

In all gifts, a delivery of the thing given is essential to their validity, for, although every other step be taken that is essential to the validity of a gift, if there is no delivery the gift must fail. Intention cannot supply it. Words cannot supply it. Actions cannot supply it. It is an indispensable requisite, without which the gift fails, regardless of the consequences. Kulp v. March, 13 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 17, 23 (citing Thornton, Gifts, § 131, p. 105).

Delivery of possession of the thing given, or of the means of obtaining it, so as to make the disposal of it irrevocable, is indispensable to a valid gift. Spooner's Adm'r v. Hilbish's Ex'r, 23 S. E. 751, 753, 92 Va. 333.

Delivery is essential, both at law and in equity, to the validity of a parol gift of a chattel or chose in action; and it is the same, were it by a gift inter vivos or a gift causa mortis, for without legal delivery the title does not pass. Dickeschied v. Exchange Bank, 28 W. Va. 340, 359.

A gift is a voluntary transfer of a chattel, completed by the delivery of possession. By whatever name called, the elements necessary to a complete gift are not changed. There must be a purpose to give, expressed in words or signs, and executed by the actual delivery to the donee, or some one for his use. In every valid gift, a present title must vest in the donee, revocable only in gifts causa mortis. Appeal of Walsh, 15 Atl. 470, 471, 122 Pa. 177, 9 Am. St. Rep. 83, 1 L. R. A. 535; Flanagan v. Nash, 39 Atl. 818, 819, 185 Pa. 41.

A gift is accomplished in one of two ways—by actual or symbolic delivery of the subject of the gift, with intent to give, or by deed delivered conveying the subject of the gift upon a good, as distinguished from a valuable, consideration. A promise to make a gift is not a gift. Thompson v. Hudgins, 22 South. 632, 633, 636, 116 Ala. 93.

It is essential to constitute a valid gift that the delivery must be such as to vest the donee with the control and dominion over the property, and to absolutely divest the donee of his possession and control, and the delivery must be made with the intent to vest the title of the property in the donee. The only distinction between the two classes of gift is that a gift causa mortis is liable to revocation by the donee if he survives. Partridge v. Kearns, 53 N. Y. Supp. 154, 156, 32 App. Div. 483.

There must be a delivery by the donor such as will place the property or thing given under the control of the donee, and there must be an intent to vest the title in him. Actual and personal delivery by the donor is not always necessary, for, when another person is the custodian, an order of the donor to deliver to the donee will constitute a gift. McKenzie v. Harrison, 120 N. Y. 260, 265, 24 N. E. 458, 8 L. R. A. 257, 17 Am. St. Rep. 638.

It is essential to a valid gift by parol that there should be an actual or symbolical delivery, and that title does not pass unless possession, or the means of obtaining it, is conferred by the donor and accepted by the donee. The situation, relation, and circumstances of the parties and of the subject of the gift may be taken into consideration in determining the intent to give, and the fact as to the delivery. A total exclusion of the power or means of resuming possession by the donor is not necessary. Waite v. Grubbe, 73 Pac. 206, 207, 43 Or. 406.

It is well settled that, to establish a valid gift, a delivery of the subject of the gift must be shown to some person so as to divest the possession and title of the donor. Young v. Young, 80 N. Y. 422, 36 Am. Rep. 634; Beaver v. Beaver, 117 N. Y. 421, 22 N. E. 940, 6 L. R. A. 403, 15 Am. St. Rep. 531. But a transfer of a claim or chose in action by a written instrument under seal, duly executed, has the effect to divest the title of the donor in the assigned property, and has the same effect as actual delivery. The delivery of the assignment is deemed a delivery of the property conveyed. Matson v. Abbey, 24 N. Y. Supp. 284, 286, 70 Hun. 475.

If delivery must be proven in order to establish a valid gift of personality, the very use of the term "gift," or "I have given," may sometimes be intended to include the delivery; and where, therefore, such declarations had been used by the donor, and they are admitted by the court as competent, it ought to be left to the jury to say whether the gift has been proved, including the delivery, and ought not to be laid down as a rule of law that such declarations in themselves are insufficient to prove the gift. Sprouse v. Littlejohn, 22 S. C. 358 (approvingly cited in Lord v. New York Life Ins. Co., 66 S. W. 200, 293, 95 Tex. 216, 56 L. R. A. 596, 93 Am. St. Rep. 827).

Donation distinguished.

A donation usually means a gift, but it need not have all the elements of a gift. A gift must be without consideration, but a donation may be for a consideration. A gift must be entirely executed; a donation need not be. Spires v. Woodhill, 71 Mo. App. 373.

Fraudulent transfer.

A fraudulent delivery of goods is not necessarily a gift or transfer, within the meaning of bankruptcy acts. Hence, when goods are removed with intent to delay a creditor, but the party to whose custody they are given has no claim given to him over them, this is not an act of bankruptcy. Cotton v. James, 1 Moody & M. 273, 277.

Inducement for the sale of property.

Under an act (St. 1884, c. 277) entitled "An act to prevent the sale or exchange of property under the inducement that a gift or prize is to be a part of the transaction," and prohibiting a sale upon any representation that anything other than what is specifically stated to be the subject of the sale is to be delivered, it is held that the sale of packages of tobacco under a promise to give a photograph to each purchaser of a package is not within the prohibition of the statute, though the purchaser is allowed to select his photograph from among a number. Commonwealth v. Emerson, 42 N. E. 559, 165 Mass. 146.

Intent.

To constitute a valid gift, there must be an intent to give on the part of the donor. Crouse v. Judson, 84 N. Y. Supp. 755, 757, 41 Misc. Rep. 338; Knight v. Tripp, 54 Pac. 267, 268, 121 Cal. 675; Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 71 Pac. 83, 138 Cal. 169, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19; Osthaus v. McAndrew (Pa.) 8 Atl. 436, 438.

The delivery of a gift must be made with an intention to give. Spooner's Adm'r v. Hübsh's Ex'r, 23 S. E. 751, 753, 92 Va. 333.

A gift, whether in the form of a trust or otherwise, always involves the intention of the donor. Farleigh v. Cadman, 159 N. Y. 169, 53 N. E. 808; Green v. Sutherland, 82 N. Y. Supp. 878, 879, 40 Misc. Rep. 559.

To constitute a gift, there must be a purpose to give, expressed in words or signs. Appeal of Walsh, 15 Atl. 470, 471, 122 Pa. 177, 9 Am. St. Rep. 83, 1 L. R. A. 535; Flanagan v. Nash, 39 Atl. 818, 819, 185 Pa. 41.

Particular words.

To constitute a gift, no formula or set phrase is necessary, as "I give," or "I have given." It is sufficient if there was delivery, and any words importing an intention to give. Handing bonds to a person with the words, "These bonds are for you," or words of such import, constitute a gift. Vandor v. Roach, 15 Pac. 354, 355, 73 Cal. 614.

Realty.

Strictly speaking, a gift is not a devise, nor a devise a gift; and property which came by descent could not have come either by gift or devise. To give is to transfer the ownership of property from one person to another gratuitously—without an equivalent or consideration. A gift is the thing transferred. The word "gift" ordinarily applies to personal property only, but in its larger signification it applies to either realty or personalty. Rountree v. Pursell, 39 N. E. 747, 749, 11 Ind. App. 522.

A statute exempting from taxation gifts to a certain institution means donation of chattels. Appeal of Wagner Free Institute of Science, 11 Atl. 402, 404, 116 Pa. 555.

Voluntary trust distinguished.

The only important difference between a gift and a voluntary trust is that in the one case the whole title, legal as well as equitable—the thing itself—passes to the donee, while in the other the actual, beneficial, or equitable title passes to the cestui que trust, while the legal title is transferred to a third person, or is retained by the person creating it, to hold for the purposes of the trust. Norway Sav. Bank v. Merriam, 33 Atl. 840, 841, 88 Me. 146.

GIFT CAUSA MORTIS.

A gift causa mortis is defined to be a gift of personal property made by a party in expectation of death that is imminent, and upon an essential condition that the property shall belong fully to the donee in case the donor dies as anticipated, leaving the donee surviving him, and the gift is not in the meantime revoked, but not otherwise. Roberts v. Draper, 18 Ill. App. (18 Bradw.) 167, 171 (citing 2 Schouler, Per. Prop. § 135); Reed v. Barnum, 36 Ill. App. 525, 535; Dickschied v. Exchange Bank, 28 W. Va. 340, 359.

A gift causa mortis is a gift of personalty made by a party in contemplation of the approach of death, subject to the following implied conditions, which are attached by the law, and the occurring of any one of which will operate as a defeasance of the gift: First, if the danger of death pass without the donor dying; second, if the donor revoke the gift before death; third, if the donee die before the donor. Seabright v. Seabright, 28 W. Va. 412, 470, 474.

To constitute a donatio causa mortis, there must be three attributes: (1) The gift must be with a view to the donor's death; (2) it must be conditioned to take effect only on the death of the donor by his existing disorder; and (3) there must be a delivery of the subject of donation. Kiff v. Weaver, 94 N. C. 274, 276, 55 Am. Rep. 601.

A donatio mortis causa is when a person in his last sickness, apprehending his dissolution near, delivers or causes to be delivered to another the possession of any personal goods to keep in case of his decease. Glynn v. Seaman's Bank for Savings, 9 N. Y. St. Rep. 499.

To constitute a donatio mortis causa, there must not only be a clear intention to give, but an executed gift. There must be a subject capable of passing by delivery, and an actual delivery at the time of the gift. Egerton's Ex'rs v. Egerton, 17 N. J. Eq. (2 C. E. Green) 419, 421.

A "donatio causa mortis," literally translated, means a gift in prospect of death. The Tennessee Supreme Court, in the case of Sheegog v. Perkins (Tenn.) 4 Baxt. 273, 280, following Blackstone, defines it as "a gift made by a person in sickness, who, apprehending his dissolution near, delivers or causes to be delivered to another the possession of any personal goods to keep as his own in case of the donor's decease." Judge Redfield (3 Redf. Wills, 322) defines such a gift as a gift of personal estate made in prospect of death at no very remote period, and which is dependent upon the condition of death occurring substantially as expected by the donor, and that the same be not revoked after death. Royston v. McCulley (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 725, 733, 52 L. R. A. 899.

Gifts causa mortis are confined to personal property or choses in action; that is, something which can be delivered into the hands of the donee. White v. Wager (N. Y.) 32 Barb. 250, 260.

A gift causa mortis is a gift of personal property made in the immediate apprehension of death, subject to the condition that if the donor should not die, or if the donee should die first, the gift should be void. To this definition there probably should be added the further condition that there must be a delivery of the property to the donee, and that no further act would be required on the part of the donor to pass title to the donee. Calvin v. Free, 71 Pac. 823, 824, 66 Kan. 466.

A gift in view of death is one which is made in contemplation, fear, or peril of death, and with intent that it shall take effect only in case of the death of the giver. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1149.

A donation mortis causa (in prospect of death) is an act, to take effect when the donor shall no longer exist, by which he disposes of the whole or a part of his property, and which is revocable. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1469.

A donation causa mortis is not a legacy, which requires the assent of the executor to vest the legal title in the donee, but it is a gift made in contemplation of death, which upon delivery passes the legal title at once to the donee, upon condition to be void if the donor do not die. Egerton v. Carr, 91 N. C. 648, 651, 55 Am. Rep. 630 (citing Overton v. Sawyer, 52 N. C. 3, 75 Am. Dec. 444).

"It is well settled, at least in this country, that a promissory note, a bond, or any instrument in writing which creates a liability against a third person, which is held by the donor, and is his property, either legal or equitable, is the subject of a valid donatio causa mortis." Seabright v. Seabright, 28 W. Va. 412, 470, 474.

As a conditional gift.

Gifts causa mortis are always conditional and dependent on the contingency of the expected death, and are revocable during the lifetime of the donor. Bieber's Adm'r v. Boackmann, 70 Mo. App. 503, 507; In re Seltz's Estate, 44 N. Y. Supp. 836, 841, 17 App. Div. 1. A donatio causa mortis is that form of gift inter vivos which is expressly made conditional upon the death of the donor. It has been judicially declared to be a gift inter vivos, subject to conditions. 2 Kent, Com. (13th Ed.) 448; Marshall v. Berry, 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 43, 46; Appeal of Perry (Pa.) 8 Atl. 450, 453. A donation to take effect at the death of the donor is a donation mortis causa. By Civ. Code La. art. 1455, "donation causa mortis" is defined to be an act to take effect when the donor shall no longer exist. Johnson v. Waters, 4 Sup. Ct. 619, 622, 111 U. S. 640, 28 L. Ed. 547. A donatio causa mortis is a gift of a personal chattel made by a person in his last illness, subject to an implied condition that, if the donor recovers, the gift shall be void. It is void, also, if the donee dies before the donor. It was introduced from the Roman civil law. Wells v. Tucker (Pa.) 3 Bin. 366, 370. A donatio causa mortis is a gift made by one who is in expectation of death, and is conditional to take effect on the death of the donor, who in the meantime has the power of revocation, and may at any time resume possession and annul the gift. Bedell v. Carll, 32 N. Y. 581, 584. In a gift causa mortis, the donee takes a present title, liable to be divested on recovery of the donor; but, if the donor dies, then the effect of the gift is the same as in the case of a gift inter vivos. Appeal of Guinan, 39 Atl. 482, 484, 70 Conn. 342.

A gift causa mortis imports that the delivery is made in expectation of death. But so long as the donor lives, the gift is ambulatory, revocable. Only death completes the gift. Before death it is subject to the will of the donor. Bickford v. Mattocks, 50 Atl. 894, 895, 95 Me. 547.

A donatio causa mortis is a gift absolute in form made by the donor in anticipation of his speedy death, and intended to take effect and operate as a transfer of title only on the happening of the donor's death. The gift must be absolute, with the exception of the conditions inherent in its nature, and a delivery of the article donated is a necessary element; but it may be revoked by the donor, and is completely revoked by his recovery from the sickness or escape from the danger in view of which it was made.

Orook v. First Nat. Bank of Baraboo, 52 N. W. 1131, 1132, 83 Wis. 81, 35 Am. St. Rep. 17.

Gifts causa mortis are always made upon condition that they shall be revocable during the lifetime of the donor, and that they shall revert in case he shall survive the donee, or shall be delivered from the peril of death in which they were made. The condition need not be expressed, as it is always implied, when the gift is made in the extremity of sickness or in contemplation of death. It is sometimes, perhaps generally, said in English cases that a gift causa mortis does not vest before the donor's death, but in Nicholas v. Adams (Pa.) 2 Whart. 17, Gibson, O. J., considered this to be inaccurate; holding that this gift, like every other, is not executory, but executed in the first instance by delivery of the thing, though defeasible by reclamation, the contingency of survivorship, deliverance from peril, or from some other act inconsistent with the gift, and indicating the donor's purpose to resume the possession of the gift. Emery v. Clough, 4 Atl. 796, 799, 63 N. H. 556, 56 Am. Rep. 543.

Death by existing disorder.

In order to constitute a donatio causa mortis, it must have been made to take effect only in the event of the donor's death by his existing disorder. Williams v. Chamberlain, 46 N. E. 250, 252, 165 Ill. 210 (citing Telford v. Patton, 144 Ill. 611, 33 N. E. 1119); Allen v. Allen, 77 N. W. 567, 568, 75 Minn. 116, 74 Am. St. Rep. 442.

A donatio causa mortis is one made in contemplation of death from present illness or anticipated peril. The circumstances must be such as to show that the donor intended the gift to take effect if he should die shortly afterwards, but, if he should recover, that the property should be restored to him. Thompson v. Thompson, 12 Tex. 327, 330 (citing Nicholas v. Adams [Pa.] 2 Whart. 17).

Delivery.

It is necessary to the validity of a gift causa mortis that there must be an actual delivery of the subject of the gift to the donee—such as will transfer possession to him. Smith v. Ferguson, 90 Ind. 229, 233, 46 Am. Rep. 216; Kilby v. Godwin, 2 Del. Ch. 61, 69; Robson v. Robson's Adm'r, 3 Del. Ch. 51, 63; Chevallier v. Wilson, 1 Tex. 161, 169, 170; Telford v. Patton, 33 N. E. 1119, 1121, 144 Ill. 611; Williams v. Chamberlain, 46 N. E. 250, 252, 165 Ill. 210.

In order to constitute a valid gift causa mortis, there must be an actual delivery of the subject of the donation. It is not enough that the donee had a previous continuous possession of the gift. There must be a delivery to him at the time of the donation.

Allen v. Allen, 77 N. W. 567, 568, 75 Minn. 116, 74 Am. St. Rep. 442.

A gift causa mortis is one in which there must be an actual delivery to or for the donee, and at the time it is made, and the possession of the donor must be actually divested. The title passes, subject to the debts of the donor, if it be found necessary to resort to it for that purpose, and subject to revocation by his restoration to health. Lewis v. Jones (N. Y.) 50 Barb. 645, 651.

To constitute a gift causa mortis, it should be full and complete at the time, passing from the donor the legal power and dominion over the thing intended to be given, and leaving nothing to be done by him or his executor to perfect it. Bradley v. Hunt (Md.) 5 Gill & J. 54, 58, 23 Am. Dec. 597 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 514).

A donatio mortis causa must be completely executed, precisely as is required in a gift inter vivos, subject to be divested by the happening of any of the conditions subsequent; that is, upon the actual revocation by the donor, or by the donor's surviving the apprehended peril or outliving the donee, or by the occurrence of a deficiency of assets necessary to pay the debts of the deceased donor. Basket v. Hassell, 2 Sup. Ct. 415, 419, 107 U. S. 602, 27 L. Ed. 500.

Delivery is indispensable to the validity of a gift causa mortis. It must be an actual delivery of the thing itself, or of the means of getting possession and enjoyment of the thing, and there must be something amounting to a delivery at the time of the gift, for it is not the possession of the donee, but the delivery to him by the donor, that is material, and after-acquired possession or a previous and continuing possession of the donee, though by authority of the donor, is insufficient." Cutting v. Gilman, 41 N. H. 147, 152.

To constitute a donatio causa mortis, there must be a delivery of the property either to the donee, or to some person for his use or benefit, and the donor must part with all dominion over the property, and the title must vest in the donee, subject to the right of the donor at any time during his life to revoke the gift. Daniel v. Smith, 17 Pac. 683, 684, 75 Cal. 548; Flanagan v. Nash, 39 Atl. 818, 819, 185 Pa. 41.

To constitute a gift causa mortis, there must be a delivery of the property to the donee or some other person for his use. The donor must part with all dominion over it, so that no further act of his or of his personal representative is necessary to vest the title perfectly in the donee; to belong to him presently, as his own property, in case the owner should die of his present illness or from the impending peril during the lifetime of the donee, and without making any change in relation to the gift. Liebe v. Battman (Or.) 54 Pac. 662, 663 (citing Dickeschied v. Exchange Bank, 28 W. Va. 340).

A wife on her deathbed called for her nephew, and, being told he was not present, informed her husband that she gave the nephew all her property, and directed him to deliver to the nephew all her property, which he agreed to do. There was no manual delivery of the property, it being already in the husband's possession. The court said that this was a sufficient delivery of a gift causa mortis. Caylor v. Caylor's Estate, 52 N. E. 465, 467, 22 Ind. App. 666, 72 Am. St. Rep. 331; Loucks v. Johnson, 24 N. Y. Supp. 267, 268, 70 Hun, 565.

Delivery of an instrument in the form of a bill of sale intended as a gift causa mortis of articles present and capable of delivery is not a sufficient delivery. Knight v. Tripp, 54 Pac. 267, 268, 121 Cal. 674.

Expectation of death.

In order to constitute a valid gift causa mortis, the gift must be with a view to the donor's death. Allen v. Allen, 77 N. W. 567, 568, 75 Minn. 116, 74 Am. St. Rep. 442; Telford v. Patton, 144 Ill. 611, 33 N. E. 1119; Williams v. Chamberlain, 46 N. E. 250, 252, 165 Ill. 210; Reynolds v. Reynolds, 45 N. Y. Supp. 338, 341, 20 Misc. Rep. 254; In re Cornell's Estate, 73 N. Y. Supp. 32, 36, 66 App. Div. 162; Zellar v. Jordan, 38 Pac. 640, 641, 105 Cal. 143 (citing Daniel v. Smith, 64 Cal. 349, 30 Pac. 575); Daniel v. Smith, 17 Pac. 683, 684, 76 Cal. 567; Robson v. Robson's Adm'r, 3 Del. Ch. 51, 63; Flanders v. Blandy, 12 N. E. 321, 322, 45 Ohio St. 108; Jacobs v. Jolley, 62 N. E. 1028, 1029, 29 Ind. App. 25.

Where it appears that, after an alleged donatio causa mortis, a will was made and regularly proved, the making of such will was conclusive evidence that the will was not made during such a last sickness as the law requires to constitute a disposition of property causa mortis. Adams v. Nicholas (Pa.) 1 Miles, 90, 93.

When a gift is made in a donor's last illness a few days or weeks before his death, though nothing be said by the donor to indicate that he was contemplating that the illness might prove fatal, it will nevertheless be presumed a gift causa mortis. Seabright v. Seabright, 28 W. Va. 412, 470, 474.

Where one who had entered the military service during the late War, a short time before starting to the army, in which he died, said to a friend in regard to a gun which he had loaned to that friend, "Well, if I never return, you may keep the gun as a present from me," this did not constitute a donatio causa mortis. Smith v. Dorsey, 38 Ind. 451, 457, 10 Am. Rep. 118.

A delivery as a free and voluntary gift of money by a soldier at about the time of his enlistment in the army, with directions to keep the same as a gift in case of his death, does not constitute a gift causa mortis. Dexheimer v. Gautier (N. Y.) 34 How. Prac. 472, 477.

Intent.

A gift causa mortis can be upheld only where the intention of the donor is definite and certain, and such interest is expressed as to the proper matter of such gift, and such gift is executed. Gano v. Fisk, 43 Ohio St. 462, 470, 3 N. E. 532, 534, 54 Am. Rep. 819.

Gift inter vivos distinguished.

A donatio inter vivos is distinguished from a donatio causa mortis in this: that the former takes place when the giver is not in any immediate apprehension of death. By such donation, completed by delivery, the property vests immediately and irrevocably in the donee, and the donor has no more right or control over it than any other person. Gale v. Drake, 51 N. H. 78, 82.

A donatio inter vivos, as its name imports, is a gift between the living, while a gift causa mortis is one in view of death. But a gift inter vivos may be made by one upon his deathbed who is aware of the near approach of death from his then ailment. Thus, a gift of a note by a person who was able to be at his business and to drive about on the day on which the transfer of the note was made, constituted a gift inter vivos. Hatcher v. Buford, 29 S. W. 641, 642, 60 Ark. 169, 27 L. R. A. 507.

There is a difference between an absolute gift and one made mortis causa. In the former case the donee becomes in the lifetime of the donor the absolute owner of the thing given, but donatio mortis causa leaves the whole title in the donor unless the event occurs, to wit, the death of the donor, which is to divest him. Buecker v. Carr, 47 Atl. 34, 35, 60 N. J. Eq. 300; Lewis v. Jones (N. Y.) 50 Barb. 645, 651.

The test whether a gift is one inter vivos or one causa mortis is not the mere fact that the donor is in extremis, and expects to die and does die of that illness, but whether he intended the gift to take effect in present, irrevocably and unconditionally, whether he lives or dies. And so, where the donor of property intended that the gift thereof shall take effect immediately and irrevocably, the mere fact that the donor is in extremis, and expects to die of his illness, and does die in a short time, does not make it a gift causa mor-

Id. Wilson v. Jourdan, 29 South. 823, 824, 79 Miss. 133.

Legacy distinguished.

A gift causa mortis resembles a testamentary disposition of property, in this: that it is made in contemplation of death, and is revocable during the life of the donor. It is not, however, a testament, but in its essential characteristics is what its name indicates—a gift. Actual delivery by the donor in his lifetime is necessary to its validity, or, if the nature of the property is such that it is not susceptible of corporeal delivery, the means of obtaining possession of it must be delivered. The donee's possession must continue during the life of the donor, for recovery of possession by the latter is a revocation of the gift. But in case of a legacy the possession remains with the testator until his decease. The title to a gift causa mortis passes by the delivery, defeasible only in the lifetime of the donor, and his death perfects the title in the donee by terminating the donor's right or power of defeasance. The property passes from the donor to the donee directly, and not through the executor or administrator, and after his death it is liable to be divested only in favor of the donor's creditors. In this respect it stands the same as a gift inter vivos. It is defeasible in favor of creditors, not because it is testamentary, but because, as against creditors, one cannot give away his property. A gift causa mortis is not subject to probate, nor to contribution with legacies, in case the assets are insufficient, nor to any of the incidents of administration. It is not revocable by will, for, as a will does not operate until the decease of the testator, and the donor at his decease is divested of his property in the subject of the gift, no right or title in it passes to his representatives. The donee takes the gift, not from the administrator, but against him, and no act or assent on the part of the administrator is necessary to perfect the title of the donee. Emery v. Clough, 4 Atl. 796, 798, 63 N. H. 552, 56 Am. Rep. 543 (citing Marshall v. Berry, 95 Mass. [13 Allen] 43, 46; Cutting v. Gilman, 41 N. H. 147, 151; Doty v. Willson, 47 N. Y. 580, 585; Dole v. Lincoln, 31 Me. 422; Chase v. Redding, 79 Mass. [13 Gray] 418; Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 2 Sup. Ct. 415, 27 L. Ed. 500; 1 Wms. Ex'rs, 686, note 1.

GIFT ENTERPRISE.

As lottery, see "Lottery."

A "gift enterprise" is defined as a business, as the selling of books or works of art, the publication of a newspaper, etc., in which presents are given to purchasers as an inducement. Cent. Dict. The term does not necessarily imply a gift involving chance.

Long v. State, 22 Atl. 4, 5, 74 Md. 565, 12 L. R. A. 425, 28 Am. St. Rep. 268.

In common parlance a gift enterprise is understood to be substantially a scheme for the division or distribution of certain articles of property to be determined by chance, amongst those who have taken shares in the scheme, and the phrase has attained such a notoriety as to justify a court in taking judicial notice of its meaning. Lohman v. State, 81 Ind. 15, 18.

An enterprise by which a trading stamp company distributes among merchant subscribers so-called trading stamps for distribution to customers according to the amounts of their purchases, which stamps when collected in sufficient numbers entitle the holders to premiums supplied by the company, is a "gift enterprise." Lansburgh v. District of Columbia, 11 App. D. C. 512, 524.

GIFT INTER VIVOS.

A donation inter vivos between living persons is an act by which the donor divests himself, at present and irrevocably, of the thing given, in favor of the donee, who accepts it. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1468.

"A donation inter vivos is an act by which one gives to another, irrevocably and gratuitously, some property, of which he becomes immediate owner. Schmier, Civ. Law, 201. Donatio inter vivos, otherwise called a proper gift, is when one out of mere liberality bestows a thing upon another, there being no law to compel him to do it. Donatio inter vivos is either relata or simplex—that is, absoluta—and this latter may be said to be remuneratoria or modalis sub modo. Thus, what is given with reference to some service done is called relata, if out of pure liberality, without any reason being assigned, simplex or absoluta; but should the object be given by way of reward for service done, it is called remuneratoria; lastly, if anything be given to a person with the view that he first do something that shall benefit himself alone, it is termed donatio modalis or sub modo." 2 Colq. Rom. Civ. Law, 109; Fish v. Flores, 43 Tex. 340, 343.

Gift causa mortis distinguished.

See "Gift Causa Mortis."

Delivery.

A gift inter vivos must be completed by a delivery of the subject of the gift. Crook v. First Nat. Bank of Baraboo, 52 N. W. 1131, 1132, 83 Wis. 31, 35 Am. St. Rep. 17.

"To render a gift inter vivos complete, there must be an actual delivery of the chattel, so far as the subject is capable of such a delivery, and without such a delivery the title does not pass. If the subject is not capable of actual delivery, there must be some act equivalent to it." Flanders v. Blandy, 12 N. E. 321, 322, 45 Ohio St. 108.

A gift inter vivos is one in which there must be an actual delivery to or for the donee in the life of the donor, and at the time it is made, and the possession of the donor must be actually divested. The absolute title passes immediately to the donee, and is irrevocable. Lewis v. Jones (N. Y.) 50 Barb. 645, 651.

To make a gift inter vivos perfect, it must be delivered to the donee, and until it is delivered it may be revoked by the donor; and, under this rule, delivery of possession is essential to validity of the gift of personal chattels, whether it is made by parol or by an instrument of record. Royston v. McCulley (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 725, 730, 52 L. R. A. 899.

To make a gift inter vivos complete, there must be an actual delivery of the subject-matter of the gift, so far as the same is capable of delivery. A gift of bonds by a husband to his wife is not established by evidence that the bonds were deposited in a box in a safety deposit vault, to which the husband and wife each held a key, where they remained until the husband's death; that the wife entered with her husband at various times, and assisted him in cutting coupons from the bonds; and that the husband had declared in the presence of third persons his intention to give the bonds to his wife. Chambers v. McCreery (U. S.) 98 Fed. 783, 784.

To constitute a valid gift inter vivos of personal property or choses in action, it is essential that the gift be delivered in present and unconditionally. Smith v. Ferguson, 90 Ind. 229, 232, 46 Am. Rep. 216.

To constitute a valid gift inter vivos, it must be made with intent that it is to take effect immediately and irrevocably, and it must be fully executed by a complete and unconditional delivery. Mere intention cannot take the place of it, nor can words, nor can actions. A mere delivery to a third person as the agent of the donor is insufficient, until it is actually delivered. Bickford v. Mattocks, 50 Atl. 894, 895, 95 Me. 547.

To constitute a gift inter vivos, there must be an intention to give, and a delivery unto the donee, or to some one for him, of the property given. An intention of the donor to give is not alone sufficient. The intention must be executed by a complete and unconditional delivery. Nor will a delivery be sufficient without an intention to give. The transaction must show a completely executed transfer to the donee of the present right of property and the possession. The donee must become the owner of the property given. In re Souldard's Estate, 43 S. W. 617, 620, 141 Mo. 642.

To constitute a valid gift inter vivos, some unequivocal act on the part of the donor, by which he divests himself of the possession and control of the subject of the gift, and delivers it to the donee, or to a trustee of the donee, is necessary. Where G. conveyed a house and lot to defendant, and took back from her a bond and mortgage, which he redelivered to her, and again took back and retained, there was no such delivery as to constitute a valid gift of the bond and mortgage. Gannon v. McGuire, 47 N. Y. Supp. 870, 872, 22 App. Div. 43.

Gifts inter vivos are upheld if the notes or bonds or choses in action are delivered to the donee so as to vest him with an equitable title to the fund they represent, and to divest the donor of all present control and dominion over it absolutely and irrevocably; and a delivery which does not confer upon the donee the present right to reduce the fund into possession by enforcing the obligation according to its terms will not suffice. A delivery which confers on the donee power to control the fund only after the death of the donor, when by the instrument itself it is presently payable, is testamentary in character, and not good as a gift. Sterling v. Wilkinson, 3 S. E. 533, 536, 83 Va. 791.

Immediate effect.

A gift inter vivos, to be valid, must take effect at once, and there must be nothing to be done essential to the validity; and, if it is to take effect in the future, there is no gift, but only a promise to give. In other words, to constitute such a gift, there must be an immediate transfer of the title, and the donor must relinquish all present right to or control over the thing given. Wright v. Bragg (U. S.) 106 Fed. 25, 28, 45 C. C. A. 204; Williamson v. Johnson, 20 Atl. 279, 280, 62 Vt. 378, 9 L. R. A. 277, 22 Am. St. Rep. 117; Williams v. Tam, 63 Pac. 133, 131 Cal. 64; Zellar v. Jordan, 38 Pac. 640, 641, 105 Cal. 143; Matthews v. Hoagland, 21 Atl. 1054, 1066, 48 N. J. Eq. (3 Dick.) 455; Williams v. Chamberlain, 46 N. E. 250, 252, 165 Ill. 210.

A gift inter vivos is a gift in present—a consummated and complete act—and has no reference to past or future acts or events. In re Birdsall's Estate, 49 N. Y. Supp. 450, 463, 22 Misc. Rep. 180.

Gifts inter vivos have no reference to the future, and go into immediate and absolute effect. To constitute such a gift, the donor must be divested of, and the donee invested with, the right of property in the subject of the gift. It must be absolute; irrevocable; without any reference to its taking place at some future period. The donor must deliver the property, and part with all present and future dominion over it. Liebe v. Battman (Or.) 54 Pac. 662, 663 (citing Dickeschied v. Exchange Bank, 28 W. Va. 340).

As a solemn contract.

Donations inter vivos are solemn contracts, subjected to certain forms, without which they are in-existent. To form a particular importance is given, as it completes and gives life to the act. "Forma dat esse rel." The solemnity is established by the notarial act. The offer of the donor and the acceptance of the donee are valid after signing the act. A grandson owed a collation to the succession of his grandfather—the value of a slave. The only evidence in support of the title by donation was a receipt, under private signature, signed by his mother, who acknowledged the receipt of the slave from her father, who was the grandfather of plaintiff. The donation was null for matters of form. Cawthon v. Kimbell, 15 South. 101, 103, 46 La. Ann. 750.

GIFT OF PUBLIC MONEY.

A legislative appropriation made to an individual in payment of a claim for damages on account of personal injuries sustained by him while in its service, and for which the state is not responsible, either on general principles of law, or by reason of any statute, is a gift of public money, within Const. § 31, providing that the Legislature shall have no power to make any gift of public money. Such appropriation is a mere gratuitous assumption of an obligation from which the state was and is exempt, and is within the mischief which the framers of the Constitution intended to remedy by such statute. Bourn v. Hart, 28 Pac. 951, 93 Cal. 321, 15 L. R. A. 431, 27 Am. St. Rep. 203.

The Constitution declares that the Legislature shall not have power to make any gift of public money or thing of value to any individual or corporation whatever. Civ. Code, § 1143, defines a gift as a voluntary transfer of personal property without consideration. Held, that the gift which the Legislature is prohibited from making is not limited to a gift as defined by Civ. Code, § 1146, but the term includes all appropriations of public money for which there is no authority or enforceable claim, or which rest on some moral or equitable obligation, which, in the mind of a generous, or even a just, individual, dealing with his own moneys, might prompt him to recognize as worthy of some reward. The Legislature is to be regarded as holding the public moneys in trust for public purposes, and this limitation of the Constitution is directed against its disposal of these funds, except in accordance with such purposes. All those moral considerations or demands arising merely upon some equitable consideration or idea of justice, which in an individual acting in his own behalf would be upheld, are insufficient as a basis for making an appropriation of public moneys. An appropriation of money by the Legislature for the relief of one who has no legal claim therefor must be regarded as a gift, within the meaning of that term as used in the Constitution; and it is none the less a gift when a sufficient motive appears for its appropriation, if the motive does not rest upon a valid consideration. Conlin v. Board of Sup'rs of San Francisco, 33 Pac. 753, 99 Cal. 17, 21 L. R. A. 474, 37 Am. St. Rep. 17.

GILDING.

"Gilding" is a Danish word signifying a castrated animal, and from it Mr. Webster derives our word "gelding." The use of the word "gilding" instead of "gelding" in an indictment for the theft of such animal does not invalidate the indictment. Thomas v. State, 2 Tex. App. 293, 294.

GILL.

While a gill is less than a quart, an averment in an indictment under the law which makes it an offense to sell liquor to a minor in less quantities than a quart at one time that the defendant sold a gill of liquor to a minor is not good as an averment that he sold less than a quart. Arbintrode v. State, 67 Ind. 267, 270, 33 Am. Rep. 86.

GILL NET.

Gill net is defined by Webster as a flat net so suspended in the water that its meshes allow the heads of fish to pass, but catch in the gills when they seek to extricate themselves. The Century Dictionary defines "gill net" as a net which catches fish by the gills. State v. Lewis, 33 N. E. 1024, 1025, 134 Ind. 250, 20 L. R. A. 52.

GILLING TWINE.

The term "gilling twine," as used in the tariff act, means twine that is made and used for gilling,—such as salmon twine,—and does not mean linen thread, although one of the minor uses of the latter is for gilling. American Net & Twine Co. v. Worthington (U. S.) 33 Fed. 826, 829.

GIN.

A gin and its band, and the rollers thereof, are not fixtures, and therefore may be removed by the owner of land after the sale thereof. Gresham v. Taylor, 51 Ala. 505, 507.

As a spirituous liquor.

Rum, brandy, and "gin" are different species of spirituous liquors, and the words in and of themselves import them to be spirituous liquors. Thus an indictment, charging the sale of rum, brandy, and gin, is not defective in failing to charge that such liquors are spirituous. State v. Munger, 15 Vt. 290, 293.

The question whether or not a particular article is gin is not a subject requiring an expert, but is a matter of general knowledge. Commonwealth v. Timothy, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 480, 481.

As long as the laws for licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors have existed, brandy, whisky, gin, rum, and other alcoholic liquids have been held to be intoxicating liquors per se, simply because it is within the common knowledge and ordinary understanding that they are intoxicating liquors. Snider v. State, 7 S. E. 631, 632, 81 Ga. 753, 12 Am. St. Rep. 350. See, also, Commonwealth v. Peckham, 68 Mass. (2 Gray) 514, 515.

GINHOUSE.

A ginhouse is an edifice which, like a barn, is of a permanent and substantial kind, and is well known in communities where cotton is grown as a building to which seed cotton is carried from the field, and where the seeds are separated by the machine called a "gin" from the lint or wool, so that, in an indictment for burglary from a ginhouse, it was not necessary to allege that it was specially constructed for the purpose. Stone v. State, 63 Ala. 115, 119.

A ginhouse is a building where cotton is ginned, and is not in any sense a storehouse, so that an indictment charging defendant with breaking and entering a storehouse is not supported by proof that he entered a ginhouse. Givins v. State, 23 South. 850, 851, 40 Fla. 200.

GINGER ALE.

Ginger ale is a temperance drink prepared from sugar and water, flavored with ginger, and colored. City of Lincoln Center v. Linker, 53 Pac. 787, 788, 7 Kan. App. 282.

GINSENG CORDIAL.

Ginseng cordial is a mixture consisting of 30 parts of water, 8 parts of alcohol, 2 parts of simple syrup and ginseng and other roots and herbs possessing medicinal properties. It is not what is usually known as intoxicating liquor, such as whisky, brandy, gin, and the like, nor, on the other hand, is it what is generally and properly known as medicine, or as a toilet or culinary article, recognized as such in standard authority, such as tincture of gentian, paregoric, bay rum, cologne, essence of lemon, and the like, which, though containing alcohol and capable of producing intoxication, are not intoxicating liquors, bitters, or beverages, within prohibitory statutes; and it is not, therefore, to be declared, as a matter of law, either that ginseng cordial is or is not an intoxicating liquor, bitter, or beverage. Wadsworth v. Dunnam, 13 South. 597, 598, 98 Ala. 610.

GIRDLE.

As the word "girdle" is used in speaking of the girdling of trees, it means the cutting off of a ring of bark around the trunk of the tree. In ordinary speech, various degrees of abrasion are called girdling. State v. Towle, 62 N. H. 373, 374.

GIRL.

See "Bad Girl or Woman."

"Girl" is a generic term, and embraces children of all ages, both over and under ten years. Such is the signification of the word given by the best lexicographers. Walker defines the word "girl" as a young woman or child; Webster, a female child or young woman. State v. Bill (La.) 8 Rob. 527, 528.

GIST.

"In pleading, 'gist' means the essential ground or object of the action, in point of law, without which there would be no cause of action. The gist of an action is the cause for which an action will lie; the ground or foundation of the suit, without which it would not be maintainable; the essential ground or object of a suit, without which there is no cause of action." Frazier v. Georgia R. & Banking Co., 28 S. E. 684, 685, 101 Ga. 70; Kitson v. Farwell, 132 Ill. 327, 338, 23 N. E. 1024, 1025; First Nat. Bank of Flora v. Burkett, 101 Ill. 391-394, 40 Am. Rep. 209; In re Murphy, 109 Ill. 31, 33; Tarbell v. Tarbell, 15 Atl. 104, 106, 60 Vt. 486; Beckman v. Menge, 82 Ill. App. 228, 230; Jernberg v. Mix, 65 N. E. 242, 199 Ill. 254.

The gist is the main point of a question; the point on which the action rests; the pith of the matter; as the gist of a question. Thus, in an action for a penalty for failure to satisfy a chattel mortgage on the record, the gist of the action is the failure to satisfy the record after notice in writing. Hoffman v. Knight, 28 South. 593, 595, 127 Ala. 149.

GIVE.

In the supplementary articles to the Choctaw treaty of September 28, 1830 (7 Stat. 340), wherein no provision is made for patents, the terms "shall be entitled to," "there is allowed," "may locate," "shall be granted," "there is given," are used synonymously with respect to reservations. Meehan v. Jones (U. S.) 70 Fed. 453, 455.

As communicate.

In an action against a railroad company for personal injuries to a brakeman caused by the engineer's failure to obey the brakeman's signals, an instruction requiring the jury to find that the brakeman "gave the engineer the signals," as a predicate of the latter's failure to obey them, was not necessarily improper because permitting recovery regardless of whether the signals were seen or not; the court remarking that, by giving the signal to the engineer, the jury, as every one else, understood he communicated to the engineer the orders to move, and the words, as used, necessarily implied that the engineer saw the signals. Cambron v. Omaha & St. L. R. Co., 65 S. W. 745, 747, 165 Mo. 543.

As convey and pay.

In a compromise of all the differences between parties interested in the estate of a deceased person, the heirs agreed to give the widow $3,750 and a certain lot of ground. Held, that the word "give," so far as it related to the lot, must be taken and construed in the sense of "convey," and, so far as it related to the payment of money, in the sense of "pay." Carter v. Alexander, 71 Mo. 585.

Covenant of warranty imported.

"Give" is the only word which implies a warranty in the conveyance of fee-simple estates. Rickets v. Dickens, 5 N. C. 343, 347, 4 Am. Dec. 555.

"According to the writers of the ancient law, there is but one word which of itself implies a covenant whenever or wherever used in a conveyance of an estate, and that is the verb 'to give.'" Mack v. Patchin (N. Y.) 29 How. Prac. 20, 23.

The word "give," when used in a deed of bargain and sale, does not import a covenant of warranty. Allen v. Sayward, 5 Me. (5 Greenl.) 227, 230, 17 Am. Dec. 221; Powell v. Lyles, 5 N. C. 348, 350.

The use of the word "give" in a deed conveying an estate in freehold or in fee implies a warranty for the life of the grantor. This arose from the fact that the ancient creation of estates consisted in the donation of land to the tenant to be held by the donor, and reciprocal relations arose between them of homage and feudal services from the grantee, in return for which the donor was bound to assure the enjoyment of the estate which he undertook to confer. "These duties were held to arise, not from express obligation, but from the nature of the tenure. They were imposed upon the tenant by his acceptance of the estate, and might be exacted of the lord, who employed the term 'dedi,' or other term of donation by which estates were created. Hence Lord Coke says, where 'dedi' is accompanied with a perdurable tenure of the feoffor and his heirs, there 'dedi' importeth a perdurable warranty for the feoffor and his heirs to the feoffee and his heirs. 2 Inst. 275." The use of the word in a lease for years does not have such effect, which arises from the fact that such leases were not originally regarded as estates in land, but as contracts for the perception of profits, and the only right of the lessee to redress or indemnity depended upon his contract. Young v. Hargrave's Adm'r, 7 Ohio (7 Ham.) 63, 69, pt. 2.

The word "give," in a deed, imports a warranty in law during the lifetime of the grantor, and this legal warranty is not taken away by the fact that an express warranty is inserted in the deed. Hoxton's Lessee v. Gardiner (Md.) 1 Har. & McH. 437, 451.

The word "give," in a feoffment at common law, implied, in the absence of express covenants, a warranty during the life of the grantor. Co. Litt. 384a; 2 Inst. 275, 276. But there is no good reason for extending this rule to an instrument which is but the execution of a power given by statute, in which the grantor neither assumes to have, nor to convey, any estate, title, or interest of his own. And therefore a sheriff's deed under execution, which recited, "I have given, granted, bargained, and sold, and do by these presents give, grant, bargain, sell, and convey," etc., did not contain any warranty during the life of either the sheriff or the judgment debtor. Dow v. Lewis, 70 Mass. (4 Gray) 468, 473.

As deliver.

To give a reward by way of bribe is to pass or deliver the reward or bribe immediately to another. State v. Harker (Del.) 4 Har. 559, 561.

"Given," as used in a will providing for the repayment of money given to testator by his wife, may be construed in the sense of handed or delivered. Dresser v. Zabriskie (N. J.) 39 Atl. 1066, 1067.

"Given," as used in a statement by a person that in case of his death he wanted a certain box given to his attorney (naming him), means the delivery of the box after his death to the person named. But the delivery of the box is a mere corporeal act, which relates only to its custody; and the word "given" does not show any testamentary intent or purpose, express or implied. In re Jacoby's Estate, 42 Atl. 1026, 1030, 190 Pa. 382.

A contract whereby the promisor agreed to give shares of stock in a certain corporation means that he will transfer them a right to the shares, and a right to demand a certificate, and not the manual delivery of the shares, or even of the certificate. Field v. Pierce, 102 Mass. 253, 261.

The word "give," in a contract to give one-half of all fruits raised or produced in a certain orchard for certain years, means to yield possession of, or to deliver over as property in exchange. The term requires the delivery of the fruit at the place where grown at a proper season of the year for the gathering of such fruit. Smock v. Smock, 37 Mo. App. 56, 67.

Statements by a deceased person that she has "given" money to a certain person are not equivalent to a declaration that she made him a gift of it, since the term is often used as the equivalent of a mere delivery. White v. Warren, 49 Pac. 129, 131, 120 Cal. 322.

If delivery must be proven in order to establish a valid gift of personalty, the very use of the term "I have given" may sometimes be intended to include the delivery; and where, therefore, such declarations had been used by the donor, and they are admitted by the court as competent, it ought to be left to the jury to say whether the gift has been proved, including the delivery, and ought not to be laid down as a rule of law that such declarations in themselves are insufficient to prove the gift. Sprouse v. Littlejohn, 22 S. C. 358 (approvingly cited in Lord v. New York Life Ins. Co., 66 S. W. 290, 293, 95 Tex. 216, 56 L. R. A. 596, 93 Am. St. Rep. 827).

Rev. St. 1844, c. 154, § 3, providing that notice may be served on the attorney of a creditor by "giving him in hand" a copy thereof, means the same as delivering a copy, and imports that the copy is to be handed to the person in the presence of the officer; and therefore sending a copy by mail or by the hands of a third person is not a sufficient service, though the officer may be satisfied that it reached the person for whom it was intended. Williams v. Kimball, 135 Mass. 411, 412.

Under Code, § 232, providing that, at any time before the delivery of property to plaintiff in replevin, the defendant may require the return thereof, upon giving to the sheriff a written undertaking executed by two or more sufficient sureties, etc., the undertaking is not required to be executed by the defendant—the word "give" meaning deliver—so that an undertaking executed by two sureties and not by the defendant is sufficient. Polite v. Bero, 41 S. E. 305, 306, 63 S. C. 209.

As devise.

The use of the word "given" in Pater-son's Laws, pp. 53, 54, § 2, providing that no entailment of any lands or other real estate shall continue to entail the same in any case whatever longer than the life of the person to whom the same hath been "given" or shall be first given or devised by such entailment, makes the statute embrace estates tail created by deed, as well as by will, and is not synonymous with "devise." The word "given," in its appropriate legal sense, is applicable to deeds as well as to wills. James v. Dubous, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 285, 292.

Execution and acceptance implied.

The record of a court contained the following entry: "N. O., sheriff, who had been notified to come into court by S. E., to give other security, came into court and gave his bond as sheriff, to collect all public taxes," etc. Held, that the word "gave" implies that the bond is executed and acknowledged, and that it is approved and accepted by the court. Governor v. Organ's Sureties, 24 Tenn. (5 Humph.) 161, 163.

As expressive of gift.

"Gave," as used in a question asked by a decedent of another as to where the notes were which the decedent gave her, was entirely appropriate to express the fact of the gift. Kulp v. March, 37 Atl. 913, 181 Pa. 627, 59 Am. St. Rep. 687.

The use of the word "give" in a deed indicates that the land was to be conveyed to the grantee as a gift, simply, but does not necessarily imply that there was not any valuable consideration at all. Baker v. Pyatt, 9 N. E. 112, 114, 108 Ind. 61.

The word "give," used by a stepfather in saying that he had given certain real and personal property to his stepson, who had lived with and assisted the former for a long time, was construed, in view of the facts, not to have been employed as indicating the disposition of a gratuity, but for the consideration of services rendered by a dutiful son. Mills v. McCaustland, 74 N. W. 930, 932, 105 Iowa, 187.

The term "give," in a writing that "I give to J. $100, to be paid as soon as my financial condition will allow, and, if I do not live to pay it, I wish it to be paid out of my estate," does not show, as a matter of law, that the instrument is a promise to make a gift, but the instrument is so ambiguous as to depend for its construction on extrinsic facts. If the words "I do give" are not qualified by other words, then plainly enough the instrument is a promise to pay a gift, and not a contract to pay money. The word "give" does not always signify a mere gratuitous act. At all events, it is not one of those words which have a fixed and unalterable meaning. In business affairs we frequently find embodied in propositions from one contracting party to another such expressions as, "I will give you such a price for" such an article, or, "I will give so much rent for" such a parcel of land. In these cases, and very many like them, no one would take the meaning of "give" to be that the person making the proposal meant to do what he proposed out of mere generosity. But while the word does not invariably indicate an intention to make a gift, the usual meaning unquestionably is to grant the thing specified as an act of generosity. Johnston v. Griest, 85 Ind. 503, 504.

In its ordinary and familiar signification, the word "give" means to transfer gratuitously, without any equivalent. Thus a promise to give a boy a sum of money if he would abstain from liquor, tobacco, etc., until he was 21, was a promise to give, and not a contract, and therefore not enforceable. Hamer v. Sidway, 11 N. Y. Supp. 182-184, 57 Hun, 229.

As furnish or supply.

"Give," as used in Gen. St. c. 29, art. 35, § 9, making it an offense for any one to give spirituous liquor to a person under 21, means to furnish or supply, but is not used in its primary and strict sense, signifying to confer or transfer without price or reward. Commonwealth v. Davis, 75 Ky. (12 Bush) 240, 241.

The word "give," in the constitutional provision, declaring that the General Assembly has no power to give or lend the credit of the state in aid, etc., is not limited in meaning to express a mere gratuity, but means to pass from one to the other, and the idea of its being done for or without consideration is not involved. Subscribing for corporation stock is a gift of the credit of the state, within the meaning of the section. Galloway v. Jenkins, 63 N. C. 147, 155.

Grant distinguished.

The word "grant" is carefully to be distinguished from the word "give," for it is well settled that "concessi," in a feoffment or estate of inheritance, implies no warranty. This distinction between the force and effect of the words "give" and "grant" arose from artificial reasons derived from the feudal law. The distinction has now become merely technical, but it is sufficient that it clearly exists, and we are certainly not at liberty to confound the word or change their established operation. Frost v. Raymond (N. Y.) 2 Caines, 188, 194, 195, 2 Am. Dec. 228.

Immediate gift imported.

The operative word "give," as used in a written instrument, is appropriate to either a deed or will, but, standing alone, would seem to indicate a direct and immediate gift, rather than a testamentary bequest. Ferguson v. Ferguson, 27 Tex. 339, 344.

Leave synonymous.

The words "leave" and "give," especially when used in a will without qualifying or restraining words, are interchangeable terms, and mean one and the same thing. Carr v. Effinger, 78 Va. 197, 203.

Quantity not designated.

Where the word "give" is used in a deed, it is not employed to express or to designate in any degree the quantity of estate intended to be conveyed, but is for the mere purpose of passing from the seller to the purchaser the estate therein described by other words introduced specially for that end. Krider v. Lafferty (Pa.) 1 Whart. 303, 314, 315, 316.

Sell distinguished.

"Give," as used in Rev. St. 1874, c. 43, providing that whoever shall sell or give intoxicating liquor to any minor without the written order of his parent, guardian, or family physician, shall for each offense be fined, etc., should be construed as stating an offense distinct from that of selling liquor to a minor, and hence a count in an indictment for the one will not be sustained by proof of the other. The words are used in the statute in their natural meaning, and cannot be considered as synonymous with the word "let," so that a conviction may be had on a count in an indictment of selling liquor to a minor where the proof showed that the liquor was sold to an adult, who gave the liquor to the minor. Siegel v. People, 106 Ill. 89. See, also, Parkinson v. State, 14 Md. 184, 190, 74 Am. Dec. 522.

Transfer of title imported.

The word "give" is often used with other meaning than as evincing an intent to confer title in a thing delivered—as, for instance, where an article is given to a person for the purpose of delivering it to some other person, or for the purpose of performing some work thereon, so that evidence that a person said he would give stock to another is not sufficient to show an intention to transfer title. Smith v. Burnet, 35 N. J. Eq. (8 Stew.) 314, 324.

The use of the word "give" by a father in making random statements that he gave his son certain money does not show a gift to the son if the latter has given his note for such money, but the transaction will be considered to be a loan. Roland v. Schrack, 29 Pa. (5 Casey) 125, 127.

The word "give," in a contract by which defendant agreed to take the wheat of plaintiffs, and to give back a barrel of flour for a certain number of bushels, requires some act of defendant which should pass the property of the flour to the plaintiffs. As a word of contract, it demands something more than the redelivery of the plaintiff's wheat in the form of flour. It implies that the property in the thing to be given is in the donor until changed by delivery. The word does not import a mere gratuity, since the defendant was to give superfine flour for—that is, in consideration of or as equivalent for—the wheat taken by him from the plaintiffs. Such a contract imports a sale, not merely a bailment. Norton v. Woodruff, 2 N. Y. (2 Comst.) 153, 158.

One of two sisters who jointly owned a mortgage, being in an advanced stage of consumption, handed all her valuable papers, including the mortgage, to the other sister. Nine years afterward, when the estates of both sisters were being administered, a daughter of the alleged donee testified that the donor said to the donee on handing over the papers: "I give them to you because they are yours. Everything I have got is yours." It appeared that the donor lived nearly a year thereafter, and that no notice was given to the mortgagor, who subsequently paid a part of the principal and a year's interest to both the sisters. It was held that the evidence was not sufficiently convincing to show a gift of the mortgage, the court saying that the word "give" is often used with other meaning than as evincing an intention to confer the title in the thing delivered. You give a person an article to carry for you, or to perform work upon. Thompson v. West, 40 Atl. 197, 199, 56 N. J. Eq. 660.

In construing a clause in a will providing that "I hereby lend to my granddaughter certain slaves during her natural life, and at her decease I give the slaves to" a certain designated beneficiary, it was said that the testator used the word "lend" to express the interest that his granddaughter should take in the property, and the word "give" to carry the property from her to the other beneficiaries. Pournell v. Harris, 29 Ga. 736, 742.

The use of the word "give" in a will in which testator states that "I give," etc., is a word of the largest signification, and is as applicable to real as personal estate. Hooper v. Hooper, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 122, 129.

In an instrument reciting that, "In consideration that L. shall care for me until my death, I give him all my goods and chattels and real estate," the word "give" is sufficient to convey the real estate. Evenson v. Webster, 53 N. W. 747, 749, 3 S. D. 382, 44 Am. St. Rep. 802.

GIVE AND BEQUEATH.

The words "give and bequeath," in a will, are equivalent to the word "devise."

In re Barrett's Will, 82 N. W. 998, 111 Iowa, 570.

Absolute gift imported.

The words "give and bequeath," in a will, import an absolute gift, to take effect upon the decease of the testator. Smith v. Jackman, 73 N. W. 228, 229, 115 Mich. 192; Eldridge v. Eldridge, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 516, 519; In re Jones' Will, 21 Atl. 950, 951, 46 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 554.

Gift of personalty imported.

The words "give and bequeath" are more properly used in a will to designate a mere gift of personal property, while the word "devise" should be added to the other words if real estate is also included in the gift. Scholle v. Scholle, 21 N. E. 84, 85, 113 N. Y. 261.

The words "give and bequeath," in a will, are strictly more applicable to personal than real estate. Delafield v. Barlow, 14 N. E. 498, 500, 107 N. Y. 535.

Estate in fee passed.

A residuary bequest in a will stating that testator gives and bequeaths all the rest and residue of his property, after paying just debts, to his wife, passes an estate in fee, although no words of inheritance are used. Lincoln v. Lincoln, 107 Mass. 590, 591.

GIVE, BEQUEATH, AND CONVEY.

The phrase "give, bequeath, and convey," as used in an instrument reciting that on consideration of past services, etc., the person executing the instrument does hereby "give, bequeath, and convey" certain real estate, is sufficient to constitute the instrument a conveyance, and not a will. Campbell v. Morgan, 22 N. Y. Supp. 1001, 1003, 68 Hun, 490.

GIVE COLOR.

The rule of common-law pleading that a plea of confession and avoidance must give color to the averments of the complaint or petition, or it will be fatally defective, simply means the absence of any denials of the facts alleged in the declaration, and the express or silent admission that the declaration, as far as it goes, is true. Mauldin v. Ball, 1 Pac. 409, 411, 5 Mont. 96; Merten v. San Angelo Nat. Bank, 49 Pac. 913, 914, 5 Okl. 585.

GIVE AN EDUCATION.

Where a testator's will directed that the executors give his son an education, the phrase "give an education" did not mean merely that the executors should furnish money necessary for such education, but they were to see that the thing was done. In re Van Houten, 3 N. J. Eq. (2 H. W. Green) 220, 227, 29 Am. Dec. 707.

GIVE, GRANT, AND CONVEY.

The words "give, grant, and convey" are as comprehensive as any that can be used to convey legal title, and are as efficient in law to transfer the title. Young v. Ringo, 17 Ky. (1 T. B. Mon.) 30, 31.

"The words 'give, grant, sell, and convey,' in a deed, do not of themselves imply a warranty. Nor do they expressly and specifically convey the whole title, but are rather words of general description, susceptible of explanation or modification by other appropriate language. They are just as applicable to a conveyance of a right of redemption as to the grant of a fee." Thus their use in a deed, followed by a statement that the grantor intends to convey the same premises and title as conveyed to him by another, only operates to pass such title, though it is only a right of redemption. Bates v. Foster, 59 Me. 157, 160, 8 Am. Rep. 406.

GIVE IN HIS VOTE.

"Give in his vote," as used in an indictment charging that the defendant did willfully and unlawfully give in his vote, is equivalent to "vote," as used in Nix. Dig. 223, § 50, providing that any person who shall vote, or fraudulently offer to vote, at any election, who shall not have certain qualifications, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. "Voting" and "giving a vote" are precisely synonymous terms. Giving the vote is voting, not offering the vote. State v. Moore, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 105, 106, 107.

GIVE INFORMATION.

A statute providing for the payment of the reward to the persons who shall make discovery and give information against any other person guilty of a crime or misdemeanor, so that he may be tendered to justice and convicted, does not mean that every one who merely gives information is entitled to a reward, but it includes the discovering and causing to be adduced some additional and corroborative testimony to the statement of a person charged with crime, implicating another, who was prosecuted and convicted by means of such additional and corroborative testimony. In re Kelly, 39 Conn. 159, 162.

Acts 1869, c. 64, § 7, providing that, whenever any person shall sustain any damage from sheep being worried by dogs, he shall within a certain time after he has knowledge thereof give information to the selectmen, cannot be construed to require the injured party to give notice in person, but he may do so by letter, or through the agency of another. Where the selectmen received information of such damage from some person other than the party injured, and act on such information, it is sufficient. Jones v. Sherwood, 37 Conn. 466, 467.

"Giving information," as used in Act Cong. July 12, 1876, c. 186, 19 Stat. 90 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2658], which prohibits the mailing of letters "giving information" as to where or how or of whom certain articles mentioned in the section may be obtained or made, is so construed that the letters, pamphlets, etc., so mailed, must be actually read by some person. The mailing to a fictitious person would not be giving information, within the meaning of this statute. United States v. Whittier (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 591, 594.

GIVE NOTICE.

The statement in a notary certificate of protest of a note that "I then protested the same for nonpayment, and gave written notice of the same to the indorser," is not subject to the objection that it does not show the mode or manner in which the notice was given. To say, "I gave written notice to the indorser," was, in effect, saying, "I placed a written notice in the indorser's hands." O'Neil v. Dickson, 11 Ind. 253, 254.

The word "given," in Bankr. Act 1867, § 12, making it proper for the register to adjourn a meeting of creditors to an hour, to be then and there fixed by him, and direct that a new notice should be given by the marshal, means notice published, as well as served. In re Devlin (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 563, 564.

GIVEN.

"Given," as used by discriminating law writers in speaking of a judgment being given, is only used to designate judgments which are not obtained by confession. Schuster v. Rader, 22 Pac. 505, 506, 13 Colo. 329.

"Given," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 456, providing that, in pleading a judgment, it is not necessary to state the facts conferring jurisdiction, but such judgment may be stated to have been "duly given or made," are not equivalent to the words "duly rendered," and a pleading using the latter is defective. City of Los Angeles v. Mellus, 59 Cal. 444, 451.

"Given," as used in Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 60b, 30 Stat. 562 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3445], prescribing that preferences given within four months of the filing of the bankrupt's petition are voidable by the trustee, cannot be construed to mean recorded, so that a mortgage given more than a year before the filing of the petition, but not recorded until within four months of such filing, is not voidable by the trustee. Asbury Park Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Shepherd (N. J.) 50 Atl. 65, 67.

Testator provided that his land should be sold by his executors, and the proceeds invested in negroes, and, after the death of his wife, her third interest should be lent by the executors to his daughters during their lives, and then given to their heirs. The will further proceeded, "I lend unto my three daughters * * * during their natural lives, and then given to the lawfully begotten heirs of their body," the remaining two-thirds of his estate. Held, that the use of the word "given," rather than "give," showed an intention of the testator that the title to two-thirds of the estate should remain in his executors during the life of his daughters, and should be by them given to the heirs of the daughters. The expression was equivalent to "then to be given." Loving v. Hunter, 16 Tenn. (8 Yerg.) 4, 31.

GIVEN BAIL.

When a defendant is said to be "on bail" or to have "given bail," it is intended to apply as well to recognizance as to bail bonds. Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 307.

GIVING AWAY.

"Giving away," as used in Laws 1873, c. 646, providing that any wife injured in her means of support in consequence of the intoxication of any person shall have a right of action against the person selling or giving away the liquors which caused the intoxication, does not include the taking of liquor by a bartender while engaged in his employment, though his employer knew that he was drinking, and said nothing against it. Campbell v. Schlesinger, 1 N. Y. Supp. 220, 221, 48 Hun. 428.

Comp. St. c. 50, § 11, making it criminal to give away intoxicating liquors upon any pretext without obtaining a license, etc., means give away upon some pretext for the purpose of evading the law. The statute does not prohibit the mere act of giving away intoxicating liquors, as such act is not criminal. State v. Ball, 43 N. W. 398, 399, 27 Neb. 601.

Code 1876, § 4205, declaring that any person, whether with or without a license, who shall "sell or give" away spirituous liquors, in any quantity whatever, to minors or persons of known intemperate habits, except upon the requisition of a physician for medicinal purposes, is guilty of a misdemeanor, etc., should be construed to include one who procures the act denounced by it to be done, although he may not actually commit the offense. It is enough that he be present, procuring or counseling, aiding or abetting, the person who actually delivers the liquor to one of the prohibited class. Walton v. State, 62 Ala. 197, 200.

The words "give away," as used in the chapter relating to traffic in intoxicating liquors, shall not apply to the giving away of intoxicating liquors, by a person in his private dwelling, unless given to a minor other than a member of his own private family, or to an habitual drunkard, or unless such private dwelling becomes a place of public resort. V. S. 4462.

As used in the chapter relating to intoxicating liquors and cigarettes, the words "giving away" do not apply to the giving away of intoxicating liquors by a person in his private dwelling, unless such private dwelling is a place of public resort. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4364-20c.

GIVING CREDIT.

In a contract of guaranty, whereby, in consideration of R. & Co. giving credit to D., the guarantor agreed to be responsible for any sum not exceeding £120 due to the said R. & Co. by said D., the words "giving credit" were equally applicable to future as well as past credit, and the agreement was a binding guaranty. Edwards v. Jevons, 8 C. B. 436, 444.

GIVING IN PAYMENT.

The "giving in payment" is an act by which a debtor gives a thing to the creditor, who is willing to receive it in payment of a sum which is due. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2655.

GIVING NOTICE.

The word "giving," in a poor debtor's bond given under Gen. St. c. 124, § 10, providing that the debtor will deliver himself up for examination before some magistrate authorized to act, giving notice of the time and place thereof, being a present participle, rather implies that the notice is to be given, or at least may be given, at the time the party delivers himself up for examination. The debtor is not required to give a prior notice of his intention to submit himself to an examination. City Nat. Bank v. Williams, 122 Mass. 534, 535.

GIVING OUT.

In Rev. St. c. 23, § 6, relating to mines and mining machinery, which requires that every drum shall be provided with a sufficient brake to prevent accident in case of the giving out or breaking of the machinery, "giving out" means any giving way of the machinery, whether from breaking or imperfection of some of its parts, or a failure of the motive power, or from any other cause. Beard v. Skeldon, 113 Ill. 584, 588.

The phrase "giving out of the machinery," in a statute requiring the coal mine operators to provide a sufficient brake on every drum to prevent accidents in case of the giving out or breaking of the machinery, includes any giving away of the machinery, whether from the breaking or imperfection of some of its parts, a failure of the motive, or, rather, of the static, power to hold in equilibrium, or from any other cause, and therefore includes a case where the cage of a mine goes down the shaft in consequence of some failure or diminution in the pressure of the steam on the face of the piston. Beard v. Skeldon, 13 Ill. App. (13 Bradw.) 54, 58.

GIVING TIME.

The words "giving time" were defined by the court in Howell v. Jones, 1 Crompt. M. & R. 107, in the following terms: "We think it means extending the period at which, by the contract between them, the principal debtor was originally liable to pay the creditor, and extending it by a new and valid contract between the creditor and the principal debtor, to which the surety does not assent." Shipman v. Kelley, 41 N. Y. Supp. 328, 339, 9 App. Div. 316.

In Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, requiring a claimant for a mechanic's lien to state in his claim of lien "the terms, time given, and conditions of his contract," "time given" means, not the date or time when the contract was made, but the time of payment for the work and labor performed, and of materials furnished, as agreed and expressed in the contract. California Powder Works v. Blue Tent Gold Mines (Cal.) 22 Pac. 391, 392 (citing Hills v. Ohlig, 63 Cal. 104).

GIVING WAY.

The term "giving way," within the meaning of maritime regulations requiring steam vessels to give way to sailing vessels, does not mean the putting the helm to port under all circumstances, but porting or starboarding the helm as the exigencies may require. Lockwood v. Lashell, 19 Pa. (7 Harris) 344, 350.

GLANDERS.

Glanders is a disease of the mucous membrane of the nostrils of a horse, with a vitiated secretion, and is contagious. Wirth v. State, 22 N. W. 860, 862, 63 Wis. 51.

GLARING.

The word "glaring" in its ordinary meaning is a stronger word than "apparent," but it is sometimes used synonymously with the words "open" and "manifest." So that an instruction that a servant having no notice of a danger does not assume the same unless so glaring and apparent as to be open to the observation of ordinarily prudent men, was not necessarily understood by the jury to mean glaringly apparent, so as to be erroneous. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Lee, 64 N. E. 675, 679, 29 Ind. App. 480.

GLASS.

Time out of mind glass has been made by melting mixtures of sand and alkali in crucibles. For many years the crucibles have consisted of large tanks, and the contents been subjected to continuous heat on the surface. As the ingredients melt, they gradually form a mixture of glass, more or less perfect, sand, etc. Benjamin v. Chambers & McKee Glass Co. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 151, 155, 8 C. C. A. 61.

"Glass," as used in Carriers' Act, 11 Geo. IV and 1 Wm. IV, c. 68, § 1, enacting that no common carrier shall be liable for loss of any trinkets, gold-plated articles, glass, silks, etc., when the value exceeds £10, unless at the time of the delivery to the carrier the value was declared, would include such articles as smelling bottles and glass flagons, though some ornaments were superadded. Bernstein v. Baxendale, 6 C. B. (N. S.) 251 260.

GLASS BEADS.

"Glass beads, loose, unthreaded, or unstrung," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 445, do not include glass beads threaded on strings. In re Steiner (U. S.) 66 Fed. 726, 727.

GLASS BROKEN.

A window glass, broken in transit, so that part of it is useless, except for remanufacture, is not admissible under Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 590, of the free list, as glass, broken, but the whole is dutiable as window glass. United States v. Bache (U. S.) 59 Fed. 762, 764, 8 C. C. A. 258.

GLASS—WITH CARE—THIS SIDE UP.

"Glass—With care—This side up," as used on a box, is sufficient notice to a carrier that the article is valuable, and liable to injury from rough handling and other causes, and that there is danger in carrying it in any other position than the one indicated by the inscription. Hastings v. Pepper, 28 Mass. (11 Pick.) 41, 43.

GLASSWORKS.

The term "glassworks," as used in all laws relative to the employment of labor, shall mean any premises in which the manufacture of glass is carried on. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 916, c. 106, § 8.

GLAZED BRICK.

Magnesic brick, glazed, and not known in commerce as fire brick, is subject to duty as glazed brick, under Tariff Act Aug. 28, 1894, c. 349, § 1, Schedule B, par. 76, 28 Stat. 512. Fleming v. United States (U. S.) 124 Fed. 1014.

GLOVE CONTEST.

A glove contest, as distinguished from a prize fight, is a mere exhibition of skill in sparring with gloves, not calculated to do great bodily injury, instead of a contest continued until one of the contestants succumbs from exhaustion or injuries received. State v. Olympic Club, 15 South. 190, 194, 46 La. Ann. 935, 24 L. R. A. 452.

GO.

A prison limits bond, providing that the bond shall be forfeited if the prisoner shall go beyond the prison limits, should be construed to mean "shall voluntarily go." Randolph v. Simon, 29 Kan. 406, 409.

As be considered.

A stipulation stating that a policy of insurance and letters of administration should go in evidence is tantamount to saying that they should be considered in evidence, and not that they might be read in evidence. The Protection Life Ins. Co. v. Palmer, 81 Ill. 88, 91.

As belong.

"Go," as used in a legislative provision that certain fines and forfeitures shall go to the county in which the indictment was found, is the equivalent of "belong." Jackson County v. Derrick, 23 South. 193, 197, 117 Ala. 348.

As vest.

The expression "shall go," as used in St. 1850, providing that on dissolution of the community one-half of the common property shall go to the survivor, etc., means "shall vest." Plass v. Plass, 53 Pac. 448, 449, 121 Cal. 131 (citing Broad v. Broad, 40 Cal. 490, 496).

GOING BEFORE THE WIND.

There is in nautical technicality a difference between a vessel "going before the wind" and "going off large." Going before the wind is when the wind is free, comes from the stern, and the ship's yards are braced square across; going off large is when the wind blows from some point abaft the beam, or from the quarter of the ship. Hall v. The Buffalo (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 214, 216.

GO BEYOND.

"To go beyond the contract in search of its meaning" means to ascertain the subject-matter to which it refers by means of extrinsic evidence, which, in connection with the instrument, establishes the right. The extrinsic evidence is essential to the completion of the meaning of the instrument, and the latter can be admitted in proof only on condition that the former is introduced. Gregory v. North Pac. Lumbering Co., 17 Pac. 143, 147, 15 Or. 447.

GO HENCE.

"Go hence," as used in a judgment that the defendant go hence without day, and recover his costs, etc., is synonymous with and has the same force as "go home" in respect to constituting the judgment a final judgment for the purposes of review in the Supreme Court. Hiatt v. Kinkaid, 58 N. W. 700, 702, 40 Neb. 178.

GO HOME.

"Go home," as used in a judgment directing that the defendant go home without day, and recover his costs, has the same force as the term "go hence," in respect to constituting the judgment a final judgment for the purposes of review in the Supreme Court. Hiatt v. Kinkaid, 58 N. W. 700, 702, 40 Neb. 178.

GO SHORT.

The expression "go short" in a will providing that, if the executrix would have to collect all rents and pay all debts, to divide the balance, if any, and, "if you go short, take out of each one share," evidently meant in the mind of the testatrix to be unable, from the net income available for the purpose, to pay the full amount of the legacies, since the remedy she provides in that case is a corresponding deduction from the share of each. Angus v. Noble, 46 Atl. 278, 280, 73 Conn. 56.

GO TO BED WITH.

"To go to bed with is to be in bed with. In all times, in every age, and by all writers, sacred and profane, in the language of scripture and in the language of the law, these words, except between man and wife, impute illicit intercourse, and with them it imputes the rite of hallowed love." Walton v. Singleton (U. S.) 7 Serg. & R. 449, 451, 10 Am. Dec. 472.

GOING.

A contract employing a shepherd, which provides that the latter would have the "going" of 105 sheep with his master's flock, meant that the sheep should be pasture fed. The King v. Inhabitants of Nacton, 8 Barn. & Adol. 543.

GOING BUSINESS OR CONCERN.

"Going business or establishment" is a term applied to a corporation which "is still prosecuting its business with the prospect and expectation of continuing to do so, even though its assets are insufficient to pay its debts." Corey v. Wadsworth, 11 South. 350, 353, 99 Ala. 68, 23 L. R. A. 618, 42 Am. St. Rep. 29.

A going concern is some enterprise which is being carried on as a whole, and with some particular object in view. Oliver v. Lansing, 80 N. W. 829, 831, 59 Neb. 219.

The term "going concern," when applied to a corporation, means that it continues to transact its ordinary business. The mere fact that a corporation is insolvent does not dissolve the corporation and make the directors mere trustees of its assets if it is still a going concern. White, Potter & Paige Mfg. Co. v. Pettis Importing Co. (U. S.) 30 Fed. 864, 865.

GOING FREE.

According to the Seaman's Manual, a vessel is going free when she has a fair wind, and her yards braced in. The Queen Elizabeth (U. S.) 100 Fed. 874, 876.

GOING OFF LARGE.

"Going off large," as used in Act 1849, § 5, providing that during the night vessels on the starboard tack shall show a red light, vessels on the larboard tack a green light, and vessels going off large, or before the wind, or at anchor, a white light, "is having the wind from on either tack, properly termed a 'vessel off large,' because it is in her power to take a course to either side—starboard or larboard—proceed straight forward on her course, or return back to her anchorage, or to the point from which she started. In other language, she is free to the wind." Ward v. The Fashion (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 181, 188.

There is in nautical technicality a difference between "going off large" and "going before the wind." Going off large is when the wind blows from some point abaft the beam, or from the quarter of the ship; going before the wind is when the wind is free, comes from the stern, and the ship's yards are braced square across. Hall v. The Buffalo (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 214, 216.

GOING ONLY.

Acts 1869-70, p. 159, provide that for every mile necessarily traveled in going only in executing any warrant of arrest, subpoena, or venire, bringing up a prisoner on habeas corpus, taking prisoners before a magistrate or to prison, the officer shall be entitled a certain mileage. It is held that the words "in going only" do not apply to the taking of a prisoner before the magistrate, except as applicable to the distance traveled from the place of arrest to the magistrate. Cunningham v. San Joaquin County, 49 Cal. 323, 324. The words "in going only," in such statute, are not to be construed to mean that the constable was only entitled to his mileage in going to make an arrest, and not in bringing his prisoner before the magistrate. The words "in going only" would, in all probability, prevent the officer from charging mileage on the return trip when he does not succeed in making the arrest, but where he does succeed, and consequently has to take the prisoner before a magistrate, it would seem that the case is covered by the words "taking prisoners before a magistrate." Allen v. Napa County, 23 Pac. 43, 45, 82 Cal. 187.

GOING PRICES.

Where one has sold lumber at the going prices, this means the market value of the same at the place and time of delivery. Kelsea v. Haines, 41 N. H. 246, 254.

GOING RATE.

Rate means price, value. Going rate as to freight, like market price for produce, means a fixed and established price for the time. A rate for freight cannot be established by a mere offer of a shipper or demand of a carrier. It can only be done by an actual contract having been made in the port, and the last one so made for the same port would fix the rate. Barrett v. The Wacousta (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 928, 929.

GOING TO PASTURE.

The turnpike act, exempting from tolls horses and cattle "going to or returning from pasture" and horses attending cattle returning from pasture, does not include a horse ridden by the owner of the cattle at pasture in order to fetch them therefrom. Harrison v. Brough, 6 Term R. 706, 707.

GOING VALUE.

By the phrase "going value" of a water-works corporation empowered to furnish water to a city and its inhabitants is meant the value which arises from having an established going business. While not exactly equivalent to the term "good will" as applied to ordinary business, it is of a somewhat similar nature, and attaches to the business, rather than to the property employed in such business. The fact that the business is established is of course a material fact in ascertaining the value of the plant, and especially is this true where the property is estimated for the purpose of sale or condemnation; but as the basis of estimating profits its signification is less apparent. In deciding whether water rates fixed by a city ordinance are so low as to allow the water company an insufficient return on its investment, and thus result in confiscating its property, the going value of the works will not be regarded as a distinct element of value. Cedar Rapids Water Co. v. City of Cedar Rapids, 91 N. W. 1081, 1091, 118 Iowa, 234.

GONE TO SEA.

"Gone to sea," as used in St. 1718, allowing married women to trade and be subject to the responsibilities of a feme sole where her husband had gone to sea, includes a going to sea both as a mariner or a passenger. It is her being left to contract debts for which his person cannot be reached by process that gives her the credit and subjects her to the responsibility of feme sole. It is indifferent whether she got her living by shopkeeping or by any other employment, or whether he be a mariner or passenger. Jacobs v. Featherstone (Pa.) 6 Watts & Serg. 346, 349.

GOAT.

As cattle, see "Cattle."

GOAT-HAIR GOODS.

Goat-hair goods are fabrics manufactured of cotton and the hair of the angora or other goat; the warp being cotton and the woof being goat's hair. Their chief use is for women's dresses, and they are known in the trade under such specific names as "brilliantines," "lustrines," "alpacas," and "mohairs." They are composed of about 80 per cent. goat's hair and 20 per cent. cotton. Arthur's Ex'rs v. Butterfield, 8 Sup. Ct. 714, 715, 125 U. S. 70, 31 L. Ed. 643.

GODLY PREACHERS.

"Godly preachers," as used by a Protestant Nonconformist in 1704 in conveying estates to trustees for the benefits of poor and Godly preachers, meant preachers of the different classes of Protestant dissenters from the established church who professed and preached what were generally acknowledged at that time to be the doctrines of the Holy Gospel of Christ, and who were then tolerated by the law of the land, and which classes were at the time divided amongst themselves into the Presbyterian, the Independents or Congregationalists, and Baptists, all of whom were believers in the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. Attorney General v. Shore, 11 Sim. 592, 635.

GOD'S LAW.

Under an act declaring all persons lawful for the purpose of marriage that "be not prohibited by God's law to marry," the words may mean more than the Levitical law. They may refer to the state of body or mind; and where God's law and the Levitical degrees are mentioned in the same branch of enactment they cannot mean the same thing, and God's law, though it includes the Levitical degrees, may prohibit something beyond them. Regina v. Chadwick, 17 L. J. M. Cas. 33, 38, 11 Q. B. 173, 176.

GOLD.

"Gold," as used in the following writing: "Two years from date for value received I promise to pay J. S. K., or bearer one ounce of gold," should not be construed to mean money, but to mean an ounce of the specific article. Roberts v. Smith, 58 Vt. 492, 494, 4 Atl. 709, 56 Am. Rep. 567.

In a promise to pay "$60.00, payable in gold," the words "dollars in gold" can only mean the gold coin of the country made current as money by public authority. Gold, in this sense, is not an article of ordinary traffic, but one form of that medium of exchange by the instrumentality of which a traffic in commodities is effected. Under such a promise the payee can recover no more than $60 and interest thereon, and is not entitled to have the premium on gold added to that amount. Gist v. Alexander (S. C.) 15 Rich. Law, 50, 51.

The misspelling of the word "gold" by the omission of the last letter thereof in an indictment charging that defendant feloniously took and carried away ten $20 "gol" pieces of American coinage, is equivalent to the word "gold," and does not invalidate the indictment, as neither clerical nor grammatical errors have such effect, unless they change the words or obscure the sense. Grant v. State, 55 Ala. 201, 207.

GOLD COIN.

See "United States Gold Coin."

By "gold or silver coin," as used in the statute punishing counterfeiting and diminishing value of current coin, is meant any piece of gold or silver of which one of these metals is the principal component part, and which passes as money in the United States, either by law or usage, whether the same be of the coinage of the United States or of any foreign country. Pen. Code Tex. 1893, art. 564.

GOLD DOLLARS.

An allegation in an indictment of the theft of "gold dollars" is defective for want of a sufficient description, as the term cannot be construed to mean "gold dollars of the lawful money or current coin of the United States" or other countries. Lavarre v. State, 1 Tex. App. 685, 687.

GOLD DUST.

Gold dust is not cash within the meaning of a contract calling for the payment of cash, since the price of gold dust is constantly fluctuating in its market value. It is an article of traffic like merchandise. Gunter v. Sanchez, 1 Cal. 45, 49.

GONORRHEA.

Gonorrhea is a loathsome disease within the meaning of the statute entitling the wife to a divorce on the ground that the husband has contracted a loathsome disease. Boughner v. Boughner (Ky.) 41 S. W. 26, 27.

GOOD.

See "As Good As."

Acceptance imported.

"By the law merchant of this country the certificate of a bank that a check is good is equivalent to acceptance. It implies that the check is drawn upon sufficient funds in the hands of the drawee, that they have been set apart for its satisfaction, and that they shall be applied whenever the check is presented for payment. It is an undertaking that the check is good, and this agreement is as binding on the bank as its notes of circulation, a certificate of deposit payable to the order of the depositor, or any other obligation it can assume. The object of certifying a check as regards both parties is to enable the holder to use it as money." Merchants' Nat. Bank of Boston v. State Nat. Bank of Boston, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 604, 645, 19 L. Ed. 1008; Willets v. Phoenix Bank, 11 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 211, 215; Meads v. Merchants' Bank of Albany, 25 N. Y. 143, 147, 82 Am. Dec. 331; Girard Bank v. Bank of Penn Tp., 39 Pa. 92, 99, 80 Am. Dec. 507.

The customary certification "Good" on a note by a bank at whose place of business the note is made payable should be construed to give information merely that the maker has funds in the bank to meet the note, and not as a binding obligation of the bank. Such information may also be furnished verbally or by letter, as well as a memorandum on the note, the effect in each case being the same. Irving Bank v. Wetherald, 36 N. Y. 335.

The words "good for the sum expressed," when placed on a check by the drawee, constitute an undertaking by the drawee that the paper will be paid on presentation, and is indorsed on the check with a view to its circulation, and to cause it to pass from hand to hand upon the strength of such indorsement. The words also import that the drawer has funds or means convertible into funds in the hands of the drawee at the time, which shall be retained and devoted to the payment of the paper on presentation. A check so indorsed is known as a "certified check." Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Kent County v. Butchers' & Drovers' Bank, 28 N. Y. 425, 427.

Average distinguished.

As clear.

The word "good" in a vendor's contract to convey a good title comprehends all that the word "clear" does, and therefore there is no strength to any argument based on the intention of the parties, as shown from the fact that the word "clear" in the original draft of the contract was stricken out, and the word "good" inserted. Such change does not show that the parties did not intend that the title should be conveyed free from all incumbrances. Oakey v. Cook, 7 Atl. 495, 503, 41 N. J. Eq. (14 Stew.) 350.

As collectible.

"Good," as used in a warranty of a note as being good, means that the note is collectible, and not that it will be paid on demand. Curtis v. Smallman (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 231, 232.

The indorsement, "I warrant this note good," means that it is collectible; that the maker is responsible; and is not an acknowledgment that the note will be promptly paid at maturity, making it incumbent on the owner of such note and guaranty, in order to charge the grantor, to prove by legal evidence that the maker was not responsible. Cowles v. Pick, 10 Atl. 569, 570, 55 Conn. 251.

A guaranty that a note is good "is in law a contract that the maker is solvent, and that the amount can be collected by due course of law." Cooke v. Nathan (N. Y.) 16 Barb. 342, 344.

An award of referees for a certain sum of sterling money of Great Britain, payable in "good and safe sterling bills of exchange on England or Holland," means such bills of exchange as would be honored and paid in either of those states by the drawee on using proper diligence and legal means. Warder v. Whitall, 1 N. J. Law (Coxe) 84.

A contract to pay a certain sum in good notes, which shall be due, and which shall provide for attorney's fees for collecting the same, means notes which are collectible by legal proceedings, and is not limited to mercantile paper which will be promptly met and paid at maturity, and hence a note secured by mortgage is a good note, though the makers are insolvent. Polk v. Frash, 61 Ind. 206, 210, 28 Am. Rep. 669.

By a writing, "I hereby guarantee this note good until January 1, 1850," the guarantor does not promise to pay the note on that date, nor that it should be paid by the makers. It is an obligation on his part, having relation merely to the solvency and ability of the makers to pay the note; in other words, he agreed that during the period mentioned in the guaranty the makers of the note should be in that condition that payment of the note could be enforced against them if legal diligence was used for that purpose. The note was good if during that period they had the means of payment, or if payment could be enforced by legal measures. The liability of the guarantor commenced when that degree of insolvency on the part of the makers existed which rendered them unable to pay the note, or the holder to collect it. Hammond v. Chamberlin, 26 Vt. 406, 412.

As financially responsible.

In Well v. Schwartz, 21 Mo. App. 372, it was held that, where an inquiry was made of one whether another was good for a bill of $400, the word "good" meant solvent. Felix v. Shirey, 60 Mo. App. 621, 624.

"Good," as used in an inquiry by one man of another whether a third party is good for a bill of goods, has reference only to the financial responsibility of the debtor, and the ability of a creditor to make his debt by legal process in the ordinary form. It does not refer to the moral character and trustworthiness of the party. Well v. Schwartz, 21 Mo. App. 372, 380.

"Good," as used in a representation that a note is good, means that the maker of the note is responsible. Weeks v. Burton, 7 Vt. 67, 70.

As genuine.

In an indictment for obtaining money under false pretenses, which states that defendant did unlawfully, knowingly, designedly, and falsely pretend that a certain paper was a good negotiable promissory note and bank bill, "good" is to be construed as meaning that the note and bank bill was genuine, rather than an expression of it being available to insure payment. "Taking the words in their ordinary meaning, we think the indictment describes not the genuine note of a worthless bank, but a note not the genuine note of any bank; that is, either a counterfeit note of some real bank, or a paper bearing the resemblance of a bank note, but purporting to be of some bank having no real existence." Commonwealth v. Stone, 45 Miss. (4 Metc.) 43, 48.

As good in law.

"Good," as used in an admission by the plaintiffs, on a trial to recover possession of land, that a certificate of entry was good, means good in law, in contradistinction to that which is deemed fraudulent in law. Howard v. Perry, 7 Tex. 259, 268.

In a prosecution for rape the defendant asked the court to instruct the jury as to the legal presumption arising from the conduct of the prosecutrix, such as failure to resist or make an outcry. The court modified the instruction requested as to such presumption by adding the words, "Unless there was a good excuse," etc. Held, that such modification was erroneous, since "good excuse," as there used, could only mean a legal excuse, and a legal excuse presents a question of law. The court should have added instead of the words "good excuse" what in law in the particular instance constituted a legal excuse, leaving the jury to find whether the requisite facts predicated were proved; as, for instance, that the prosecutrix was paralyzed by fear, or by the superior strength of the defendant. But it should not have been left to the jury to find what would constitute a good excuse for doing or omitting to do an act, without any direction as to what in law would constitute a good excuse. Austine v. People, 110 Ill. 248, 254.

"Good," as used in Gen. St. c. 105, § 5, declaring that no contract for the sale of goods shall be "allowed to be good" unless the buyer accepts and receive part, or gives earnest, or there is some memorandum, means good for the purpose of a recovery under it. Townsend v. Hargraves, 118 Mass. 325, 334.

As suitable, proper.

"Good watch," in an answer to a question in an application for fire insurance as follows: "Is a watch kept upon the premises during the night? Is any other duty required of the watchmen than watching for the safety of the premises?" that a "good watch kept, men usually at work, watchmen work at the saws," is equivalent to a "watch suitable, proper, and adapted to the exigency of the case." Parker v. Bridgeport Ins. Co., 76 Mass. (10 Gray) 302, 304.

An affirmation by a vendor that the articles he has for sale or sells are good does not amount to warranty of the quality of the goods sold. It is not an affirmation of any particular quality; hence the vendor is not liable if the goods turn out not to be good. The language merely imports an opinion. Barrett v. Hall (Vt.) 1 Aikens, 269, 271.

A written instrument, which, after the date, reads, "We agree to put on board the brig Charlotte 200 dozen good fine wine and send the same to" a specified address, "and we acknowledge to have received our full pay for the above wines," does not constitute a warranty of the quality of the wines. The instrument does not purport to be a contract of sale, but it presupposes a sale already made, and is of itself a promise and undertaking to ship the wines to the address named. There is no doubt that in a contract of sale words of description are held to constitute a warranty that the articles sold are of the species and quality so described. But the warranty must be upon the sale, and one of the terms of the contract of sale. Any subsequent or collateral contract of warranty must arise from an express promise or undertaking to warrant, and that upon a new consideration distinct from that of the sale itself. Hogins v. Plympton, 28 Mass. (11 Pick.) 97, 99.

Where the seller of a horse which was exposed to the purchaser's inspection stated that the eyes of the horse were good as any horse's eyes in the world, the expression did not amount to a warranty of the horse's eyes. House v. Fort (Ind.) 4 Blackf. 293, 294.

GOOD AND CLEAR TITLE.

A vendor's contract to furnish an abstract of title showing a "good and clear title" free from defects is not performed if the abstract shows defects which may or may not exist in the title as tested by the original records, and an incumbrance which may or may not be barred by limitation. Kane v. Rippey, 33 Pac. 936, 24 Or. 338.

GOOD AND COLLECTIBLE NOTE.

See "Good and Sufficient Note."

A guaranty that a note is "good and collectible" means that it is capable of being collected. Such a guaranty does not require the obtaining of a judgment and the return of an unsatisfied execution to render the guarantor liable thereon. Sanford v. Allen, 55 Mass. (1 Oush.) 473, 475.

The term "good and collectible," as used in a guaranty of a note, requires the person taking the security to resort to legal measures within a reasonable time, and to pursue them with common diligence until the final event is thereby completed. Wheeler v. Lewis, 11 Vt. 265.

A guaranty of a note as follows: "I warrant this note good and collectible for two years from date," means that the note shall be and remain "good and collectible" for the full period of two years. Bull v. Bliss, 30 Vt. 127, 131; Marsh v. Day, 35 Mass. (18 Pick.) 321, 322.

The expression, "I hereby warrant the within note good and collectible until paid," is a waiver of legal process and the usual requirements as to diligence in proceeding against the maker, and the guarantor is liable, though demand is not made or suit instituted against the maker within a reasonable time. Lemmon v. Strong, 13 Atl. 140, 142, 55 Conn. 443.

A guaranty of promissory notes as good and collectible, which is executed before the maturity of the notes, means good and collectible at the date of their maturity. Dana v. Conant, 30 Vt. 246, 253.

GOOD AND COMFORTABLE SUPPORT AND MAINTENANCE.

A will bequeathing to the testator's widow "a good and comfortable support and maintenance" both as to food and clothing and nursing in health and sickness, includes a proper supply of fuel and the necessary expenses of keeping the house in a tenable and comfortable condition. Conant v. Stratton, 107 Mass. 474, 484.

GOOD AND CONVENIENT COURT HOUSE.

A "good and convenient courthouse" may necessarily mean a courthouse with shade trees surrounding it, and therefore a statute requiring the board of supervisors of each county to keep in repair a good and convenient courthouse may be construed to be an authorization for the making of an appropriation for shade trees on the courthouse grounds. Allgood v. Hill, 54 Miss. 666, 667.

GOOD AND LAWFUL FENCE.

The term "good and lawful fence" in a statute imposing a liability for stock killed in the operation of a railroad, containing a proviso that the act shall not apply to any company whose road is inclosed with a good and lawful fence to prevent such animals from being on said road, means a fence sufficient to prevent the animals from going on the track. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Jones, 20 Kan. 527, 529. The words "good and lawful fence," as so used are to be construed in connection with the fence law in force. In other words, railroad companies are not required to build different fences from other parties. The fence spoken of in the stock law is no different or more expensive than that mentioned in the general law defining a legal and sufficient fence. In townships where hogs are permitted to run at large, the bottom rail, board, or plank of which the fence is composed shall not be more than six inches from the ground. In other townships it shall not be more than two feet. In the law there is no prohibition against building fences of rail or timber, and when constructed of this material they are lawful fences. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Yates, 21 Kan. 613-620.

GOOD AND LAWFUL MEN.

A record stating that the grand jury returning a certain indictment is composed of good and lawful men means that the men composing the grand jury have all the qualifications required by law. Bonds v. State, 8 Tenn. (1 Mart. & Y.) 143, 146; State v. Price, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 203, 209; Jerry v. State (Ind.) 1 Blackf. 395, 396.

GOOD AND LAWFUL REASONS.

An order by a trial judge appointing another judge to try a cause, which recites that the presiding judge refuses to try such cause for "good and lawful reasons," will be construed to mean some one of the causes specified in Act March 1, 1885, which provides that in certain specified cases it shall be lawful for the presiding judge, in his discretion, to decline to preside during the trial of a cause. Leonard v. Blair, 59 Ind. 510, 514.

GOOD AND MARKETABLE TITLE.

Where land is conveyed under and subject to the condition that no mill, factory, brewery, or distillery shall be erected thereon, the title of the grantee thereto cannot be regarded as "good and marketable." Batley v. Foerderer, 29 Atl. 868, 870, 162 Pa. 460.

GOOD AND MERCHANTABLE CATTLE.

A contract for the delivery of good and merchantable cattle did not mean cattle which, at the time of the delivery, were merely in such a condition and of such an appearance as to be salable, but meant cattle which were sound and free from existing disease. Parks v. O'Connor, 8 S. W. 104, 108, 70 Tex. 377.

GOOD AND PERFECT DEED.

A contract for the sale of land, wherein the vendor stipulated that he would make a good and sufficient deed, meant that he would give a good and perfect title to the land. Greenwood v. Ligon, 18 Miss. (10 Smedes & M.) 615, 617, 48 Am. Dec. 775.

A covenant requiring a vendor to make a good and perfect deed does not mean a deed good in form only, but requires the vendor to give good title. Feemster v. May, 21 Miss. (13 Smedes & M.) 275, 277, 53 Am. Dec. 83.

GOOD AND PERFECT TITLE.

A contract to execute a conveyance vesting in the purchaser a good and perfect title to the property conveyed means one which is not only good in point of fact, but also one apparently perfect when exhibited; that is, free from any reasonable objection. It is not sufficient that it can be shown to be good as the result of an action instituted for the purpose of reforming defects existing in any deed which is necessary to make the chain of title complete. Peckham v. Stewart, 31 Pac. 928, 929, 97 Cal. 147.

The charter of an insurance company provided that no insurance effected on any property should be valid unless he has a "good and a perfect title" thereto at the time of effecting such insurance, or unless the true title of the insured to the same, and the incumbrances, if any, be fully disclosed, etc. Held, that the term "good and perfect title" should be construed to mean a perfect title which is good both at law and in equity, and a good title in equity alone to the property was not sufficient within the terms of the charter, and hence where a mortgagee of the insured premises declared that he had no interest in the premises to the insured, so that the mortgagee would be estopped from making any subsequent claim to the property as against the plaintiff or any one claiming under him, it did not create a good and perfect title in the plaintiff which he could avail himself of in the suit on the policy. Warner v. Middlesex Mut. Assur. Co., 21 Conn. 444, 449.

GOOD AND SUFFICIENT CAUSE.

Other good and sufficient cause, see "Other."

Under Horner's Ann. St. 1897, § 6436, providing that where a receiver neglects to pay taxes on property he may be cited to show cause why such taxes, with penalty, should not be paid, it was a good and sufficient cause that the receiver had sold the property, which was realty, by the court's order and approval, and that the purchaser had taken it subject to taxes. The statute was intended to secure a short and simple method of enforcing the taxes due upon property in custodia legis, and to enable the court in whose custody the property should be held not only to judge with considerable discretion as to what should constitute good and sufficient cause for the failure of its officer, but to punish a failure without such cause by denying a credit for the sum which might be ordered paid. Stetson v. Rochester Shoe Co., 52 N. E. 149, 150, 151 Ind. 575.

The term "good and sufficient cause" in a will appointing one of several heirs as trustee, but giving the power to other heirs to remove him for good and sufficient cause, is not limited to such cause as would be deemed by a court of equity to be good and sufficient, but the heirs have the power to determine the sufficiency of the cause, being subject only to the restraining power of a court of equity against the abuse of it. May v. May, 17 Sup. Ct. 824, 827, 167 U. S. 310, 42 L. Ed. 179.

GOOD AND SUFFICIENT COURT-HOUSE.

Where the Legislature imposed on the police jury of a parish the obligation to provide a good and sufficient courthouse, it did not mean that a house should be rented, nor a log house nor a frame house built, nor any other makeshift, but it meant a permanent and substantial courthouse giving promise of durability, and in keeping with the dignity of the people and the solemnity of the rites to whose uses it would be dedicated. State ex rel. Knollman v. King, 33 South. 776, 781, 109 La. 799.

GOOD AND SUFFICIENT DEED.

The term "good and sufficient deed," as used in a contract to convey real estate, relates only to the validity of the deed to pass the title which the vendor has, and does not imply that the title is valid, or free from incumbrances. Tinney v. Ashley, 32 Mass. (15 Pick.) 546, 552, 26 Am. Dec. 620; Barrow v. Bispham, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 110; Brown v. Covillaud, 6 Cal. 566, 573. A covenant to execute a good and sufficient deed does not mean that a perfect title is to be conveyed, but that the deed is to contain good and sufficient covenants. Clute v. Robison (N. Y.) 2 Johns. 595, 611; Gazley v. Price (N. Y.) 16 Johns. 267, 269.

In a contract for the sale of land calling for a good and sufficient warranty deed, the words "good and sufficient" relate only to the validity of the deed to pass the title which the defendants had to the plaintiff, and do not imply that their title was valid, or that it was free from incumbrances. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Shepard, 28 South. 202, 203, 126 Ala. 416.

A bond conditioned on the defendant's selling and conveying to plaintiff a certain quantity of land by a "good and sufficient deed" should be construed as having reference to the form of the deed and its execution, and not to the title. If the deed was of a proper form, and regularly executed, and the grantor was seised, so that the land was conveyed by it, the condition was performed. Aiken v. Sanford, 5 Mass. 494, 499.

Conveyance in fee.

An agreement made by the owner of land with the turnpike company to grant land for the company's use, on condition that the road be located on a particular route, and covenanting to rent so much land as the road should occupy, and to execute a good and sufficient deed for the same, meant a conveyance in fee, and not merely for the time the charter had to run. New Barbadoes Toll Bridge Co. v. Veerland, 4 N. J. Eq. (3 H. W. Green) 157, 162.

In a contract to procure from a third person "a good and sufficient warranty deed of conveyance in the law of fee simple of the premises," the term means a good and sufficient deed to convey an estate in fee simple in the land, a conveyance operative upon the title and effectual to transfer it immediately to the purchaser. Carpenter v. Bailey (N. Y.) 17 Wend. 244, 246.

A contract to make a good and sufficient deed means a deed conveying the fee simple with covenant of warranty. Tremain v. Liming (Ohio) Wright, 644.

Where the defendant, by a written agreement, in consideration of a sum of money, admitted to have been paid by the plaintiff, agreed to execute to him a good and sufficient deed of a particular pew in a church, and it appeared that the church was built pursuant to articles of subscription, by the terms of which the pews were all to be leased in perpetuity, subject to an annual rent, and that the religious society gave no title to pews other than such leases reserving rent, and that the plaintiff, at the time the agreement was made, had knowledge of these facts, held, notwithstanding, that the plaintiff was not obliged to accept such lease as a performance of the defendant's agreement. Foote v. West (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 544.

Covenants of warranty.

A bond to make a good and sufficient deed to lands requires a general warranty. Fleming v. Harrison's Devisees, 5 Ky. (2 Bibb) 171, 174, 4 Am. Dec. 691.

The term "good and sufficient deeds of conveyance," in a statute empowering administrators and executors to make good and sufficient deeds of conveyance, means that the deeds shall not only be good and sufficient to convey, but shall also contain the usual covenants against defects in title. Sumner v. Williams, 8 Mass. 162, 181, 5 Am. Dec. 83.

An undertaking to sell and convey by good and sufficient warranty deed requires the making of a deed with statutory covenants. Whicker v. Hushaw, 64 N. E. 460, 461, 159 Ind. 1 (citing Clark v. Redman [Ind.] 1 Blackf. 379; Linn v. Barkey, 7 Ind. 69; Bethell v. Bethell, 92 Ind. 318).

The agreement to convey by a good and sufficient deed of conveyance calls for a deed with the usual covenant. Fleckten v. Spicer, 65 N. W. 926, 927, 63 Minn. 454.

Good title.

A contract covenanting to deliver a good and sufficient deed with covenants of warranty relates to something more than the form of the instrument; it relates to the title, and imports an understanding to convey a good title. Tindall v. Conover, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 651, 654; Conover v. Tindall, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 513, 516; Everson v. Kirtland (N. Y.) 4 Paige, 628, 638, 27 Am. Dec. 91.

A contract by which a vendor was bound to convey land, the title to be a good and sufficient deed, meant that a good title should be conveyed by deed, and, if the vendor had no title, the purchaser was not bound to receive a deed from him, with whatever formality executed, or by whatever covenants secured. Brown v. Gammon, 14 Me. (2 Shep.) 276, 280.

A contract to give a good and sufficient deed of land is not satisfied by a deed conveying covenants of warranty and against incumbrances, where the grantor has not the legal title to the premises. Fletcher v. Butten, 4 N. Y. (4 Comst.) 396, 400.

In construing a contract to convey land by good and sufficient deed, Chancellor Kent said that: "A covenant to execute and deliver a good and sufficient deed of a piece of land does not mean merely a conveyance good in point of form. That would be a covenant without substance. But it means an operative conveyance; one that carries with it a good and sufficient title to the lands to be conveyed." Clute v. Robison (N. Y.) 2 Johns. 595, 613.

A good and sufficient deed, within the meaning of a contract to convey real estate by such a deed, imports that the vendor is to furnish a good title to the land in question; and this rule is not affected by the fact that a defect in title might have been discovered at the time of entering into the contract to purchase by an examination of the public records, as the vendee is not bound, as between himself and the vendor, to search the records for defects of title. Burwell v. Jackson, 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 535, 545; Story v. Conger, 36 N. Y. 673, 675, 93 Am. Dec. 546.

A contract for the sale of real estate, by which the vendor agreed to execute and deliver to the purchaser a good and sufficient warranty deed in fee-simple, free from all incumbrances, meant a deed not only sufficient in form, but one which would pass the title free from incumbrances; so that, if the vendor had no title, or the land was incumbered, the tender of a deed containing the specified covenant was not a compliance. Cogan v. Cook, 22 Minn. 137, 139, 140.

Ordinarily, when a person sells and agrees to convey land to another by good and sufficient deed in fee simple, and when there are no circumstances to take the case out of the general rule, the words are held to mean a perfect title, both legal and equitable. But where the vendee has notice and knowledge of the condition of the title, knows that the title is perfect in the vendor with the exception of the issuance of the patent, goes into possession of the property, makes improvements thereon, makes payments, asks for and is given an extension of time in which to make his final payment, and when this extension has expired asks for and offers a bonus of $500 for further extension when he knows patents have not issued, and his time has expired, such facts show clearly that the parties themselves not only intended that the contract to convey by good and sufficient deed in fee simple meant such title as the vendor could convey, and that the vendee was to rely on the covenant contained in the deed to indemnify himself against loss by reason of no issuance of patent, but also that the parties themselves so construed it by their subsequent acts and conduct. Bash v. Cascade Min. Co., 70 Pac. 487, 29 Wash. 50.

GOOD AND SUFFICIENT FENCE.

A good and sufficient fence, within the stock law, is a fence sufficient to turn ordinary cattle. Headen v. Rust, 39 Ill. 186, 188.

A good and sufficient fence which a railroad is required to erect along its right of way must be not merely one which will turn ordinary stock, for a slight barrier might do that, but one which will turn stock even though to some extent unruly. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Utley, 38 Ill. 410, 414; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Bryant, 29 Ill. App. 17, 20.

GOOD AND SUFFICIENT NOTE.

See "Good and Collectible Note."

Where a contract called for payment to be made by a good and sufficient note, such phrase meant such a note as the payee could get his money on, which could be readily discounted at some bank where the parties resided. Armstrong v. Andrews, 109 Mich. 537, 539, 67 N. W. 567.

GOOD AND SUFFICIENT SECURITY.

An award of the possession of certain premises upon the giving of good and sufficient security for the payment of specified sums at certain periods, is void for uncertainty when it does not define the nature of the security, and whether it was to consist of real or personal security, or to what extent. Jackson v. De Long (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 43, 44.

GOOD AND SUFFICIENT SUPPORT.

A will providing that good and sufficient support should be furnished to the wife of testator's son, should be construed to mean such as is proper for a mother and head of a family with the fortune and rank of her husband and his children. Jacobus' Ex'r v. Jacobus, 20 N. J. Eq. (2 C. E. Green) 49, 51.

GOOD AND WELFARE OF COMMON-WEALTH.

"The 'good and welfare of this commonwealth,' for which reasonable orders, laws, statutes, and ordinances may be made, by force of which private rights of property may be affected, is a much broader and less specific ground of exercise of power than public use and public service. The former expresses the ultimate purpose or result sought to be obtained by all forms of legislative power over property. The latter implies a direct relation between the primary object of appropriation and the public enjoyment. The circumstances may be such that the use or service intended to be secured will practically affect only a small portion of the inhabitants or lands of the commonwealth. The essential point is that it affects them as a community, and not merely as individuals." The rebuilding by private property owners in a city of buildings destroyed by general fires is not a public use or public service for which the city may issue bonds. Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454, 470, 15 Am. Rep. 39.

GOOD AND WORKMANLIKE MANNER.

"Good and workmanlike manner," as used in contracts for the performance of particular services, means that the work shall be done as a skilled workman should do it. As used in a contract for the laying of tiling in a good and workmanlike manner, the phrase should not be construed to mean that the contractor merely agreed to perform the work in a manner considered good and workmanlike by the local tilers of that community, though in determining the question as to whether or not the work was skillfully done the jury might be properly governed by the testimony of local tilers, still the question to be determined is not whether the work was done in a manner considered skillful by the workman of that particular community only, but whether it is done in a manner generally considered skillful by those capable of correctly judging such work, whether in that community or elsewhere. Fitzgerald v. La Porte, 40 S. W. 261, 64 Ark. 34.

GOOD AS GOLD AND SILVER.

A warranty of a debt as being as "good as gold and silver" is to warrant that it is founded on a legal consideration, that the debtor is of competent ability, and that the debt will be paid on demand. Koch v. Melhorn, 25 Pa. 89, 92, 64 Am. Dec. 685.

GOOD AS A POSSESSORY TITLE.

Where a title company reported a title to be "good as a possessory title," the phrase should be taken as meaning a title good by prescription or adverse possession under such circumstances and for such length of time as to have ripened into a perfect title indefeasible at law or in equity. Block v. Ryan (U. S.) 4 App. Cas. 283, 287.

GOOD AUTHENTIC DEED.

An award that plaintiff should execute a good authentic deed or conveyance of all the lands which the plaintiff held by deed from M., means that plaintiff shall convey all the lands which he holds by that deed. An award that a man should execute a good authentic deed of land, or that he should convey the land, means the same thing. Whitcomb v. Preston, 13 Vt. 53, 56.

GOOD BANK NOTES.

See "Good Current Bank Notes."

The term "good bank notes" imports such only as are redeemable in gold or silver. Roberts v. Short, 1 Tex. 373, 381.

GOOD BEHAVIOR.

See "Behavior."

Good behavior is conduct authorized by law. In re Spenser (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 921, 922.

Const. 609, providing that clerks of the courts of the state shall be removable for breach of good behavior, does not mean merely a breach of official good behavior, but signifies general moral behavior. State v. Bell (La.) 2 Mart. (N. S.) 683, 699.

In proceedings under a provision of the Constitution providing that clerks should be removable from office for breach of good behavior it was held that the inquiry must be confined to misconduct in office, and that conduct, however immoral, which did not relate to the official action of the clerk, constituted no ground for his removal. Commonwealth v. Williams, 79 Ky. 42, 47, 42 Am. Rep. 204 (citing Commonwealth v. Barry, 3 Ky. [Hardin] 238; Commonwealth v. Chambers, 24 Ky. [1 J. J. Marsh.] 160).

The term "breach of good behavior," as used in a constitutional provision that clerks of courts shall be removable for a breach of good behavior, means unreasonable neglect; as, if the clerk should wantonly refuse to obey an order of court. State v. Roll, 2 West. Law Jour. 121, 137. The term, as so used, is held to include the procuring of means to produce an abortion. State v. Bell (La.) 2 Mart. (N. S.) 350, 357.

Act March 11, 1902, § 3 (Acts 1902, p. 42, c. 14), providing that on the second or any subsequent conviction for a violation of the local option law the court shall require the defendant to execute a bond for his good behavior for 12 months, is held not to be void on the ground that the phrase "good behavior" is uncertain, the court observing in this connection that the words "good behavior" are so well known, and their connection with the intent and purpose of the statute so patent, that they cannot fail to be understood by persons of ordinary intelligence. Huyser v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 76 S. W. 174, 175.

GOOD BOND.

Under a building contract requiring that the contractor shall furnish a good bond, and a stipulated amount, it is held that the meaning of the term "good bond" is that the surety on the bond shall be financially sound. Barnes v. Ludington, 51 Ill. App. 90, 97.

GOOD CATTLE.

See "Good and Merchantable Cattle."

GOOD CAUSE.

See "Good and Sufficient Cause."
Good cause shown, see also, "Shown."

For adjourning sale.

"Good cause," within the meaning of Pub. St. c. 132, § 30, authorizing an officer to adjourn a judicial sale for good cause, is shown by a return that the adjournment was by plaintiff's attorney, and it is not necessary that the return shall recite that the officer deemed the adjournment expedient. Frazee v. Nelson, 61 N. E. 40, 42, 179 Mass. 456, 88 Am. St. Rep. 391.

For bringing action on judgment.

"Good cause," as used in Code, § 14, providing that no action shall be brought upon a judgment rendered in any court in this state except a court of a justice of the peace, between the same parties, without the leave of the judge of the court for good cause shown, is synonymous with "sufficient cause." What is good cause is a question exclusively within the discretion of the judge to whom the application is made. Kendall v. Briley, 86 N. C. 56, 58.

For canceling contract.

"Good cause," as used in a contract stipulating that it might be canceled by either party for good cause, has no such distinct sense as to furnish a common and intelligible criterion for the parties, or any determinate sense whatever. It is impossible to say that the wills of the parties concurred, and that each meant exactly what the other did or what either meant. As so used, the phrase can only have reference to the respective understandings of the parties, and any revocation in good faith is a revocation for good cause. Cummer v. Butts, 40 Mich. 322, 325, 29 Am. Rep. 530.

For not dismissing prosecution.

What is good cause within the meaning of the statute providing that, when a person has been held to answer for a public offense, the court shall order the prosecution dismissed unless good cause to the contrary be shown, if an indictment be not found against him at the next term of the court at which he is held to answer, may be difficult to define with precision, since it must, in a great measure, be determined with reference to the particular circumstance in each case. There should undoubtedly be some fact or circumstance disclosed to the court upon which its authority in this respect, somewhat discretionary, could be brought into exercise. Its discretion is not to be arbitrary, but should proceed upon such knowledge and information as would enable it to determine for itself whether or not public justice requires the detention of the prisoner notwithstanding the delay upon the part of the prosecution. Ex parte Isbell, 11 Nev. 295, 298. The mere recommendation of a grand jury, which fails to indict, that a prisoner be further detained, is not a good cause for his detention within the meaning of the statute. Ex parte Bull, 42 Cal. 196, 199.

For dissolving corporation.

Rev. St. 1891, c. 32, § 25, which provides that courts of equity shall have full power, on good cause shown, to dissolve or close up the business of any corporation, means "a legal cause, a cause for which the sovereign authority might be allowed to resume the franchise granted." Wheeler v. Pullman Iron & Steel Co., 32 N. E. 420, 422, 143 Ill. 197, 17 L. R. A. 818.

For failing to file transcript.

Comp. Laws 1884, § 2189, provides that the appellant shall file a transcript in the Supreme Court within ten days before the first day to which appeal is returnable, and that, in case of his failure to do so, the court may affirm the judgment, unless good cause shall be shown to the contrary. Held, that the fact that a client was a poor man, and was not able to obtain the money with which to procure a transcript until after the time for filing it, constituted a good cause within the meaning of the statute. Armijo v. Abeytia, 25 Pac. 777, 779, 5 N. M. 533.

The term "good cause" has no fixed meaning, but must depend upon the circumstances of each case, to be determined by the sound discretion of the court. A delay of seven months in order that counsel might find time from an engrossing business to prepare briefs is not good cause for permitting a transcript to be filed after the 90 days. Christensen v. Anderson, 58 S. W. 962, 964, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 345.

For failing to take appeal.

Under a statute giving a right of appeal from the judgment of a justice within 10 days from the entry of judgment, or thereafter, and within 90 days, upon showing good cause for his not having taken appeal within the 10 days, the fact that the defendant was a nonresident of the state, and did not know that the appeal was required to be taken within 10 days, is not good cause for granting an appeal. Hubbard v. Yocum, 5 S. E. 867, 870, 30 W. Va. 740.

The words "good cause" in the statute authorizing appeal from a decision of a justice of the peace after the time when such appeal may be taken as a matter of right on showing good cause, etc., means a showing that appellant was prevented from taking his appeal within the specified time by fraud, accident, surprise, or adventitious circumstances beyond his control, as would entitle him to a new trial. Home Sewing Machine Co. v. Floding, 27 W. Va. 540.

The term "good cause" in a statute limiting the right of the county court to grant an appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace after the expiration of 10 days from the rendition thereof, to cases in which the party seeking the appeal shows good cause for not having taken the appeal within such time, means such cause as would authorize the granting of a new trial; as, for instance, fraud, accident, surprise, or some adventitious circumstance beyond the control of the party. Where the party has full knowledge of the facts upon which his rights depend, and fails to take his appeal in 10 days through mistake as to the legal consequences, an appeal will not be granted. Ruffner v. Love, 24 W. Va. 181, 185.

For limiting costs.

"Good cause," within a statute authorizing the court to limit costs when good cause is shown, is practically identical in meaning with the phrase "just and reasonable," as used in the former statute, providing that the court might limit costs as they should deem just and reasonable. Whatever, under the old statute, would make it appear just and reasonable to the court that the cost should be limited, would be good cause shown for doing the same thing under the new law. Whitcher v. Town of Benton, 50 N. H. 25, 27.

For quitting employment.

Good cause, within a statute authorizing an employé to quit his service, means sufficient cause, and an irresistible, superhuman cause, which disabled, unnerved, and placed an employé on his deathbed, is a good and sufficient cause for his failure to perform arduous toil and ordinary farm labor. McClellan v. Harris, 64 N. W. 522, 7 S. D. 447.

For setting aside appraisement of land.

The term "good cause" in a statute providing that when land is taken for railroad purposes, and any one is dissatisfied with the report of the commissioners appointed to determine the value of the land taken, he may have a new trial upon good cause shown, is not satisfied by the mere dissatisfaction of landowners, regardless of the merits of the matter. Virginia & T. R. Co. v. Elliott, 5 Nev. 353, 365. Good cause means something clear and indubitable, pointing error in law or fact or both, intentional or unintentional, on the part of the commissioners. Virginia & T. R. Co. v. Henry, 8 Nev. 165, 176.

Good cause means such matters as lead to a reasonable apprehension that injustice has been done in settling the amount of damages, or some improper conduct on the part of the commissioners, the company, or their agents, in respect to the assessment. Objections that there was a mistake in locating a part of the land in the wrong township, or that the engineer did not specify all the lands taken, cannot be considered on an application to set aside the report. Vanwickie v. R. R. Co., 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 162, 167. The term is to be construed as authorizing the court to grant a new appraisement when the court is thoroughly satisfied that the commissioners have erred in the principles upon which they have made their appraisals. St. Louis & St. J. R. Co. v. Richardson, 45 Mo. 466, 468. It does not mean mistake, irregularly, or even fraud in the proceedings previous to or in the appointment of the commissioners. Good cause is where the commissioners have not taken and subscribed an oath or affirmation before some person duly authorized to administer an oath faithfully and impartially to examine the matter in question, and to make a true report, or where a notice such as is required in the act of the time and place of the meeting of the commissioners is not given to the party, and for want of which he has been prejudiced in his claim; or if the commissioners did not meet at the time and place appointed, but at some other time or place without due notice to or the consent of the party, so that he had not an opportunity of being heard and presenting his claims; or where the commissioners did not view and examine the lands and materials, but made their report without such view and examination; or where the commissioners acted with partiality or corruption; or where mistake of law or fact intervene on the part of the commissioners as to their powers or duty, or in relation to the quantity and value of the land, and such mistake is made manifest; or where, upon the whole matter, there should be reasonable grounds to apprehend that justice may not have been done, and the landholder is willing to take the hazard of paying costs if the jury do not assess his damages at more than the commissioners have given. Bennett v. Camden & A. R. Co., 14 N. J. Law (2 Green) 145, 150.

Good cause, within a statute relating to the assigning of homestead in an action against a debtor, and providing that upon good cause shown the court out of which the process issued may order a reappraisement and reassignment, would include a case where an assignment of 400 acres of land as a homestead had been, after trial, set aside as excessive, and new appraisers appointed, who assigned the same land and 54 acres additional without affixing any valuation to such homestead tract. Kerchner v. Singletary, 15 S. C. 535, 539.

For setting aside judgment.

Good cause, within a statute authorizing the court, upon good cause shown, to set aside or modify its judgment, is satisfied by showing that there is a good defense. Lord v. Hawkins, 38 N. W. 689, 690, 39 Minn. 73.

Good cause, within Sp. Laws 1889, c. 351, relating to the municipal court of the city of St. Paul, which provides that defaults may be opened and judgments or orders may be set aside or modified for good cause shown within six days after the party effected thereby shall have notice or knowledge of the same, means such cause as would justify the exercise of the power by a district court. Granse v. Fringo, 49 N. W. 60, 61, 46 Minn. 352.

Under the statute providing that a defendant against whom publication is ordered made upon good cause shown be allowed to defend after judgment, to show good cause he must show a sufficient excuse for his default, and, except where the motion is on the ground of the want of jurisdiction, he must also show that he has a meritorious defense to an action or suit. A mere stating that defendant had a good and valid defense, without setting forth the facts constituting the defense, is not sufficient. Mayer v. Mayer, 39 Pac. 1002, 1003, 27 Or. 133.

Within Rev. St. art. 1373, entitling a nonresident served by publication to a new trial for good cause shown, good cause has always included a showing that the applicant had no actual notice of the pendency of the suit; and hence does not apply where he has actual notice of the suit. Roller v. Ried (Tex.) 24 S. W. 655, 656.

Under a statute authorizing the court to set aside a default judgment and permit the defendant to defend on good cause being shown, the good cause required to be shown must not only be a meritorious defense, but the exercise of all due diligence by the party. And where a defendant, having been personally served with process, supposing that he could put in his plea by the sixth day of the term, did not call on an attorney until the fifth day, when he was informed that judgment had been entered on the third day of the term, due diligence is not shown. Ignorance of the law does not excuse a party from the exercise of diligence. Green v. Goodloe, 7 Mo. 25, 27.

Under a statute which authorized defendant, in a suit by attachment sued out against him because he resides out of the state, to set aside the decree by default on his application and good cause shown, the good cause must, it would seem, go to the merits, but, if it is in abatement, it must be distinctly and unequivocally stated. Cain v. Jennings, 3 Tenn. Ch. 131, 133.

For removing criminal cause.

The high character and political prominence of defendants is not good cause within Code Cr. Proc. § 344, providing that a criminal action prosecuted by indictment may at any time before trial, on the application of the defendant, be removed from a court of sessions or a city court to the court of oyer and terminer of the same county for good cause shown; nor will such removal be made on the ground that the probability of defendants having a fair trial has been effected by public clamor. But the fact of the indictment being against the officers of a railroad company for violating a car-heating act is good cause, because it involves such important questions, as is also the fact that the district attorney contends that the questions involved, though novel and important, have already been adjudicated in the general sessions by the charge of the judge of that court to the grand jury. People v. Clark, 15 N. Y. Supp. 79, 80. In attempting to define the term "good cause" the first thought which naturally suggests itself is, why was an expression so general and sweeping used? If the Legislature had in view any particular reasons, which, in their judgment, were sufficient to transfer any criminal action from the one court to the other, and had determined that no others should have that effect, those reasons would have been embodied in the statute. The result from such omission and the general language employed is that every application for removal must rest in the sound discretion of the court or judge who is to determine it, and the reasons must be as various as the surroundings of each case in which it is attempted. Without undertaking to define with exact precision the phrase employed, it will be safe to say that a motion of this character should be granted not only when the obtainment of an impartial and fair trial requires it, but also whenever the situation and official standing of the accused party, the widespread and clearly divided line of popular opinion, and the circumstances of the alleged crime, as well as the important legal questions which it presents, so magnify the importance of the cause as to justify its removal from the inferior to the superior tribunal for trial. In deciding upon such an application it is impossible that the court or judge to whom it is addressed should regard the personnel of the magistrate who is to preside in the lower court. That the political and official standing of the accused (he was at the time of the alleged act a member of the Senate of this state), the act charged (accepting a bribe), and the warm and bitter feelings which the allegation of its perpetration caused, have magnified this cause far above and beyond an offense committed under other and different circumstances, must also be conceded; and, if any case of sufficient importance can be supposed in which the relief asked should be granted, then the present is that case. People v. Sessions (N. Y.) 62 How. Prac. 415, 420.

GOOD CAUSE OF ACTION.

If a person have a legal right to sue he must necessarily have a good (using that word, as it obviously is always used in this connection, in the sense of "legally sufficient") cause of action. If he have no legal right to sue, he has not merely a bad cause of action, but no cause of action; so good cause of action can mean no more than cause of action, and the word "good" in that connection is hence clearly superfluous. Parker v. Enslow, 102 Ill. 272, 276, 40 Am. Rep. 588.

GOOD COARSE SALT.

A contract obligating a seller to deliver to a buyer a quantity of "good coarse salt" was filled and the contract complied with by a delivery of "coarse salt" of a medium quality of the kind in use at the time and place of the contract. Goss v. Turner, 21 Vt. 437, 441.

GOOD COMPANY.

See "Very Good Company."

GOOD CONDITION.

See "Good Order and Condition"; "Good Working Condition."

A statute requiring a jail to be kept in good condition "does not merely refer to its security, but to its sanitary condition, and to its capacity to render persons reasonably comfortable. It is impossible to say it is in good condition when it is filthy and unhealthy." Stuart v. La Salle County Sup'rs, 83 Ill. 341, 346, 25 Am. Rep. 397.

GOOD CONDUCT.

The words "good conduct" in a divorce statute forbidding the granting of the divorce in ex parte proceedings in the absence of proof of the good conduct of the petitioner, have always been construed to have reference to the conduct of the husband or the wife in his or her marital or home relations, as distinguished from the conduct of either of them to society in general. Thus proof of entire propriety in the latter relations is a very slight, if any, proof of the good conduct mentioned in the statute. Reed v. Reed, 39 Mo. App. 473, 477.

GOOD CONSIDERATION.

A good consideration is such as that of blood, or of natural love and affection, as when a man grants an estate to a near relation; being founded on motives of generosity, prudence, and natural duty. Potter v. Gracie, 58 Ala. 303, 307, 29 Am. Rep. 748 (quoting 2 Black, 296, 297); Groves v. Groves, 62 N. E. 1044, 1045, 65 Ohio St. 442 (quoting 2 Bl. Comm. 296); Clark v. Troy, 20 Cal. 219, 224; Corwin v. Corwin (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 219, 225.

Love and natural affection of parent to child was a good consideration, and would support a deed operating as a covenant to stand selsed. The distinction between good considerations and valuable considerations seems first to have been discussed in cases arising from the technical rules of the common law, now no longer applicable to conveyances. Deeds of bargain and sale required a consideration of some pecuniary value, either expressed or proved, to support them, and not merely a good consideration. Jackson v. Alexander (N. Y.) 3 Johns. 484, 3 Am. Dec. 517 (cited in Turner v. Howard, 42 N. Y. Supp. 335, 338, 10 App. Div. 555).

A moral obligation to perform a duty is a good consideration for a subsequent promise to do so, even if there was originally no legal obligation to perform. Pars. Cont. § 434. In view of this rule of law, the duty resting on a purchaser of coal to protect the barges of the vendor, in which it was shipped, from injury while in his possession, was a sufficient consideration to support a promise to protect the barges from ice. Pierce v. Walton, 50 N. E. 309, 313, 20 Ind. App. 66.

A thing which must be of advantage or gain to him who makes the promise, or an injury to him to whom the promise is made, is a good consideration. Where a person sent out to locate mines by associates, who were to pay his expenses, faithfully performs his part of the contract, his promise to repay moneys advanced thereunder if they were dissatisfied is without consideration. Templin v. Hobson, 51 Pac. 1019, 1020, 10 Colo. App. 525.

Any benefit conferred or agreed to be conferred upon the promisor by any other person to which the promisor is not lawfully entitled, or any prejudice suffered or agreed to be suffered by such person other than such as he is at the time of consent lawfully bound to suffer as an inducement to the promisor, is a good consideration for a promise. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3871; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1124; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1605; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 766; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2160.

GOOD CURRENT BANK NOTES.

Good current bank notes are bank notes which circulate currently as money. English v. Turney, 49 Tenn. (2 Helsk.) 617, 618.

As valuable consideration.

The words "good consideration" have always been construed by the courts of England and this country to mean "valuable consideration." Arrington v. Arrington, 19 S. E. 351, 356, 114 N. C. 151.

The phrase "good consideration," as used in the statute of frauds, was derived from the English statutes, in which it frequently occurs in reference to valuable consideration; perhaps good also in the ordinary acceptance of the word, or any consideration which is legal and sufficient and bona fide. Killough v. Steele (Ala.) 1 Stew. & P. 262, 269.

A good consideration, within a statute requiring the recording of all conveyances, and that the act shall extend to any conveyance made upon good consideration and bona fide, will be construed to mean valuable consideration. Hodgson v. Butts, 7 U. S. (3 Cranch) 140, 157, 2 L. Ed. 391.

St. 13 Eliz. avoids all gifts, conveyances, etc., of lands or chattels had or made with intent or purpose to delay or defraud creditors, with the proviso that it shall not extend to any estate or interest upon good consideration lawfully conveyed or assured to any person not having at the time any notice or knowledge of the fraud. Held, that good consideration means valuable consideration as between existing creditors and others claiming under the debtor. Cunningham v. Dwyer, 23 Md. 219, 231.

The language of Shaw, C. J., in Nelson v. Boynton, 43 Mass. (3 Metc.) 396, 37 Am. Dec. 148, where he says that a promise to answer for the debt, default, etc., of another, in order to be binding on the promisor without the memoranda required by the statute of frauds, must be made on good consideration, is to be construed as using the word "good" not in any technical sense as denoting consideration of blood, but it was used with reference to a sufficient or valuable consideration. Doyle v. White, 26 Me. (13 Shep.) 341, 351, 45 Am. Dec. 110.

A "good consideration," as used in Civ. Code, § 1605, where the general definition of any benefit conferred or agreed to be conferred is applied to the case of a promise, is not used in the ancient technical sense "as that of blood or natural affection," but as equivalent to the term "a valuable consideration." Aden v. City of Vallejo, 72 Pac. 905, 906, 139 Cal. 165.

GOOD CURRENT MONEY.

"Good current money," as used in a contract, will be understood to mean the coin of the Constitution, or foreign coins made current by act of Congress, unless it appears from the context that the terms have a different local signification by reason of the usage in trade. Moore v. Morris, 20 Ill. (10 Peck) 255, 259; Graham v. Adams, 5 Ark. (5 Pike) 261, 262.

GOOD CUSTOM COWHIDE.

"Good custom cowhide," as used in a note promising to pay a certain sum of good custom cowhide boots at a certain number of dollars per pair, has no definite meaning in relation to the kind, quality, and worth of the boots intended. Wait v. Fairbank (Vt.) Brayt 77.

GOOD DEED.

See "Good and Perfect Deed"; "Good and Sufficient Deed"; "Good Authentic Deed"; "Good Warranty Deed."

The term "good deed," in a bond calling for a good deed, means a deed in fee simple, with covenants. Carver v. Williams, 10 Ind. 267, 268.

A contract to give a good and warranty deed does not refer to the title, but to the instrument, and the alleged inability to convey a title on account of a mortgage at the time the bond was executed does not constitute a breach of the condition. Joslyn v. Taylor, 33 Vt. 470, 475.

GOOD FAIR.

The words "good fair" and "average," when used as descriptive of cotton, are not precisely the same in their primary signification, as the quality indicated by the former is a shade above what the latter describes. Thus, changing a contract requiring the delivery of average cotton by inserting the words "good fair" instead of the word "average" is a material change in the contract. Waddell v. Glassell, 18 Ala. 561, 565, 54 Am. Dec. 170.

GOOD FAITH.

See, also, "Bona Fide."

Good faith means honest, lawful intent; the condition of acting without knowledge of fraud, and without intent to assist in a fraudulent or otherwise unlawful scheme. Crouch v. First Nat. Bank, 40 N. E. 974, 979, 156 Ill. 342.

Good faith, in the popular sense, is used to denote the actual existing state of the mind, without regard to what it should be from given standards of law or reason. Seymour v. Cleveland, 68 N. W. 171, 173, 9 S. D. 94 (citing Wright v. Mattison, 59 U. S. [18 How.] 50, 56, 15 L. Ed. 280).

The phrase "in good faith," as it is used in the law, simply means honestly; without fraud, collusion, or deceit; really, actually, without pretense. Docter v. Furch, 65 N. W. 161, 164, 91 Wis. 464.

A want of that caution and diligence which an honest man of ordinary prudence is accustomed to exercise in making purchases is, in judgment of law, a want of good faith. Pringle v. Phillips, 7 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Sandf.) 157, 165.

Good faith consists in an honest intention to abstain from taking any unconscientious advantage of another, even through the forms or technicalities of law, together with an absence of all information or belief of facts which would render the transaction unconscientious. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2787; Rev. Codes N. D. 1890, § 5114; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2448; Cone v. Ivinston, 4 Wyo. 203, 248, 33 Pac. 31, 35 Pac. 933; Breaux-Renoudet Cypress-Lumber Co. v. Shadel, 52 La. Ann. 2094, 28 South. 292, 294; Friedrich v. Fergen, 91 N. W. 328, 330, 15 S. D. 541; Gress v. Evans, 46 N. W. 1132, 1134, 1 Dak. 387.

Good faith in general means without notice, as well as for a valuable consideration. Milton v. Boyd, 22 Atl. 1078, 1082, 49 N. J. Eq. (4 Dick.) 142; Meding v. Roe, 30 Atl. 587, 589; Keller v. Stanley (Ky.) 4 S. W. 807, 809; Dornitzer v. German Savings & Loan Soc., 62 Pac. 862, 882, 23 Wash. 132; Cardenas v. Miller, 39 Pac. 783, 785, 108 Cal. 250, 40 Am. St. Rep. 84; McKee v. Bassick Min. Co., 8 Pac. 561, 563, 8 Colo. 392; Burchinell v. Gorsline, 52 Pac. 413, 415, 11 Colo. App. 222; Riederer v. Pfaff (U. S.) 61 Fed. 872, 873; People's Sav. Bank v. Bates, 7 Sup. Ct. 679, 682, 120 U. S. 556, 30 L. Ed. 754; Strahorn-Hutton-Evans Commission Co. v. Florel, 54 Pac. 710, 713, 7 Okl. 499; Tolbert v. Horton, 18 N. W. 647, 648, 31 Minn. 518; Kohl v. Lynn, 34 Mich. 360, 361.

Good faith and diligence are not always the same. Lack of diligence does not necessarily involve absence of good faith; so that failure to discover fraud in the sale of the bank stock within a short time is not proof of lack of good faith. Stufflebeam v. De Lashmutter (U. S.) 101 Fed. 367, 370.

Good faith is the opposite of fraud and of bad faith, and its nonexistence must be established by proof. McConnell v. Street, 17 Ill. (7 Peck) 253, 254.

The term "good faith" is used in the law to qualify many different kinds of actions. Thus a purchaser without notice of a defect or a fraud is called a purchaser in good faith. One who acts honestly, and not fraudulently, is said to act in good faith. There are purchasers in good faith, settlers in good faith, and possessors in good faith. Walraven v. Farmers' & Merchants' Nat. Bank, 74 S. W. 530, 534, 96 Tex. 331.

Assignment of commercial paper.

One who takes an assignment of commercial paper before maturity, paying value, without notice of infirmity in title or consideration, is deemed a "good-faith purchaser." Atlas Nat. Bank v. Holme (U. S.) 71 Fed. 489, 491, 19 C. C. A. 94.

An allegation in an action on a promissory note that the indorsee took the note in good faith is not equivalent to an averment that the indorsee took the note without notice of the maker's defenses. Bunting v. Mick, 31 N. E. 1055, 1056, 5 Ind. App. 289.

Color of title.

The good faith required to constitute the payment of taxes and the making of valuable improvements upon property a sufficient color of title is an honest belief in the validity of one's title. One holding by a conveyance obtained in violation of law, and in a manner which the statute says shall be treated as against equity in good conscience, cannot be said to hold in good faith. The claimant must not only obtain an honest belief in the validity of his title, but he must have some reasonable ground upon which to base such confidence. Lindt v. Uihlein, 89 N. W. 214, 216, 116 Iowa, 48.

"Good faith," as used in Rev. Code Miss. 1871, c. 17, art. 4, § 1557, which provides for the payment to defendants, in actions of ejectment, of the value of their improvements on the land, and that no defendant shall be entitled to such compensation unless he shall claim the premises under some deed or contract of purchase made or acquired in good faith, means nothing more than an honest belief on the part of the purchaser that he was the true owner. It does not mean that the purchaser must have made every possible research to discover whether or no his title was valid. It is used in contradistinction to bad faith. Canal Bank v. Hudson, 4 Sup. Ct. 303, 311, 111 U. S. 66, 28 L. Ed. 354.

Good faith, such as is required in the creation or acquisition of color of title, is a freedom from a design to defraud the person having the better title, and the knowledge of an adverse claim to or lien upon property does not, of itself, indicate bad faith in a purchaser, and is not even evidence of it, unless accompanied by some improper means to defeat such claim or lien. Searl v. School Dist. No. 2, 10 Sup. Ct. 374, 377, 133 U. S. 553, 33 L. Ed. 740.

Within the rule that a prescription of ten years, based on good faith, will give title to land, good faith consists in the well-settled opinion that the possessor has acquired the property which is in his possession. But a purchaser, knowingly not having complied with his bid at a tax sale, was not in good faith. Marmion's Heirs v. McPeak, 26 South. 376, 378, 51 La. Ann. 1631.

Good faith in the acquirement of title, within the meaning of the statute in reference to title by adverse possession, does not require ignorance of adverse claims or defects in the title. Notice, actual or constructive, is of no consequence. There may be good faith notwithstanding actual notice of existing claims or liens or knowledge of legal defects which prevent the title of which there is color from being absolute. Thus one who obtains a deed to property without fraud, supposing that it conveys good title, may acquire title by possession and payment of taxes, although he took the deed with knowledge of an adverse claim. Keppel v. Dreier, 58 N. E. 386, 388, 187 Ill. 298.

By the term "good faith," as used in the rule that good faith in the claimant is an indispensable element in the law of adverse possession, it must not be understood that it involves an inquiry into the party's belief in the character or strength of his title, or whether in fact he has any title. What is meant by the term is simply good faith in claiming possession or title; or, in other words, a real intention to claim the land as his own, distinct and hostile to the title of the owner. Newell on Ejectment, p. 788. But the court held that, to say that good faith is an essential element, and then to limit it to mere intent to claim title, is to eliminate it altogether, as the intent to claim title may exist entirely independent of any element of good faith, as the term has universally been understood. Lampman v. Van Alstyne, 69 N. W. 171, 174, 94 Wis. 417.

The words "good faith," as used in the statute of limitations of 1839, providing that title of land shall vest in one in possession who has paid taxes for seven years under claim and color of title acquired in good faith, should be construed in their practical common-sense meaning. The statute was intended to protect a purchaser of land who bought and paid his money under the belief that he was acquiring title. The fact that a purchaser may err in judgment, or do an act that another, under like circumstances, might not do, is not enough to impeach the good faith of the transaction, when the purchase is made with an honest purpose, though the real title is not acquired. Winters v. Haines, 84 Ill. 585, 588.

The requirement that the defeated party in ejectment must have made improvements on the premises while claiming under some deed or contract of purchase made in good faith in order to be entitled to the value of the improvements, means merely that the party must have an honest belief that he is the true owner. The expression "some deed or contract" of itself negatives the idea that it is the true title which he must have, and plainly indicates that what the law calls "color of title" will be sufficient. Indeed, if he were the purchaser of the true title, there would be no occasion for him to invoke the protection of the statute, since he could never be dispossessed, and hence could never be compelled to make claim for improvements. Hicks v. Blakeman, 21 South. 7, 8, 74 Miss. 459.

Contribution to limited partnership.

An affidavit, made at the time of the formation of a limited partnership, that a definite amount stated in the certificate of partnership to have been contributed to the capital stock thereof by the special partners had been actually contributed and applied and paid into the same, was a sufficient affidavit of good faith, as required by a statute providing that the affidavit must state that the property specified in the certificate had been contributed and applied in good faith. Crouch v. First Nat. Bank, 40 N. E. 974, 979, 156 Ill. 342.

Deed of married woman.

The words "good faith," in Laws 1889, c. 103, legalizing deeds of married women made in good faith after judgment of divorce, are used in their ordinary and popular sense, referring to the actual knowledge and intentions of the parties. Wistar v. Foster, 49 N. W. 247, 248, 46 Minn. 484, 24 Am. St. Rep. 241.

Improvements.

"Good faith," as used in Act Cong. June 1, 1874, c. 200, 18 Stat. 50, 1 Supp. Rev. St. p. 25 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 581], providing that, when an occupant of land having color of title in good faith has made valuable improvements thereon, such occupant will be entitled in the federal courts to all the rights and remedies secured by the state or territory where the land lies, means "without notice." One having knowledge of plaintiff's claim to certain land cannot erect valuable permanent improvements in good faith. Hawke v. Deffebach, 22 N. W. 480, 490, 4 Dak. 20.

"Good faith," as used in a statute giving the defendant in ejectment the right to recover for improvements made in good faith, cannot be construed to apply to improvements made by one who derived his title through a life tenant whose interest was plainly shown by the title papers. Stewart v. Matheny, 5 South. 387, 66 Miss. 21, 14 Am. St. Rep. 538.

Mortgage.

A mortgage in good faith means the same thing as a mortgage for a valuable consideration without notice. People's Savings Bank v. Bates, 7 Sup. Ct. 679, 682, 120

U. S. 556, 30 L. Ed. 754 (citing Kohl v. Lynn, 34 Mich. 360).

No one can become a purchaser or an incumbrancer of property in good faith if he have notice of a pre-existing mortgage, although such mortgage may not be verified or recorded in accordance with the statute. Strahorn-Hutton-Evans Commission Co. v. Florer, 54 Pac. 710, 713, 7 Okl. 499.

The expression "good faith," as used in the statute providing that a chattel mortgage shall cease to be valid against the creditors of the person making the same or mortgagees in good faith after the expiration of one year from following the same, unless an affidavit of renewal is filed, is synonymous with "conscience." It embraces those obligations which are imposed upon one in dealing with property by the circumstances surrounding it at the time. It is fundamental that such preference cannot be acquired by any one having notice of the existing right, and the words "good faith" in the statute are therefore synonymous with "without notice." Riederer v. Plaff (U. S.) 61 Fed. 872, 873; Burchinell v. Gorsline, 52 Pac. 413, 415, 11 Colo. App. 22.

The words "good faith" in the chattel mortgage act, providing that an unrecorded chattel mortgage unaccompanied by immediate delivery shall be absolutely void as against the creditors of the mortgagor and as against subsequent purchasers and mortgagees in good faith, have been held to mean "without notice." Meding v. Roe (N. J.) 30 Atl. 587, 589.

"Good faith," as used in Chattel Mortgage Act, § 4, declaring unrecorded mortgages to be invalid as against creditors and purchasers and mortgagees in good faith, means such as parted with something of value, or otherwise altered their positions on the strength of the apparent ownership, and without notice. Milton v. Boyd, 22 Atl. 1078, 1082, 49 N. J. Eq. (4 Dick.) 142.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 39, § 1, providing that every mortgage on personal property, unaccompanied by immediate delivery, and followed by actual and continued change of possession, shall be absolutely void as against subsequent purchasers in good faith, unless the mortgage was executed in good faith and filed, cannot be construed to include a purchaser with actual notice of a prior conveyance. Tolbert v. Horton, 18 N. W. 647, 648, 31 Minn. 518.

A vendor and vendee, without any intent to defraud, entered into a genuine agreement that the sale of a certain lot should be "on time," and that the vendor should advance to the vendee a certain sum of money, to be used in the building of a house, taking for such sum and the purchase price of the lot a mortgage. Held, that such agreement, when executed, constituted the vendor a mortgagor in good faith. Hill v. Aldrich, 50 N. W. 1020, 48 Minn. 73.

"Good faith," when used with reference to the transfer of a mortgage, means without notice, as well as for a valuable consideration. Wright v. Larson, 51 Minn. 321, 53 N. W. 712, 38 Am. St. Rep. 504.

Offer to marry.

"Good faith," as used in Pen. Code, art. 969, authorizing the dismissal of prosecution if defendant offered to marry the complaining witness in good faith, means ability to consummate the marriage. Merrell v. State, 57 S. W. 289, 290, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 19.

Payment for corporate stock.

Under the so-called "trust fund doctrine," which is founded on the proposition that, as the state undertakes to relieve a stockholder in a corporation of general liability of the debts of the concern to the amount he has invested in the enterprise, he ought in good faith to pay in money or its equivalent the face value of the stock received, there has arisen what is called the "good-faith rule" in determining whether the property given in exchange for the stock was properly valued. Some courts hold that the valuation should be made in good faith, and some of them hold that, in the absence of an affirmative showing of fraud aliunde, mere oral valuation of the property given in exchange for stock will not render the stockholder liable for the difference, while others hold that overvaluation itself, especially if gross, constitutes or raises a strong presumption of fraud. State Trust Co. v. Turner, 82 N. W. 1029, 1030, 111 Iowa, 664, 53 L. R. A. 136.

Publication of libelous article.

St. 1894, § 5417, relating to actions for libel, providing that where a libel has been published in a newspaper, and the publisher of the paper, upon notice, publishes a retraction of the same, and that, if it appear on the trial that the same was published in good faith, the plaintiff shall only recover actual damages, means an absence of negligence as well as improper motives in making the publication. It must have been honestly made, in the belief of its truth, and upon reasonable grounds for this belief, after the exercise of such means to verify its truth as would be taken by a man of ordinary prudence under like circumstances. Allen v. Pioneer Press Co., 41 N. W. 936, 939, 40 Minn. 117, 3 L. R. A. 532, 12 Am. St. Rep. 707.

Purchase of personality.

A party who took personal property in payment of a debt, without notice, was a "purchaser in good faith," within Laws 1893, p. 253, making unrecorded conditional sales of property absolute as to creditors and purchasers in good faith. Johnston v. Wood, 53 Pac. 707, 708, 19 Wash. 441.

Laws 1833, c. 279, § 1, providing that the failure to record a chattel mortgage shall render it void against subsequent purchasers in good faith, does not include debtors of the mortgagor, who purchase the property in satisfaction of an existing indebtedness. Button v. Rathbone, Sard & Co., 27 N. E. 266, 267, 126 N. Y. 187.

Purchase of realty.

Want of notice and payment of the purchase money are not necessary ingredients to constitute one a purchaser in good faith within the meaning of Act Oct. 10, 1868, declaring that the liens of judgments created or preserved by certain acts and consequences of acts should be null and void against a purchaser in good faith for valuable consideration. "In certain cases the faith of a transaction involves the motive with which it is entered into. Thus, if a purchaser, knowing of a judgment not of itself a lien, has the view and purpose to defeat the creditor's execution, his purchase is iniquitous, and fraudulent, and is void against the creditor, notwithstanding he may give a full price; but, if his intention is pure, the sale is valid. Mere knowledge of a lien is not incompatible with good faith because the purchaser may buy subject to it." Thornton v. Bledsoe, 46 Ala. 73, 76.

Rev. St. 1851, c. 46, § 44, providing that all conveyances of real estate shall pass title without record as against all persons except subsequent purchasers in good faith for a valuable consideration whose conveyances should be first duly recorded, cannot be construed to include a judgment or attaching creditor. Gaston v. Merriam, 22 N. W. 614, 618, 33 Minn. 271.

Rev. St. § 2241, providing that those only who purchase in good faith shall be protected by a prior record of their deed, means to purchase without knowledge of an outstanding incumbrance, or any information sufficient to put the purchaser upon inquiry; and the law would not protect one who purchases land with knowledge of an outstanding unrecorded mortgage. Mueller v. Brigham, 10 N. W. 366, 368, 53 Wis. 173.

Acts 1873, c. 41, for the relief of purchasers of real estate at probate or chancery sales, when it states that the purchase money must have been in good faith paid by the purchaser, and in good faith applied to the payment of debts, or distributed among the distributees, means that it shall have been genuinely paid without any knowledge or suspicion of fraud either on the part of the purchaser or of the administrator. The term is used in contradistinction to "bad faith," and not in the technical sense in which it is applied to conveyances of title, in which latter sense a party wholly free from moral male fides is still frequently held not to be a bona fide purchaser. Cole v. Johnson, 53 Miss. 94, 99.

Purchase of stock.

To constitute good faith there must not only be an absence not alone of participation in the fraud or collusion with the vendee, but also of knowledge, or even of notice, of the fraud, or of facts and circumstances calculated to put an ordinary business man on inquiry, so that he would ascertain the truth. Thus, where it appeared that a purchaser of stock had suspicions relating to the sale of it, he cannot be said to be a purchaser in good faith. Pinkerton Bros. Co. v. Bromley, 77 N. W. 307, 308, 119 Mich. 8.

Set-off.

Statutes which provide that, in order to be allowed as a set-off, a demand must have belonged to the defendant in good faith before notice of the assignment of the plaintiff's claim, mean that demand shall be actually, and not merely colorably, owned by the defendants. Smith v. Warner, 16 Mich. 390, 398.

Where a defendant filed an offset sufficient in amount to entitle him to an appeal in a suit before a magistrate, and there was no evidence against it, it was held that the magistrate had no power to refuse the appeal on the ground that the offset was not filed in good faith. The court said in this connection: "Good faith, or the want of it, is not a tangible, visible fact that can be seen and touched, but rather a state or condition of mind which can only be judged of by actual or fancied tokens or signs; and the greatest errors have been committed and the bloodiest and blackest pages of history have been written by men who arrogate to themselves good faith and deny it to others. The richest ingredient of our inheritance is that there is woven into the texture of our organic law that crime cannot be predicated upon a fancied state of mind, nor fundamental rights lost or denied except for overt acts. Sin, whether original or imputed, doubtless exists, and sometimes in the most subtle form; but it has been found wiser and safer to leave that to free discussion and the harmless exercise of opinion, that the subtle disputants on creeds may have free course without power to inflict penalties for error of opinion or a bad state of mind. It is not probable that this justice had a very accurate conception of what good faith meant—whether it had reference to the Nicene creed or to some abstruse process of the law which he did not fully comprehend. This statute, to work beneficial results, must have a practical administration. The petitioner was denied a valuable right, because, as the record is made to say, he did not present his claim in good faith, and there was no evidence to the contrary." Wilder v. Gilman, 55 Vt. 504, 505.

Taking property of another.

"Good faith," as the term is used in the rule of law that a trespasser on the land of another who takes property therefrom shall be liable only for the actual damage if the property taken was taken in good faith, means that the taking is without culpable negligence or a willful disregard of the rights of others, and in the honest and reasonable belief that it was rightful. The term has been employed in the authorities upon this subject to characterize the acts of one who, while legally a wrongdoer, acted in the honest belief that his conduct was rightful. Whitney v. Huntington, 33 N. W. 561, 563, 37 Minn. 197.

Testimony.

In an instruction that the jury are not required to blindly receive the testimony of defendant as true, but are to fully and fairly consider whether it is true, and made in good faith, etc., it was contended that the expression "good faith" was uncalled for, in that, if the jury believe the testimony to be true, it made no difference whether it was given in bad faith; but the court held that, if the defendant's story was true, it was for that reason given in good faith; if it was false, then it was in bad faith, because it was false. "True" and "in good faith," used in such a connection, are necessarily convertible terms, and could not have misled the jury. Carleton v. State, 61 N. W. 699, 714, 43 Neb. 373.

Use of land.

Where the horticultural or agricultural use of a small tract of land is merely contributory to the comfort or convenience and for the purpose of adorning the home on such land, it cannot be said to be used for agricultural or horticultural purposes in good faith, so as to relieve it from liability from any city tax except a road tax, under Acts 23d Gen. Assem. c. 1, § 3. Windsor v. Polk County, 80 N. W. 323, 324, 109 Iowa, 156.

GOOD FENCE.

See "Good and Lawful Fence"; "Good and Sufficient Fence."

GOOD FOR ONE PASSAGE.

A railroad ticket stating that the same was good for "one first-class passage," means a continuous passage. A journey wherein the party going between two places stopped over at different places on the way would not be one passage within the meaning of the term as above used. Hamilton v. New York Cent. R. Co., 51 N. Y. 100, 104.

GOOD FOR ONE SEAT.

The statement "good for one seat," printed on a railroad ticket, means a seat in the train on which the passenger enters to be carried; not by different trains or by broken stages. "There is nothing in the words 'one seat' which enlarges the meaning so that the holder can take seat after seat, train after train, day after day, and from station to station, especially in contravention of the known regulations of the company as to the travel on such tickets. It necessarily follows that the contract for one seat must mean in the train which the holder of the ticket enters to be carried, and not by different trains and by broken stages day after day." Dietrich v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 71 Pa. (21 P. F. Smith) 432, 437, 10 Am. Rep. 711.

GOOD FOR THIS DATE, DAY, AND TRIP ONLY.

The words "good this date only," when indorsed on a railroad ticket, operate as a valid limitation on the ticket by which it is good for transportation only on the day on which it is dated. Elmore v. Sands, 54 N. Y. 512, 515, 13 Am. Rep. 617.

The words "good for this trip only" on a railroad ticket will not limit the undertaking of the company to any particular day, nor any specific train of cars. They do not relate to time, but to a journey; and, if the ticket has not been previously used, it entitles the holder to a passage on a subsequent day, as well as on the day it bears date. Pier v. Finch (N. Y.) 24 Barb. 514, 516.

A railroad company may, in making arrangements with another company to sell tickets over both roads at a rate less than the regular fare for transportation over each road if purchased separately, limit the time during which such ticket is good; and where a ticket is so sold, clearly stamped "Good for this day and train only," and it is not used until several days thereafter, the connecting road may refuse to accept and receive such ticket for carriage of the passenger. Shedd v. Troy & B. Ry. Co., 40 Vt. 88, 94.

The words "good for this date only," on a railroad ticket, operate as a limitation of the right of the holder to passage to the day only of the date of the ticket. Bolce v. Hudson River R. Co. (N. Y.) 61 Barb. 611.

A condition in a railroad ticket that it is "good for one continuous passage on and from the date," stamped on the back, implies that the ticket is limited to the day upon which it was dated, and to such further time as is necessary to complete the continuous passage designated. Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Powell, 35 S. W. 841, 842, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 212.

"Good for this day and train only," printed on a railway ticket, was not a representation that the first train passing the station after the purchase of the ticket would stop to take on passengers, and that the purchaser was entitled to passage on that particular train. Duling v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co., 6 Atl. 592, 596, 66 Md. 120.

GOOD HABITS.

A warranty of insured in a life policy that his habits were good, and had always been good, cannot be construed to mean that his habits were absolutely correct according to the strict rules of ethics, but they were and had always been ordinarily good. Galbraith's Adm'r v. Arlington Mut. Life Ins. Co., etc., 75 Ky. (12 Bush) 29, 39.

GOOD HEALTH.

The term "good health" in an application for a life insurance policy representing that the insured is in good health does not mean absolute perfection, but is comparative. The insured need not be entirely free from infirmity, or from all the ills to which flesh is heir. If he enjoys such health and strength as to justify the reasonable belief that he is free from derangement of organic functions, or free from symptoms calculated to cause a reasonable apprehension of such derangement, and to ordinary observation and outward appearance his health is reasonably such that he may with ordinary safety be insured, and upon ordinary terms, the requirement of good health is satisfied. Slight troubles, temporary and light illness, infrequent and light attacks of illness, not of such a character as to produce bodily infirmity or serious impairment or derangement of vital organs, do not disprove the warranty of good health. In other words, the term "good health," when used in a policy of life insurance, means that the applicant has no grave, important, or serious disease, and is free from any ailment that seriously affects the general soundness and healthfulness of the system. Barnes v. Fidelity Mut. Life Ass'n, 43 Atl. 341, 342, 191 Pa. 618, 45 L. R. A. 264 (citing 3 Joyce, Ins. § 2004); Goucher v. Northwestern Traveling Men's Ass'n (U. S.) 20 Fed. 596, 598; Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. of New York v. Beyer (Ky.) 67 S. W. 827, 828; Hann v. National Union, 56 N. W. 834, 836, 97 Mich. 513, 37 Am. St. Rep. 365; McDermott v. Modern Woodmen of America, 71 S. W. 833, 837, 97 Mo. App. 636.

The term "good health" in a life insurance policy is comparative; and an assured is in good health unless affected with a substantial attack of illness threatening his life, or with a malady which has some bearing on the general health. It does not mean in perfect health; nor would it depend upon ailments slight, and not serious in their natural consequences. Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Carder (U. S.) 82 Fed. 986, 989, 27 C. C. A. 344; Galbraith's Adm'r v. Arlington Mut. Life Ins. Co., etc., 75 Ky. (12 Bush) 29, 39; Mason's Benefit Society v. Winthrop, 85 Ill. 537, 541; Maine Benefit Ass'n v. Parks, 16 Atl. 339, 340, 81 Me. 79, 10 Am. St. Rep. 240; Jeffrey v. United Order of Golden Cross, 53 Atl. 1102, 1104, 97 Me. 176.

"Good health," as used in a warranty in an application for a policy of life insurance by a third person that insured is in good health, does not mean an actual freedom from illness or disease, but simply that the person has indicated in his actions and appearance no symptoms and traces of disease, and to the ordinary observation of a friend or relation is in truth well. Grattan v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 92 N. Y. 274, 280, 44 Am. Rep. 372.

Good health, within the meaning of the following question and answer in an application for life insurance: "Question. What is the present state of the party's health? Answer. Good"—means free from any apparent sensible disease or symptoms of them; that the party was not conscious of any derangement of the functions by which health could be tested; or, in other words, that he was in a good state of health. Conver v. Mutual Ins. Co. (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 368, 369.

The term "good health" in an application for renewal of a life insurance policy, representing that the insured was then in good health, should be construed by the standard of health existing at the time of the original policy and the description of the insured's condition and ailments contained in the declaration on which it was made. Where the insured, at the time of the renewal, is not affected with any diseases, other than those named in the original application, which tend to shorten life or increase the risk, and those diseases have not become so aggravated as to make his condition subsequently different from what it was at the date of the first policy, he is in good health within the meaning of the policy. The adjective "good" is comparative; it does not require absolute perfection. When, therefore, one is described as being in good health, that does not necessarily nor ordinarily mean that he is absolutely free from all and every ill that flesh is heir to, but rather means—especially in applications for life insurance—that the applicant is exempt from any dangerous disease, or one which frequently terminates fatally. Peacock v. N. Y. Life Ins.

Co., 20 N. Y. 293, 296. In an application for the renewal of a policy of life insurance, a certificate that the applicant is "now in good health" means the same thing as was meant by the same words when used in the original application for the policy; that is, just such health as the original declaration of the insured described. It cannot be said that good health has so definite a meaning that it admits of application to only one physical condition. Its ordinary use in the community does not import a perfect physical condition once in one hundred times. Peacock v. New York Life Ins. Co., 14 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Bosw.) 338, 347.

In construing an application for life insurance in which the assured had stated that he was in good health, the court said: "It cannot be supposed that one who, for the purpose of procuring insurance, alleges himself to be in good health, shall be understood as warranting himself to be in perfect and absolute health, for this is seldom, if ever, the fortune of any human being; and we are all born, as said by Lord Mansfield in Willis v. Poole, Park, Ins. 555, with the seeds of immortality in us. These inquiries as to symptoms of disease, as is said by Mr. Parsons, therefore must mean whether they have ever appeared in such a way or under such circumstances as to indicate a disease which would have a tendency to shorten life." Alabama Gold Life Ins. Co. v. Johnston, 80 Ala. 467, 475, 2 South. 125, 59 Am. Rep. 816.

"Good health," as contained in an application for reinstatement to life insurance stating that the applicant was in good health, means that state of health which his original application disclosed to the company. Massachusetts Ben. Life Ass'n v. Robinson, 30 S. E. 918, 932, 104 Ga. 256, 42 L. R. A. 261.

GOOD HUNTER.

"Good hunter," as applied to a horse, implies soundness in wind and eyes, which would exclude a whistler, whistling being a noise made in respiration by a horse while trotting or cantering, which, though at first it does not indicate any defect in pace or endurance, is apt to increase, and indicate such defect. 29 Alb. Law J. 25.

GOOD MERCHANTABLE SHIPPING HAY.

The meaning of the words "good merchantable shipping hay," within the meaning of a contract to sell such hay, is to be determined by evidence as to what was intended by such words. Fitch v. Carpenter (N. Y.) 43 Barb. 40, 42.

GOOD MORAL CHARACTER.

"Good moral character," as used in Rev. St. § 2165 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1329], providing that an alien, to be entitled to admission to citizenship, must first prove that he has behaved himself as a man of good moral character, means that he must have conducted himself as a man of good moral character ordinarily would, should, or does, but what constitutes good moral character is not easy to determine, as the standard may vary from one generation to another, and the conduct of the average man of the country is probably as high as the standard can be set, but, on general principles, it would seem that whatever is forbidden by the law of the land ought to be considered for the time being immoral; and therefore a person who violates the law thereby manifests in a greater or less degree that he is not well disposed to the good order and happiness of the country, and hence a man who commits perjury is not a man of good moral character. In re Spenser (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 921, 7 Cent. Law J. 84, 85.

The phrase "good moral character" as used in Rev. St. c. 144, § 2580, subd. 3, declaring that a person, in order to be admitted to the bar, must, in addition to other requisites, be of good moral character, is general in its application, and includes all the elements essential to make up such a character, among those being common honesty and veracity. In re O——, 42 N. W. 221, 225, 73 Wis. 602.

A teacher who habitually used profane language in the presence of his scholars, and who openly and conspicuously broke the Sabbath, was not a person of good moral character. Wieman v. Mabey, 8 N. W. 71, 72, 45 Mich. 484, 40 Am. Rep. 477.

GOOD MORTGAGE.

An affidavit that a mortgage was good and valid has reference to the character and sufficiency of the security, and not to the title simply. Du Flon v. Powers (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 391, 395.

GOOD NOTE.

See "Good and Collectible Note"; "Good and Sufficient Note."

GOOD OPPORTUNITY.

In a will reciting testator's wish that his farm should be rented for five years, and then sold, or, should a good opportunity offer, then the same should be sold sooner, and expressing the desire that his minor son, 17 years old, should buy the same, the expression "good opportunity" does not mean a good offer, so as to authorize the executors of the will to sell the farm at any time they receive a good offer for it. Appeal of Clouse, 43 Atl. 413, 414, 192 Pa. 108.

GOOD ORDER AND CONDITION.

See "Apparent Good Order."

The term "good order," when applied to the shipment of glass, is to be taken in the meaning in which it is used in the glass trade, and cannot be defined by the court in the absence of evidence of such meaning. King v. Nelson, 36 Iowa, 509, 512.

A bill of lading stating that goods were received in good order, but that the contents thereof are unknown, only means that the external condition of the goods was in good order. Clark v. Barnwell, 53 U. S. (12 How.) 272, 283, 13 L. Ed. 985; Vaughan v. 630 Casks of Sherry Wine (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 1114.

A bill of lading which recites that certain articles were shipped in good order and well conditioned refers to the exterior and apparent condition of the articles, and not to the internal condition, except so far as it may be inferred from external appearances. Gowdy v. Lyon, 48 Ky. (9 B. Mon.) 112, 114; The Olbers (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 635, 636; Bradstreet v. Heran (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 1183; Keith v. Amende, 64 Ky. (1 Bush) 455, 459.

A bill of lading reciting that the goods were shipped in good order and condition refers only to the external condition, and not to the state of the article. It has no reference to its soundness. West v. The Berlin, 3 Iowa, 532, 542; The Orisflamme (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 810; The California (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 1058, 1059.

The use of the words "good order" in a bill of lading reciting the receipt of the goods in good order is not conclusive, as between the carrier and shipper, that the goods were in fact in good order, but creates a presumption to such effect. Ellis v. Willard, 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 529; Barrett v. Rogers, 7 Mass. 297-300, 5 Am. Dec. 45; Carson v. Harris (Iowa) 4 G. Greene, 516, 517; Choate v. Crowninshield (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 646, 647.

The use of the words "good order," in a bill of lading reciting that freight received for carriage which is contained in boxes is in good order, operates to impose the burden of proof on the carrier of showing that the goods were not in good order when received. Price v. Powell, 3 N. Y. 322, 825; The Oriflamme (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 810.

The use of the words "good order," in a contract to deliver wool in good order, imports a warranty that the wool delivered will be in good order. Polhemus v. Helman, 50 Cal. 438.

Where a steamboat gave a bill of lading in which cotton is receipted for as in good order and condition, the receipt is not conclusive against the vessel, but throws the burden of proof upon it, and the recital cannot be overthrown or qualified except by evidence of a very clear and convincing character. The policy of the law—a policy justified by long experience—is to hold the carrier to a very strict accountability. The recital of a bill of lading is not to be weakened by a conjectural showing, and where the cotton, when delivered by the boat at its destination, was wet and damaged, it cannot be presumed, without clear proof, that the cotton was wet before its receipt by the steamer. Bond v. Frost, 6 La. Ann. 801, 802.

In a bill of lading containing a receipt of goods packed in boxes as in good order, and a contract to forward such goods, the parts of such bill containing the receipt may be explained and contradicted by parol evidence, as any other receipt. In such a receipt, if the property to be transported, and which was declared to be in good order, was in all parts open to inspection, and no fraud or imposition was practiced, it might not be unreasonable to say that no evidence should be admitted to prove that it was not in good order; but, in the case of goods put up in boxes, the exterior only of which was visible, and neither the interior, nor its quality or condition, could be known to the master, who signed the bill of lading, evidence is admissible to prove that the goods were not in good order at the time the bill of lading was given. The Missouri v. Webb, 9 Mo. 193, 195, 196.

"Good order," in a receipt signed by a person receiving goods from a carrier that the goods are in good order when so received, does not preclude the person giving the receipt from showing that they were not in fact in good order; but he may show that he wanted to sign for the goods as being in poor condition, but was not permitted to do so by the carrier. The instrument is a mere receipt, which may be varied by parol evidence. Tierney v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. (N. Y.) 10 Hun, 569, 570.

A bill of lading providing that the ship should deliver the goods in like good order and condition must be construed strictly, and so as to harmonize with the ship's duty to make a good delivery, and, as so construed, means that the goods may be landed at a proper time and place, though without notice to the consignee, and that, on the ship's taking reasonable care of them afterwards, they will be at the consignee's risk and expense, and therefore, if the goods are discharged at an improper time, or are voluntarily exposed to known and imminent peril of loss, the ship will be liable for breach of duty, though the goods were at the owner's risk after delivery in good order and condition. The Surrey (U. S.) 26 Fed. 791, 795.

The words "good order and condition," as used in an instruction stating that it is the duty of a city to keep its streets in good order and condition, are not synonymous with the words "reasonably safe condition for travel," since a street might not be considered in good order and condition, but still it might be reasonably safe for travel in ordinary modes with the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care. City of Denver v. Moewes, 60 Pac. 986, 987, 15 Colo. App. 28.

GOOD REASON TO BELIEVE.

See "Good and Lawful Reasons."

"Good reason to believe," as used in an affidavit for a warrant for arrest for trespass, alleging that the affiant has "good reason to believe" a just cause of action exists, is not "probable cause," within Const. art. 6, § 26, providing that such a warrant can only issue on a showing under oath of probable cause, but the facts must be sworn to. Meddaugh v. Williams, 12 N. W. 34, 35 48 Mich. 172.

GOOD REPAIR.

See "Good Tenatable Repair."

A provision in a charter of a tollbridge corporation that the bridge should at all times be kept in good, safe, and passable repair, meant in such condition as befitted a public highway, and safe and convenient for all kinds of travel at all seasons and at all times, by day and night. Commonwealth v. Central Bridge Corp., 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 242, 244.

An agreement of a lessee to deliver the premises in good repair at the expiration of the lease does not bind him to restore the buildings if burned, where it is stipulated that he shall take insurance to a certain amount, and assign it to the lessor, and use it to restore the buildings if destroyed by fire. Sun Ins. Office v. Varble, 46 S. W. 486, 103 Ky. 758.

GOOD REPUTE.

"Good repute," as used in an instruction in an action for seduction, declaring that, if the plaintiff's daughter was seduced and debauched, she being then an unmarried female of good repute, the jury would find defendant guilty, etc., means if she was honestly pursuing the path of virtue. "Good repute" is synonymous with, and only means, "of good reputation." State v. Wheeler, 18 S. W. 924, 925, 108 Mo. 658.

"Good repute" is synonymous with, and only means, "of good reputation." State v. Wheeler, 18 S. W. 924, 108 Mo. 658. And it has such meaning in the statute declaring it an offense for one under promise of marriage to seduce an unmarried female of good repute, under 18 years of age. State v. Sharp, 33 S. W. 795, 796, 132 Mo. 165.

In construing Rev. St. § 1259, providing for the punishment of persons who shall, under promise of marriage, seduce any unmarried female of good repute, it was held in State v. Patterson, 88 Mo. 88, 95, 57 Am. Rep. 374, that the words "of good repute" did not confine the evidence, on a prosecution under the act, to mere reputation of the prosecutrix, but that evidence of previous unchastity was admissible, the same as under statutes in which the words "of previous chaste character" are used instead of "of good repute." This conclusion is reached from an analysis of the essential meaning of the word "seduction." This case overrules State v. Brassfield, 81 Mo. 151, 51 Am. Rep. 235.

"Good repute for chastity," as used in a statute providing for the prosecution of any person seducing a woman of good repute for chastity, does not mean actual personal virtue. Actual personal virtue may be preserved while the good repute for chastity may be impaired by indiscreet conduct. The offer of evidence to show that the woman was not chaste is immaterial, and does not bear on the question of her good repute for chastity. Foley v. State, 35 Atl. 105, 106, 59 N. J. Law, 1.

GOOD RIGHT TO SELL.

GOOD SEED RICE.

A representation in a sale of rice that it was good seed rice amounted to a warranty, and, on the failure of the rice to sprout under proper conditions, the warranty was broken. Relger v. Worth Co., 41 S. E. 377, 130 N. C. 268, 89 Am. St. Rep. 865.

GOOD STANDING.

An application by a member of a temperance order for a beneficiary certificate in the nature of a life insurance policy contained the following clause: "I further agree that should I at any time violate my pledge of total abstinence, or be suspended or expelled for a violation of any of the laws of the order, or for nonpayment of dues," etc., "then all rights which either myself, the person or persons named in the certificate, my heirs," etc., "may have in the beneficiary fund of the order, shall be forfeited." The certificate provided that, "in case he is in good standing at the time of his decease, then the person or persons hereinafter named shall be entitled," etc. Held, that the term "good standing" not only implies that the party should be a member of the society at the time of his decease, but that he have a good reputation therein. The words should not be construed so as to make a trial and conviction of the violation of the insured's pledge of total abstinence a condition precedent to forfeiture. The words are to be construed with reference to the language of the certificate, and when this is done they manifestly mean not only good reputation, but good conduct; that is, a freedom from a violation of the pledge of total abstinence. The violation of this pledge, therefore, and not the expulsion or suspension by reason thereof, is a cause for forfeiture of rights and benefits under the certificate. Supreme Council Royal Templars of Temperance v. Curd, 111 Ill. 284, 289 (cited in High Court L. O. O. F. v. Zak, 26 N. E. 593, 595, 136 Ill. 185, 188, 29 Am. St. Rep. 318); Smith v. Knight of Father Mathew, 36 Mo. App. 184.

A member of an order at the time of his death in arrears of dues and assessments, the time for collecting which has fully expired, is, by reason of those facts, not in good standing, within the meaning of a benefit certificate requiring the member to be in good standing in the order at the time of his death, to entitle the beneficiary to recover. Puhr v. Grand Lodge German Order of Haugari, 77 Mo. App. 47, 63 (citing Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 414).

"Good standing," within the meaning of the order of the Knights of Honor, implies a full and fair compliance with their laws in the payment of assessments and dues; and therefore a member who is largely in arrears for assessments and dues is not in good standing, within the meaning of a benefit certificate, and his beneficiaries are not entitled to the payment of the same. It is not necessary to prevent insured from being in good standing that he should have been actually suspended before his death. McMurry v. Supreme Lodge Knights of Honor (U. S.) 20 Fed. 107.

A provision in the constitution of a fraternal insurance society that, if the member continue in good standing, the certificate shall be incontestable after a certain date from the issuance thereof, refers to such good standing as exists up to the time of death; and hence suicide, though elsewhere declared to avoid the certificate, does not involve loss of good standing. Royal Circle v. Achterrath, 68 N. E. 492, 498, 204 Ill. 549, 63 L. R. A. 452.

GOOD STEAM SAWMILL.

A promise by a vendee to erect on land a good steam sawmill is a promise to erect a mill capable of doing such work and to such amount as is ordinarily done by good mills. Such a promise is not void for uncertainty. Fraley v. Bentley, 46 N. W. 506, 1 Dak. 25.

GOOD SUPPORT.

See "Good and Comfortable Support and Maintenance"; "Good and Sufficient Support."

GOOD TENANTABLE REPAIR.

The phrase "good tenantable repair," in a lease requiring the tenant of a house to yield up the premises in good tenantable repair, is not violated by the act of the tenant, on quitting the property, in leaving nine cart loads of ashes, brickbats, and rubbish on the demised premises. Thorndike v. Burrage, 111 Mass. 531.

GOOD TITLE.

See "Good and Clear Title"; "Good and Marketable Title"; "Good and Perfect Title."

The term "good title" does not necessarily mean one perfect of record. Block v. Ryan, 4 App. Cas. (D. C.) 283, 287.

As clear title.

The word "good," in a vendor's contract to convey a good title, comprehends all that the word "clear" does, and therefore there is no strength to any argument based on the intention of the parties, as shown from the fact that the word "clear," in the original draft of the contract, was stricken out, and the word "good" inserted. Such change does not show that the parties did not intend that the title should be conveyed free from all incumbrances. Oakey v. Cook, 7 Atl. 495, 503, 41 N. J. Eq. (14 Stew.) 350.

"Good title" means a title free from litigation, palpable defects, and grave doubts. It should consist of both legal and equitable titles, fairly deducible of record. Reynolds v. Borel, 25 Pac. 67, 69, 86 Cal. 538 (citing Turner v. McDonald, 76 Cal. 179, 18 Pac. 262).

As marketable title.

A good title means not merely a title valid in fact, but a marketable title which can again be sold to a reasonable purchaser, or mortgaged to a person of reasonable prudence as a security for a loan of money. Irving v. Campbell, 24 N. E. 821, 822, 121 N. Y. 358, 8 L. R. A. 620; Moore v. Williams, 22 N. E. 233, 234, 115 N. Y. 586, 5 L. R. A. 654, 12 Am. St. Rep. 844; Emens v. St. John (N. Y.) 29 N. Y. Supp. 655, 657, 79 Hun, 102.

As fee-simple title.

The term "good title," in Acts 1854, § 18, speaking of the obtaining of a good title to certain real estate by a county, means a title in fee simple absolute. Title of itself to real estate implies an estate in fee. Nothing short is a complete title. A good title can be nothing less than a legal estate in fee—an estate indefeasible. Jones v. Gardner (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 266. Such would be the construction of an agreement between individuals. A contract to give a good title to real estate will be held to require a deed in fee that should in effect give a perfect title. Gillespie v. Broas (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 370, 381.

The words "good, unincumbered title," as used in Acts 1854, § 18, relating to the erection of a courthouse for the county of Schuyler, and directing commissioners to obtain a "good, unincumbered title" to certain lands for the purpose of erecting thereon a courthouse, jail, and clerk's office, mean a title in fee simple absolute, free and clear from any legal exception or charge thereon. They import an estate without any prior claim to continue forever, and having no qualification or condition in regard to its continuance. Gillespie v. Broas (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 370, 375.

Quitclaim deed.

The term "good title," as used in an agreement to sell and convey land with a good title, is satisfied by a deed of quitclaim, as such a deed vests the right of property and of exclusive possession as effectually as a warranty deed. Kyle v. Kavanagh, 103 Mass. 356, 359, 4 Am. Rep. 560.

A contract for the sale of land, by which the vendor agreed to furnish a good title, should not be construed to call for a conveyance with covenants of warranty, where the title was in the vendors. A quitclaim deed sufficiently complied with the terms of the contract. The title being in the vendors, the form of the conveyance was immaterial. Pugh v. Chesseldine, 11 Ohio, 109, 126, 37 Am. Dec. 414.

GOOD WARRANTY DEED.

As used in a covenant to execute a good warranty deed of conveyance, the word "good" refers only to the instrument of conveyance. The expression does not mean that the covenantor will give a good warranty title. It merely means that it is to be a good warranty deed of conveyance. Parker v. Parmele (N. Y.) 20 Johns. 130, 134, 11 Am. Dec. 253.

A bond conditioned that on the payment of a certain sum a party should make a good general warranty deed for a certain tract of land cannot be construed to require a covenant of seisin in such deed. Kirkendall v. Mitchell (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 676, 677.

GOOD WHITE MARBLE.

In Viall v. Hubbard, 37 Vt. 114, involving a contract for the sale of a good white marble headstone, the headstone made and delivered was shown to have been tarnished and discolored on the face of the stone and partly across the inscription by some accident and artificial means; and such discoloration was held a defect that impaired the value of the stone, and that defendant was not bound to accept it as a compliance with the contract. Lyndon Granite Co. v. Farrar, 53 Vt. 535.

GOOD WILL.

Good will is the advantage or benefit which is acquired by an establishment beyond the mere value of the capital stock, funds, or property employed therein, in consequence of the general public patronage and encouragement which it receives from constant or habitual customers on account of its local position, or from celebrity or reputation for skill or affluence or punctuality, or from other accidental circumstances or necessities, or even from ancient partialities or prejudices. Haverly v. Elliott, 57 N. W. 1010, 1011, 39 Neb. 201; Munsey v. Butterfield, 133 Mass. 492, 494; Howard v. Taylor, 8 South. 36, 37, 90 Ala. 241 (quoting Story on Partnership, § 99); Carey v. Gunnison (Iowa) 17 N. W. 881, 885 (cited in Nelson v. Hiatt, 56 N. W. 1029, 1032, 38 Neb. 478); Bell v. Ellis, 33 Cal. 620, 625; Boon v. Moss, 70 N. Y. 465, 473; Howe v. Searing (N. Y.) 10 Abb. Prac. 264, 277; Id., 19 How. Prac. 14, 17; Id., 19 N. Y. Super. Ct. (6 Bosw.) 354, 362; People v. Roberts, 53 N. E. 685, 688,

"Good will," as defined by Lord Eldon, means nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place. Porter v. Gorman, 65 Ga. 11, 14; Bell v. Ellis, 33 Cal. 620, 625; Bradford v. Peckham, 9 R. I. 250, 252; Fenn v. Boles (N. Y.) 7 Abb. Prac. 202, 203; Myers v. Kalamazoo Buggy Co., 20 N. W. 545, 548, 54 Mich. 215, 52 Am. Rep. 811; Chittenden v. Witbeck, 15 N. W. 526, 534, 50 Mich. 401. Sir George Jessel, in Ginesi v. Cooper, 14 Ch. Div. 596, 601, pointed out that this definition was one which was applicable only to the facts and situation in that case, and in the same opinion gives the following wider definition of "good will" made by Vice Chancellor Wood in Churton v. Douglas, 5 Jur. (N. S.) 887, 890—a leading case: "It would be taking too narrow a view of what was laid down by Lord Eldon to say that good will is confined to that. Good will, I apprehend, must mean every positive advantage, if I may so express it, as contrasted with the negative advantage of the late partner, not carrying on the business himself, that has been acquired by the old firm in carrying on its business, whether connected with the premises on which the business was previously carried on, or with the name of the late firm, or with any other matter carrying with it the benefit of the business." Newark Coal Co. v. Spangler, 34 Atl. 932, 933, 54 N. J. Eq. 354. See, also, Menendez v. Holt, 9 Sup. Ct. 143, 144, 128 U. S. 514, 32 L. Ed. 526; Farewell v. Huling, 23 N. E. 438, 439, 132 Ill. 112; Glen & Hall Mfg. Co. v. Hall, 61 N. Y. 226, 230, 19 Am. Rep. 278; Lobeck v. Lee-Clarke-Andresen Hardware Co., 55 N. W. 650, 653, 37 Neb. 158, 23 L. R. A. 795; Slack v. Suddoth, 52 S. W. 180, 182, 102 Tenn. 375, 45 L. R. A. 589, 73 Am. St. Rep. 881. In Crutwell v. Lye, 17 Ves. 335, "good will" is defined to be the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place. Zeigler v. Sentzler, 8 Gill & J. (Md.) 150, 158. "Good will" has been defined by the courts to be the favor which the management of a business wins from the public, and the probability that old customers will continue their patronage. Chittenden v. Witbeck, 50 Mich. 401, 15 N. W. 526. Lord Eldon, in Crutwell v. Lye, 17 Ves. 335, defined it simply as the probability that old customers will resort to the old place. Williams v. Farrand, 88 Mich. 473, 487, 50 N. W. 446, 14 L. R. A. 161.

The probable retention of customers is what is meant by "good will." Town of Bristol v. Bristol & Warren Waterworks, 49 Atl. 974, 975, 23 R. I. 274.

"The good will of a business comprises those advantages which may inure to the purchaser from holding himself out to the public as succeeding to an enterprise which has been conducted in the past with the name and repute of his predecessor." Knoedler v. Boussod (U. S.) 46 Fed. 465, 466.

"Good will is the favor which the management of a business wins from the public, and the probability that old customers will continue their patronage and resort to the old place. Good will is an advantage or benefit which is acquired by business establishments, beyond the mere intrinsic value of the capital stock. It is the general public patronage and encouragement which a business receives from its customers on account of its local position. It is the subject of value and price, and of bargain and sale, though intangible. But in order to be conveyed, mention must be made of it in the act of sale." Vonderbank v. Schmidt, 10 South. 616, 617, 44 La. Ann. 264, 15 L. R. A. 462, 32 Am. St. Rep. 336.

The good will of a business is not the business, but is one result springing out of it. It would be too narrow to construe the word "business" to be the good will of the business. McGowan v. Griffin, 37 Atl. 298, 299, 69 Vt. 168.

It is difficult to define all of the elements embraced in the term "good will," but it is evident that the valuable elements of a good will are those which attract the customers. They are all—excluding from the present consideration the right to continue the business in the firm name—included in the right to succeed to the business, and to carry it on openly as the successor to the old firm. Slater v. Slater, 80 N. Y. Supp. 363, 367, 78 App. Div. 449 (citing Thynne v. Shove, 45 Ch. Div. 577; Burchell v. Wilde, 1 Ch. 551; Knoedler v. Boussod [U. S.] 47 Fed. 465; People v. Roberts, 159 N. Y. 70, 81, 53 N. E. 685, 45 L. R. A. 126).

The good will of a business is the custom which it attracts and the benefits or advantages it receives from constant or habitual customers, and the probability that the old customers will continue to come to the place. A vendor who sells the good will of a business guarantees nothing, for, in the nature of things, he can give no assurance that the patronage of the place will continue. It is the sale of a mere chance that a preference which has usually been extended will continue. He wills what he has, and if the purchaser, when he attempts to continue the business, discovers that there is no trade or custom connected with it, he is without remedy, unless he can show some fraudulent representation or suppression of fact on the part of the vendor. Johnson v. Friedhoff, 27 N. Y. Supp. 982, 983, 7 Misc. Rep. 484.

The good will of a partnership may be defined as every possible advantage acquired by the firm in carrying on its business, whether connected with premises, name, or other matter. Farwell v. Huling, 132 Ill. 112, 119, 23 N. E. 438. No good will can exist except in cases of commercial or trade partnerships. None exists in a partnership engaged in the business of buying and selling grain and produce on commission, in the absence of a special contract. Douthart v. Logan, 86 Ill. App. 294, 309, 310.

Engaging in same business.

The sale of an established business, including good will, does not of itself imply a contract on the part of the seller not to engage in the same business so as to compete with the buyer. Jackson v. Byrnes, 54 S. W. 984, 985, 103 Tenn. 698.

"Good will," as used in sales of business or professional locations and the good will of the business, includes not only the established business and patronage or clientele thereof, but also an implied covenant that the seller will not engage in the same business in the same locality. French v. Parker, 14 Atl. 870, 872, 16 R. I. 219, 27 Am. St. Rep. 733.

Insurance agency.

On the dissolution of a partnership carrying on the business of an insurance agency in a firm name composed of the names of the partners, there is nothing left to which the good will, as a property right of the business, can attach, as neither partner has the exclusive right to carry on the old business; but, in the absence of stipulation, each is left to procure for himself alone the agency of the companies formerly represented by the firm. Rice v. Angell, 11 S. W. 338, 339, 73 Tex. 350, 3 L. R. A. 769; Smith v. Smith, 24 South. 618, 619, 51 La. Ann. 72.

Profit distinguished.

See "Profit."

As property.

See "Personal Property"; "Property."

School.

"Good will," as used in a contract for the sale of a school and the good will thereof, does not involve any personal effort on the part of the seller to use his personal influence to procure the attendance of pupils at such school. McCord v. Williams, 96 Pa. 78, 80.

Solicitation of former customers.

One who sells the good will of a business thereby warrants that he will not endeavor to draw off any of the customers. Merchants' Ad-Sign Co. v. Sterling, 57 Pac. 468, 469, 124 Cal. 429, 46 L. R. A. 142, 71 Am. St. Rep. 94.

The good will of a business is the reputation it has established in the community, including the customers which usually trade there; and therefore if a business is sold, and with it the owner's good will, that amounts to a warranty that the seller will not thereafter attempt to draw off any of the customers which he had previously had, from the purchaser. Snow v. Holmes, 11 Pac. 856, 859, 71 Cal. 142.

"Good will," as used in a contract of purchase of the interest of one partner, including the good will, by the other partner, means simply the right to conduct an old business at the old stand, and does not prevent the retiring partner from lawfully establishing a similar business in the neighborhood, and, by advertisements, circulars, cards, and personal solicitation, invite the public generally, including the customers of the old firm, to come there and purchase of him. The good will which has been the subject of sale is nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place. Cottrell v. Babcock Printing Press Mfg. Co., 8 Atl. 791, 800, 54 Conn. 122 (citing Crutwell v. Lye, 17 Ves. 335, 346).

Use of trade-name.

The good will of a business is the expectation of continued public patronage, but it does not include a right to use the name of any person from whom it was acquired. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1371; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4176; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 992; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3486; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 893; Mapes v. Metcalf, 88 N. W. 713, 716, 10 N. D. 601.

As used in the sale of the good will of a business, the term "good will" should not be construed to include the right to the use of the vendor's name of trade. Howe v. Searing (N. Y.) 19 How. Prac. 14, 17.

A sale of the good will of a business does not transfer the right to use the vendor's trade-name. Howe v. Searing (N. Y.) 19 How. Prac. 14, 25.

"Good will," as used in a partnership agreement providing that, on the death or withdrawal of a partner, the other partners could continue business, on paying for the stereotype and electrotype plates, engravings, publishing, patent and copy rights, good will, etc., a sum equal to the gross profits of the firm for the last two complete years preceding the time of settlement, includes the right to continue the business under the old firm name. Blake v. Barnes, 12 N. Y. Supp. 69, 72, 26 Abb. N. C. 208.

As used in a contract of sale, whereby a partnership is dissolved, and one of the partners transfers to the others all his interests in the firm business and assets, together with the good will, with the understanding that they are to succeed to the business of the old firm, the term "good will" includes the firm name. Brass & Iron Works Co. v. Payne, 33 N. E. 88, 89, 50 Ohio St. 115 (citing Churton v. Douglas, Johns. Eng. Ch. 174).

The good will of a partnership includes, among other things, the trade-name, to the extent that the purchaser may stand as a successor of the former firm; and, upon the death of the last survivor of a firm, although no provision for the sale of the name is made by statute, and although that name itself is not assignable by the administrators, still they may sell, in addition to the property and trade-marks, the good will of the firm, which shall include the right of the purchaser to advertise himself to the public thereafter as being the successor to the property and business of the firm which has become extinct. Fisk v. Fisk, 79 N. Y. Supp. 37, 38, 77 App. Div. 83.

GOOD WORK.

A notice "to put the mill in repair, so as to do good work," is sufficient to cover all alterations necessary to accomplish that end. Stillwell & Bierce Mfg. Co. v. Phelps, 9 Sup. Ct. 601, 603, 130 U. S. 520, 32 L. Ed. 1035.

Good work in one place is not of necessity good work everywhere else. It means such work as is usual and common, taking into consideration the place of the work, the kind of work, and the price stipulated to be paid for the same. Carter v. Adams (Ohio) Wright, 471.

GOOD WORKING CONDITION.

"Good working condition," within the meaning of a covenant in a lease of a mine that it shall be left at the expiration of the term in good working condition, imports that supports and pillars shall not be removed from the mine, even though all the coal is exhausted, because if the pillars are removed the surface of the ground will become depressed. Randolph v. Halden, 44 Iowa, 327, 329.

"The word 'goods' is defined by Webster as follows: 'Goods, n. pl.: (1) Movables; household furniture. (2) Personal or movable estate, as horses, cattle, utensils, etc. (3) Wares; merchandise; commodities bought and sold by merchants and traders.' The word is defined by Worcester: 'Goods (gudz), n. pl.: (1) Movables; personal or movable estate; furniture; chattels; effects; "All your goods, lands, and tenements." Shak. (2) Wares; freight; merchandise; commodities. "When the goods of our English merchants were attached." Raleigh, Syn.' The term 'goods' comprehends a person's movable property, chattels, cattle, implements of husbandry, etc.; goods and chattels; personal estate and effects." Vawter v. Griffin, 40 Ind. 593, 600.

"Webster defines 'good' as a valuable possession or piece of property; especially and almost universally in the plural; goods, wares, commodities, chattels." St. Joseph Hydraulic Co. v. Wilson, 33 N. E. 113, 115, 133 Ind. 465.

"The first exposition I have found of the word 'goods,' is in Bailey's Large Dictionary of 1732, which defines it simply 'merchandise'; and by Johnson, who followed as the next lexicographer, it is defined to be movables in a house; personal or immovable estates; wares; freight; merchandise." Passaic Mfg. Co. v. Hoffman (N. Y.) 3 Daly, 495, 512.

Goods and merchandise are commodities bought and sold by merchants and buyers. Chamberlain v. Transp. Co. (N. Y.) 45 Barb. 218, 223; Dyott v. Letcher, 29 Ky. (6 J. J. Marsh.) 541, 543; Vasse v. Ball (Pa.) 2 Yeates, 178, 182.

The word "goods" imports that the things which it is used to specify are chattels. Pickett v. State, 60 Ala. 77, 78.

As all personal property.

"The words 'goods and chattels,' at common law, include all personal property in possession." State v. Brown (Tenn.) 9 Baxt. 53, 54, 40 Am. Rep. 81; Hornblower v. Proud, 2 Barn. & Ald. 327, 335.

"The term 'goods,' when used in contradistinction to 'real estate,' doubtless includes all kinds of personal property." Curtis v. Phillips, 5 Mich. 112, 113 (cited in St. Joseph Hydraulic Co. v. Wilson, 33 N. E. 113, 115, 133 Ind. 465).

"Goods," as applied to bequests or devises, taken simply and without qualification, comprise the whole personal estate, of every description. Kendall v. Kendall, 4

Russ, 360, 370; Dowdell v. Hamm (Pa.) 2 Watts, 61, 65; Chamberlain v. Western Transp. Co., 44 N. Y. 305, 310, 4 Am. Rep. 681; Commonwealth v. Keller, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 253, 255.

"The words 'goods and chattels' are the most comprehensive terms of description for passing personal property by will, yet they may be restricted by the context." Foxall v. McKenney (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 645, 646.

"Goods and chattels," as words of description in a bequest, will pass all the personal estate, but, where used after the word "furniture," restrict the articles to the same kind as mentioned; that is, articles of furniture. Stuart v. Marquis of Bute, 11 Ves. 656, 665.

The word "goods," in common parlance, means goods only, and not the whole personal estate. Crickton v. Symes, 3 Atk. 61, 62.

Act Cong. May 20, 1862, empowering the Secretary of the Treasury to prevent transportation of any goods, wares, or merchandise intended for any place under the control of the insurgents, meant every species of property which was not real estate or freehold. In re Gay's Gold, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 358, 362, 13 L. Ed. 504.

The words "goods, wares, and merchandise," as used in Crimes Act, § 24, providing that every person who shall in the night season break and enter the store, shop, etc., of another, wherein goods, wares, or merchandise are deposited, with intent, etc., shall be imprisoned, on conviction thereof, for a certain term, mean "any personal property of which a larceny may be committed, and not those goods and chattels only which are offered for sale." State v. Brooks, 4 Conn. 446, 449.

The word "goods," in a statute relative to the recording of mortgages of negroes, goods, and chattels, means evidently what is usually understood by "goods, wares, and merchandise." The term would not embrace horses, cattle, plate, household furniture, and the like, with sufficient clearness. Ex parte Leland (S. C.) 1 Nott & McC. 460, 462.

The word "goods," in the definition of "bailment," to the effect that it is the delivery of goods, etc., includes every article of movable and tangible personal property. McCaffery v. Knapp, Stout & Co. Company, 74 Ill. App. 80, 85; Knapp, Stout & Co. Company v. McCaffrey, 52 N. E. 898, 900, 178 Ill. 107, 69 Am. St. Rep. 290.

The words "goods, wares, and merchandise," in the statute of frauds, are equivalent to the term "personal property," and are intended to include whatever is not embraced by the words "lands, tenements, and hereditaments," in the preceding section

French v. Schoonmaker, 54 Atl. 225, 69 N. J. Law, 6.

The words "personal property," as used in Rev. St. c. 120, § 254, providing that taxes assessed on personal property shall be a lien on the personal property of the person assessed, and the words, "goods and chattels," as used in section 137, providing that in all cases the collector's warrant shall authorize the town or district collector, in case any person named in such collector's book shall neglect to pay his personal property tax, to levy the same by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of such person, are to be construed as having the same meaning, and as comprehending every species of personalty which may, under the statute, be made the subject of levy and sale under execution issued under a judgment at law. Loeber v. Leininger, 175 Ill. 487, 51 N. E. 703.

The word "goods," as used in the provisions of the Code punishing the receiving of stolen goods, includes money and bank notes, as well as all other kinds of personal property. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 6556.

As all property.

Technically the word "goods" does not include lands or slaves, but, as used in the following devise, "and as touching my worldly goods, which it has pleased Almighty God to bless me with, I give and bequeath in the manner and form following," is construed to include all the testator's property of every description. Bailey v. Duncan's Ex'x, 18 Ky. (2 T. B. Mon.) 20, 22.

Advancements.

The term "goods and chattels," used in reference to the goods and chattels as to which a decedent dies intestate, does not include advancements made by the decedent to his children in his lifetime. Knight v. Oliver (Va.) 12 Grat. 33-37.

Alcohol.

The words "goods, wares, or merchandise," as used in Gantt, Dig. § 1618, providing for the punishment of every person who shall on Sunday keep open any store, or retail any goods, wares, or merchandise, should be construed to include alcohol. Bridges v. State, 37 Ark. 224, 225.

Animals.

The term "goods" includes things inanimate, furniture, farming utensils, corn, etc. Pippin v. Ellison, 34 N. C. 61, 62, 55 Am. Dec. 403; Vaugun v. Town of Murfreesborough, 2 S. E. 676, 677, 96 N. C. 317, 60 Am. Rep. 413.

"It is said in Burrill's Law Dictionary that the word 'goods' strictly seems to be applicable only to inanimate objects; being in this respect less comprehensive than 'chattels,' which includes animals." St. Joseph Hydraulic Co. v. Wilson, 33 N. E. 113, 115, 133 Ind. 465.

"Goods," as used in a lease giving the landlord a lien on all goods in a store for rent unpaid, could include only inanimate movables, the term being less comprehensive than "chattels," and hence such term could not include animals. Van Patten v. Leonard, 55 Iowa, 520, 8 N. W. 334, 336.

The term "goods or articles" includes a horse, as used in Gen. St. p. 503, § 15, relating to the receiving of stolen goods or articles. State v. Ward, 49 Conn. 429, 442.

The word "goods," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 3460, providing for the seizure of goods as subject to forfeiture under provisions of the internal revenue law, covers a team of mules used for the removal of spirits with intent to defraud the government. The term "goods" has often been construed to cover animate property. Pilcher v. Faircloth, 33 South. 545, 546, 135 Ala. 311 (citing Hadley v. Patterson, 47 Ala. 271; Weston v. McDowell, 20 Mich. 353).

Within a statute making goods and chattels the subject of larceny, a dog is included. Rockwell v. Oakland Circuit Judge (Mich.) 94 N. W. 378, 379.

The term "goods" is commonly applied to inanimate movables, but its full significance, especially in its legal sense, has a larger or more extensive application. As defined by Webster, it signifies movables, household furniture, personal or movable estate, as horses, cattle, utensils, etc. The primary meaning of the term refers to movable property, whether animate or inanimate. As used in Gen. St. p. 320, § 13, providing that the action of replevin may be maintained for goods unlawfully taken or retained from the owner thereof, it includes both animate and inanimate movable property. Eddy v. Davis, 35 Vt. 247.

While the word "goods" may in some instances include animals, yet such is not the case where the context or the particular enumeration of articles would seem to exclude them. Bouvier says the term "goods" is not as wide as "chattels," for it applies to inanimate objects, and does not include animals. A fire and storm insurance company, authorized to insure certain described properties—personal property, goods, wares, merchandise, and effects, etc.—held not authorized to insure horses. Knapp v. North Wales Mut. Live Stock Ins. Co., 11 Montg. Co. Rep. 119, 121.

Appurtenances or equipments of ship.

The term "goods, wares, or merchandise," within the meaning of the revenue act of 1799, c. 128, § 50, requiring a permit before a ship shall land goods, wares, or merchandise, does not include appurtenances or equipments of a ship, as a chain, cable, or other articles purchased bona fide for the use of the ship. United States v. Chain Cable (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 391, 392.

Baggage.

A marine policy on goods means only such as are merchantable, and does not include baggage. Vasse v. Ball (Pa.) 2 Yeates, 178, 182.

The word "goods," as used in 1 Brightly, Dig. p. 834, § 1, providing that no owner or owners of any vessel shall be liable for loss or damage which may happen to any goods or merchandise which shall be shipped on such vessel, by any fire happening on such vessel, unless caused by the design or neglect of its owners, is to be construed in its broad sense, as meaning personal property, and hence includes the personal baggage of a passenger. Chamberlain v. Western Transp. Co., 44 N. Y. 305, 310, 4 Am. Rep. 681.

Bank notes.

Bank notes are not goods, wares, and merchandise, in the meaning of an act incorporating a company as a carrier of goods, wares, and merchandise. Sewall v. Allen (N. Y.) 6 Wend. 335, 355.

Bank notes are personal goods. In form, a bank note is a chose in action, and, when dishonored, becomes the evidence of a right of action; a document for a debt. Bank notes have been held to be within the terms of "goods, wares, and merchandise." United States v. Moulton (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 11, 12.

Bonds.

A devise of all the testator's goods passed a debt by bond. Anon., 1 P. Wms. 267.

The words "goods, wares, and merchandise," in the sixth section of the statute of frauds, are equivalent to the terms "personal property," and intended to include whatever is not embraced by the phrase "lands, tenements, and hereditaments," and include a bond and mortgage. Greenwood v. Law, 26 Atl. 134, 55 N. J. Law (26 Vroom) 168, 19 L. R. A. 688. See, also, Allen v. Sewall (N. Y.) 2 Wend. 327, 339.

The words "goods and movables," when used in a will bequeathing testator's goods and movables, will include bonds belonging to the testator, unless there is something in the context of the whole will which will restrain such a construction. Jackson v. Robinson (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 101, 102, 1 Am. Dec. 293.

The words "goods or chattels," as used in Rev. Laws 174, § 2, providing that, where any testator or intestate in his lifetime shall have taken or carried away or converted to his own use the goods or chattels of any person, such person could maintain the same action against the executors and administrators of such testator or intestate as he could have maintained against such testator or intestate, should be construed to include bonds and other documentary securities, for they are bona notabilia, and therefore property, though there is a distinction between rights and credits and goods and chattels. Terhune v. Bray's Ex'rs, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 53, 54.

Building.

A declaration to recover for "goods, wares, and merchandise" sold and delivered should be construed to include a building which was movable property belonging to the plaintiff and the other proprietors. "The word 'goods,' as a technical term of the law, is nomen generalissimum, and has a very extensive meaning. In a strict sense, as the word is understood in the construction of penal statutes, it is limited to movables belonging to the property of some person, which have an intrinsic value, and does not include securities, which are not valuable in themselves, but merely representing value. In a will, where there is nothing to restrain its operation, it includes all the personal estate of the testator. In its legal sense, as answering to the law term 'biens,' it includes all tangible personal property, even including animals, and is broad enough to include a building standing on the land of another." Keyser v. School Dist. No. 8 in Sunapee, 35 N. H. 477, 483.

Chattel distinguished.

"Goods, wares, and merchandise" means all movable property that is ordinarily bought and sold, while "chattels" is a more comprehensive term, and includes animate property. Smith v. Wilcox, 24 N. Y. 353, 358, 82 Am. Dec. 302; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Thompson, 19 Ill. (9 Peck) 578, 583; Dowdel v. Hamm (Pa.) 2 Watts, 61, 63, 65; Pippin v. Ellison, 34 N. C. 61, 62, 55 Am. Dec. 403. See, also, Pearce v. City Council of Augusta, 37 Ga. 597, 599.

Chose in action.

"Goods" is a general term, of wide import, including all personal property, not only corporeal, but choses in action, such as bills, notes, etc. Epping v. Robinson, 21 Fla. 36, 52; Dowdel v. Hamm (Pa.) 2 Watts, 61, 63, 65; Gibbs v. Usher (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 303, 304; Allen v. Sewall (N. Y.) 2 Wend. 327, 339.

"Goods or chattels" includes, when taken in its broadest sense, any variety of personal property, whether corporeal or incorporeal; but the sense of the term may be so limited by the context as to refer to corporeal personalty only—as, for instance, in Rev. St. art. 2546, providing that gifts of goods or chattels shall not be valid unless actual possession be acquired by the donee, choses in action are construed not to be goods or chattels. This construction apparently proceeds on the ground that the owner of a chose in action, desiring to pass it to another, cannot give actual possession; written evidence of the right being, at best, but evidence of title in the donee, not possession of the property itself. Cowen v. First Nat. Bank, 63 S. W. 532, 533, 94 Tex. 547.

The term "goods and chattels," as used in Code 1873, p. 897, §§ 4-6, requiring every contract in writing made in respect to real estate or goods and chattels in consideration of marriage to be in writing and to be recorded, means such property and such goods and chattels as are visible, tangible, or movable. It does not include a mere chose in action. Kirkland v. Brune (Va.) 31 Grat. 126, 131.

The term "goods and chattels," as used in the recording act, means only personal property which is visible, tangible, and movable, and does not embrace choses in action. Tingle v. Fisher, 20 W. Va. 497, 511.

Choses in action are not, in the hands of an assignee thereof, "goods, effects or credits" of the assignor, so as to be liable to trustee process. Lupton v. Cutter, 25 Mass. (8 Pick.) 298, 300.

All the definitions of the word "goods" refer to things that are visible and in possession, while the definition of "chose in action" refers to something invisible, intangible, as a debt or demand or right of action. The statute of frauds, relating to the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise for the price of $50 or upwards, has no application to the sale or contract to transfer a mere chose in action, such as a debt or evidence of a debt. Vawter v. Griffin, 40 Ind. 593, 601, 602.

A debt, though incapable of manual delivery, is "goods or effects," within Code Civ. Proc. § 657, relative to attachments. Minor v. Gurley, 80 N. Y. Supp. 596, 597, 39 Misc. Rep. 662.

An instrument in these words, "Pay to John Low or bearer $1,500 in n. Myer's bills or yours," is not an order for the payment of money or the delivery of goods. People v. Farrington (N. Y.) 14 Johns. 348.

Dredge, scow, or yacht.

Dredges and scows are vessels, and are not dutiable as "goods, wares, and merchandise," under the tariff laws. The International (U. S.) 83 Fed. 840.

A pleasure yacht built in a foreign country, and purchased there by an American citizen, is not dutiable as "goods, wares, and merchandise," after her entering port in this country. The Conqueror, 17 Sup. Ct. 510, 512, 166 U. S. 110, 41 L. Ed. 937.

Execution.

An execution in the hands of a sheriff for service is not "goods, effects, or credits" of the execution creditor, within the meaning of the statute empowering a creditor to attach the goods, effects, and credits of his debtor in the hands of a third person, where they may be found, and who for this purpose is considered as a trustee of the defendant. Sharp v. Clark, 2 Mass. 91, 93.

Farm produce.

The phrase "goods, wares, and merchandise," as used in Acts 1796, § 5, providing that all actions or suits founded upon accounts for goods, wares, or merchandise sold and delivered, etc., shall be commenced and sued within 12 months, as to the cause of such action or suit, etc., includes only those articles which are sold or kept for sale by a merchant; that which is sold by a merchant in the course of his business as such. It would not include property and produce sold by a farmer. Dyott v. Letcher, 29 Ky. (6 J. J. Marsh.) 541, 543.

Act April 17, 1846, § 1, forbidding the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise by any person as a hawker or peddler, was not intended to include farm products in the hands of farmers. Commonwealth v. Gardner, 19 Atl. 550, 551, 133 Pa. 284, 7 L. R. A. 666, 19 Am. St. Rep. 645.

Fixtures.

The words "goods, chattels, and effects," as used in a declaration in trespass for breaking and entering plaintiff's dwelling house and taking "goods, chattels and effects," would include fixtures. Fixtures may be taken in execution under a fi. fa. containing similar words. Pitt v. Shew, 4 Barn. & Ald. 206, 207.

Flour.

"Goods," as used in the statute of frauds, would include flour not prepared or in a state capable of immediate delivery. Garbutt v. Watson, 5 Barn. & Ald. 613.

Gravel.

Gravel falls under an original description in the act of Parliament (35 Geo. III) giving the commissioners for making the Eau Brink navigation a toll on "goods, wares, and merchandise." Coulton v. Ambler, 13 Mees. & W. 403, 417.

Growing crops.

Growing periodical crops are not goods and chattels, within the meaning of the statute of frauds, of which a sale, in order to be valid as against the creditors of the vendor, must be accompanied by an immediate delivery and continued change of possession. Davis v. McFarlane, 87 Cal. 634, 638, 99 Am. Dec. 340.

Household furniture.

A marine policy on goods means only such as are merchantable, and does not include household furniture. Vasse v. Ball (Pa.) 2 Yeates, 178, 182.

Interest in unpatented invention.

The phrase "goods, wares, or merchandise," as used in the statute of frauds, requiring contracts for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise to be in writing, does not include an interest in an unpatented invention. Somerby v. Buntin, 118 Mass. 279, 19 Am. Rep. 459.

Leasehold.

The expression "goods and chattels" means goods and chattels personal, and not real. Hence it does not include a leasehold. Putnam v. Westcott (N. Y.) 19 Johns. 73, 76.

A mortgage of leasehold interest does not come within the provision of Laws 1833, c. 279, requiring mortgages of goods and chattels to be filed. State Trust Co. v. Casino Co., 41 N. Y. Supp. 1, 2, 18 Misc. Rep. 327.

"Goods and effects," within the meaning of Act June 13, 1836, relating to the service of foreign attachments on the goods and effects of the debtor, cannot be construed to include leaseholds of lands, and buildings on leaseholds. The meaning of the words is free from all ambiguity or doubt, whether used in the popular, lexicographical, or legal sense. The word "goods" is always used to designate wares, commodities, and personal chattels. The word "effects" is the equivalent of the word "movables." Appeal of Vandergrift, 83 Pa. 126, 129.

Land.

Under a statute authorizing the institution of trustee process to reach goods, effects, and credits of the debtor, it is held that land fraudulently conveyed is neither goods, effects, nor credits, within the statute. Hunter v. Case, 20 Vt. 195, 197.

Goods are valuable possessions or pieces of property; effects are goods, movables, or personal estate; and so goods and effects have never been held to include real estate, and will thus be construed as used in the treaty of 1873 between the United States and Sweden (page 1042, Treaties and Conventions between the United States and Other Powers), providing that subjects of the contracting parties may freely dispose of their goods and effects, either by testament, donation, or otherwise. Meier v. Lee, 76 N. W. 712, 715, 106 Iowa, 303.

Lottery tickets.

"Anything made the subject of traffic and sold as lottery tickets usually are, the right of property in which passes by the mere delivery thereof by the seller to the buyer, may properly be construed as coming under the denomination of 'goods, wares, and merchandise.'" Yohe v. Robertson (Pa.) 2 Whart. 155, 162.

Money.

"Goods and chattels," as used in Swan's St. 273, providing that if any person shall receive or buy any goods and chattels that have been stolen, with intent to defraud the owner, he shall be punished, includes coin. Hall v. State, 3 Ohio St. 575, 576.

The word "goods" has the same signification as the word "bona" in the civil law, under which name is comprehended almost every species of personal property. Act July 13, 1861, providing for the forfeiture of all goods coming from or proceeding to the insurrectionary districts, includes gold coin. United States v. Caudace (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 279, 280.

Code Va. 1887, § 20,655, provided that an action of trespass or trespass on the case may be maintained by or against a personal representative for the taking or carrying away of any goods, etc. It was held that the term "goods" is broad enough to include money, and, as used in the statutes, must be held to be so inclusive, for it would be strange that a cause of action for taking and carrying away 1,000 pieces of silver should survive the death of the defendant, while a like action for taking and carrying away $1,000 in money should not. In The Elizabeth & Jane (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 473, Mr. Justice Story said: "It cannot be doubted that money, and, of course, foreign coin, falls within the description of goods, at common law." Patton v. Brady, 22 Sup. Ct. 493, 494, 184 U. S. 608, 46 L. Ed. 713.

"Goods," as used in 1 St. 665, requiring a permit from the customhouse for the landing of goods, wares, and merchandise, includes coin. "It cannot be doubted that money, and, of course, foreign coin, falls within the description of goods, at common law; and a legacy of goods would, ex vi termini, carry money or coin, unless that construction were repelled by the context. And coin, dollars, and bullion are considered in commercial transactions as goods and merchandise, and may be insured as such in a policy of insurance." The Elizabeth & Jane (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 473, 474.

"Goods and chattels," as used in an indictment charging the breaking into the house of a certain person with intent to steal the goods and chattels of such person, means the personal goods of such person, and includes bank bills and money. Garfield v. State, 74 Ind. 60, 65.

Rev. St. p. 279, § 72, making it a misdemeanor to receive or buy any stolen goods or chattels, cannot be construed to include bank notes. State v. Calvin, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 207.

"Goods, wares, and merchandise," as used in the statute of frauds requiring contracts of sale of goods, wares, and merchandise to be reduced to writing, does not include United States treasury checks. Beers v. Crowell (Ga.) Dud. 28, 29.

"Goods," as used in Swan & C. Rev. St. 105, § 1, providing that an action may be instituted against a steamboat company for damages arising out of any contract for the transportation of goods or persons, etc., means only such goods as the officers of the boat have power to contract for the transportation of, and does not include money or bank bills, since the owners of a steamboat are not liable for the loss of money received to be carried unless they have in some way assented, expressly or impliedly, to the practice of the boat's doing that kind of business. Pumphry v. Steamboat Parkersburgh (Ohio) 2 West. Law Month. 491, 492.

The word "goods" is of limited significance, and does not include money, so that under a statute authorizing the attachment of goods, effects, and credits by trustee process, money cannot be attached. Morrill v. Brown, 32 Mass. (15 Pick.) 173, 176.

A statute relating to the tax levied on goods, wares, or merchandise cannot be construed to include money in bank. Boston Investment Co. v. City of Boston, 33 N. E. 580, 581, 158 Mass. 461.

"Goods," as used in Code 1880, § 1178, declaring that no transfer of goods or chattels between husband and wife shall be valid, as against any third person, unless such transfer or conveyance be in writing, and acknowledged and filed for record as a mortgage or deed of trust of such property is required to be filed for record, etc., does not include money. Leinkauf v. Barnes, 5 South. 402, 405, 66 Miss. 207.

Music.

The words "goods, wares, and merchandise," in Acts 1852-53, § 30, declaring that no person shall sell any goods, wares, or merchandise, without obtaining a license, except, etc., include music, as the word is frequently used to import a kind of merchandise which is found exhibited for sale in the store of nearly every bookseller or stationer in the country; and an indictment charging the sale of music without a license is sufficient, without the use of words explaining the meaning of the term "music" as there used.

Commonwealth v. Nax (Va.) 13 Grat. 789, 791.

Newspaper.

The words "goods, wares, and merchandise," as used in a statute prohibiting the sale of "goods, wares, and merchandise" on Sunday, include all movable property that is ordinarily bought and sold, and include a newspaper which is made the subject of sale. Smith v. Wilcox, 24 N. Y. 353, 358, 82 Am. Dec. 302.

Note.

Act Nov. 18, 1789, providing for the punishment of a person who shall have gotten into his possession the money or goods of another, should be construed to include a promissory note of a bank. Commonwealth v. Swinney, 1 Va. Cas. 146, 149, 5 Am. Dec. 512.

The words "goods, wares, and merchandise," in the statute of frauds, requiring agreements for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise to be in writing, do not embrace every variety of personal property, and do not include a promissory note. A promissory note is neither goods, wares, nor merchandise, in the common and ordinary sense of those terms. It is only by giving them a broad and unusual signification that bills of exchange and notes of hand can be included, and there is no occasion for extending the construction so as to include matters which are not within the well-understood meaning of the statute. Whittemore v. Gibbs, 24 N. H. (4 Fost.) 484, 488.

Within the meaning of Rev. St. c. 81, § 8, giving the court jurisdiction to hear in equity all suits to compel the redelivery of any goods or chattels whatsoever taken and detained from the owner thereof, and secreted or withheld, so that the same cannot be replevied, notes and other securities for debts are goods and chattels, and may be recovered in such an action. Clapp v. Shephard, 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 228, 230.

Right to office.

"Goods and chattels" include personal property, choses in action, and chattels real. The right to an office is neither personal property, nor a chose in action, nor chattels real, in the sense used in the law. State v. Moores, 76 N. W. 530, 533, 56 Neb. 1.

Safe.

A bill of sale from an insolvent debtor to his creditor, describing the property as all my stock of "goods, wares, and merchandise in my store," will include an iron safe, if such was the intention of the parties. Rankin v. Vendiver, 78 Ala. 562, 566.

A chattel mortgage given by a merchant on goods in the store includes only the merchandise and commodities kept on hand for the purpose of sale, and does not include a safe kept in his store, not for sale, but for his own private use. The term "goods," as used in this chattel mortgage, cannot be given the broad meaning that is given when the word is used in contradistinction to "real estate," when it includes all kinds of movable personal property. Curtis v. Phillips, 5 Mich. 112, 113.

Shares of stock.

Shares of corporate stock are goods, wares, and merchandise, within the meaning of the statute of frauds, requiring a sale of goods, wares, and merchandise to be in writing. Ellison v. Brigham, 38 Vt. 64, 66; North v. Forest, 15 Conn. 400, 404; Fine v. Hornsby, 2 Mo. App. 61, 64; Bernhardt v. Walls, 29 Mo. App. 206; Colvin v. Williams (Md.) 3 Har. & J. 38, 42, 5 Am. Dec. 417; Ayres v. French, 41 Conn. 142, 151; Boardman v. Cutter, 128 Mass. 388, 390. Contra, see Humble v. Mitchell, 11 Adol. & E. 205; Southern Life Ins. & Trust Co. v. Cole, 4 Fla. 359, 378; Rogers v. Burr, 31 S. E. 438, 440, 105 Ga. 432, 70 Am. St. Rep. 50; First Nat. Bank v. Holland, 39 S. E. 126, 129, 99 Va. 495, 55 L. R. A. 155, 86 Am. St. Rep. 898.

A statute requiring the filing of mortgages on all goods and chattels means personal property of all kinds which is capable of visible possession, and hence a mortgage of capital stock of a corporation is not within the statute. Williamson v. New Jersey South R. Co., 26 N. J. Eq. (11 C. E. Green) 398, 403.

"Goods and chattels," as used in Nix. Dig. 294, § 7, providing that the rights, credits, moneys or effects, goods and chattels, lands and tenements, of a defendant may be attached, should be construed to include corporate stock. Curtis v. Steever, 36 N. J. Law (7 Vroom) 304, 306.

The phrase "goods, wares, and merchandise," as used in a city ordinance declaring that a broker is one who, for a commission, is engaged in selling or negotiating the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise, includes and comprehends shares in capital stock of incorporated companies which are the subject of common barter and sale, and which are given visible and palpable form by means of certificates, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness. Banta v. City of Chicago, 50 N. E. 233, 237, 172 Ill. 204, 40 L. R. A. 611.

Steam engine.

A steam engine erected for the purpose of working a colliery, to be used by the lessee during his term, and to be held as the property of the landlord, does not come within the description of goods and chattels. Coombs v. Beaumont, 5 Barn. & Adol. 72 (quoting 6 Geo. IV, c. 18, § 72).

Wares, commodities, and chattels.

The word "goods," as used in the definition of a retailer as one who sells goods by small quantities or parcels, includes wares, commodities, and chattels. Said in construing a city ordinance providing for the levy and collection of a license tax on lumber dealers. Campbell v. City of Anthony, 40 Kan. 652, 654, 20 Pac. 492, 493.

GOODS AND CHATTELS.

See "Goods."

As property, see "Property."

GOODS AND EFFECTS.

See "Effects."

GOODS HELD ON STORAGE.

An insurance policy on a hotel and its furniture, and excepting from its operation goods held on storage, cannot be construed to include furniture, etc., stored in the hotel, to be used or consumed in the business of the hotel whenever the patronage made such use necessary; being owned by the insured, and consisting of such articles as were contemplated to be covered by the policy; the deposit being merely incidental, with a view to be used and consumed in the business of the hotel. Continental Ins. Co. v. Pruitt, 65 Tex. 125, 129.

GOODS IN TRUST.

See "Held in Trust."

GOODS KEPT IN COUNTRY STORES.

A fire policy on a stock of merchandise, described in the written part as including goods usually kept in country stores, includes gasoline, if gasoline is an article usually kept in a country store, although the policy contains a printed condition that, unless otherwise provided, it shall be void if gasoline is kept on the premises. Yoch v. Home Mut. Ins. Co., 44 Pac. 189, 190, 111 Cal. 503, 34 L. R. A. 857.

An insurance policy on a building, and also on a stock of goods therein, such as are usually kept in country stores, should be construed to include all articles of merchandise coming within the said description, even though it includes articles generally prohibited, except at special rates. Therefore such a policy must be construed as insuring spirits of turpentine and gunpowder, where they are articles of merchandise usually kept in country stores, as much as though these articles had been specifically mentioned as insured in the policy. Pindar v. Kings County Fire Ins. Co., 38 N. Y. 648, 649, 93 Am. Dec. 544.

GOODS OF SIMILAR DESCRIPTION.

A duty on certain specified goods and on "goods of a similar description" means a similarity in respect to the product, and its adaptation to use, and to its uses, and not merely to the process by which it was produced. Greenleaf v. Goodrich, 101 U. S. 278, 283, 25 L. Ed. 845; Schmieder v. Barney, 5 Sup. Ct. 624, 113 U. S. 645, 28 L. Ed. 1130.

An additional duty on all delaines, cashmere delaines, muslin delaines, barege delaines, composed wholly or in part of worsted, woolen, mohair, or goats' hair, and on all "goods of similar description," not exceeding a certain value per yard, means completed fabrics, composed wholly or in part of worsted, woolen, mohair, or goat's hair, and used for dress goods, which also, as completed fabrics, possessed qualities of general appearance, character, and texture like unto, or nearly corresponding to, or generally resembling the qualities which distinguish delaines or cashmere delaines or barege delaines or muslin delaines, in determining which question the material of which the goods are composed, the method of their manufacture, their weave, their weight, their texture, their surface or finish, their appearance, their feel, their color, their uses, and their adaptation to uses, are all to be considered. The single fact that goods are used for the same purpose as delaines is not sufficient to make them goods of similar description, nor will the process of manufacture determine such question. White v. Barney (U. S.) 43 Fed. 474, 475.

Tariff Act 1890, par. 395, relating to the duty on "women's and children's dress goods, or goods of similar description and character," applies to gloria cloth, which is composed of silk and worsted, silk being the material of chief value. Bister v. United States (U. S.) 59 Fed. 452, 453, 8 C. C. A. 175.

GOODS ON HAND.

A contract by the proprietors of a scribbling and fulling mill, stipulating that all goods on hand should be subject to a lien for a general balance, meant goods manufactured, and not articles used incidentally in the process. The term could only apply to such goods as were frequently on hand—that is, goods on which the labor of the defendants' mill was employed; and the proprietors having received certain wool and cloth to be scribbled and fullled, and certain oil and dyeing materials to be used by the owner on the wool, for which purpose the owner had access to the oil and dyes in a room of which the proprietors kept the key, the proprietors had no lien for their general balance on the oil and dyeing materials. Cumpston v. Haight, 2 Bing. N. C. 449.

GOODS, WARES, AND MERCHANDISE.

See "Foreign Goods, Wares, and Merchandise"; "Goods."
All goods, wares, and merchandise, see "All."

GOODYEAR RUBBER.

"Goodyear rubber" is a term descriptive of a well-known class of goods manufactured by the process known as "Goodyear's Invention." Goodyear India Rubber Glove Mfg. Co. v. Goodyear Rubber Co., 9 Sup. Ct. 166, 167, 128 U. S. 598, 32 L. Ed. 535.

GOOSENECK.

The "goose-neck" of a tender and "dead-wood" of a car are terms which designate the fixtures or parts of the respective cars which come in contact when they are being coupled. Grannis v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co., 46 N. W. 1067, 81 Iowa; 444.

GORGE.

"Gorge," as applied to an outlet of surface water, means a defile between hills or mountains; that is, a narrow throat or outlet from a district of country. Gibbs v. Williams, 25 Kan. 214, 217, 37 Am. Rep. 241.

GOSPEL.

According to the common and more general acceptance of the term, "Gospel" is synonymous with Christianity or the Christian religion; and a devise to be applied to the "dissemination of the Gospel at home and abroad" is sufficiently certain and specific. Attorney General v. Wallace's Devises, 46 Ky. (7 B. Mon.) 611, 617.

GOVERN.

Other governing body, see "Other."

The power to govern implies the power to ordain and establish suitable police regulations, and, it has often been decided, authorizes municipal corporations to prohibit the use of locomotives in the public streets, when such action does not interfere with vested rights. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. v. Richmond, 96 U. S. 521, 528, 24 L. Ed. 734.

GOVERNED BY LAW.

"To be governed by the law" is to be governed not only by a part but by the whole law relating to the subject. And the term in Act 1883, reading, "In making loans and disbursing interest collected, the trustee and auditor of the state shall be governed by the law now in force regulating the manner of making loans of the University fund," was so used. Fisher v. Brower, 64 N. E. 614, 618, 159 Ind. 139.

GOVERNING BOARD.

In the act relating to the authority of municipal corporations to issue bonds, the term "governing board" shall mean the selectmen of a town, the commissioners of a village, district, or precinct, and the school board of a school district. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 491, c. 43, § 1.

The expressions in Laws 1902, c. 195, "the common council or other governing board," and "the common council or other governing body," used with reference to cities, were used in order to include a general board or body, not styled a common council; and, as applied to a city governed by a board of aldermen, such board was the governing body. Dillon on Municipal Corporations says: "A city is a corporation with a governing body usually styled the 'council,' which council, he says, is in some instances composed of two bodies, the members being called the 'aldermen,' 'councilmen,' or 'trustees,' and that the governing body of the municipal corporation may be either the councilmen or the aldermen, as they may be styled in the charters in respective cities. Fitzgerald v. City of Jersey City, 53 Atl. 819, 821, 69 N. J. Law, 152.

GOVERNMENT.

See "Arbitrary Government"; "De Facto Government"; "Foreign Government"; "Military Government"; "Popular Government"; "Provisional Government"; "Town Governments."

The word "government" is a synonym of "management," and means control. City of St. Louis v. Howard, 24 S. W. 770, 771, 119 Mo. 41, 41 Am. St. Rep. 630.

Government is the exercise of authority in the administration of the affairs of a state, community, or society; the authoritative direction and restraint exercised over the actions of men in communities, societies, or states. People v. Pierce, 18 Misc. Rep. 83, 85, 86, 41 N. Y. Supp. 858 (citing Cent. Dict.).

"In a political sense, 'government' signifies that form of fundamental rules by which the members of a body politic regulate their social action, and the administration of public affairs according to established constitutions, usages, and laws." Winspear v. District Tp. of Holman, 37 Iowa, 542, 544.

"Government is the ligament that holds the political society together, and when that is destroyed the society, as a political body, is dissolved. It is the public political authority which guides and directs the body politic, or society of men called a 'state,' united together to promote their safety and advantage by means of their union." Thomas v. Taylor, 42 Miss. 651, 706, 2 Am. Rep. 625.

"Government" is a very comprehensive term, and one of the most important subjects included in it is that of finances, including assets in property as well as in money. In re Sugar Notch Borough, 43 Atl. 985, 986, 192 Pa. 349.

As used in Acts 1865-66, pp. 217, 220, consolidating certain railroads under a new name, and providing that the new road should, for its government, be entitled to all the powers and privileges, and subject to all the restrictions and liabilities, conferred and imposed on one of the railways consolidated, naturally "government" means regulation and control, and was not used as intending or imposing a limitation on the powers and privileges of the new corporation. In reality, it neither adds to nor takes from the force of the other words, and simply implies that the new corporation shall have the same charter rights and privileges, and be subject to the same charter restrictions and liabilities, as the old company. Tennessee v. Whitworth, 6 Sup. Ct. 649, 653, 117 U. S. 139, 29 L. Ed. 833.

State distinguished.

In discussing the question as to the force of an act of the Legislature not authorized by the Constitution, the court, in Polindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270, 5 Sup. Ct. 914, 29 L. Ed. 185, say the distinction between the government of the state and the state itself is important, and should be observed. In common speech and common apprehension they are usually regarded as identical, and as ordinarily the acts of the government are the acts of the state, because within the limits of its delegation of power, the government of the state is generally confounded with the state itself. The state itself is an ideal person, intangible, invisible, immutable. The government is an agent, and, within the sphere of its agency, a perfect representative. This same distinction is to be observed in determining the effect of the acts of a Governor as binding the state. Grunert v. Spalding (Wis.) 78 N. W. 606, 613.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACT.

A government office is different from a government contract. The latter, from its nature, is necessarily limited in its duration and specific in its objects. The term "office" has reference to functions conferred by public authority, and for a public purpose. Moll v. Sblsa, 25 South. 141, 142 51 La. Ann. 290.

A government contract is different from a government office, since, from its nature, it is necessarily limited in its duration and specific in its object. The terms agreed upon define the rights and obligations of both parties, and neither has the right to depart from them without the consent of the other, while an office is a public situation or employment conferred by the appointment of the government; the term embracing the idea of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties. United States v. Hartwell, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 385, 393, 18 L. Ed. 830.

GOVERNMENT LANDS.

St. c. 75, § 3, providing for taxation of improvements on government lands, means improvements made by homestead settlers and entrymen on their respective homestead claims. Crocker v. Donovan, 30 Pac. 374, 378, 1 Okl. 165.

GOVERNMENT OFFICE.

A "government office" is defined to be a public station or employment conferred by the appointment of government. The term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties. In re House Bill No. 166, 21 Pac. 473, 9 Colo. 628.

GOVERNMENT OFFICER.

Under the term "officer of the government," as used in the chapter defining and punishing the misapplication of public money, are included the State Treasurer and all other heads of departments who may receive or keep in their care public money of the state, tax collectors, and all other officers who by law are authorized to collect, receive, or keep money due to the government. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 100.

A clerk in the office of a district attorney is not a government officer, so as to make him a creditor of the government, and authorizing him to maintain an action for his pay. United States v. McDonald (U. S.) 72 Fed. 898, 900, 21 C. C. A. 347.

GOVERNMENTAL POWER.

There exists in each state the power, by appropriate enactments not forbidden by its own Constitution or the Constitution of the United States, to regulate the relative rights and duties of all persons and corporations within its jurisdiction, and therefore to provide for the public convenience and the public good; and this is so whether it is called police, governmental, or legislative power. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Ohio, 19 Sup. Ct. 465, 470, 173 U. S. 285, 43 L. Ed. 702.

GOVERNMENTAL PURPOSES.

Const. § 170, provides that "public property used for public purposes is exempt from taxation." "Public property," as here used, has been construed to mean such property as is necessarily used for governmental purposes. "Governmental purposes," as used in this sense, can only mean the punishment for crime, for prevention of a wrong, the enforcement of a private right, or in some manner preventing wrong from being inflicted upon the public or an individual, or redressing some grievance, or in some way enforcing a legal right or redressing or preventing a public individual injury. City of Owensboro v. Commonwealth, 49 S. W. 320, 323, 105 Ky. 344, 44 L. R. A. 202.

GOVERNOR.

A governor is a mechanical appliance contained within a gasometer, which regulates the pressure of the gas therein. Consolidated Gas Co. v. City of Baltimore, 62 Md. 588, 591, 50 Am. Rep. 237.

GOVERNOR OF STATE.

"Governor," as used in Bat. Rev. St. c. 35, § 8, regulating acknowledgments of foreign deeds, and providing that the certificate of a certain judge, with the certificate of the Governor of the state or territory, annexed to such deed, that he was such judge, should be sufficient to admit the deed to probate and registration in North Carolina, should be construed as meaning the chief executive of a state or territory, and to include the chief of the Cherokee Nation; and hence the certificate of the chief of the Cherokee Nation, under its great seal, that a certain judge, before whom the probate of the deed is taken is such judge, etc., is sufficient to entitle a deed to probate and registration. Whitsett v. Forehand, 79 N. C. 230.

The words "Governor of the state," as used in a complaint alleging that a certain person, "Governor of the state," claimed an interest in the mortgaged premises subsequent to the plaintiff's lien, are merely descriptive personae, and have no more signification than any other title or description that might have been given. They certainly do not show that he is sued in his official capacity, as chief magistrate, or that he represents any interest which concerns the state. The fair inference is that such person is a subsequent mortgagor, or in some other way personally interested in the mortgaged premises, or interested in the mortgaged property, as trustee or otherwise. The fact that he is Governor will not prevent a foreclosure of the order, or deprive the court of the power of making a decree barring his equities in the real estate. Bridgeport Sav. Bank v. Randall, 15 Wis. 541.

The words "the Governor" are equivalent to "the executive of the state," or "the person having the executive power." Code W. Va. 1899, p. 133, c. 13, § 17; Code Va. 1887, § 5; Code Supp. Va. 1898, § 5.

GRACE.

See "Days of Grace"; "Free of Grace"; "Of Grace."

GRADE.

A grade is a step in a series; a rank. Schuetze v. United States (U. S.) 24 Ct. Cl. 299, 305.

Grade, as defined by lexicographers, is a degree, or rank, in order or dignity—a step or degree in any ascending series. People v. Rawson (N. Y.) 61 Barb. 619, 631.

In army or navy.

The term "grade," in reference to officers of the army and navy, is a step or degree in either office or rank, and has reference to the divisions of the one with the other, or both, according to the connection in which the word is employed. Wood v. United States (U. S.) 15 Ct. Cl. 151, 160.

Rev. St. § 1588 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1086] provided that, on the retirement of a naval officer, his pay shall be equal to "one-half his sea pay provided for the grade or rank held by him at the time of his retirement." In the navy there are grades for duty, for honor and for pay—some by name and others by description. A lieutenant has the grade of his class, and also a grade in his class upon which his pay is ascertained, dependent upon the length of his own personal service. The one is called a grade in the law, the other is only described as such. The sea pay of a lieutenant during the first five years of service is $2,400, and during the second five years $2,600; and, where a lieutenant retired before he had served as such for five years, his pay must be computed upon the former basis. McClure v. United States (U. S.) 18 Ct. Cl. 347, 348.

Rev. St. § 1588 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1086], authorizing the retirement of navy officers after a certain service at a compensation based on their grade or rank, was construed to include all navy officers, whether they were classified according to duty, office, or title, according to relative importance or honor, or according to compensation. "All these classes come within the normal meaning of the words 'grade and rank.' The law designates some of them as grades and ranks by name; others only by description." Rutherford v. United States (U. S.) 18 Ct. Cl. 339, 343.

The periods of five-years service mentioned in Rev. St. § 1556 [U. S. Comp. St.

1901, p. 1067], for increase of pay, are "grades," within the meaning of section 1588 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1086], fixing the pay of retired officers at 75 per cent. of the sea pay of the grade or rank held at the time of retirement. Thornley v. United States (U. S.) 18 Ct. Cl. 111, 115.

Of crime.

Grades of crime in legal parlance are always spoken of and understood as higher or lower in grade or degree according to the measure of punishment attached and meted out on conviction, and the consequences resulting to the party convicted. Punishments are attached by law to offenses according to what is deemed to be their heinousness and their injurious consequence upon society. In this way they are ranked and graded, and by this rule the rank or grade of a crime or of a class of crimes, as of a higher or lower grade, is determined. People v. Rawson (N. Y.) 61 Barb. 619, 631.

Of employment.

"Grade," as used in Laws 1893, p. 120, § 2, providing that co-employees to be fellow servants must be in the same grade of employment, means the rank or relative positions occupied by the employees while engaged in the common service. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Warner, 35 S. W. 364, 365, 89 Tex. 475.

"Grade," as used in relation to employment, means the rank or relative positions occupied by the employees while engaged in the common service. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Warner, 35 S. W. 364, 365, 89 Tex. 475.

Of lumber.

"Grades," as used in an agreement to pile grades of lumber separately, as might be designated, refers to the quality into which lumber is classified. Tompkins v. Gardner & Spry Co., 37 N. W. 43, 44, 69 Mich. 58.

In an action involving the question whether certain lumber ordered and charged for as "No. 3 siding" was in fact No. 3 or No. 4 siding, where the witnesses and the court sometimes used the word "grade" to designate the difference between the different kinds of lumber, and it was objected that the word "grade" really distinguished only a quality, and not a kind, the court said: "We can see no difference in the words themselves, as expressive of the same idea. The word 'grade' is perhaps somewhat more technical, but it is perfectly manifest that the classification of the lumber into numbered grades, as Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, was, in the trade, a practical division of it into different kinds. At any rate, this was the sense in which the witnesses and the court used the word 'grade,' and the jury could not be misled by it. It is a mere play upon words to say that, because 'grade' means also 'quality,' therefore only quality was meant when the word 'grade' was used. It is true that No. 4 siding was, in quality, inferior to No. 3, and this was necessarily developed in the examination of the witnesses; but that circumstance does not alter, but, rather, confirms, the fact that, in the trade, No. 3 siding was one kind, and No. 4 another." Whitehall Mfg. Co. v. Wise, 13 Atl. 298, 299, 119 Pa. 484, 21 Wkly. Notes Cas. 268.

Of street.

Change of grade, see "Change."

A pleading in an action against a city alleging that it had raised the grade of a street to a certain height necessarily implies that it was done in pursuance of some ordinance, as the city could only act in such matter by ordinance. Werth v. City of Springfield, 78 Mo. 107, 109.

The grade of a street is the degree of its inclination from a horizontal line, and, as used in a street improvement act, includes the height of its surface above the line of its established base. Palmer v. Burnham, 52 Pac. 664, 120 Cal. 364.

In reference to streets, "grade" has two distinct meanings. By the first, it signifies the line of the street's inclination from the horizontal; by the second, a part of a street inclined from the horizontal. That is, it sometimes signifies the line established to guide future construction, and at other times the street wrought to the line. As used in an ordinance granting a franchise to a street railway company, in which the city reserved the right to change the grade of its streets, and provided that the company should lay its tracks in accordance with the grades as they were then, or might thereafter be, established, it signifies the line of the street's inclination as established or to be established by the city. City of Little Rock v. Citizens' St. Ry. Co., 19 S. W. 17, 56 Ark. 28.

The term "grade," as used in a decree laying out a street of a certain width, and prescribing the grade along its center line, refers to the physical condition of the street when its construction is complete. Como v. City of Worcester, 59 N. E. 444, 177 Mass. 543.

The use of the word "graded" in a municipal ordinance directing that a street be graded includes grading, grubbing, guttering, and curbing the street. City of Spokane v. Browne, 36 Pac. 26, 27, 8 Wash. 317.

"Grade," as used in Gen. St. Conn. § 2703, authorizing recovery of damages for change of the grade of a highway, does not signify a level precisely established by mathematical points and lines, but the surface of the highway as it in fact exists. Any elevation or depression of this surface by the municipal authorities resulting from an attempt to establish a grade is a change of grade. McGar v. Borough of Bristol, 42 Atl. 1000, 1002.

Same—Change of level.

In Act Feb. 12, 1851, incorporating the Warren Railroad Company (section 9), making it the duty of the company to "erect and keep in repair good and sufficient bridges or passages over or under the said railroad where the public or other road * * * shall cross the same, and so to alter and grade said road that the passage of carriages," etc., "shall not be impeded thereby, "grade" means simply to change its level—such being its common usage—and does not confer the power to make other alterations in a road at the place of crossing, as, for instance, a fence or rails at the side of a necessary embankment. Warren R. Co. v. State, 29 N. J. Law (5 Dutch.) 353, 355.

Grading includes cutting as well as filling. Technically, it is the reducing of the surface of the earth to a given line fixed by the city as the grade, and may involve filling or excavating, or both, as shall be necessary to accomplish that object. Ryan v. City of Dubuque, 83 N. W. 1073, 1074, 112 Iowa, 284 (citing Smith v. Washington City, 61 U. S. [20 How.] 135, 15 L. Ed. 858).

"The ordinary meaning of the term 'grade' is the amount of difference between a grade line and a level or horizontal line, and to grade a street is to bring the surface of the street to the grade line. The extension of the level of a street by filling in the sides thereof, without raising the level of the street above the established grade, does not constitute a change or alteration of grade, within Laws 1897, c. 414, § 159, providing that a change of grade, to the extent of damages resulting therefrom, shall be deemed a taking of adjacent property for public use. Bissell v. Village of Larchmont, 67 N. Y. Supp. 962, 963, 57 App. Div. 61.

Same—Moving dirt from cut to fill.

A contract between a city and a contractor whereby the latter agrees to grade, curb, fill, and remove the dirt from a certain street for a certain consideration per cubic yard for all the work mentioned, should be construed to mean the removal of dirt from one point and placing it at another on the street, to bring the surface to a certain line. "The object of the proposed arrangement was to grade a certain street; that is, to bring the surface to a certain line. To accomplish this, it may have been necessary to remove earth from one point to another within the street. The language used would cover either or all of these operations, and the word 'grade' was intended to include them all. It was to be graded for the stated consideration per cubic yard." City of Leavenworth v. Rankin, 2 Kan. 357, 373.

Same—Macadamizing.

"Grade," as used in an order of the common council to the board of public works to grade a street, should be construed to include macadamizing the street, as well as putting down stone gutters and curbing. State v. District Court of Ramsey County, 22 N. W. 295, 296, 33 Minn. 184.

Same—As order.

In St. 1871, c. 382, which provides that at any time within two years after any street or highway or other way is laid out, altered, widened, graded, or discontinued, an assessment may be made, etc., and also in section 5 of the same act, which provides that the owner of any real estate which may abut on any street which may be laid out, graded, etc., may, at any time before the estimated damages are made, give notice of his objection to the assessment, etc., "grade" refers to an order to grade.—Hitchcock v. Board of Aldermen of Springfield, 121 Mass. 382, 385.

Same—Preparatory work.

In a street-paving ordinance, providing for the establishing of a grade line, and that the streets should be so graded that the surface of the pavement, when finished, should be a certain number of inches above the grade line, it was not necessary to state specifically that the inequalities should be even, as the word "grade," taken in the context, included all that was necessary to put the roadway in condition for pavement. McChesney v. City of Chicago, 66 N. E. 217, 219, 201 Ill. 344.

The ordinary meaning of the term "grade" is the amount of difference between the grade line and a level or horizontal line. And to grade a street is to bring the surface of the street to the grade line. The term includes excavations and filling so as to make the surface conform to the grade line.—Davies v. City of East Saginaw, 66 Mich. 37, 39, 32 N. W. 919.

Pub. Laws, c. 310, provides that whenever the grade of any street or highway shall be lawfully changed, and the estate of any abutting proprietor injured thereby, the town in which such change of grade shall have been made shall be liable to pay the damages occasioned, etc. Held, that the word "grade" should be construed to involve more than to simply prepare it for travel, and that it included grades made or established by surveyors of highways. Aldrich v. Board of Aldermen of City of Providence, 12 R. I. 241, 244.

Same—Widening.

To grade a street is to reduce it, either by filling or excavation, to a fit or established degree of ascent or descent, and is not authorized by an act providing for the widening of a street. Wilcoxon v. City of San Luis Obispo, 35 Pac. 988, 989, 101 Cal. 508.

GRADE CROSSINGS.

Grade crossings of railroads with common roads are places of obvious peril to the traveler upon the common road. Giberson v. Bangor & A. R. Co., 36 Atl. 400, 401, 89 Me. 337.

GRADERS' REJECTION.

A contract for the sale of wool subject to graders' rejection means that, on the receipt of the wool by the purchasers, they should place it in the hands of persons skilled in grading wool, known as "wool graders," for the purpose of ascertaining what portion, if any, of the wool is taggy and scabby—the examination to be fleece by fleece—and, if any portion of it should be found to be taggy and scabby, the purchasers should forthwith notify the sellers, and furnish them with a certificate of the graders to that effect, giving the weight and amount of the wool found taggy and scabby, which should be deducted from the gross amount delivered to the purchasers, and returned to the sellers, and the balance of such gross amount should be paid for forthwith at the rate agreed upon; the sellers to be apprised of the result of the grading within a reasonable time from the delivery of the wool. Merehin v. Ball, 8 Pac. 886, 68 Cal. 205.

GRADUAL.

In the statement that, to constitute accretions, the additions to the soil must be gradual, and not sudden, the term "gradual" means that, though witnesses are able to perceive from time to time that the land is encroaching on the sea line, the process was such that they could not perceive the progress at the time it was made. Mulry v. Norton, 3 N. E. 581, 583, 100 N. Y. 424, 53 Am. Rep. 206.

GRADUATE.

"The word 'graduate,' philologically considered, is one of elastic import, having various meanings. Of the definitions given in the dictionaries," the one most applicable to Const. art. 206, providing that the General Assembly may levy a license tax, and in such case shall "graduate" the amount of such tax to be collected from the persons pursuing the several trades, professions, and callings, "is the following: 'To regulate by degrees; to proportion; to adjust, as to graduate punishments.' Worcester. The standards and methods of graduation, proportion, and adjustment are susceptible of infinite variation." State v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co., 4 South. 504, 505, 40 La. Ann. 463.

In Const. art. 206, providing that the Legislature may levy a license tax, and in such case shall graduate the amount of such tax to be collected from the persons pursuing the several trades, professions, vocations, and callings, "graduate" should be construed as synonymous with the word "proportion," so that the section shall read that the Legislature shall proportion the amount of the tax, etc. State v. O'Hara, 36 La. Ann. 93, 95.

The word "graduate," as used generally, has a broad meaning. It embraces steps, degrees, grades, or intervals—that is, division into degrees, grades, or intervals; and the imposition of a license tax upon retail dealers in a certain branch of business was within the constitutional provision relative to graduating licenses, the method of which graduation is left to the Legislature. Browne v. Selser, 31 South. 290, 291, 106 La. 691.

In medicine.

"Graduate," as used in County Government Act, § 25, subd. 5, providing that the board of supervisors shall appoint some suitable graduate in medicine to attend the indigent sick or otherwise dependent poor, means one legally licensed to practice medicine and surgery under the laws of the state. Technically the word "graduate" implies a degree and regular curriculum, and Webster defines the verb "graduate" as "to pass through, or to receive a degree in, a college or university"; but the word is not used in its strict and technical sense in the statute. People v. Eichelroth, 20 Pac. 364, 365, 78 Cal. 141, 2 L. R. A. 770.

Of Naval Academy.

Under Rev. St. § 1520 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1046], the course of instruction of cadet engineers in preparation for the duties of the engineer corps, was required to be four years at the Academy, and two years' service in naval steamers. Their pay was, before final academic examination, $500; after final academic examination, and until warranted as assistant engineers, when on duty at sea, $1,000. By Appropriation Act Aug. 5, 1882, c. 391, 22 Stat. 286 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1042], the grades of engineers were fixed as chief engineers, passed assistant engineers, assistant engineers, cadet engineers (graduates), and cadet engineers. In considering the question whether engineers who had taken the four years' course at the Academy, and received their diploma, and entered upon the two years' service on naval steamers, should be classed as graduates, it should not be forgotten that the two additional years required to fill up the six-year course are not years of study, but of service. They do not go to sea in practice ships, in large numbers, mainly for educational purposes. They are not subject to academic orders, nor are they expected to pursue academic studies, but to take charge of and run the engines. Their school exercises are ended, and their life work begun. They are as much in the service, and as subject to all its requirements, as they ever will be. When at the end of the two years—or, rather, at the end of a cruise, which may last three years or more—they are examined, it is for promotion only. This examination is not at the Academy, nor before the academic board, but is the same kind of examination that every officer, at each step in his advancement, is required to undergo. So emphatically does the law consider these two years as years of service, that it doubles the pay. In the universities the students who have honorably passed through the prescribed course of study and received certificates to that effect are known and catalogued as graduates. According to the dictionaries, it is a proper designation. Cadet engineers, who have successfully completed their academic course, passed the closing examination, and received from the academic board certificates to that effect, have hitherto been called in navy parlance, "graduates." In the Navy Register, under the head of "Date of Graduation" the time when they left the Academy is given. Under the head of "Sea Service since Graduation" all sea service after leaving the Academy is recorded. Congressmen, especially those on naval committees, become familiar with these registers. As every Representative in the House nominates a cadet at the Academy, and naturally takes a deep interest in him and the institution, this classification and designation could scarcely escape his attention. Under these circumstances it is not unfair to presume that in using the terms "graduate" and "undergraduate" Congress followed the definition of the schools, the dictionaries, and the Navy Register. Leopold v. United States (U. S.) 18 Ct. Cl. 546, 557.

In speaking of the graduates of the United States Naval Academy before Act Cong. 1882, relative to the pay of those attending at that institution, graduates are those who have completed a four years' course on land at the academy, but who have not yet completed their two years' sea service, but within the meaning of the law of 1882, which makes appropriation for the payment of attendants at the naval academy, would include only those who have completed the full six years' course, four years on land and two on the sea. United States v. Redgrave, 6 Sup. Ct. 444, 449, 116 U. S. 474, 29 L. Ed. 697.

GRADUATED.

"Graduated," means to mark with degrees, regular intervals, or divisions; and this is its use when speaking of a "graduated" circle in machinery. Chandler v. Ladd (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 452, 458 (citing Craig, Dict.).

GRADUATED PHYSICIAN.

"Graduated physician," as used in Act March 6, 1877, as amended by Act March 5, 1879, prohibiting the sale of vinous or alcoholic liquors, except for medical, chemical, or sacramental purposes, on a prescription or recommendation of a graduated physician, or a regular practitioner of medicine, who has taken the oath prescribed by the act, is not equivalent to a regular practitioner of medicine. One may be a graduated physician without being a regular practitioner of medicine. Thompson v. State, 37 Ark. 408, 410.

GRAIN.

See "Artificial Grains"; "Green Grain"; "Standing Grain."
Other grain, see "Other."

Webster defines the word "grain," when used without a definitive, to mean corn in general, or the fruit of certain plants which constitute the chief food of man and beast, as wheat, rye, barley, oats, and maize. Smith v. Clayton, 29 N. J. Law (5 Dutch.) 357, 358; Holland v. State, 34 Ga. 455, 457.

"Grain" is defined in Cent. Dict. as "a small hard seed, specifically, a seed of one of the cereal plants; wheat, rye, oats, barley; corn in general; the gathered seeds of certain cereal plants in mass; also the plants themselves, whether standing or gathered." Norris v. Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 65 Mo. App. 632, 638, 639.

The term "stock, tools, hay, and grain belonging to him," in a contract to lease a farm, with various descriptions of other property, which provides that at the expiration of the term the tenants shall return to the landlord the stock, tools, hay, and grain belonging to him, does not mean the identical articles received from the landlord, but only a return in kind or value equivalent to that received. Brockway v. Rowley, 66 Ill. 99.

The use of the word "grain" as descriptive of the subject of a legacy is so uncertain as to render the legacy void, because the heir could liberate himself from such legacy by giving a grain of corn. Succession of Trouard, 5 La. Ann. 390.

Barley.

An indictment for setting fire to a "stack of barley" was sufficient under a statute prescribing the punishment for setting fire to a "stack of corn or grain." Rex v. Swatkins, 4 Car. & P. 548, 552.

Broom corn.

The term "grain," as used in an insurance policy, is sufficient to include broom corn in the bale, but the baled panicles, from which the seed or grain is threshed, is no more grain than the straw of wheat, oats, rye, or millet, after the grain has been threshed therefrom. Reavis v. Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 78 Mo. App. 14, 17.

Corn and millet hay.

The word "grain," in a fire policy, includes corn and millet hay. Norris v. Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 65 Mo. App. 632, 638.

Flax.

In Gen. St. 1894, § 7645, providing that, when any grain shall be delivered for storage, such delivery shall be deemed a ballment, etc., "grain" will be held to include flax, from the common custom of farmers to store flax in warehouses, and the fact that warehouse receipts use the term "grain" and "flax" interchangeably. State v. Cowdery, 81 N. W. 750, 751, 79 Minn. 94, 48 L. R. A. 92.

A policy of insurance, in which grain in stacks and granary on the farm was insured, includes flax. Hewitt v. Watertown Fire Ins. Co., 7 N. W. 596, 55 Iowa, 323, 39 Am. Rep. 174.

Grain in straw.

An officer's return to a writ of attachment, describing the property attached as all the hay and grain in the barns in a particular place, should be construed to include grain in the straw. Briggs v. Taylor, 35 Vt. 57, 66.

Millet or sugar cane.

In a statute declaring that it shall not be lawful for any person in this state to make any spirituous liquors out of any corn, wheat, rye, or other grain, except for medicinal purposes, "grain" includes sugar cane seed and millet. Holland v. State, 34 Ga. 455, 457 (quoted in Bethune v. State, 48 Ga. 505, 510).

Oats.

A lease stipulating that if the lessor should sell the lot leased the lease should be void, but if such sale was made at any time after the lessee had planted it he should have the privilege of sowing grain on the same, should be construed to include oats. Smith v. Clayton, 29 N. J. Law (5 Dutch.) 357, 358.

Peas.

"Grain," as used in Act 1826, declaring any person guilty of larceny who shall take from any field not belonging to such person any cotton, corn, rice, or other grain fraudulently, etc., should not be so construed as to apply to only the same class of products according to the classification of botanists as corn and rice, but should be construed as words of common parlance, so as to include peas. State v. Williams (S. C.) 2 Stro. 474, 477.

GRAIN MERCHANT.

A grain merchant or produce broker, is defined, in an ordinance of the city of Chicago requiring such brokers to be licensed, as one who for commission or other compensation is engaged in selling or negotiating the sale of goods, wares, merchandise, produce, or grain belonging to others. O'Neill v. Sinclair, 39 N. E. 124, 125, 153 Ill. 525.

GRAIN OF WHEAT.

"A 'grain of wheat' may be described generally as follows: It consists of a pellicle or outside covering, known as bran, an inner envelope, consisting of cells and their contents of gluten, the most nutritious portion of the berry, and an interior white mass, composed mainly of starch, extending to the head of the berry. At one end of the berry, under an irregularly curved surface layer of bran, technically called the 'shield,' is the embryo or germ. The germ is a yellow, waxy substance, and the bran is consistent and tough." Downton v. Yeager Milling Co., 3 Sup. Ct. 10, 12, 108 U. S. 466, 27 L. Ed. 789.

GRAIN RENT.

The term "grain rent" means a payment for the use of land in grain or other crops; the return to the landlord paid by croppers or persons working the land on shares. Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co. v. Bates, 58 N. W. 959, 963, 40 Neb. 381.

GRANARY.

A "granary," according to Webster, is a storehouse or repository for grain after it is threshed; a corn house. The term, rather than the term "barn," characterizes a building, sitting on blocks in a barnyard, which is used for the storage of corn and other products of the farm, and therefore the burning of such a building is not made criminal by Rev. Code, c. 34, § 2, which provides a punishment for the burning of barns. State v. Laughlin, 53 N. C. 455, 458.

"Granary," as used in Comp. St. 1850, c. 229, § 10, which punishes as a distinct offense stealing in a warehouse or granary, after entering in the nighttime or breaking and entering in the daytime, should be construed to mean a building devoted to the storage of grain, the principal and main use of which is the storage of grain, and not to include a building, 21 feet by 15 feet, placed on a market garden and used for storing the tools and agricultural implements used there, such seeds as were sown there, and manures employed in the garden. State v. Wilson, 47 N. H. 101.

In an indictment charging burglary in the granary, warehouse, and building of W., the word "granary" is used as an adjective describing the particular character of warehouse, indicating that warehouse was for the storage of grain, and does not render the indictment void for duplicity. State v. Watson, 42 S. W. 726, 727, 141 Mo. 338.

GRANDCHILD.

Webster says that the word "grandchild" means a son's or daughter's child. Otterback v. Bohrer, 12 S. E. 1013, 1014, 87 Va. 548.

Where testator bequeathed his estate to his aunt for life, and at her death to his cousin, "to descend to his female children and grandchildren, and to their heirs, forever," and such aunt and cousin both died before testator, the cousin leaving a grandchild, who was daughter of a deceased daughter, and also a daughter, who had one daughter living, the word "grandchildren," as used in the will, would not include the children of the living daughter of such cousin. Hallstead v. Hall, 60 Md. 209, 213.

Child of stepchild.

A will providing that, in case of the death of any of testator's children or stepdaughter without lawful issue, the share which by the will would go to such issue should be equally divided among the survivors of testator's children or grandchildren, should be construed to include the issue of testator's stepdaughter. In re Hallet (N. Y.) 8 Paige, 375, 376.

A will, after giving testator's wife a life estate in his farm, directed that after her death "I give to my grandchildren and their heirs, forever, my said farm, as follows, to wit: To the children of my stepdaughter M. lot No. 1, and to the children of my daughter S. lot No. 2." A subsequent clause directed that, in case of the death of any of testator's children or stepchildren without lawful issue, the share or portion of the estate which would have gone to such issue should be equally divided among the survivors of "my children or grandchildren." Held, that the term "grandchildren," as used in the latter clause, should be construed to include the children of testator's stepdaughter, as well as the children of his son and daughters, as testator's intention to use the word in such meaning was shown from the first clause. Cutter v. Doughty (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 305.

Great-grandchild.

"Grandchildren" will not be held to include great-grandchildren, when used in a will, where at the time of the execution of the will no great-grandchildren were living. Smith v. Lansing, 53 N. Y. Supp. 633, 639, 24 Misc. Rep. 566.

"Grandchildren," as used in a will devising a life estate to the testator's children, and providing that upon their death the estate was to go to his "grandchildren" then living, cannot be construed to extend to great-grandchildren. Bragg v. Carter, 50 N. E. 640, 171 Mass. 324.

A will giving and devising to each of testator's grandchildren a certain sum, should be construed to include great-grandchildren, such being the intention of the testator made apparent by the rest of his will, though ordinarily, and without something further to extend its natural signification, the term "grandchildren" does not include great-grandchildren. Hone v. Van Schaick (N. Y.) 3 Barb. Ch. 488, 505.

Chief Justice Tilghman, in Pemberton v. Parke (Pa.) 5 Bin. 601, 6 Am. Dec. 432, quotes Lord Northington, in Hussey v. Dillon, Amb. 555, as saying that "in common parlance the word 'grandchildren' includes great-grandchildren, and all other descendants," and says: "In this I think he goes too far. In common parlance we understand grandchildren to mean children of children, but it is certain that, when it appears by the will that the testator meant to comprehend great-grandchildren, the courts having given it a construction agreeably to the intent." In re Coates St. (Pa.) 2 Ashm. 12, 23.

As minor grandchild.

A will devising certain property to the testator's grandchildren living at the time of his death, to be paid on their respectively attaining the age of 21 years or on their marriage, whichever event should take place first, does not include a grandchild who was both of age and married at the time the testator made his will. Hone v. Van Schaick, 3 N. Y. (3 Const.) 538, 540.

As name of class of devisees.

A will directed the balance of the estate, if any, "to be equally divided among his children and grandchildren, each grandchild having their equal proportion of what their ancestor would have drawn, had they lived." The words "children and grandchildren" embraced all those persons who constituted the testator's heirs at law at the time of making the will. Held, that the words "children and grandchildren" should be construed as not having been used to designate the persons who would take, but as naming the classes who were to take, because they embraced all those persons who constituted his heirs at law, and the phrase meant that only those grandchildren whose parents were not living at the time when the legacy vested would take within the terms of the will, to the exclusion of such grandchildren as had parents living when the legacy vested. Hamilton v. Lewis, 13 Mo. 184, 188.

Posthumous grandchild.

A will providing: "All the rest of my estate, real and personal, to be equally divided between my grandchildren"—should be construed so as to include a posthumous grandchild, who was in ventre sa mere at the testator's death. Smart v. King, 19 Tenn. (Meigs) 149, 152, 33 Am. Dec. 137 (citing Swift v. Duffield [Pa.] 5 Serg. & R. 38).

A will giving and bequeathing to testator's grandchildren a certain sum, to be paid to them on their severally attaining the age of 25 years, and, in the event of the decease of either of such grandchildren prior to attaining the age of 25 years, the share of such deceased should be equally divided between the "surviving grandchildren," means the grandchildren living at the time of testator's death, excluding after-born grandchildren. In re Herrick's Estate, 12 N. Y. Supp. 105, 107.

A will devising "all the residue of my estate in trust for my grandchildren, to be divided equally as they shall respectively arrive at the age of 25 years, the share of each grandchild to be determined by a division of the whole amount of the fund then existing by the number of grandchildren to whom no share has been distributed," should be construed so as to include in the term "my grandchildren" a grandchild born six months after the death of the testator. Cowles v. Cowles, 13 Atl. 414, 417, 56 Conn. 240.

As a word of purchase.

"Grandchildren," as used in a will devising and bequeathing all of testator's property to his wife for life, with power to dispose of the same by will between testator's children and grandchildren, is not used in a substitutionary sense, but as a word of purchase. The words must, in the absence of anything in the context to lead to a different construction, be construed according to their natural import. Wright v. Wright, 4 Atl. 855, 857, 41 N. J. Eq. (14 Stew.) 332.

GRANDDAUGHTER.

A testator bequeathed a slave to his daughter E. for life, with remainder to his "granddaughter" Harriet. He had two granddaughters named Harriet, one of whom was illegitimate and the daughter of E., and the other legitimate and the daughter of a son. Held, that the term "granddaughter" should be construed in its established legal sense to apply strictly to the legitimate granddaughter Harriet, rather than to the other. The long-established rule is that a gift to children, sons, daughters, or issue, imports legitimate children or issue, excluding those who are illegitimate; nor will expressions or a mode of disposition affording mere conjecture of intention be a ground for their admission. To entitle illegitimate children to take, the intention to include them under the description of children, etc., must appear from the will itself, either by express designation or necessary implication collected from the instrument itself. Ferguson v. Mason 34 Tenn (2 Sneed) 618, 626.

GRAND JURY.

The institution of the grand jury is of very ancient origin in the history of England. It goes back many centuries. For a long period its powers were not clearly defined, and it would seem from the accounts of commentators on the laws of that country that it was at first a body which not only arrested, but also tried, public offenders. However this may have been in its origin, it was at the time of the settlement of this country an informing and accusing tribunal only, without whose previous action no person charged with a felony, except in certain special cases, could be put upon his trial. Ex parte Bain, 7 Sup. Ct. 781, 786, 121 U. S. 1, 30 L. Ed. 849.

"The grand jury had its origin at the time when there raged a fierce conflict between the rights of the subject and the power of the crown. It was established to secure to the subject a right of appeal to his peers, under the immunity of secrecy and irresponsibility, before the government could bring him to trial. It was a right wrung from the government to secure the subject against oppression. The Constitution of the United States and the Constitutions of all the states show that it is adopted here as a means of protection to the citizen as well as a necessary aid to public justice." In re Gardiner, 64 N. Y. Supp. 760, 761, 31 Misc. Rep. 364.

The grand jury is a constituent of the court of oyer and terminer, and its proceedings are a part of the proceedings of the court of oyer and terminer. The court inquires by the grand jury, and tries and determines with the petit jury. It has been repeatedly held that when the grand jury is in session it is completely under the control of the court, and the court can at any time recommit an imperfect finding or may take measures on the suggestion of a defendant to determine whether 12 assented to the bill. People v. Naughton (N. Y.) 7 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 421, 423.

While the grand jury is a constituent of a court of criminal jurisdiction, it is a distinct, independent body, and must deliberate and act free from influence, fear, favor, affection, reward, or the hope thereof, proceeding from or without the court. They are selected and drawn by a body of officers appointed by the statute and not under any order or process made or issuing under the authority of the court. When selected and drawn, the clerk of the court, who is one of the officers charged with the duty of selecting the drawing, issues a venire, directed to the sheriff, commanding him to summon the persons so drawn to appear at the succeeding term of the court and serve in the capacity of grand jurors. Finley v. State, 61 Ala. 201, 204.

A grand jury is a body of men selected, chosen, and summoned according to and in the manner prescribed by law to serve as grand jurors at a competent court, and by such court impaneled, sworn, and charged to inquire in regard to crimes committed within their jurisdiction, and to present all offenders against the law in the mode and manner defined by it. People v. Duff (N. Y.) 65 How. Prac. 363, 369.

A grand jury is a body of men, returned at stated periods from the citizens of the county, before a court of competent jurisdiction, and chosen by lot, and sworn to inquiry of crimes committed or triable in the county. Cr. Code N. Y. 1903, § 223.

Examination of witnesses.

A grand jury is a lawful body empowered to hear and investigate charges of a criminal nature against persons within their proper county. A grand jury has a power to examine witnesses and compel witnesses to testify before them. The foreman of the grand jury can administer the oath to a witness. The statute law makes false swearing before such body perjury, and a charge that a person swore to a lie before the grand jury is actionable without any inducement. Every person in the community who hears such a charge against another person understands at once that the person accused has been charged with the crime of perjury. Perselly v. Bacon, 20 Mo. 330, 336.

Number of jurors.

A grand jury is a body of men, seven in number, drawn by lot from the jurors in attendance upon the court at the particular term, and sworn to inquire of public offenses committed or triable within the county. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, §§ 961, 1265.

A grand jury is a body of persons, seven in number, returned in pursuance of law from citizens of a county before a court of competent jurisdiction, and sworn to inquire into public offenses committed or triable within the county. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 1293.

A grand jury is a body of men, consisting of not less than six nor more than eight jurors, impaneled and sworn to inquire into and true presentment make of all public offenses against the state committed or triable within the county or subdivision for which the court is holden. Code Cr. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 161.

A grand jury is a body of men, 16 in number, returned in pursuance of law from citizens of the county before a court of competent jurisdiction, and sworn to inquire of public offenses committed or triable within the county. Code Civ. Proc. Idaho 1901, § 8045.

A grand jury is a body of men, not less than 12 nor more than 17 in number, impaneled and sworn to inquire of public offenses committed or triable within the county. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 4732.

A grand jury is a body of men, consisting of not less than 16 nor more than 23 persons of the county, possessing the qualifications prescribed by law, and impaneled and sworn to inquire into and true presentment make to the district court of all crimes or public offenses against the laws of this state committed or triable within the county or judicial subdivision for which the court is holden. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7988.

A grand jury is a body of men, 19 in number, returned in pursuance of law from the citizens of a county, or city and county, before a court of competent jurisdiction, and sworn to inquire of public offenses committed or triable within the county or city and county. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 192.

A grand jury is a body of men, to consist of 21, returned at stated periods from the citizens of the county, before a court of competent jurisdiction, chosen by lot, and sworn to inquire of public offenses committed or triable in the county. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 957.

A grand jury composed of all the regular venire in attendance on the court, being 12 in number, and 2 persons summoned by the sheriff under the direction of the court from the bystanders, is a good and legal grand jury. Dowling v. State, 13 Miss. (5 Smedes & M.) 664 (cited and followed in Johnston v. State, 15 Miss. [7 Smedes & M.] 58, 62).

A grand jury at common law anciently consisted of only 12 persons, but in later times it was composed of not less than 12 nor more than 23, and the concurrence of 12 was absolutely essential to the finding of an indictment; and hence the term "grand jury," as used in the Bill of Rights, providing that no person shall be tried for a capital crime or other felony unless on presentment or indictment by a grand jury, has its common-law meaning, and an act making the grand jury consist of 12, and authorizing 8 of the 12 to find an indictment, is invalid. English v. State, 12 South. 689, 691, 81 Fla. 340.

Under a constitutional provision that grand and petit juries shall be composed of 12 men, but that 6 members of a grand jury shall be a quorum to transact business and present bills, it is held that the constitutional grand jury must be composed of the exact number of 12 persons. Rainey v. State, 19 Tex. App. 479, 481.

The common law required that 24 should be summoned to attend on the grand jury, but not more than 23 were sworn, because of the inconvenience which might arise, in case 12, who were sufficient to find a true bill, were opposed by the other 12, who should be against the finding. Whatever number were sworn constituted the grand jury, and it was never claimed that the death or discharge by the court of any of those sworn, provided 12 remained, rendered the action before a grand jury illegal. The same rule obtains in California. People v. Hunter, 54 Cal. 65, 66.

Secrecy of vote.

Every grand jury consists of 12 men at least, and these 12 must concur in the finding of an indictment. How any juror voted is a secret no juror is permitted to disclose, but whether 12 of their number concurred in finding a bill is not a secret of the state, of their fellows, or of their own. It is a fact they of necessity profess to disclose every time they promulgate their decision upon any bill laid before them. Accordingly it is proper, where a claim is made that a finding of a bill was not concurred in by the requisite number, for the court to inquire into the truth of the statement, and permit the defendant, if in his power, to prove such fact by the foreman and his fellows of the grand jury. In re Low's Case, 4 Me. (4 Greenl.) 439, 452, 453, 16 Am. Dec. 271.

GRAND JURY BOX.

A "grand jury box" is the box in which are placed the names, on separate pieces of paper, of the 72 persons named in a properly made out list. A box which does not contain such names is not a grand jury box. State v. Greenman, 23 Minn. 209, 211.

GRAND LARCENY.

As felony, see "Felony."

At common law the stealing of goods above the value of 12 pence was "grand larceny." State v. Young, 43 Pac. 881, 882, 13 Wash. 584.

Where a jury returns a verdict of "guilty of grand larceny," the term "grand larceny" is sufficient to indicate the value of goods stolen, so as to render the verdict sufficient. The common law divided the crime of larceny into grand and petit larceny; the former being where the value of the goods is over 12 pence, and the latter where the value was not over that sum. Our statute divides the crime in much the same way, and graduates the punishment on the basis of value above $7. The terms "grand larceny" and "petit larceny" are generally used in our courts to designate the degrees in which the crime is divided, and they are well understood to mean, respectively, larceny of goods above $7 in value and larceny of goods not above that value. As all reasonable presumptions will be made in this court in favor of the correctness of proceedings in the trial court, it will not be assumed that the court omitted to instruct the jury what it was necessary to find in respect of the value of property in order to warrant a verdict of guilty of the higher grade of the offense. State v. Bean, 52 Atl. 269, 270, 74 Vt. 111.

Every person who shall be convicted of feloniously stealing, taking, and carrying away any money, goods, right in action, or other personal property or valuable thing whatsoever, of the value of $20 or more, shall be deemed guilty of grand larceny. Gen. St. 1897, c. 100, § 82. State v. Start, 63 Pac. 448, 10 Kan. App. 583.

Grand larceny is the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal property of another of the value of more than $25. 2 Rev. St. p. 679, § 63; Fallon v. People, *41 N. Y. (2 Keyes) 145, 147.

Grand larceny consists in stealing the personal goods of another of the value of $50 or more. People v. Murray, 8 Cal. 519, 520; People v. Swalm, 22 Pac. 67, 68, 80 Cal. 46, 13 Am. St. Rep. 96.

Grand larceny consists of stealing the goods of another of the value of $50 or more, and is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, and is therefore a felony. People v. Murray, 8 Cal. 519, 520; Territory v. Duncan, 6 Pac. 353, 354, 5 Mont. 478.

Grand larceny is larceny committed in either of the following cases: (1) When the property taken exceeds $50 in value; (2) when the property is taken from the person of another. State v. Woolsey, 57 Pac. 426, 427, 19 Utah, 486. Any property of value taken from the person of another is grand larceny, without regard to its value. People v. Holmes, 58 Pac. 917, 918, 126 Cal. 462.

Grand larceny is defined to be larceny committed of a horse, mare, gelding, cow, steer, bull, calf, mule, jack, jenny, goat, sheep, or hog. Pen. Code, § 487, subd. 3; People v. Salorse, 62 Cal. 139, 142.

Under Rev. St. § 1309, larceny committed in a dwelling house is grand larceny, without reference to the value of the property stolen; so where defendant was indicted for burglary and larceny, and acquitted of the burglary, but convicted of larceny of property taken from the dwelling house, he was properly convicted of the offense of grand larceny, though the value of the stolen property was only $30. State v. Kennedy, 88 Mo. 341, 343.

GRAND LIST.

The terms "list" and "grand list," as they are used in our statutes relative to taxation, mean a schedule of the polls and ratable estate of the inhabitants upon which taxes are to be assessed. A list that only represents real estate answers the requirement of the statute as fully as would a list that represented the real and personal property. Such is the meaning of the term in Gen. St. p. 1036, providing that every male citizen of the age of 21 years, whose list shall have been taken in any town or city at the annual assessment next preceding any town or city meeting, shall be a legal voter in town meetings, as it is obvious that the intention of the law was to allow such persons as are subject to taxation in towns and are residents therein to vote in the annual meetings of such towns. Wilson v. Wheeler, 55 Vt. 446, 452.

GRAND LODGE.

The words "grand lodge," or "supreme lodge," when used "in their ordinary and popular sense, apply only to secret organizations or supreme bodies constituted from and having jurisdiction over secret societies." The term is so used in Laws 1885, c. 131, § 30, in reference to insurance, which provides that the act shall not apply to any association of religious or secret societies now existing or under the supervision of a grand or supreme lodge. State v. National Ass'n of Farmers' & Mechanics' Mut. Aid Ass'n, 9 Pac. 956, 960, 35 Kan. 51.

GRAND RAFFLE.

"Grand raffle" is a game where there are 50 prizes of jewelry, etc., placed on the numbers from 10 to 60, the whole not amounting to over $500 in value; every person paying 50 cents being entitled to a throw of 10 dice, which, when thrown, will exhibit numbers in the aggregate not less than 10 nor more than 60. The prizes are not less than 25 cents, and not more than $125, each; the highest prizes being placed on the numbers which are the most difficult to throw, such as 10, 11, 12, etc., while the small prizes are placed on the medium numbers—that is, both ways from the number 35. At every throw the bettor must get a prize of 25 cents at least, and in that case, if he does not want the prize, the keeper hands him back 25 cents in money and retains the jewelry. The effect of the whole contrivance is that the bettor gives the keeper 25 cents for the improbable chance of winning some of the tempting prizes. The real fund which the bettor stakes his money against is the money in the keeper's pocket or on his table, as he may choose to keep it. On the side of the bettors it is a game of perfect chance; on the side of the keeper there are both chance and skill, and his skill is exercised in so placing the prizes of any value that the bettor will have but a remote possibility of winning them. The bettors, however numerous, may all throw in turn for the same prizes, which may still remain on the table, being paid for by the keeper if accidentally won by any bettor. Here is found the leading characteristic of a common gaming table or bank; one against the many, the exhibitor with an interest in the game against the bettors, and that not disguised even." Stearnes v. State, 21 Tex. 692, 694.

GRANT.

Agree synonymous, see "Agree."

To grant means to give over, to make conveyance of, to give the possession or title to, to convey—usually in answer to petition; to confer or bestow, with or without compensation, particularly in answer to prayer or request; to admit as true when disputed or not satisfactorily proved; to yield belief to; to allow; to yield; to concede. Grant is usually regarded as synonymous with give, confer, bestow, convey, transfer, admit, allow, concede. As a noun, the term signifies: (1) The act of granting; a bestowing or conferring; concession; admission of something as true. (2) The thing granted or bestowed; a gift; a boon. (3) A transfer of property by deed or writing, especially an appropriation or conveyance made by the government, as a grant of land. State ex rel. Orr v. City of New Orleans, 24 South. 666, 670, 50 La. Ann. 880.

A grant implies a disposition of the thing in esse, or potentially so, as the clip of the wool for a term of years of the sheep which a man then has. The grantor owns the property from which the wool actually grows, so that he may be said to be the potential owner. Everman v. Robb, 52 Miss. 653, 658, 24 Am. Rep. 682.

Of administration.

Pub. St. c. 189, § 13, provides that no heir or devisee shall have power to alien or incumber the real estate of any decedent, so as to affect the testator's sale thereof, within three years and six months after the grant of administration, but that after that period he may alien or incumber the same, and the same shall not be liable for the decedent's debts in the hands of the purchaser. Held, that the phrase "grant of administration" meant, not only a tender of administration by the court, but an acceptance of the trust by the one to whom the tender is made. Dawley v. Probate Court of New Shoreham, 19 Atl. 248, 249, 16 R. I. 694.

Of discharge.

The word "grant," as used in a statute providing that the commander of a regiment, on a proper certificate of the troop, battery, or company commander, could grant an enlisted man a full and honorable discharge, does not imply that the enlisted man's consent or request is necessary. The word "grant" refers, not to the wish of the enlisted man, but to the fact of the discharge, and to the benefits supposed to be attached to its honorable character, to its release from further service, and its exemption forever from jury duty. Except as the word aptly harmonizes with these benefits, it has no greater significance than such words as "give," "furnish," or "deliver." North v. Appleton, 12 N. Y. Supp. 72, 73, 25 Abb. N. C. 389.

Of incorporation.

Mr. Justice Buller, in the case of King v. Passmore, 3 Term R. 246, says that the "grant of incorporation" is a compact between the crown and a number of persons, the latter of whom undertake, in consideration of the privileges bestowed, to exert themselves for the good government of the place. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 658, 4 L. Ed. 629.

Of injunction.

An order of injunction, issued on a motion after notice, though preceded by a temporary restraining order, would be an order granting an injunction, rather than an order continuing it. But an order denying a motion to dissolve an injunction previously granted is not the granting of an injunction, within the statute authorizing an appeal within a certain time after the granting of any injunction. Dreutzer v. Frankfort Land Co. (U. S.) 65 Fed. 642, 646, 13 C. C. A. 73.

Of license.

St. 1894, c. 351, § 2, provides that the police board should exercise all power conferred by the statutes upon the mayor and aldermen and city clerk relative to granting and signing licenses. Pub. St. c. 100, § 19, provides that, when a person holding a license is convicted of violating any law relative to the business which he is licensed to pursue, the court should send to the board issuing the license a certificate of such conviction. Section 23 of the same chapter provides that, if a judgment recovered under another section thereof remains unsatisfied for 30 days, the board granting the license shall revoke it; and the general act of 1894 (St. 1894, c. 428), which established boards of license commissioners, provides that such commissioners shall exercise the powers imposed on the mayor and aldermen of the cities. Held, that the granting and signing of licenses in chapter 351, § 2, gives the board power to also revoke licenses. Sullivan v. Borden, 40 N. E. 859, 860, 163 Mass. 470.

Of pardon.

To grant pardons implies that the sovereign power of the state or its representative has executed and delivered, and the prisoner has agreed to accept and has accepted, a pardon or forgiveness of the offense which he has committed, or some part of it, and a remission of and release from the penalties attached to the offense, or some of them. People v. Potter (N. Y.) 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 235, 240.

Of trial.

Under a statute authorizing a court of common pleas to grant a trial in certain cases, that court has authority to set aside a default judgment and reinstate the case, which is the same thing as granting a trial. Kinhead v. Keene, 47 Atl. 887, 22 R. I. 336.

GRANT (In Conveyancing).

See "Give, Grant, and Convey"; "Legislative Grant"; "Lost Grant"; "New Grant"; "Perfect Grant"; "Private Land Grant"; "Public Grant."

A grant is the method by the common law of transferring the property of incorporeal hereditaments, or such things whereof no livery can be had. Jordan v. Indianapolis Water Co., 64 N. E. 680, 682, 159 Ind. 337 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. p. *317).

"The term 'grant,' in a treaty, comprehends not only those which are made in form, but also any concession, warrant, order, or possession, to survey, possess, or settle, whether evidenced by writing or parol, or presumed from possession." Bryan v. Kennett, 5 Sup. Ct. 407, 413, 113 U. S. 179, 28 L. Ed. 908; Strother v. Lucas, 37 U. S. (12 Pet.) 410, 436, 9 L. Ed. 1137.

The word "grant," as used in the form of a deed provided by statute for conveying land, must have a thing for it to operate upon, a thing in the objective case, and its operation is limited to the thing specified as granted, the thing shown by the whole deed to have been intended to be granted; and, if that is only a right of way, the word "grant" passes that only. Uhl v. Over River R. Co., 41 S. E. 340, 344, 51 W. Va. 106.

The word "grant," in Rev. St. U. S. § 2477 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1567], providing that the right of way for the construction of highways over public lands not reserved to public uses is hereby granted, is very significant. The word "grant" is defined to be an act evidenced by letters patent under the great seal granting something from the king to a subject; a transfer by deed of that which cannot be passed by levy; a generic term applicable to all transfers of real property; a technical term made use of in deeds of conveyance of land to import a transfer—and as used in such section conveys a property right in the highway. Estes Park Toll Road Co. v. Edwards, 32 Pac. 549, 550, 3 Colo. App. 74.

The word "grant" has two significations, it being oftentimes used technically to refer to lands in place, which are spoken of as granted lands in contradistinction to lands which are to be selected or indemnity lands, and then it is oftentimes used both in land legislation and opinions to refer to all lands the title to which has passed either as lands in place or by selection. Barney v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. (U. S.) 24 Fed. 889, 891.

A grant in its own nature amounts to an extinguishment of the right of the grantor, and implies a contract not to reassert that right. A party is therefore always estopped by his own grant. State of Illinois v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. (U. S.) 33 Fed. 721, 774 (citing Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. [6 Cranch] 87, 3 L. Ed. 162).

A transfer in writing is called a grant, or conveyance, or bill of sale. The term "grant" includes all these instruments, unless it is specially applied to real property. Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 921.

The word "grant," in the chapter relating to the forfeiture of grants, includes all grants and charters of lands made by the supreme executive or legislative power of the state, and all acts of incorporation and laws giving to individuals powers and rights not common to all of them. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 750, c. 240, § 1.

The word "grant," as used in the chapter relating to forfeitures of grants, shall mean grants or charters of lands situated in this state, made by the king of Great Britain, or by this state or any other government; acts of the General Assembly, granting to individuals rights or privileges not common to all the citizens of the state; and acts of incorporation for any purpose. V. S. 1566.

Bounty distinguished.

"The word 'grant' is more comprehensive in meaning than the term 'bounty.' It implies the conferring by the sovereign power of some valuable privilege, franchise, or other right of like character upon a corporation, person, or class of persons. Under the ancient laws of England this was deemed in many cases to be the prerogative of the king, who possessed large powers for the regulation of trade and commerce. It is stated, for example, by Macaulay, as follows: 'In addition to his [King James I's] undoubted right to grant special commercial privileges to particular societies and to particular individuals, he long claimed a right to grant special commercial privileges to particular societies and individuals.' And again: 'He readily granted oppressive patents of monopoly.' 4 Macaulay, Hist. Eng. pp. 222, 223. A well-known instance of a similar grant was in the great Case of Monopolies (Coke, pt. 11, p. 86), where a patent had been granted to the plaintiff, giving him the sole right to import playing cards and the entire traffic in them, and the sole right to make such cards within the realm. The court held that 'the grant to have the sole benefit of making them was against the common law and the benefit and liberty of the subject.' See comment on this case in Butchers' Benevolent Ass'n of New Orleans v. Crescent City Livestock Landing & Slaughter House Co., 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 36, 103, 21 L. Ed. 394. In more modern times, the grant of special privileges by the Louisiana Legislature to a particular class of persons, giving them a monopoly of establishing slaughter houses in the city of New Orleans, is another illustration. The supreme court, per Miller, J., speaking of the act of the Legislature, remarked: 'It is true that it grants for a period of 25 years exclusive privileges.' And again: 'We think it may be safely affirmed that the Parliament of Great Britain . . . continued to grant to persons and corporations exclusive privileges, privileges denied to other citizens,' etc. These cases are cited for the purpose of illustrating the broad and comprehensive meaning of 'grant,' which differs in many respects from 'bounty.' While it involves the idea of a favor or benefit conferred by the government, sometimes of an exclusive character, it does not necessarily embrace the act of appropriating or paying money out of the public treasury. Indeed, the word 'grant,' in its broad signification, may well include the remission of a tax already levied and assessed by the authority of government." Downs v. United States (U. S.) 113 Fed. 144, 147, 51 C. C. A. 100.

Condemnation proceeding.

The taking of title by the exercise of the right of eminent domain is not "by grant," in the common acceptance of that term. It imports concession. Blackstone says a grant differs but little from a feoffment, except in the subject-matter, for the operative words therein commonly used are

"dedi et concessi"—have given and granted. At common law a grant was a conveyance applicable to incorporeal hereditaments, and not to livery of seisin. In this was the difference between a grant and feoffment. In this state the mode of conveyance by feoffment and livery is abolished, and the name of "conveyance by bargain and sale" is absorbed in the term "grant." Archer v. Eckerson, 42 N. Y. Supp. 137, 139, 10 App. Div. 598.

Gen. St. S. C. § 9, providing that the jurisdiction of the state, except for the administration of criminal law and the service of civil process, is ceded to the United States over so much land as is necessary for the public purposes of the United States, provided, however, that the jurisdiction shall not vest until the United States shall have acquired the title to the lands by grant or deed from the owner or owners thereof, includes not only voluntary grants or deeds of the property, but also title acquired by condemnation proceedings. In re Rughelmer (U. S.) 36 Fed. 369, 372.

As used in an instrument providing that, in consideration of the right of way granted for the purpose of building a railroad track the grantee agrees to pay, etc., the word "grant" is synonymous with "convey," and the instrument is an absolute conveyance of such right of way. Des Moines County Agricultural Soc. v. Tubbsing, 54 N. W. 68, 87 Iowa, 138.

In a conveyance, the word "convey" means to transfer the title or property. The word "convey" means to transfer the title from one person to another. It has the same legal effect as the word "grant," which has become a generic term applicable to the transfer of all classes of real property. In New York the operative word of conveyance is "grant"; but Chancellor Kent says: "As other modes of conveyance operate equally as grants, any words showing the intention of the parties would be sufficient." The word "convey," then, or "transfer," in a deed, is of equivalent signification and effect as "grant"; and to construe a deed containing the words "have bargained, sold, and conveyed, and by these presents do bargain, sell, and convey," as a bargain and sale, is to ignore the word "convey," and give it no effect in the conveyance, which is executed with the formalities required by the statute. Lambert v. Smith, 9 Or. 185, 193.

Conveyance in fee implied.

A contract of sale whereby the owner of land agrees to "grant the right and privilege of digging all the ore on his land" amounts to an equitable conveyance of the ore in fee, not the mere license to take the minerals. Fairchild v. Dunbar Furnace Co., 18 Atl. 443, 128 Pa. 485.

"A grant of lands by the government is equivalent to a deed in fee." United States v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 12 Pac. 769, 770, 6 Mont. 351.

Covenant for quiet enjoyment imported.

The word "grant," in a lease, implies a covenant for quiet enjoyment. Gallup v. Albany Ry. (N. Y.) 7 Lans. 471, 479.

Declaration of trust.

A declaration of trust is not a grant, and therefore, under a statute requiring that a trust should be created or declared by deed or conveyance in writing, subscribed by the party creating or declaring the trust, it may appear in the recitative part of the conveyance as well as any other. Wright v. Douglass, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 564, 569.

The word "grant" is not a technical word, like the word "enfeoff," and although, if used properly, without limitation or restriction, it would carry an estate or interest in the thing granted, still it may be used in a more restricted sense, and be so limited that the grantee will take but a mere naked trust or power to dispose of the thing granted, and to apply the proceeds arising out of it to the use and benefit of the grantee. Consequently, where an act of Congress granting land to a territory restricted its use to the one purpose of making or aiding to make a certain public improvement of general interest, permitting the territorial Legislature to dispose of the land for the public purpose specified, and no other, and declaring that no title should vest in the territory, nor patent issue for any part of the lands until a specified portion of the public improvement be completed, such provisions were not inconsistent with the use of the word "grant" in the same and previous sections of the act. Rice v. Railroad Co., 66 U. S. (1 Black) 358, 378, 17 L. Ed. 147.

Deed of bargain and sale.

"Grant," as used in Rev. St. c. 95, § 3, providing that any married female may receive by inheritance, or by gift, grant, devise, or bequest, from any person other than her husband, includes deeds of bargain and sale, and entitles a married woman to acquire title to land by purchase. McVey v. Green Bay & M. R. Co., 42 Wis. 532, 537.

A grant is of the same nature as a deed of bargain or sale, which is an executed contract between bargainor and bargainee, differing in the fact that the state is grantor, instead of an individual. Higdon v. Rice, 26 S. E. 256, 119 N. C. 623.

Executed contract.

A grant is a contract executed—that is, one in which the object of the contract is performed—and in its own nature amounts to an extinguishment of the right of the grantor, and implies a contract not to reassert that right; and the obligations created by such grant cannot be impaired by subsequent legislation, though the grant be by the state. Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. (6 Cranch) 87, 137, 3 L. Ed. 162.

Feoffment created.

The words "enfeoff" or "grant" are sufficient words in a deed to create a feoffment. Perry v. Price, 1 Mo. 553, 555.

Grant in presenti imported.

An act of Congress granting lands in the aid of railroad telegraph line from Lake Superior to the Pacific coast, approved July 2, 1864, meant that the grant was one in presenti, not in futuro, and on the location of the road the grant took effect as of the date of the act, and attached to the specific lands ascertained by the location and survey. Northern Pac. Ry. Co. v. Majors, 2 Pac. 322, 327, 5 Mont. 111; St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 11 Sup. Ct. 389, 390, 139 U. S. 1, 35 L. Ed. 77.

Indefeasible estate implied.

The language of Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850, enabling the state of Arkansas and other states to reclaim the swamp lands within those states, and declaring that the swamp lands "shall be and the same are hereby granted to the state," gives the states an indefeasible estate in the lands granted. Whiteside County Sup'rs v. Burchell, 31 Ill. 68, 78.

"Grant," as used in Act April 4, 1864, § 4, providing that the grant of interest on a railroad company's bonds in aid of the construction of its road was made on the express condition and in consideration that the company should do certain things and enter into an agreement promising to comply with the terms and conditions set forth in the act, was a grant in the present, the conditions of which were to be performed in the future. People v. Central Pac. Ry. Co., 18 Pac. 90, 93, 78 Cal. 29.

Lease.

The word "grant," as used in Civ. Code, § 1093, providing that no estate of a married woman passes by any grant purporting to be executed or acknowledged by her, unless the "grant or instrument" is acknowledged by her in a certain manner, should be construed to include a lease from a married woman. Carlton v. Williams, 19 Pac. 185, 186, 77 Cal. 89, 11 Am. St. Rep. 243.

The term "grant," although anciently used as applicable more particularly to a conveyance of incorporeal hereditaments, or all such property or rights as could not be transferred by livery of seisin, has now a more comprehensive signification, and includes a demise or lease. So, under Laws 1849, p. 528, providing that any married female may take by inheritance, or by gift, grant, devise, or bequest from any person other than her husband, and hold to her sole and separate use, and convey and devise, real and personal property, etc., as if she were unmarried, and that the same shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband, she can take and hold a lease for a term of years, and dispose of the same without her husband's consent or control. Darby v. Callaghan, 16 N. Y. 71, 74, 75.

"Granted," as used in Gen. St. § 2018, which declares that no leases shall at any time be assigned, granted, or surrendered, unless it be by deed or note in writing, etc., may be construed to mean the original execution of a lease, or the transfer of an existing leasehold interest. Davis v. Pollock, 15 S. E. 718, 720, 38 S. C. 544.

The words "grant or demise" in a lease pertain to an estate in lands, and not to the mere privilege of occupation or possession upon the payment of rent. Mershon v. Williams, 44 Atl. 211, 214, 63 N. J. Law, 398.

License distinguished.

A grant passes some estate of greater or less degree, must be in writing, and is irrevocable, unless it contains words of revocation. There is a clear distinction between it and a license to enter land uncoupled with an interest, as a license is a personal privilege, can be conferred by parol or in writing, conveys no interest or estate, and is revocable at the pleasure of the party making it. Jensen v. Hunter (Cal.) 41 Pac. 14, 17.

Mortgage.

A mortgage is a "grant or conveyance," within Rev. St. U. S. § 2262, which provides that any grant or conveyance made by a settler of lands pre-empted before final receipt shall be null and void, except in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value. Bass v. Buker, 12 Pac. 922, 924, 6 Mont. 442. Contra, see Norris v. Heald, 29 Pac. 1121, 12 Mont. 282, 33 Am. St. Rep. 581.

A mortgage is technically a grant. It is a sale or assignment, so that under the statute, after condition broken, the title vests absolutely in the mortgagee. Everman v. Robb, 52 Miss. 653, 658, 24 Am. Rep. 682.

The word "grant" is a generic term, applicable to the transfer of all classes of real property. Patterson v. Carneal's Heirs, 10 Ky. (3 A. K. Marsh.) 618, 13 Am. Dec. 208; Lambert v. Smith, 9 Or. 185. Thus, where a lessee, who had erected on the leased lands elevator buildings which could not be removed without injury to them and to the freehold, and whose lease gave him no right to remove fixtures, gave a mortgage thereof, which, though in form a chattel mortgage, purported to grant and convey the elevator, the mortgage was valid as a mortgage of the leasehold estate, although it was realty. Cross v. Weara Commission Co., 38 N. E. 1033, 1041, 153 Ill. 499, 46 Am. St. Rep. 902.

Perfect title not imported.

In California the term "grant" has not only been used by the people to designate all concessions of the Mexican government, but such use of the term has also been so general in legal proceedings as to have acquired this signification in the legal language of the state; so it is held that a stipulation that a party to an action involving title to land claimed by grant does not necessarily import that he has a perfect title. Seale v. Ford, 29 Cal. 104, 107.

Purchase.

The word "grant," as used in the statute securing to a married woman "any real or personal estate acquired before her marriage, either by her own personal industry, or by inheritance, gift, grant, or devise, or to which she may at any time after her marriage be entitled by inheritance, gift, grant, or devise," includes purchase, and applies alike to corporeal and incorporeal, personal and real, property. In other words, the statute was intended to secure to a married woman any property acquired by her before marriage by whatever means, or acquired after marriage by any means except her own personal industry. Rich v. Rich, 12 Minn. 468 (Gil. 369, 376).

Quantity not imported.

Where the word "grant" is used in a deed, it is not to express or designate in the slightest degree the quantity of estate intended to be conveyed, but merely for the purpose of passing from the seller to the purchaser the estate therein described by words introduced specially for that end. Krider v. Lafferty (Pa.) 1 Whart. 303, 314-316.

Quitclaim deed.

The word "grant," as used in Civ. Code, § 1243, providing that a homestead can be abandoned only by a declaration of abandonment or a grant thereof, executed and acknowledged by the husband and wife, should be construed in its generic, and not in its technical, sense, and as so used is applicable to all transfers of real estate, including a quitclaim deed. Washburn says: "Though the word 'grant' was originally made use of in treating of conveyances of interest in land, denoting a transfer by deed of that which could not be passed by livery, and of course was applied only to incorporeal hereditaments, it has now become a generic term, applicable to the transfers of all classes of real property." Wood, in his treatise on Conveyancing, said: "The word 'grant,' taken largely, is where anything is granted or passed from one to another, and in this sense it comprehends feoffments, bargains and sales, gifts, leases in writing or by deed, and sometimes by word without writing." Faivre v. Daley, 29 Pac. 256, 257, 93 Cal. 664.

Deed of release of shares.

A deed of release of shares in a corporation will be held to operate as a grant, in order to effect the intent of the parties. Hastings v. Turnpike Co., 26 Mass. (9 Pick.) 80, 81.

Transfer of corporeal hereditaments.

"A grant, in the original signification of the word, is a conveyance of an incorporeal hereditament. As livery of seisin could not be had of incorporeal hereditaments, the transfer of them was always made by writing in order to give them a notoriety which was produced in the transfer of corporeal hereditaments by the delivery of possession." French v. French, 3 N. H. 234, 260.

"The ancient technical description of a grant is that it is the regular method by the common law of transferring the property of incorporeal hereditaments, or such things whereof no livery can be had." As used in legislation the word "grant" means, not a transfer of incorporeal hereditaments, "but of lands and houses by deed, or by other effectual conveyance." And it is true that "grant" is used by the most accurate modern writers as comprehending more than a transfer of incorporeal hereditaments; a conveyance of corporeal hereditaments. Dudley v. Summer, 5 Mass. 438, 470.

Transfer of personality.

The term "grant" is only applicable to transfers of real property. Personal property is not conveyed by grant. Hopkins v. Noyes, 2 Pac. 280, 282, 4 Mont. 550.

While the word "grant" is technically applicable to real estate, yet where other language in a deed created a trust, speaking of the trust fund as the sum of $100,000, the word "grant" will not be held to be controlling as creating a trust in real estate. New York Life Ins. & Trust Co. v. Hoyt, 52 N. Y. Supp. 819, 821, 31 App. Div. 84.

Title transferred.

The words "give, grant, and convey" are as comprehensive as any that can be used to convey legal title, and are as efficient in law to transfer the title. Young v. Ringo, 17 Ky. (1 T. B. Mon.) 30, 31.

The term "grant" is defined as the passing of real estate from one to another. Whitney v. Richardson, 13 N. Y. Supp. 861, 862, 59 Hun, 601.

Use conveyed.

The words "make over and grant," in a deed, are sufficiently operative to convey land in the way of a use. Jackson v. Alexander (N. Y.) 3 Johns. 484, 495, 3 Am. Dec. 517.

Whole interest transferred.

The word "grant," or the phrase "bargain and sell," in a deed, or any other words purporting to transfer the whole estate of the grantor, shall be construed to pass to the grantee the whole interest and estate of the grantor in the lands therein mentioned, unless there be limitations or reservations showing, by implication or otherwise, a different intent. Pub. Gen. Laws Md. 1888, p. 254, art. 21, § 12.

GRANT, BARGAIN, AND SELL.

The words "grant, bargain, and sell," when used in a conveyance in fee, do not imply any covenants. Bethell v. Bethell, 54 Ind. 428, 429, 23 Am. Rep. 650; Frost v. Raymond (N. Y.) 2 Calnes, 188, 2 Am. Dec. 228; Burwell v. Jackson, 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 535, 541; Phillips v. City of Hudson, 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 143, 151 (citing Rawle, 272); Allen v. Sayward, 5 Me. (5 Greenl.) 230, 17 Am. Dec. 221; Bates v. Foster, 59 Me. 157, 160, 8 Am. Rep. 406; Young v. Hargrave's Adm'r, 7 Ohio (7 Ham.) 63, 70, pt. 2 (citing Co. Litt. 384a, Butler's note; 2 Bl. Comm. 300); Rickets v. Dickens, 5 N. C. 343, 347, 4 Am. Dec. 555; Wheeler v. Wayne County, 24 N. E. 625, 626, 132 Ill. 599; Douglass v. Lewis, 9 Pac. 377, 379, 3 N. M. 345.

"The words 'demise and grant,' in a lease, are held to import a covenant for quiet enjoyment." Burwell v. Jackson, 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 535, 541 (quoting Grannis v. Clark [N. Y.] 8 Cow. 30); Barney v. Keith (N. Y.) 4 Wend. 502; Stott v. Rutherford, 92 U. S. 107, 109, 23 L. Ed. 486.

The words "grant, devise," etc., in leases for years, were originally held at common law to imply a covenant on the part of the lessor to pay damages to the tenant if the possession was lost. Young v. Hargrave's Adm'r, 7 Ohio (7 Ham.) 63, 69, pt. 2.

The word "grant" in a deed imports a warranty in law during the lifetime of the grantor, and this warranty is not taken away by the insertion of an express warranty in the deed. Hoxton's Lessee v. Gardiner (Md.) 1 Har. & M. 437, 451.

The words "grant, bargain, and sell," in all conveyances in which any estate in fee simple is limited, operate by the express provision of Rev. St. § 675, unless restrained by the express terms contained in the conveyance, as a covenant for further assurance of such realty, made by the grantor and his heirs to the grantee and his heirs. Cockrill's Adm'x v. Bane, 7 S. W. 480, 481, 94 Mo. 444.

The words "grant, bargain, and sell," when used in a conveyance of real estate, create a covenant that the grantor has not done any act or created any incumbrances whereby the estate granted by him may be defeated, and it extends to and includes a tax for a municipal improvement assessed on the land during the grantor's title; but an entry on land by the authority of the state in the exercise of the right of eminent domain is not a breach of such a covenant. Ake v. Mason, 101 Pa. 17, 20.

The words "grant, bargain, and sell," when used in a deed made in Illinois to convey land in that state, are to be held to contain express covenants that the grantor is seised of an indefeasible estate in fee simple, free from every incumbrance upon or suffered by the grantor, as also for quiet enjoyment against the grantor and his heirs and assigns. Mosely v. Hunter, 15 Mo. 322, 328.

The statutory covenants of seisin, quiet enjoyment, and against incumbrances implied in the words "grant, bargain, and sell," are not general covenants, but only covenants against acts done or suffered by the grantor and his heirs. Heflin v. Phillips, 11 South. 729, 96 Ala. 561; Armstrong v. Darby, 26 Mo. 517; In re Wood's Estate, 15 Wkly. Notes Cas. 94, 96; Winston v. Vaughan, 22 Ark. 72, 73, 74, 76 Am. Dec. 418 (citing Gratz's Lessee v. Ewalt [Pa.] 2 Bin. 95; Whitehill v. Gotwald [Pa.] 3 Pen. & W. 313; Cain's Lessee v. Henderson [Pa.] 3 Bin. 108; Dorsey v. Jackman [Pa.] 1 Serg. & R. 52; Funk v. Vonelda [Pa.] 11 Serg. & R. 109; Roebuck v. Duprey, 2 Ala. 535; Latham v. Morgan (Miss.) Smedes & M. Ch. 611, 619; Roebuck v. Duprey, 2 Ala. 535, 539; Cadwalader v. Tyron, 37 Pa. 318, 322.

The words "grant, bargain, and sell," in a deed, though Code 1892, § 2440, provides that they shall operate as an express covenant that the grantor is seised of the estate, do not create an implied covenant that he is seised in fee, even though the habendum is to have and hold the fee simple. Cunningham v. Dillard, 13 South. 882, 883, 71 Miss. 61.

The phrase "grant, bargain, and sell," in a deed of conveyance, imports a covenant of general warranty of title and against incumbrances and for quiet enjoyment. Bush v. Cooper, 26 Miss. (4 Cush.) 599, 612, 59 Am. Dec. 270.

The words "grant, bargain, and sell," in a deed containing a covenant of warranty of title, but no express covenant of seisin, will not amount to a covenant of seisin. Hoy v. Taliaferro, 16 Miss. (8 Smedes & M.) 727, 742; Duncan v. Lane, Id. 744, 753.

The words "grant, bargain, and sell," in a deed, operate as an express covenant that the grantee was seised, etc., only when not limited by express words contained in the conveyance. Hart v. Gardner, 20 South. 877, 879, 74 Miss. 153.

The words "grant, bargain, and sell," when used in a conveyance, must be construed, when not limited by any express language in the deed, as an express covenant against incumbrances done or suffered by the grantors. Brodie v. Watkins, 31 Ark. 319, 326.

The words "grant, bargain, and sell," when used in a conveyance in which an estate of inheritance in fee simple is limited, amount to a covenant of seisin of the estate so limited, and the covenant runs with the land. Schnelle & Querl Lumber Co. v. Barlow (U. S.) 34 Fed. 853.

"Grant, bargain, sell," as used in a deed reciting that the party of the first part had granted, bargained, sold, released, and conveyed, and did by those presents grant, bargain, sell, release, and convey, to the party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, forever, said real estate, amounts to a covenant that the grantor has done no act nor created any incumbrance whereby the estate granted by him could be defeated, and are an express covenant that the grantor was seised of an indefeasible estate in fee simple, as also for quiet enjoyment by the grantee. Hawk v. McCullough, 21 Ill. (11 Peck) 220, 221.

After-acquired title.

A deed in which the grantor "grants, bargains, and sells all the right, title, and interest" is merely a quitclaim conveyance, and inoperative to convey an after-acquired title. Butcher v. Rogers, 60 Mo. 138, 139.

Under a statute providing that if any person convey any real estate by conveyance purporting to convey the same in fee simple absolute, and shall not at the time of such conveyance have the legal estate in such real estate, but shall afterwards acquire the same, the legal title thus acquired is immediately passed to the grantee, the words "grant, bargain, and sell," in a deed, served to convey the after-acquired title. McDermott Min. Co. v. McDermott, 69 Pac. 715, 717, 27 Mont. 143.

The operative words of a quitclaim deed are "remit, release, and quitclaim." Accordingly a deed containing the words "grant, bargain, sell, and convey" as the operative words is not a mere quitclaim, but operates to transfer any interest which the grantor had in the land at the date of the deed. Mul-ler v. Boggs, 25 Cal. 175, 187.

The term "granted, bargained, and sold," in a deed stating that the premises are granted, bargained, and sold, but which contains a subsequent declaration that the deed is understood to be a quitclaim, will not be construed to change the character of the deed from that of a quitclaim, as, when the parties to a contract expressly define the meaning of the terms which they use, such meaning will be given them, regardless of their natural meaning. Morrison v. Wilson, 30 Cal. 344.

The words "grant, bargain, and sell," when used in a deed, imply a general warranty, and a subsequently acquired title inures to the grantee. King v. Gilson's Adm'x, 32 Ill. 348, 350, 83 Am. Dec. 269.

The words "grant, bargain, and sell," by virtue of the act of 1715 (1 Dall. Laws, p. 109, § 6), have the force of a general warranty, unless restrained by subsequent expressions; and a mere special warranty will not be sufficient so to restrain them. There is no contradiction in making one covenant against yourself and your heirs, and another against all mankind. Bender v. Fromberger, 4 U. S. (4 Dall.) 436, 440.

GRANT TO A PUEBLO.

A "grant to a pueblo," as the term was used in the Mexican law, was not a private land grant, in the sense which took title out of the state. It was the mere vesting in the pueblo of the use of the land in trust for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof, and with power as the representative of the state to make grants which should vest title in private ownership of "solares," or house lots, and "suertes," or sowing lots, to settlers; the remainder to remain vacant, to the end that gifts thereof might be made to new settlers. These "grants," as they are generally called, did not deprive the state itself, at any subsequent period, of making what are technically denominated "private land grants," vesting title in natural persons to any portion of the lands lying within the four leagues of the pueblo which had not already passed into private ownership; and this power on the part of the state was not unfrequently exercised. United Land Ass'n v. Knight, 24 Pac. 818, 827, 85 Cal. 448.

GRANTED AND TO FREIGHT LET.

The words in a charter party whereby the shipowner "granted and to freight let," though ordinarily words granting possession of the ship, are not absolutely so in every particular case, but the opposite construction may be shown from the entire agreement. Christie v. Lewis, 2 Brod. & B. 410, 441.

GRANTED LANDS.

In the construction of land grants in aid of a railroad, there is a well-established distinction observed between "granted lands" and "indemnity lands." The former are those falling within the limits specially designated, and the title to which attaches when the lands are located, by an approved and accepted survey of the line of the road filed in the Land Department, as of the date of the act of Congress. The latter are those lands selected in lieu of parcels lost by previous disposition or reservation, for other purposes, and the title to which accrues only from the time of their selection. Barney v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 6 Sup. Ct. 654, 656, 117 U. S. 228, 29 L. Ed. 858; Altschul v. Clark, 65 Pac. 991, 994, 39 Or. 315; Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Amacker (U. S.) 53 Fed. 48, 54.

GRANTEE.

The word "grantee" may include every person to whom any estate or interest in land passes in or by any deed. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 64, c. 2, § 16; V. S. 5.

The word "grantee" may be construed as including every person to whom any freehold estate or interest passes in or by any deed. Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 4971; Ky. St. 1903, § 461; Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 88, c. 8, § 5, subd. 3; Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 50, subd. 5; Rev. Code Del. 1893, p. 42, c. 5, § 1, subd. 3; Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 59, c. 1, § 6, subd. 5.

The word "grantee," as used in the chapter relating to the forfeiture of grants, shall mean the person to whom such land rights or privileges were granted, and the representatives or assignees of such person, and the corporation thus created. V. S. 1567.

The word "grantee," as used in the chapter relating to the forfeiture of grants, includes the person or corporation to whom a grant is made, and all persons having the right of such person or corporation therein. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 570, c. 240, § 2.

A grantee is one to whom a grant is made. In its largest sense the word comprehends everything that is granted or passed from one to another, and is applied to every species of property. The word is, however, a generic term, peculiarly applicable to all transfers of real property and incorporeal rights. It is, indeed, so seldom, if ever, applied to the transfer of a chose in action, that nothing short of a manifest purpose to apply it will carry that meaning in the use of the word. Hence its use in a statute providing that no party to a civil action shall be allowed to testify in any action where the adverse party is one claiming or defending as "heir, grantee, or devisee" does not prevent the party from testifying where the adverse party is the assignee of a chose in action of the deceased person. Indeed, its use between the words "heir" and "devisee" would indicate rather that its meaning should be known by its association, and that it should apply exclusively to real property. Elliott v. Shaw, 32 Ohio St. 431, 433.

"A grantee is one who has transferred to him in writing the exclusive right under the patent to make and use, and to grant to others to make and use, the thing patented only throughout some specified part or portion of the United States. Such right must be an exclusive, sectional right, excluding the patentee therefrom." Potter v. Holland (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 1154, 1157.

Heirs and assigns of grantee.

The word "grantee," as used in a mortgage wherein the grantor's wife relinquished her right in the premises to the grantee, cannot be construed to include the heirs and assigns of the grantee. Allendorff v. Gaugengigl, 16 N. E. 283, 286, 146 Mass. 542.

Mortgagee.

"Grantee" is a word of well-known signification, and means the purchaser of an estate. A mortgagee is held not to be a grantee, within the meaning of an act authorizing the owner of an estate, or his grantee, to redeem from a sale under execution. Van Rensselaer v. Sheriff of Albany (N. Y.) 1 Cow. 501, 502.

As representative.

See "Legal Representative"; "Representative."

GRANTEE OF A POWER.

The term "grantee of a power" is used as designating the person in whom a power is vested, whether by grant, devise, or reservation. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 4361; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 2158.

GRANTOR.

The word "grantor" may be construed as including every person from or by whom an estate in lands passes in or by a deed. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 50, subd. 5; V. S. 1894, § 5; Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 64, c. 2, § 16.

The word "grantor" may be construed as including every person from or by whom any freehold estate or interest passes in or by any deed. Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 4971; Ky. St. 1903, § 461; Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 88, c. 8, § 5, subd. 3; Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 59, c. 1, § 6, subd. 5; Rev. Code Del. 1893, p. 42, c. 5, § 1, subd. 8.

The ancient technical definition of a grantor was he who transferred the property in a corporeal hereditament by a grant thereof. In its more modern and comprehensive meaning, it signifies one who conveys land. Dudley v. Sumner, 5 Mass. 438, 470.

The word "grantors," in the phrase "that we, the grantors, have hereunto set our hands and seals," occurring in a quitclaim deed, is not to be understood in its strict technical sense; for, it being a deed of release, the word was undoubtedly intended to refer to all persons who signed the deed. Hence it was sufficient to show that the seal attached was the seal of all the signers, though two of them had only a dower interest in the land. Tasker v. Bartlett, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 359, 365.

Assignee.

The term "grantor" being the proper and customary word to designate the party who conveys by deed, an assignee, when he conveys any trust property by deed, is properly and accurately described as the grantor in the deed, and he is such a grantor within the statute providing that, as between the grantor and grantee of any property, when there is no express agreement in writing as to which shall pay the taxes that may be assessed thereon of the property as conveyed on or after the 1st day of January, then the grantor shall pay the taxes thereon for that year. Carey v. Foster, 51 Pac. 206, 207, 7 Wyo. 216.

Husband of grantor.

A husband, joining in a deed of his wife's property which contains the words "grant, bargain, and sell," is as much bound by the statutory covenant as though he was an owner in fee. In contemplation of the statute he was a grantor, and as much bound by his statutory covenant as if he owned the land. Pratt v. Eaton, 65 Mo. 157, 161, 165.

Pub. St. c. 120, § 6, authorizing the acknowledgment of deeds by the grantors, or one of them, and chapter 3, § 3, providing that the word "grantor" may include every person by whom a freehold estate or interest passes by deed, authorize a husband, before issue born, to acknowledge a deed by his wife of her separate land. Hayden v. Peirce, 43 N. E. 119, 120, 165 Mass. 359.

Vendor distinguished.

See "Vender—Vendor."

GRANTOR OF A POWER.

The "grantor of power" is used as designating the person by whom a power is created, whether by grant or devise. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 4361; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 2158.

GRANULATED.

The phrase "granulated linoleum composition" may mean linoleum composition which has been separated into grains, or it may mean, not a material which has been granulated, but that particular composition in a thorough state of combination from which granulated linoleum is made, as distinguished from the somewhat differently constituted composition from which linoleum cement is made. Thus, in construing the language in a claim for a patent, as it is susceptible of either of two constructions, its meaning must be read in the light of the actual condition of things, and, if technical, be given the meaning by which it would be understood by those skilled in the art. Melvin v. Thomas Potter Sons & Co. (U. S.) 91 Fed. 151, 154.

"Granulated tobacco," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 3368, par. 2, is a term unknown in the tobacco business, and, since it has no definite meaning among tobacco dealers, while the term "snuff" has such a meaning, granulated tobacco must be held to be some species of chewing or smoking tobacco, and not synonymous with snuff. Venable v. Richards (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 1144, 1145.

GRAPEVINES.

A contract requiring a party to plant grapevines should be construed to mean indifferently either cuttings or rooted plants, according to the common usage. The word is so indiscriminately used in common usage, and may mean either, and, as both cuttings and rooted plants are used in planting vineyards, the party was at liberty, under the contract, to use either. Remy v. Olds (Cal.) 34 Pac. 216, 218, 21 L. R. A. 645.

GRAPHIC SLATE.

Drawing, or graphic, slate is a soft kind of slate, containing carbon, which is used for pencils. Plastic Fireproof Construction Co. v. City and County of San Francisco (U. S.) 97 Fed. 620, 623.

GRASS.

The term "grass" means the flora growing in a meadow before it is severed, and is therefore distinguished from the term "hay," which is the grass after it is severed and cured. An allegation, however, in a suit for the conversion of grass and hay, did not necessarily import a joinder of two causes of action, one relating to real estate and the other to personalty, since cases may arise where, even before severance, grass belongs to persons other than the owner of a fee, or even the owner of a possessory estate therein, which ownership may depend on contract. Reed v. McRill, 59 N. W. 775, 41 Neb. 206. See, also, Baumgartner v. Sturgeon River Boom Co., 79 N. W. 568, 567, 120 Mich. 321.

Hay is grass cut and cured for fodder, and so the words "grass standing in the field," in a statute defining arson, may well include haystacks. State v. Harvey, 42 S. W. 938, 939, 141 Mo. 343.

GRATES.

In a colloquial sense to refer or speak of "the grates of the engine" would be understood not to mean any part of that particular contrivance by which the steam itself is applied to the wheels, but as one of the component parts which go to make up and complete a machine in position to propel railroad cars by steam, and an allegation that an engine was defective and dangerous was broad enough to cover a defect in the grates. Brown v. Benson, 29 S. E. 215, 217, 101 Ga. 753.

GRATUITOUS.

Without valuable or legal consideration; a term applied to deeds of conveyance. In old English law, voluntary, without force, fear, or favor. Black, Law Dict.

A gratuitous bailment is a bailment for the sole benefit of the bailor. Prince v. Alabama State Fair, 17 South. 449, 450, 106 Ala. 340, 28 L. R. A. 716.

GRATUITOUS BAILMENT.

"Gratuitous bailment" is a term used to designate a depositum or naked bailment, in which there is no change but to the depositary. Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 479, 499, 9 Am. Dec. 168.

GRATUITOUS CONTRACT.

A gratuitous contract is defined to be one the object of which is the benefit of the person with whom it is made, without any profit received or promised as a consideration for it, as, for example, a gift. Georgia Penitentiary Co. v. Nelms, 65 Ga. 499, 505, 38 Am. Rep. 793 (quoting Bouv.).

GRATUITOUS DEPOSIT.

A gratuitous deposit is a deposit for which the depositary receives no consideration beyond the mere possession in the thing deposited. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1851. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2844; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4020; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1372.

GRATUITY.

"Gratuity," as used in Rev. St. § 5501 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3709], providing for the punishment of every officer of the United States who asks, accepts, or receives any money, or any contract, promise, undertaking, obligation, gratuity, or security for the payment of money, or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value, etc., is limited by the words "for the payment of money, or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value." United States v. Kessel (U. S.) 62 Fed. 57, 58.

GRAVE OPENING.

The term "grave openings" can only be construed as referring to graves, and not to cemetery lots. Thus, in a contract in which it was agreed, on the sale of land to a cemetery association, that the purchaser should have $40 for each lot of 400 square feet, and a proportionate sum for larger or smaller lots, which the association should dispose of for burial purposes, and $3 for each "grave opening," until the lands had been sold for cemetery purposes only. It was held that the term was limited to a single grave sold, and not to include graves on lots sold. Ben-net v. Washington Cemetery, 62 N. Y. Supp. 87, 88, 47 App. Div. 365.

GRAVEL.

As goods, wares, or merchandise, see "Goods."

The meaning of the words "gravel and sand," in a deed from a town reserving the right to enter on the land and take sand and gravel for the purpose of making and repairing highways, is to be determined by evidence to prove the meaning of the words as generally understood in such locality. Brown v. Brown, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 573, 576.

In St. 1849, c. 437, § 1, authorizing the selectmen of a town to select and lay out a lot of land for a gravel pit for the purpose of securing earth and gravel to be used in the repair of roads, "earth and gravel" should be construed to include any earth, gravel, or stones suitable for use in repairing and constructing roads, and capable of being dug out of the ground and removed by ordinary excavation. The words "earth and gravel" are not to be taken with such extreme strictness as to require that the gravel should be screened or that the question should be raised and decided judicially how large a piece of gravel or stone may be included in the general description of earth and gravel. Hatch v. Hawkes, 126 Mass. 177, 181.

To "gravel a street" is to cover the surface of a street already existing with some durable substance, and is not authorized by an act authorizing the widening of a street. Wilcoxon v. City of San Luis Obispo, 35 Pac. 988, 989, 101 Cal. 508.

Act Nov. 28, 1883, § 8, authorizing the city of Olympia to "curb, grade, and gutter" its streets, and to levy a special tax to pay the expenses of the "graveling and paving" said streets, construed to include "curbing, paving, and guttering" the street, and hence the statute authorized a special assessment therefor. McNair v. Ostrander, 23 Pac. 414, 415, 1 Wash. St. 110.

GRAVEYARD.

See "Family Graveyard."

Land used exclusively as graveyard, see "Exclusively Used."

By Code 1854, a graveyard was defined to be a place where the bodies of six or more persons are buried. City of Stockton v. Weber, 33 Pac. 332, 333, 98 Cal. 433.

GRAVEYARD INSURANCE COMPANY.

"Graveyard insurance company" is a term employed to designate an insurance company engaged in the business of issuing wagering policies, etc. Appeal of McCarty, 4 Atl. 925, 927, 110 Pa. 379.

GRAVING DOCK.

A graving or dry dock is a water-tight chamber fitted with timber or iron gates, which are shut against the tide after the vessel has entered for the purpose of being inspected or repaired. When admitted, she is placed on certain blocks in the center of the dock, and as the tide recedes the water is let out until it is level with low water, and, if it becomes necessary for examination or repair, the water below low tide is generally pumped out by steam, and the vessel must be continually shored up as the process of emptying is carried on, that she may be kept on an even keel and prevented from straining or careening; and, notwithstanding a vessel during inspection may rest high and dry on the bottom of the dock, and, indeed, ships and other water craft are frequently thus left alongside a wharf on the recession of the tide, yet when a vessel enters a dry or graving dock she floats in, and when she leaves it she floats out. The Vidal Sala (U. S.) 12 Fed. 207, 211.

GRAVITY SYSTEM.

The term "gravity system," as applied to sewer drainage, means a system in which gravitation alone is depended upon for the discharge of sewage. McChesney v. Village of Hyde Park, 37 N. E. 858, 861, 151 Ill. 634.

GRAVITY YARD.

Where a switch track is constructed on a downgrade for a certain distance, and from there on on a level, so that cars are switched by allowing them to run down by gravity, thereby saving the handling of cars by locomotive, such arrangement is known as a "gravity yard." Haesley v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 46 Minn. 233, 234, 48 N. W. 1023, 24 Am. St. Rep. 220.

GRAY.

The term "gray mare mule," when used in an indictment charging the stealing of a gray mare mule, is sufficient to designate an iron gray mare mule, or dark iron gray mare mule; and hence proof that the mule stolen is of the latter description does not constitute a variance. State v. Hill, 65 Mo. 84.

GREASE.

Grease may include oily or unctuous matter of any kind, and where vaseline, which is one of the solvents used in producing a pomade, which is admittedly an enfleurage grease, and vegetable oils, are used in making enfleurage grease, inasmuch as the pomade is a grease in its physical character in the same sense as vaseline, it is admissible free of duty as enfleurage grease, within the tariff act of 1894. United States v. Dodge (U. S.) 94 Fed. 481, 482.

GREAT.

Webster defines "great" to be "more than ordinary in degree; very considerable in degree; as to use great caution; to be in great pain." Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 28 S. W. 520, 522, 87 Tex. 348.

GREAT BODILY HARM.

"Great bodily harm" means "great bodily injury." State v. West, 12 South. 7, 9, 45 La. Ann. 14.

"Great bodily harm" is interchangeable or synonymous with "serious bodily harm," as used in a statute relating to self-defense. The word "serious," when used to define the degree of bodily harm or injury apprehended, requires and implies as high a degree as "great." The latter, as used in a statute, means high in degree as contradistinguished from trifling. Such, likewise, is the meaning of "serious," when used in the same connection. The definition given by lexicographers of the word "serious" is "important, weighty, momentous, and not trifling." Lawlor v. People, 74 Ill. 228, 231.

The adjective "great," as used in connection with "bodily harm," as "great bodily harm," authorizing the use of self-defense on apprehension thereof, is not synonymous with "enormous." The word "enormous" has more intensity and deeper color of expression than the word "great," and thus, when the court used the phrase "great or enormous bodily harm," it must have intended a higher degree of meaning and something more than could have been experienced by "great," which rendered the charge erroneous. McDonald v. State, 14 S. W. 487, 488, 89 Tenn. 161.

"Great bodily harm," in the law of self-defense, means something more than mere slight injury, like a simple assault and battery, from which only a slight injury is likely to be suffered. It means a serious and severe injury of a greater degree. Boykin v. People, 22 Colo. 503, 45 Pac. 419, 422.

GREAT BODILY INJURY.

The words "great bodily injury," as used in the Criminal Code, imply an injury of a graver and more serious character than an ordinary battery. Murphey v. State, 61 N. W. 491, 492, 43 Neb. 34; State v. Murdy, 47 N. W. 867, 871, 81 Iowa, 603; Whitner v. State, 64 N. W. 704, 705, 46 Neb. 144; Smith v. State, 78 N. W. 1059, 1060, 58 Neb. 531; Likens v. State, 88 N. W. 506, 507, 63 Neb. 249.

"Great bodily injury," as used in criminal law, means a great bodily injury, as distinguished from one that is slight or moderate, such as would ordinarily be inflicted by an assault and battery with the hand or fist without a weapon. Rogers v. State, 29 S. W. 894, 895, 60 Ark. 76, 31 L. R. A. 465, 46 Am. St. Rep. 154.

The expression "great bodily injury" is equivalent to the expression "great bodily harm." Terre Haute Electric Ry. Co. v. Lauer, 52 N. E. 703, 706, 21 Ind. App. 466.

GREAT CARE OR DILIGENCE.

"High or great diligence" is, of course, extraordinary diligence, as that which very prudent persons take of their own concerns. Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Rollins, 5 Kan. 167, 180.

"High or great diligence" is that with which prudent persons take care of their own concerns. It differs from "common or ordinary diligence," which is that which men in general exert with respect to their own concerns, or "slight diligence," which is that with which persons of less than common diligence, or, indeed, of any prudence at all, take care of their own concerns. Litchfield v. White, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 438, 442, 57 Am. Dec. 534.

"Great care" is that degree of care usually bestowed upon the matter in hand by the most competent, prudent, and careful class of persons engaged in the business to which such matters belong, no matter how few such persons may be, if they are numerous enough to have a recognized existence as a class. Great care, therefore, is care greater than that usually bestowed by persons of ordinary prudence under like circumstances. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 28 S. W. 520, 522, 87 Tex. 348.

As compared with other kinds of business, the care required of telegraph companies may be called "great care," which term, while meaning really the same, is variously stated as "due and reasonable care," "ordinary care and vigilance," "reasonable and proper care," "reasonable degree of care and diligence," "care and diligence adequate to the business which they undertake," "with skill," and "with care and attention, and a high degree of responsibility." Fowler v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 15 Atl. 29, 31, 80 Me. 381, 6 Am. St. Rep. 211.

The words "great care and diligence," as used in the statute requiring telegraph companies to exercise great care and diligence in the transmission and delivery of messages, includes the employment of proper instruments and competent operators. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Cook (U. S.) 61 Fed. 624, 628, 9 C. C. A. 680; Hart v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 6 Pac. 637, 639, 66 Cal. 579, 56 Am. Rep. 119.

Great care or diligence is such as persons of ordinary prudence usually exercise about their own affairs of great importance. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5109; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2782.

GREAT PERSONAL INJURY.

"Great personal injury," as used in Comp. Laws, § 692, providing that a homicide is justifiable when committed in lawful defense, when there is reasonable ground to apprehend a design to do some great personal injury, and there is imminent danger of such design being accomplished, means something more than apprehension, however imminent, of a mere battery not amounting to a felony. Territory v. Baker, 13 Pac. 30, 40, 4 N. M. (Gild.) 236.

GREAT PONDS.

Natural ponds, exceeding 10 acres in extent, which have not been devoted by the proprietors to the artificial cultivation or maintenance of useful fishes, are "great ponds," the fish in which may be lawfully taken by one who obtains lawful access to the ponds, according to the Maine colonial ordinance. Barrows v. McDermott, 73 Me. 441, 447, 450, 451.

The term "great ponds" was given in the colonial ordinance of Massachusetts of 1641-47 to ponds containing more than 10 acres; the ordinance prohibiting towns from granting away such ponds, and providing that they should be free to the public for fishing and fowling. Lamprey v. Metcalf, 53 N. W. 1138, 1141, 52 Minn. 181, 18 L. R. A. 670, 33 Am. St. Rep. 541.

"Great ponds," within the meaning of a statute making ponds of a certain size not appropriated by private persons prior to a certain date public property, to lie in common use, includes all ponds of the designated description, whether at that time included within the territory granted to a town or to any body of proprietors for the plantation of a town. Inhabitants of West Roxbury v. Stoddard, 89 Mass. (7 Allen) 158.

GREAT PREJUDICE.

2 Rev. St. p. 330, § 81, authorizing a sale of property held in common where it appears that the premises are so circumstanced that a partition cannot be made without great prejudice to the owners, will not justify a decree of sale where the aggregate amount of the benefits to the parties from a sale, instead of an actual partition, will be small in reference to the value of the property of which a partition or sale is sought. The statute refers to comparative prejudice to the owners between the actual partition and a sale of the property, so that if either a partition or a sale will be greatly prejudicial to the owners, compared with the use of the property in common, still an actual partition must be made, unless the injury to the interests of the owners collectively in reference to the rights of each in the common property will be much greater by an actual partition than by a sale. Smith v. Smith (N. Y.) 10 Paige's Ch. 470, 474.

GREAT ROADS.

The term "great roads" is commonly used to designate main or principal roads or highways. Ex parte Withers (S. C.) 3 Brev. 83, 86; State v. Mobley (S. C.) 1 McMul. 28, 30.

GREAT SEAL.

There is no ambiguity in the word "great seal." It is a seal of a nation and not of a state, no matter whether the government be a monarchy or a republic, and all courts are bound judicially by this insignia of nationality. It is authentic per se. Phillips v. Lyons, 1 Tex. 392, 393.

GREAT WASTE OF PROPERTY.

The "great waste of property" mentioned in the rule that work to prevent great waste of property is a work of necessity within the meaning of a Sunday law prohibiting Sunday work, but excepting works of necessity, must not be understood as necessarily meaning property of great value. The circumstances and financial condition of the owner, and the value to him and his need of the property, are to be considered in determining the true application and meaning of the phrase. Johnson v. People, 42 Ill. App. 594, 599.

GREATER PART IN INTEREST.

Gen. St. c. 148, § 2, providing that the proprietors of meadow and swamp lands, or the "greater part of them in interest," may apply by petition to the superior court for the improvement of the lands, means "proprietors having the greatest interest in value, and not to those owning the largest territorial area." Henry v. Thomas, 119 Mass. 583.

GREATER SUM.

The words "greater sum," in a statute providing that in civil actions in a justice's court, where defendant tenders plaintiff judgment for a specific amount, plaintiff shall not recover attorney fees or other costs subsequent to such tender, unless he shall recover on a trial of the action a greater sum than that tendered, means a sum actually greater than the tender; and therefore interest on the latter amount between the date of the tender and that of the recovery is not to be deducted from the amount recovered, at least where it does not appear that the jury included interest in the verdict. Erd v. N. W. R. Co., 41 Wis. 65, 69.

GREATEST NUMBER OF VOTES.

Under St. 5 & 6 Wm. IV, c. 75, § 35, providing that in municipal elections such persons "as shall have the greatest number of votes shall be deemed to be elected," where the party receiving a majority of the votes cast was disqualified, such fact being known to the voters at the time they cast their votes, the votes cast for such person were deemed to be the same as if not voted at all or voted for a nonexistent person, and the candidate receiving the next greatest number of votes was deemed to have received the greatest number of votes, within the meaning of the act. Regina v. Coaks, 3 El. & Bl. 249, 254.

GREEN GRAIN.

"Green grain in the ground," as used in a contract for the sale of land, reserving the green grain in the ground, means "the whole of the crop, grain and straw. It is an entirety, and cannot be separated into its component parts. Under the contract the vendors are entitled to the crop in its largest sense." Hendrickson v. Ivins, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt.) 562, 570.

GREEN SUGAR.

The words "green sugar" include both concentrated molasses and concentrated melado or syrup. Belcher v. Linn, 65 U. S. (24 How.) 508, 518, 16 L. Ed. 754.

GREENBACKS.

"Greenbacks" is but a nickname originally; a slang word, derived from the color of the engraving on the backs of the currency so denominated, and not either the legal designation or a proper description of money alleged to have been feloniously taken. The fact that the word, from its convenience, came into common use, does not make it by itself, without connection with something else indicating the notes called by that name, a proper designation for them in an indictment. Wesley v. State, 61 Ala. 282, 287.

"One $10 treasury note of the United States, usually called a 'greenback,' and one $10 national bank bill, usually called a 'greenback,'" is a sufficient description in an indictment for larceny. Sallie v. State, 39 Ala. 691.

As bank notes.

"Currency issued by or under the authority of the United States, and so called from the back of the notes being of a green color. The term is more frequently applied to United States treasury notes issued by the government, but is also sometimes used to designate the national currency or bank notes issued under its authority." Levy v. State, 79 Ala. 259, 261.

"Greenbacks" is a term sometimes employed to denote national bank bills, as well as United States treasury notes. Duvall v. State, 63 Ala. 12, 17.

As currency of United States.

The term "greenbacks" is used to designate a certain species of the currency of the United States. Evidence of the stealing of "greenbacks" is sufficient, under an indictment charging the larceny of currency of the United States. Gady v. State, 3 South. 429, 430, 83 Ala. 51.

"Greenback currency," as used in a note payable in greenback currency, means the same as United States currency or legal tender notes, and is of the same validity as if the term "dollars" alone had been used. Greenback money or currency is not defined by law, and if we refer to the common use of the term "greenback" we find it applied to the issues of currency circulated by the government during the late Rebellion. Burton v. Brooks, 25 Ark. 215, 216.

As treasury notes.

The term "greenback" is the popular and almost exclusive name applied to almost all

United States treasury notes, and is not applied to any other species of paper currency; and, this being the case, it is as certain in the description of property stolen as if the phrase "treasury notes" had been used. Hickey v. State, 23 Ind. 21, 23.

United States notes, which are public, and not private, obligations, provided for by acts of Congress, are commonly known as "greenbacks," a particular and distinct kind of obligation of the United States. United States v. Howell (U. S.) 64 Fed. 110, 114.

Where, in an action to recover for the services of an attorney, witnesses as to the value of such services testify "that the services were worth $1,000 in greenbacks, or $500 in coin," the term "greenbacks" is intended to designate treasury notes of the United States, made by act of Congress a legal tender in payment of debts, and the term "coin" to signify coin of the United States, also made a legal tender. Greenbacks are lawful money. They are a legal tender for all debts, and are therefore a legal standard for the measurement of values in all other lawful money, and of all commodities bought and sold, services rendered, etc. Spencer v. Prindle, 28 Cal. 276, 277, 279.

GRIEVANCE.

"Grievance," as used in Act 1851, § 27, authorizing a complaint to be filed in the court of quarter sessions for any grievance in consequence of any ordinance, means an injury, a wrong done, or that which causes a ground of complaint because it is unjust or oppressive; and hence an ordinance compelling property owners to remove a newly constructed sidewalk and replace it with a narrower one constituted a grievance. Appeal of Borough of Charters (Pa.) 8 Atl. 181-182.

A "grievance," to give a person a right to an appeal from the decision or doings of any school committee, district meeting, or trustees, does not imply a wrong growing out of some infraction of law or a litigated question of right. A deprivation of school privileges is a grievance. Appeal of Cottrell, 10 R. I. 615, 616.

GRINDSTONE.

The term "grindstone," as used in a declaration in tort for the conversion of one grindstone, would include, not only the stone, but the frame and hangings, which are necessary for its use. Patterson v. Dudley, 78 Mass. (12 Gray) 375.

GRIST.

"Grist work" is the grinding of grain by a miller for toll for farmers in the neighborhood, the doing of which characterized the old-fashioned gristmill. Sparks Mfg. Co. v. Town of Newton, 41 Atl. 385, 403, 57 N. J. Eq. 367.

GRISTMILL.

The term "gristmill," as used in a fire insurance policy, insuring the contents of a flouring mill, and prohibiting the buildings from being used for the purpose of a "gristmill," should be construed to include a kiln-drying corn meal mill, which is not an incidental part of the flouring mill. The term "gristmill" is a general term, comprehending all kinds of mills for grinding corn for food. A corn meal mill belongs to a particular class of gristmills, the use of which may be a distinctive business of itself, and if the kiln-drying corn meal apparatus be not an invaluable and essential part of the corn meal mill, the latter may or may not have that appendage. At this day there should be no uncertainty as to the distinctive significance of the terms "flouring mill" and "gristmill," which are words of common use. A flouring mill, in its most restrictive sense, is, to say the least, a mill used for grinding one kind of grain for food, to wit, wheat. Flour is the product of grain, both ground and bolted; while meal is the pulverized grain, ground, but not bolted. The making of flour, therefore, consists in grinding the grain and bolting the meal, while the making of meal consists of the simple process of grinding. The grinding or gristmill, therefore, is an essential part of all flouring mills, while the bolting apparatus is not an indispensable part of a gristmill. Washington Mut. Ins. Co. v. Merchants' & Manufacturers' Mut. Ins. Co., 5 Ohio St. 450, 480.

"Gristmill on the Little Blue river," as used in county bonds issued to persons named on their executing a satisfactory bond to the county commissioners conditioned for the erection of a gristmill on the Little Blue river, implies that it was a mill propelled by water. State v. Clay County, 30 N. W. 528, 529, 20 Neb. 452.

A representation that an insured building is a gristmill is not falsified by the fact that a workbench and tools are kept in the mill for the purpose of keeping it in repair. Jennings v. Chenango County Mut. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 2 Denio, 75, 83.

GRIT.

Where, on a trial for murder, a witness testified that he knew the defendant and his brother, and that they had good grit, it was not error to refuse defendant the right to prove what the witness meant. Under the circumstances in which the word "grit" is used, the jury could have no difficulty in understanding its meaning, to wit, as defined in dictionaries, "to indicate firmness of mind, courage, spunk." Mitchell v. State, 41 S. W. 816, 817, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 170 (citing Webst. Dict.).

GROAT.

"Groat" is the name of an English coin of the value of four pence, and is synonymous with "four pence." A groat in Edward III's reign weighed a great deal more than a four penny piece of 1842. Reg. v. Connell, 1 Car. & K. 190, 191.

GROCER.

As a merchant, see "Merchant."

"Webster defines the meaning of the word 'grocer' to be a trader who deals in tea, sugar, spices, coffee, liquors, fruits, etc." Thus it was held that an answer in an application for life insurance that the applicant was a grocer will not alone avoid the policy, because he also sold liquors. McGurk v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 16 Atl. 263, 265, 56 Conn. 528, 1 L. R. A. 563.

GROCERIES.

In a mortgage on all flour, soap, sugar, spices, and all groceries and fixtures of a country and village grocery store, belonging to the mortgagor, "groceries" is to be construed in its natural and accepted meaning, and does not include all articles which are usually kept in such a store, such as shovels, pails, and buckets. Fletcher v. Powers, 131 Mass. 333, 335.

An insurance policy, insuring the stock of a merchant "keeping a store of dry goods and groceries," covers all such goods and merchandise as are usually kept in such stores as are called "dry goods and grocery stores" in the place where the insured did business. Germania Fire Ins. Co. v. Francis, 52 Miss. 457, 468, 24 Am. Rep. 674.

Where a fire policy describes the insured premises as a grocery store, the term "groceries" cannot be construed to include oil and sulphur kept in the store, where such articles are enumerated as hazardous, and the keeping of hazardous articles prohibited. Whitmarsh v. Charter Oak Fire Ins. Co., 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 581, 583.

Whether the word "groceries," as used in a policy of fire insurance, covers alcohol and spirituous liquors kept in the store, in violation of the prohibitory law, was a question of fact for the jury. Niagara Fire Ins. Co. v. De Graff, 12 Mich. 124, 126.

A misspelling of the word "groceries" as "groclers," in an indictment for the forgery of an order for groceries, does not invalidate the indictment. Myers v. State, 101 Ind. 379, 382.

GROGSHOP.

A grogshop is a place where liquor is sold, and formerly represented that class of the liquor traffic now filled by saloons and barrooms. Town of Leesburg v. Putman, 29 S. E. 602, 603, 103 Ga. 110.

GROOM.

A groom is the mere servant, menial as it were, and not the general agent, of the owner of the horse, and an understanding or misunderstanding of the law in the neighborhood, or by a portion of the people in the neighborhood, cannot enlarge the powers of a lackey into those of an agent, capable of controlling the contracts of the master. Moore v. Tickle, 14 N. C. 244, 246.

GROOVE.

The meaning of the word "groove" in an application for a patent, providing that certain rods should be fitted loosely in the engagement of its grooves, is unmistakably and perfectly clear. It conveys to the mind the idea of a noticeable depression of some length in a surface. It is absurd to imagine a groove in a perfectly smooth, even surface. Schreiber & Conchar Mfg. Co. v. Adams Co. (U. S.) 117 Fed. 830, 833, 54 C. C. A. 128.

GROSS.

See "In Gross."

"Gross means whole, entire, total." Appeal of Braun, 105 Pa. 414, 415.

GROSS AMOUNT.

Hurd's Rev. St. 1899, p. 1042, providing that all foreign insurance companies should at the time of filing their annual statement pay as taxes 2 per cent. of the gross amount of premiums received by them for business done in the state the previous year, means the whole or entire amount of premiums received for business done in the state during the year. The word "gross" is opposed to "net," and in its ordinary meaning is the entire amount of the receipts of a business, while the net receipts are those remaining after deductions for the expenses and charges of conducting the business. German Alliance Ins. Co. v. Van Cleave, 61 N. E. 94, 96, 191 Ill. 410.

GROSS AVERAGE.

"Gross average" means a contribution by all the parties concerned in a mercantile voyage, either as to the cargo or vessel, toward a loss sustained by some of the parties in interest for the benefit of all. Wilson v. Cross & Co., 33 Cal. 60, 69.

GROSS DRUNKENNESS.

Where a statute (St. 1889, c. 447) makes gross and confirmed drunkenness caused by the excessive use of opium and other drugs a ground for divorce, the use of the drug, in order to justify a divorce thereunder, must be excessive and habitual. The mere use, without the abuse, of the drug, is not sufficient. Burt v. Burt, 46 N. E. 622, 623, 168 Mass. 205.

GROSS EARNINGS.

Laws Ex. Sess. 1858, c. 1, § 18, subd. 1, enacts that the Minnesota & Pacific Railway Company shall pay to the state 3 per cent. of its gross earnings in lieu of all taxes, and provides that for the purpose of ascertaining said earnings an accurate account shall be kept by said company of all receipts and expenditures on account of the operation of said railroads. Held, that the "gross earnings" meant receipts arising from the operation of the railroad, and hence did not include the compensation paid to such company by another company for the right to run trains over lines of the former. State v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co., 15 N. W. 307, 30 Minn. 311 (quoted in State v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 32 Minn. 294, 295, 20 N. W. 234, 235).

"Gross earnings," as used in Laws 1896, c. 908, § 184, providing that every steam surface railroad company shall pay an annual tax upon its gross earnings within the state, which shall include its gross earnings from its transportation or transmission business, means all receipts arising from or growing out of the employment of its capital, whether that capital is employed in the transportation or transmission business, or otherwise. People v. Roberts, 52 N. Y. Supp. 859, 860, 32 App. Div. 113.

In a contract by a ferryman to transport all the passengers presented for ferriage by a railway company from its terminus to a certain town, in consideration of one-fifth of the gross earnings of the railway on such passengers, the term "gross earnings" includes the entire sum received from passengers, including the amounts paid to a transfer company to which the railway has let the contract of hauling its passengers from the terminus to a specified town, where the railway company sells the tickets of the transfer company and manages it as a part of its system. Dardanelle & R. Ry. Co. v. Shinn, 12 S. W. 183, 184, 52 Ark. 93.

In a lease providing that the "gross earnings and receipts" of the railroad leased shall be the basis of computing the rent, the phrase means the same thing as the receipts of the entire railroad and the property. Cincinnati, S. & O. R. Ry. Co. v. Indiana, B. & N. Ry. Co., 44 Ohio St. 287, 315, 7 N. E. 139.

GROSS FAULT.

"Gross fault" is that which proceeds from inexcusable negligence or ignorance. It is considered as nearly equal to fraud. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 13.

GROSS IMMORALITY.

"Gross," as used in modifying the word "immorality," does not mean great and excessive, but rather willful, flagrant, or shameless, showing a moral indifference to the opinions of the good and respectable members of the community, and to the just obligations of the position held by an officer; and a public prosecutor whose duty it is to prosecute the keeper and inmates of a house of ill fame, who resorts thereto for prostitution, is guilty of gross immorality. Moore v. Strickling, 33 S. E. 274, 278, 46 W. Va. 515, 50 L. R. A. 279.

GROSS INADEQUACY.

A gross inadequacy of consideration of a contract, such as will avoid it on the ground of fraud, means such inadequacy as will shock the conscience and furnish satisfactory and decisive evidence of fraud. Cleere v. Cleere, 3 South. 107, 111, 82 Ala. 581, 60 Am. Rep. 750; Clark v. Freedman's Trust Co., 100 U. S. 149, 152, 25 L. Ed. 573.

GROSS INCOME.

"Gross income," as used in a contract by which an employé was to receive his salary out of the gross income of the mill property belonging to the firm, should be construed as the total income less the annual current expense of carrying on the business, and hence, in making an account of the gross income, there should not be deducted from it the amounts spent for the improvement of the mill property, since that was in the nature of permanent improvements. Such improvements, adding to the value of the real estate, though they may have been necessary for the preservation of the property, must be regarded as capital invested, and not as a part of the expenses of the business. Appeal of Braun, 15 Pittsb. Leg. J. 94, 105 Pa. 414, 416.

GROSS LEWDNESS.

V. S. 444, § 8, providing that, if any man or woman shall be guilty of "open and gross lewdness and lascivious behavior," etc., he shall be imprisoned, etc., should be construed to include an indecent exposure of a man's person to a woman and his solicitation of sexual intercourse, and his persistence in such conduct, notwithstanding her remonstrances. The common sense of the community and the sense of decency and morality is sufficient to point out in each particular case what conduct is rendered criminal by the statute. The crime does not depend on the number of persons to whom one thus exposes himself, whether one or many. State v. Millard, 18 Vt. 574, 577, 46 Am. Dec. 170.

GROSS MISBEHAVIOR.

Rev. St. c. 139, § 2, authorizing a divorce for "gross misbehavior and wickedness" repugnant to and inconsistent with the marriage contract, should be construed as including two distinct moral elements or qualities; that is, it must be of such a character as in the first place to amount to gross misbehavior and wickedness, and in the second place to be repugnant to and in violation of the marriage contract. There are consequently many kinds of gross misbehavior and wickedness which are not, under the clause, grounds for divorce, such as embezzlement or forgery; and so, on the other hand, there are doubtless many violations of marital duty and much conduct repugnant to and in violation of the marriage contract which are nevertheless not sufficient as grounds of divorce, for the reason that they do not take, in the statutory sense, the form of gross misbehavior and wickedness. The statute authorizes a divorce only where there is a concurrence of both elements, and hence does not justify a divorce on the ground that the respondent husband, for a period shorter than the period required by the statute in cases of desertion, has lived in the same house with, or previously been the daily companion of, another woman, each avowing for the other entire affection, though no criminal relation has existed between them. Stevens v. Stevens, 8 R. I. 557, 561.

GROSS MISTAKE.

The gross mistake which will authorize an abatement from the purchase price on account of deficiency in the quantity of the premises, occurs where the difference between the actual and estimated quantity of land represented is so great as to clearly warrant the conclusion that the parties would not have contracted, had they known the truth. Melick v. Dayton, 34 N. J. Eq. (7 Stew.) 245, 249; McMichael v. Webster, 35 Atl. 663, 666, 54 N. J. Eq. 478. It is hardly necessary to say that a difference of 35 acres in a farm of 150 acres would be a gross mistake. McMichael v. Webster, 35 Atl. 663, 666, 54 N. J. Eq. 478.

The words "gross mistake," used in reference to the gross mistake of a log scaler, is a mistake which is clearly shown to have left out some of the logs, or increased the scale by a mistake in the tally, or any addition of the amounts on the tally sheets or something of that kind, and not an honest mistake of judgment in the scaler; for it is well understood and established that in estimating the merchantable lumber in a given log the judgment of scalers varies more or less, and that the scale cannot be made so accurate that all scalers will agree upon it. Malone v. Gates, 49 N. W. 638, 639, 87 Mich. 332.

GROSS NEGLIGENCE.

Gross negligence is the want of even slight care and diligence. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. McCoy, 81 Ky. 403, 409; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Walters (Ky.) 56 S. W. 706, 707; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kelly's Adm'r, 38 S. W. 852, 855, 100 Ky. 421, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 69, 78; Canton, C. & H. Turnpike Co. v. McIntire, 48 S. W. 980, 982, 105 Ky. 185; McLaughlin v. Louisville Electric Light Co., 18 Ky. Law Rep. 693, 699, 100 Ky. 173, 37 S. W. 851, 34 L. R. A. 812; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Walden (Ky.) 74 S. W. 694, 695; Litchfield v. White, 7 N. Y. 438, 442, 57 Am. Dec. 534; Riley v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 26 N. Y. Supp. 532, 535, 6 Misc. Rep. 221; Michigan Central R. Co. v. Carrow, 73 Ill. 348, 357, 24 Am. Rep. 248; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Johnson, 103 Ill. 512, 523; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Dougherty, 12 Ill. App. (12 Bradw.) 181, 199; Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Rollins, 5 Kan. 167, 180; Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Henry, 14 Pac. 1, 3, 36 Kan. 565; Memphis & L. R. R. v. Sanders, 43 Ark. 225, 229; Thackston v. Port Royal & W. C. Ry. Co., 18 S. E. 177, 178, 40 S. C. 80; Whiting v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 37 N. W. 222, 224, 5 Dak. 90; Coit v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 63 Pac. 83, 85, 130 Cal. 657, 53 L. R. A. 678, 80 Am. St. Rep. 153; Murdock v. Clarke (Cal.) 24 Pac. 272, 274; Bennett v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 57 Conn. 422, 426, 18 Atl. 668; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2784; Rev. Codes N. D. 1809, § 5111.

Gross negligence is the want of that diligence which even careless men are accustomed to exercise. Lycoming Ins. Co. v. Barringer, 73 Ill. 230, 235; McGrath v. Hudson River R. Co. (N. Y.) 19 How. Prac. 211, 220 (quoting Jones, Bailm. 21, 22); White v. Western Union Telegraph Co. (U. S.) 14 Fed. 710, 717; Campbell v. Monmouth Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 59 Me. 430, 436; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Coleman (Ky.) 59 S. W. 13, 15.

Gross neglect is the want of that care which every man of common sense, however inattentive he may be, takes of his own property. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 2900; French v. Buffalo, N. Y. & E. R. Co., *43 N. Y. (4 Keyes) 108, 113; Seybel v. National Currency Bank, 54 N. Y. 288, 299, 13 Am. Rep. 583; Van Nostrand v. New York Guaranty & Indemnity Co., 39 N. Y. Super. Ct. (7 Jones & S.) 73, 80; Annas v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co., 30 N. W. 282, 288, 67 Wis. 46, 58 Am. Rep. 848. In giving such definition it is erroneous for the court to omit the words "how inattentive soever he may be." Seaboard & R. R. Co. v. Cauthen, 41 S. E. 653, 654, 115 Ga. 422.

By "gross negligence" is meant exceeding negligence; that which is mere inadvertence in a superlative degree. It is a convenient designation of a real thing, and in this sense "gross" is merely intensive, and not vituperative. Holwerson v. St. Louis & S. Ry. Co., 57 S. W. 770, 777, 157 Mo. 216, 50 L. R. A. 850 (quoting Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 62).

"It is said that the term 'gross negligence' conveys no definite legal idea; and the language of learned judges in some recent cases cited in Ang. Carr. §§ 22, 23, 163, appears to sustain the assertion. However that may be, there is no doubt that in the ordinary use of language and in the popular sense of the words, it signifies negligence of an aggravated character, as distinguished from that which is merely careless or not palpably culpable." A stipulation limiting the liability of a trustee to his own "gross negligence or willful misconduct" exonerates him from the consequences of want of caution and of every degree of negligence except that which at first blush would strike the mind as manifestly culpable or aggravated. Litchfield v. White, 5 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Sandf.) 545, 552.

"Gross negligence," says the court, "is nothing more than negligence with the addition of a vituperative epithet." Mariner v. Smith, 52 Tenn. (5 Heisk.) 203, 208.

Negligence cannot be considered gross unless evidenced by an entire failure to exercise care, or by the exercise of such a slight degree of care as to justify a belief that the person on whom the care was incumbent was indifferent to the interest and welfare of the other. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Lawler, 3 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 19.

"Gross negligence" is a technical term. It is the omission of that care "which even inattentive and thoughtless men never fail to take of their own property. It is a violation of good faith." It implies malice and evil intention. Bannon v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 24 Md. 108, 124 (quoting Ang. Carr. § 10).

No degree of mere carelessness or inadvertence constitutes gross negligence or willful misconduct. Decker v. McSorley, 93 N. W. 808, 809, 116 Wis. 643.

The word "gross," when used to qualify "negligence," is a relative one, and is supposed to emphasize merely a want of due care and negligence as gross or ordinary, according to the circumstances, relations, and conditions in which due care is omitted to be exercised. East Tennessee Telephone Co. v. Simms' Adm'r, 36 S. W. 171, 173, 99 Ky. 404.

The word "gross," when used to qualify the word "negligence," is a relative one, and is supposed to emphasize merely the want of due care and negligence as gross or ordinary. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kelly's Adm'r, 40 S. W. 452, 100 Ky. 421.

"Gross negligence" is a relative term. It is doubtless to be understood as meaning a greater want of care than is implied by the term "ordinary negligence," but after all it only means the absence of the care that was requisite under the circumstances. Albion Lumber Co. v. De Nobra (U. S.) 72 Fed. 739, 741, 19 C. C. A. 168 (citing Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 494, 23 L. Ed. 374).

As bad faith.

Gross negligence may be evidence of mala fides, but it is not the same thing. Atlas Nat. Bank v. Holm (U. S.) 71 Fed. 489, 491, 19 C. C. A. 94.

Gross negligence in the taking of negotiable paper is not itself the same as bad faith, though it may be evidence of it, inasmuch as the act of negligence may be so wanton as to afford ground for believing that it was intentional and fraudulent. Bad faith will not be imputed, unless there be something in the particular transaction which is equivalent to fraud, actual or constructive. But a deliberate and intentional avoidance of knowledge, or a willful closing of the eyes to a fact, will be construed to have the same effect as knowledge or actual notice. Morton v. New Orleans & S. Ry. Co. & Immigration Ass'n, 79 Ala. 590, 617 (citing 1 Para. Notes & B. 257, 259; 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 190-199; Jones, Securities, § 299).

"Gross neglect," as applied to the neglect of duty by railroad employes, means such an intentional or reckless disregard of security and right as to imply bad faith, and which therefore squints at fraud, and is tantamount to the "magna culpa" of the civil law, which in some respects is quasi criminal. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Robinson, 67 Ky. (4 Bush) 507, 509.

Gross negligence may furnish evidence of fraud and of a violation of that good faith that the law presumes to exist in every contract of bailment, but that it amounts to actual or intentional fraud, or, in other words, is a quasi crime, as fraud is sometimes termed, is a doctrine clearly opposed to reason and authority. Gross negligence, on the contrary, may be and often is consistent with good faith and honesty of intention, and, as said by Judge Story, in his work on Bailment, "to confound the terms 'gross negligence' and 'fraud' might be most mischievous error." Tudor v. Lewis, 60 Ky. (3 Metc.) 378, 385.

As ground for divorce.

The term "gross neglect of duty," which is a cause of divorce, is indefinite, and it is difficult to lay down any general rule by which every case can be determined to be within or without its limits. Each case must be examined by itself. It is not mere neglect of marital duty. The adjective "gross," whatever may be said of it as a mere term of vituperation in other relations, here has legal force as descriptive of the conduct of the party neglecting duty. There must not only be a default, but the default must be attended with circumstances of indignity or aggravation. Smith v. Smith, 22 Kan. 699, 700.

A cause of action for divorce on the ground of gross neglect is not established by proof of personal violence, agreement to separate, a division of furniture, and the husband's adulterous intercourse with others. Thorp v. Thorp (Ohio) Wright, 763.

The mere neglect of a husband, with no circumstances of aggravation, to provide maintenance for his wife and children for 15 years, during which time she has supported the children from her own earnings, is not such gross or wanton or cruel neglect as will sustain a libel for divorce in her behalf, under Gen. St. c. 107, § 9, making gross, wanton, or cruel neglect a ground for divorce. Peabody v. Peabody, 104 Mass. 195, 197.

Lesser degrees included.

The term "gross negligence" includes all lesser degrees of negligence, and a charge in a petition that an act was done through gross negligence would not limit the plaintiff's right of recovery, if otherwise entitled, to an injury inflicted by the willful or intentional act of another. Hays v. Gainesville St. Ry. Co., 8 S. W. 491, 493, 70 Tex. 602, 8 Am. St. Rep. 624.

Ordinary negligence distinguished.

See "Ordinary Negligence."

As want of due or ordinary care.

The word "gross," when applied to negligence, per se has no legal significance which imports other than simple negligence or a want of due care. Stringer v. Alabama Mineral R. Co., 13 South. 75, 80, 99 Ala. 397; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Hall, 17 South. 176, 179, 105 Ala. 599; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. An- chors, 22 South. 279, 281, 114 Ala. 492, 62 Am. St. Rep. 116 (citing Stringer v. Alabama Mineral R. Co., 99 Ala. 397, 13 South. 75).

Though the words "gross negligence" have been used frequently by judges in discussing the question of the negligence of a railroad which will authorize a recovery for an injury received at a crossing accident, the use of the word "gross" is probably wholly unnecessary. In England it is definitely decided that there is no difference between negligence and gross negligence; the latter being nothing more than the former with the addition of a vituperative epithet. McPheeters v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 45 Mo. 22, 26.

"Gross or willful negligence" is more than mere negligence, as these words are used in Pub. St. c. 112, § 213, requiring it to be shown, in order to recover, that, in addition to a mere want of ordinary care, a person was, at the time of a collision with a railroad train, guilty of gross or willful negligence, and that such gross or willful negligence contributed to the injury; but the distinction between them is one of degree. Where the question is whether a given condition of things amounts to negligence, the court has a right to say that negligence existed, and that therefore the plaintiff could not recover. The same must be true as to negligence in a higher degree, and was so decided in Debbins v. Old Colony R. Co., 154 Mass. 402, 28 N. E. 274. See, also, Sullivan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 154 Mass. 524, 28 N. E. 911; Emery v. Boston & M. R. Co., 53 N. E. 278, 279, 173 Mass. 136.

It is said that the expression "gross negligence" is loosely used in many judicial decisions, and that it is sometimes used as a mere antithesis of a want of ordinary care. Warren v. Robison, 57 Pac. 287, 290, 19 Utah, 289, 75 Am. St. Rep. 734.

Where a landlord makes repairs on the demised premises without using ordinary skill in so doing, he is liable for a personal injury caused thereby to the tenant. In such a case there is no practical difference between gross negligence and the want of ordinary care and skill. The question of reasonable care must always depend on the special circumstances of each case, and is almost of necessity a question of fact, rather than of law. The degrees of negligence so often spoken of in the text-books do not admit of such precision and exactness of definition as to be of any practical advantage in the administration of justice, without a detail of the facts which they are intended to designate. Gill v. Middleton, 105 Mass. 477, 479, 7 Am. Rep. 548.

The term "gross negligence" means something more than a want of ordinary care, and the word "gross" has more effect than the word "due" or "ordinary." Galbraith v. West End St. Ry. Co., 43 N. E. 501, 502, 185 Mass. 572.

The use of the words "gross negligence," in Pub. St. c. 112, § 213, making a railroad corporation liable for death of any one killed at a crossing through the company's failure to give certain signals, unless deceased was guilty of gross or willful negligence, shows that the Legislature intended a materially greater degree of negligence than the mere one of ordinary care. Phelps v. New England R. Co., 51 N. E. 522, 523, 172 Mass. 98.

A charge that, if the injuries for which an action was brought were due to the gross negligence of defendant, the jury should consider the question of exemplary damages, and that gross negligence was a total want of ordinary care, and that ordinary care is that degree of care which an ordinary person would use under like circumstances, is erroneous, since the exercise of care but slightly less than ordinary care does not constitute gross negligence. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Mitchell, 10 S. W. 411, 413, 72 Tex. 171.

In an action against a railroad to recover for the death of plaintiff's husband, where the court gave an instruction authorizing punitive damages for gross negligence, it was prejudicial error to instruct the jury that gross negligence is the absence of ordinary care. Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Judd's Adm'x, 50 S. W. 539, 540, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1978, 1979, 106 Ky. 364.

Gross negligence having been branded as an unmeaning, vituperative epithet, the modern tendency is to discard its use, and treat everything under the head of "ordinary care," and its correlative, "simple negligence." But it would be remarkable to find a few simple and useful gradations in almost all things, and yet none in negligence. It may not be generally useful in practice at the present day, but that is because of the multiplicity of the degrees of negligence, and the unevenness of the grades and subdivisions, and not because there is no such thing as gross negligence. To say that it is but the violation of the duty of ordinary care required in the case is but putting two things of different degrees in the one class by using "ordinary care" as a generic term. When one inflicts on a voluntary licensee a wanton, reckless, heedless injury, he is guilty of gross negligence, and is liable. Poling v. Ohio River Co., 38 W. Va. 645, 661, 18 S. E. 782, 787, 24 L. R. A. 215.

As want of necessary care.

Gross negligence is the failure to exercise that degree of care, whether slight, ordinary, or great, which is required in the particular instance, although the party may have exercised some care, and it may be only slightly less than the degree of care required. Chicago, K. & N. Ry. Co. v. Brown, 24 Pac. 497, 499, 44 Kan. 384.

Strictly speaking, the expressions "gross negligence" and "ordinary negligence" are indicative rather of the degree of care and diligence which is due from a party, and which he fails to perform, than the amount of inattention, carelessness, or stupidity which he exhibits. If very little care is due from him, and he fails to perform that little, it is called "gross negligence." If very great care is required, and he fails to come up to the mark, it is called "slight negligence." And if ordinary care is due, such as a prudent man would exercise in his own affairs, failure to bestow that amount of care is called "ordinary negligence." In each case the negligence, whatever epithet we give it, is failure to give and bestow the care which the situation demands, and hence it is more strictly accurate, perhaps, to call it simply "negligence," and this seems to be the tendency of modern authority. Briggs v. Spaulding, 11 Sup. Ct. 924, 930, 141 U. S. 132, 35 L. Ed. 662.

"Gross negligence" is a relative term. It is doubtless to be understood as meaning a greater amount of care than is employed by the term "ordinary negligence," but after all it only means an absence of the care that was requisite under the circumstances. Campe v. Weir, 58 N. Y. Supp. 1082, 1084, 28 Misc. Rep. 243 (citing Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 23 L. Ed. 374).

Within the rule that gratuitous bailees of another's property are not responsible for its loss, unless guilty of gross negligence in its keeping, gross negligence is nothing more than a failure to bestow the care which the property in its situation demands. The omission of the reasonable care required is the negligence which creates the liability. Preston v. Prather, 11 Sup. Ct. 162, 163, 137 U. S. 604, 34 L. Ed. 788. Whether this existed is a question of fact for the jury to determine. Gray v. Merriam, 35 N. E. 810, 812, 148 Ill. 179, 32 L. R. A. 769, 39 Am. St. Rep. 172.

"Gross negligence," on the part of a bailee, is a relative term, to be considered with reference to the nature of the goods. A bailee without hire is guilty of gross negligence if he omits that reasonable care of property committed to his charge which persons in the like situation exercise, or which the bailee is accustomed to exercise with respect to his own goods, in like cases. Tracy v. Wood (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 117.

Gross negligence means the absence of the care that was necessary under the circumstances. When the danger is very great, and the care to prevent disaster is very slight, or none at all, the negligence of the party becomes a willful act in law. An act characterized by a high degree of negligence, or, as it is familiarly called, "gross negligence," is the counterpart of a willful act. Shumacher v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (U. S.) 39 Fed. 174, 177.

Where, under the circumstances, great care would be required, and the care demanded was not exercised, the case is one of gross negligence. "Gross negligence" is also a relative term. It is doubtless to be understood as meaning greater want of care than is implied by the term "ordinary negligence"; but after all it means the absence of the care required under the circumstances. It is also a want of slight care, an entire failure to exercise care, or the existence of so slight a degree of care as to justify the belief that there was an indifference to the interest or the welfare of others. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Cook (Tex.) 16 S. W. 1038, 1039.

As wanton or willful negligence.

Negligence, even when gross, is but an omission of duty. It is not designed and intentional mischief, though it may be cogent evidence of such fact; and a refusal to instruct that gross negligence is defined by the law to be willful and intentional neglect is correct. Jacksonville S. E. Ry. Co. v. Southworth, 25 N. E. 1093, 1094, 135 Ill. 250.

The expression "gross neglect" signifies a less degree of neglect than the expression "willful neglect," but as coupled in a petition, alleging that the deceased's death was caused by the gross and willful neglect of the defendant, it does not tend to change the degree of neglect expressed by the word "willful." Hackett v. Louisville, St. L. & T. P. R. Co., 24 S. W. 871, 872, 95 Ky. 236.

In some of the cases, and especially the older ones, the term "gross negligence" is used as the equivalent of "willful negligence" as used by the later authorities, which imports acts or conduct that is willful or wanton, and to which the doctrine of contributory negligence has no application; for, when the injury done to plaintiff is occasioned by the willful and wanton act of the defendant, the negligence of the plaintiff is no defense. Moses v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 23 Pac. 498, 501, 18 Or. 385, 8 L. R. A. 135.

The words "willful" and "gross," as applied to negligence, are not synonymous. As used in Ky. St. § 6, providing that punitive damages may be recovered when an act causing the death of a party is willful or the negligence gross, the word "willful" is descriptive of the act, while the word "gross" is descriptive of a degree of negligence. Clark's Adm'r v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 39 S. W. 840, 841, 101 Ky. 84.

Gross negligence is not necessarily the same as willful neglect, and, in an action under Act 1854, § 3, for the delivery by an apothecary's clerk of poison, instead of a harmless drug, is not the same as "willful neglect," which gives a right of action under such statute. Hansford's Adm'r v. Payne, 74 Ky. (11 Bush) 380, 382.

An allegation that deceased was killed by reason of defendant's "gross negligence" does not amount to a charge that the killing was willful or intentional. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Tartt (U. S.) 64 Fed. 823, 825, 12 C. C. A. 618.

Willful neglect is a higher degree of neglect than gross neglect, and has never been used as a synonym by courts in discussing the facts of a particular case. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Coniff's Adm'r (Ky.) 27 S. W. 865, 866.

The word "gross," as used in characterizing the degree or kind of negligence, does not imply the same thing as "willful" or "intentional," and implies nothing more than negligence. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Tartt (U. S.) 64 Fed. 823, 825, 12 C. C. A. 618.

As contradistinguished from ordinary neglect, the term "gross neglect," when applied to acts of a bailee, means acts equivalent to willful acts upon the part of the bailee, for example, where he willfully refuses to take any precautions for the purpose of saving or caring for the property, the bailee is guilty of gross neglect. It is not where he simply fails to use the ordinary care which a prudent person would exercise under the circumstances. Gurney v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 14 N. Y. Supp. 321, 322, 59 Hun, 625.

"Gross negligence," which evidences willfulness, is such a gross want of care for the rights of others as to justify the presumption of willfulness or wantonness. It is such gross negligence as to imply a disregard of consequences or a willingness to inflict injury. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. Bode-mer, 29 N. E. 692, 695, 139 Ill. 596, 32 Am. St. Rep. 218.

"Gross negligence" means an intentional failure to perform a manifest duty, in reckless disregard of the consequences as affecting the life or property of another. It also implies a thoughtless disregard of consequences, without exerting any effort to avoid them. Denman v. Johnston, 48 N. W. 565, 567, 85 Mich. 387; Spokane Truck & Dray Co. v. Hoefler, 25 Pac. 1072, 2 Wash. St. 45, 11 L. R. A. 689, 26 Am. St. Rep. 842; Annas v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co., 30 N. W. 282, 290, 67 Wis. 46, 58 Am. Rep. 848.

The term "gross negligence" has been long and often employed in this state and in cases before this court as a synonym for wantonness or reckless indifference to probable consequences, and while it is inaccurate in that connection, which has been pointed out, it has been recognized as implying more than negligence of any degree, and as being the equivalent of wantonness, or that recklessness which is beyond all negligence. In Georgia Pac. Ry. Co. v. Lee, 92 Ala. 262, 9 South. 230, it was held that the term "gross negligence" has been so frequently used as defining that recklessness or wantonness, or worse, which implies a willingness to inflict the impending injury, or a willfulness in pursuing a course of conduct which will naturally or probably result in disaster, or an intent to perpetrate wrong, that it is perhaps too late, if otherwise desirable, to eradicate what is said to be an insufficient definition, if not indeed, a misnomer. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Orr, 26 South. 35, 41, 121 Ala. 489.

Though wanton and reckless conduct which amounts to willful negligence has sometimes been spoken of as gross negligence, the term does not define it; nor is gross negligence confined to only such an extreme degree of negligence. Where a court did not instruct that contributory negligence would not be a defense in a case for gross negligence, the term "gross negligence" will not be held to have been used in such extreme sense. Florida Southern Ry. Co. v. Hirst, 11 South. 506, 513, 30 Fla. 1, 16 L. R. A. 631, 32 Am. St. Rep. 17.

The expression "gross negligence," in a charge to a jury does not of itself define, nor does it include, only that extreme degree of negligence which is wanton or reckless of its injurious consequences, and to which the defense of contributory negligence does not obtain. Florida Cent. & P. R. Co. v. Fosworth, 25 South. 338, 341, 41 Fla. 1, 79 Am. St. Rep. 148.

The term "gross negligence," when referred to as authorizing recovery for a negligent injury, notwithstanding the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, means the intentional failure to perform a manifest duty in reckless disregard of the consequences as affecting the life or property of another. It implies a thoughtless disregard of consequences, without the exertion of any effort to avoid them. Schindler v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co., 49 N. W. 670, 674, 87 Mich. 400.

The term "gross negligence," as defined in decisions of Wisconsin, means that no degree of mere carelessness or inadvertence, however remote from the care customarily used by either the ordinarily careful man or by the exceptionally careful one, constitutes gross negligence, unless accompanied by what is described as intent, either active or constructive, to cause injury, or unless the conduct evinces a total disregard for the safety of persons or property, and is but little less than intentional wrong. Watermolen v. Fox River Electric Railway & Power Co., 85 N. W. 663, 665, 110 Wis. 153 (citing Lockwood

v. Belle City St. Ry., 92 Wis. 97, 65 N. W. 866; Schug v. Chicago, M. & St. Ry. Co., 102 Wis. 515, 78 N. W. 1090; Bolin v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co. [Wis.] 84 N. W. 446, 108 Wis. 333).

The gross negligence of the defendant, which will authorize a recovery in a personal injury action notwithstanding plaintiff's contributory negligence, means such a negligence as evinces a reckless disregard of human life, or of the safety of persons exposed to its dangerous effects, or that entire want of care which would raise the presumption of a conscious indifference to the rights of others which is equivalent to an intentional violation of them. McDonald v. International & G. N. R. Co. (Tex.) 21 S. W. 774, 775 (citing Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Shuford, 10 S. W. 408, 72 Tex. 165; Southern Cotton Press & Mfg. Co. v. Bradley, 52 Tex. 587, 600; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Cocke, 64 Tex. 151, 157; Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. Bodemer, 29 N. E. 692, 695, 139 Ill. 596, 32 Am. St. Rep. 218; Battishill v. Humphreys, 38 N. W. 581, 586, 64 Mich. 514); Wall v. Cameron, 6 Colo. 275, 277. Gross negligence is that entire want of care which would raise a presumption as to the conscious indifference as to consequences. Redington v. Pacific Postal Telegraph Cable Co., 40 Pac. 432, 434, 107 Cal. 317, 48 Am. St. Rep. 132 (citing Southern Cotton Press Mfg. Co. v. Bradley, 52 Tex. 587).

Gross negligence is an entire failure to exercise care, or the exercise of so slight a degree of care as to justify the belief that there was an indifference to the rights and welfare of others. Gross negligence is that entire want of care which would raise a presumption of conscious indifference to consequences. Thus, where a telegraph message was transmitted by a company at a time when the wires were working, though immediately before they had been working badly, it cannot be said that the company was guilty of gross negligence. Colt v. Western Union Tel. Co., 63 Pac. 83, 85, 130 Cal. 657, 53 L. R. A. 673, 80 Am. St. Rep. 153.

GROSS PROCEEDS.

"Gross proceeds," as the term is used in marine insurance in the statement of the rule that the measure of damages in case of a partial loss of a cargo of grain from water damage, is the difference between the respective gross proceeds of the same article when sound and when damaged, and not the net proceeds. It is said in 2 Arn. Ins. 969, to be the market price at which the merchant, after paying freight, duty, and landing charges, can sell the goods to the consumer or purchaser at the port of arrival, and that by the term "net proceeds" is meant the gross proceeds, deducting freight, duty, and landing charges. Lamar Ins. Co. of New York

v. McGlashen, 54 Ill. 513, 518, 5 Am. Rep. 162.

GROSS RECEIPTS.

A "tax on gross receipts" is a tax on the money of the carrier after it has reached the treasurer of the corporation. The fact that it may have been derived from transportation of freight between states, or between the home port and a foreign port, matters not; and it is not the same as a tax on tonnage. Philadelphia & S. M. S. S. Co. v. Commonwealth, 104 Pa. 109, 115.

"Gross receipts," as used in Act June 7, 1879, providing that every railroad company shall pay a tax on its gross receipts for tolls or transportation, telegraph, and express business, is equivalent to "gross increase" or "gross earnings," and their origin and ownership, rather than the hands into which they come, must be considered in determining the question whether they are taxable or not. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 104 Pa. 80, 82.

Thus an express company cannot deduct from the amount on which it pays taxes the amounts paid various railroad companies for transporting express matter, even though the railroad companies have paid all the taxes accrued in respect to their gross earnings, including the amount received from such express company. Commonwealth v. United States Exp. Co., 27 Atl. 396, 398, 157 Pa. 579.

The gross receipts received from passengers and freight, within the meaning of Act Pa. June 1, 1889, which provides that a railroad company owning, operating, or leasing any railroad shall pay a tax upon the gross receipts received from passengers and freight, do not include tolls received by one railroad company from another for the joint use of the track of the former, computed, not upon the amount of the gross receipts, but at a certain specified sum per ton or per passenger. Commonwealth v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 22 Atl. 806, 145 Pa. 200.

In Internal Revenue Act June 30, 1864, § 103 (13 Stat. 275), as amended by Act July 13, 1866, § 9 (14 Stat. 135), imposing a tax on the gross receipts of steamboat companies from passengers carried by it in its steamboats, "gross receipts" include not only the receipts for the carriage of the passengers, but also the money received for the use of berths and staterooms. New Jersey Steamboat Co. v. Pleasonton (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 87.

GROSS SALES.

"Gross sales," as used in a contract providing for the payment as royalties of a certain per cent. of the amount of the gross sales, means actual sales, without deducting expenses. Seven Southerland Sisters v. McInnerney, 53 N. Y. Supp. 771, 24 Misc. Rep. 720.

GROSS TON.

Where by local usage "gross ton" is used in place of "long ton," and means a ton of 2,240 pounds, a contract having reference to such local usage and using the words "gross ton" will not be held to mean a ton of 2,000 pounds, as provided by Pol. Code, § 3215. Higgins v. California Petroleum & Asphalt Co., 52 Pac. 1087, 1089, 109 Cal. 304.

"Gross ton," as used in a contract providing for royalty of so much per gross ton of bituminous rock, will be held to mean the crude unrefined rock, in distinction from a product of a process of refinement by which it is reduced to pure asphalt, which is only one ton from about seven tons of the crude rock, and will not be held to mean a ton of 2,240 pounds. Higgins v. California Petroleum & Asphalt Co., 41 Pac. 1087, 1089, 109 Cal. 304.

GROSS TONNAGE.

The entire cubic contents of the interior space of a vessel, numbered in tons, is called the "gross tonnage." The Thomas Melville (U. S.) 62 Fed. 749, 751, 10 O. C. A. 619.

GROSSLY.

A statute authorizing the granting of a divorce when the husband "grossly, wantonly, and cruelly" refuses or neglects for one year to provide a maintenance for the wife, being of sufficient ability, should be construed to mean more than a mere willful desertion and refusal of support. "The terms 'grossly, wantonly, and cruelly,' etc., although not very definite, must not be considered wholly insignificant. The Legislature did not intend a new cause of divorce, and the court could not regard it as synonymous with 'willful desertion,' where three years are required, and here only one year." Mandigo v. Mandigo, 15 Vt. 786.

GROSSLY INADEQUATE CONSIDERATION.

"Grossly inadequate consideration" means a consideration so far short of the real value of the property as to shock a correct mind, or as to arouse a presumption in the mind that the person who takes that property takes it under some kind of secret trust. McGhee v. Wells, 35 S. E. 529, 531, 57 S. C. 280, 76 Am. St. Rep. 567.

GROUND.

See "Building Ground"; "Burying Grounds"; "Just Ground."

A covenant in a deed, reserving the right of arching over an alleyway at a height of not less than 10 feet from the ground, referred to the surface of the earth as it might be from time to time, and not to the surface as it was in its original state. An alleyway, with a cover not less than 10 feet above the surface of the alley, must be maintained under the covenant. Wood v. Carter, 70 Ill. App. 217, 218.

Everything under surface.

A reservation, in a lease of land for coal mining purposes, of the "ground east and south of a certain building," includes not only the surface, but everything thereunder. Oskaloosa College v. Western Union Fuel Co., 54 N. W. 152, 153, 90 Iowa, 380.

Land synonymous.

"Ground," as used in Act April 9, 1867, § 1, authorizing school directors to enter upon and occupy ground for schoolhouses, is synonymous with "land," and is not confined to such only as is bare of buildings. Ferree v. Sixth Ward School Dist. of Allegheny, 76 Pa. (26 P. F. Smith) 376, 378.

Land under water.

Acts 1852, p. 426, § 17, provides that a water tax of a certain city may be assessed upon all grounds within the city limits liable to taxation, at a certain rate for each 100 square feet of surface. Held, that the word "grounds" does not include lots under water, whether owned by the state or by an individual. The very use of the word "grounds," to be taxed in proportion to their surface with regard to value, indicates a distinction, and hence that part of the tax for surface of ground below high-water mark must be set aside. State v. Jersey City, 25 N. J. Law (1 Dutch.) 525, 529.

Where certain lands have been granted for cultivation and settlement, the term "rest of the ground," as used in a grant, cannot be construed to mean land flowed by tide water, without some context or qualifying word of description indicating such an intention. Commonwealth v. City of Roxbury, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 451, 491.

Electric current.

A statement that there was a "ground" on an electric circuit between two boxes means that the current escaped and was carried to the ground. Bergen County Traction Co. v. Bliss, 41 Atl. 837, 838, 62 N. J. Law, 410

GROUND OF ACTION.

The phrase "ground of action," as used in a statute authorizing the court to allow a declaration to be amended when amendment does not change the ground of action, "is not used in any technical or narrow sense, but was intended to refer rather to the real object of the plaintiff in bringing the suit, and such construction has always been given to it as would further that object. The face of the declaration merely, therefore, has never been held to determine whether it may be amended, the form of the action being preserved; but courts, in deciding on the admissibility and propriety of an amendment, have uniformly, and we think properly, looked also at the extrinsic circumstances of the case, with a view to ascertaining the real purpose for which the suit was brought." Nash v. Adams, 24 Conn. 33, 39.

The phrase "ground of action," within a statute allowing the amendment of a declaration, provided the ground of action is not changed, is not to be construed in its technical sense, but is held to refer rather to the real object of the plaintiff in bringing the suit, which is to be determined, not merely by the face of the declaration, but also by the extrinsic circumstances of the case. Howland v. Couch, 43 Conn. 47, 52; Appeal of Huntington, 48 Atl. 766, 767, 73 Conn. 582.

The ground of an action, as alleged in the original complaint, was a false affirmation or affirmations, amounting to a false warranty, in respect to the value of a river landing, by means of which the defendants induced the plaintiff to buy a lease of the landing to his injury; and the amendments introduced into that complaint enlarged the affirmation, so as to include in it the value of certain coal embraced in the same purchase. They do not otherwise change it. No other or different warranty, or other and different transaction or bargain, is set up; but the warranty is made by the amendment to extend to the value of the coal also. It is a case of purchase at the same time, of the same party, and by the same contract of two articles, under the inducement of a false warranty as to both; and the plaintiff, in declaring, omits to aver that the bargain embraced both articles, and that the false warranty extended to both. It is not changing his grounds of action to amend by averring that the purchase embraced both, and the false affirmation covered both. In fact, the amendment undoubtedly enlarges the issue, and lays the foundation for other and further evidence, and the recovery of greater damages; but that is immaterial. Church v. Syracuse Coal & Salt Co., 32 Conn. 372, 376.

The term "ground of action," in Gen. St. § 1029, providing that, in hearings before the superior court on appeal from the doings of commissioners, the claimant shall have liberty to amend any defect, mistake, or informality in the statement of the claim, not changing the ground of action, refers to what was the real object of the claimant in making his claim. Donahue's Appeal from Com'rs, 62 Conn. 370, 373, 26 Atl. 399, 400.

GROUND OF RAILROAD.

The phrase "the ground of the railroad," used in describing a parcel of land in a mortgage as being "north of the ground of the railroad," evidently means its right of way. Pence v. Armstrong, 95 Ind. 191, 195.

GROUND RENT.

See "Irredeemable Ground Rents."
As real property, see "Real Property."

Ground rent is a rent paid for the privilege of building on another's land. It implies that the buildings placed upon the land by the lessee shall be his property. Russell v. City of New Haven, 51 Conn. 259, 361.

Ground rent is a rent service. Wallace v. Harmstad, 44 Pa. (8 Wright) 492, 501.

"Ground rent" is an estate of inheritance in the rent, while the owner of the land has an estate of inheritance in the land out of which the rent issues. Each is the owner of a fee-simple estate. "The one is incorporeal; the other, corporeal." Hart v. Anderson, 48 Atl. 636, 637, 198 Pa. 558 (citing Irwin v. Bank of United States, 1 Pa. [1 Barr] 349).

The word "ground rent" is used to signify the "reditus," or "render," reserved in a perpetual lease. Sturgeon v. Ely, 6 Pa. (6 Barr) 406, 408.

A ground rent is an estate carved out of the land. The owner of the one has an estate in the rent; the other, an estate in the land. Both are real estate, and subject alike to be incumbered by mortgage and judgment. Mitchell v. Steinmetz, 97 Pa. 251, 255, 10 Wkly. Notes Cas. 43, 44.

Primarily the term "ground rent" means a rent payable to a lessor; but, as used in a will wherein the testatrix bequeathed her several ground rents for the payment of funeral expenses and the erection of monuments for her father, mother, husband, and herself, she having disposed of all her other property, and the rent amounting only to $86 a year, should be construed so that the reversionary interest of the testatrix might be sold and the proceeds applied to the purposes mentioned in the will. Ogle v. Reynolds, 23 Atl. 137, 138, 75 Md. 145.

A grant of land from A. to B., his heirs and assigns, made under a certain annual rent, payable forever to the grantor, his heirs and assigns, is called in this country a "ground rent," though in England, subsequent to the statute quia emptores terrarum of 18 Edw. I, a feoffment in fee by the owner, with a reservation by the same deed of a rent to be paid to himself and his heirs, with the right of distress, has been considered a rent charge. Nevertheless such ground rents differ from a rent charge, strictly speaking, which arises where one, being seised in fee of lands, grants a rent in fee or for life out of them, with a power to the grantee to distrain. In the latter case the payment is founded on a consideration actually paid to the grantor of the rent, and received by him at or before the time of granting it; and hence, if the title of the grantor to the land upon which the rent is charged proved defective, still the rent is not extinguished, but must be paid, while in the case of a ground rent, the continuance of which depends entirely upon the future enjoyment of the land under the title conveyed by the grantor, to whom the rent is to be paid, if the grantee and heirs be evicted by a title paramount, the rent ceases and becomes extinct. Franciscus v. Reigart (Pa.) 4 Watts, 98, 116.

GROUNDLESS PROSECUTION.

"A groundless and malicious prosecution is caused by the act of commencing the action, not by the reasons given for commencing it. There is no relation of cause and effect between an illegal act, or the determination to do one, and the excuse alleged for doing it." Rothschild v. Whitman, 30 N. E. 858, 859, 132 N. Y. 472.

GROUNDS.

Rev. St. c. 26, authorizing a proceeding at the instance of the public against corporations to have a forfeiture of the charter or a dissolution of the corporation judicially declared and a judgment of ouster thereon, and that such proceeding is to be effected by an information by the Attorney General in a superior court or the Supreme Court, "setting forth briefly and without technical terms the grounds on which such forfeiture or dissolution is alleged to have been incurred or to have taken place," means that the information, like an indictment or declaration, should state with certainty to a common intent those facts and circumstances which constitute the offense in its substance, whether of misfeasance or nonfeasance, so that on its face, if true, it may be seen that there is a specific ground in fact, and not by conjectural inference, on which a forfeiture ought to be adjudged. By requiring the grounds to be set forth, nothing less could be meant than that the facts and circumstances should be set forth. Attorney General v. Petersburg & R. R. Co., 28 N. C. 456, 467.

GROUNDS OF BELIEF.

The expression "grounds of belief" is practically synonymous and interchangeable with "ground of belief," so that a charge is not erroneous because using one expression instead of the other. Lucas v. Johnson (Tex.) 64 S. W. 823, 825.

GROUTING.

"Grouting" is the same as being laid flush with mortar, as used in a contract for the construction of bridge piers, reciting that the foundation should rest on limestone rock and the filling in should be laid flush with mortar; the contract being construed to mean that the contractor should build the foundation on bed rock, and the filling in should be held to its place by grouting. Sullivan County v. Ruth, 59 S. W. 138, 140, 106 Tenn. 85.

GROW.

See "Stock Grower."

Where a farmer mortgaged "all the hay and grain of every kind that grows on the farm on which I now live the present year," in January, it covered the hay and the winter rye, as being in esse at the time of the execution of the mortgage, but no part of the grain crop of the spring of such year. Cudworth v. Scott, 41 N. H. 458.

GROW DUE.

An assignment of property in trust for the benefit of creditors, directing the payment of debts and liabilities to grow due, should be construed to mean debts which will mature in the course of time, but which have then not matured, and cannot be held to mean debts or claims not then in existence, but afterwards to be created, either by the assignor or assignees, which, if secured, would render the assignment void. Brainerd v. Dunning, 30 N. Y. 211, 214; Van Hook v. Walton, 28 Tex. 59, 75. Thus it was held that a claim for rent accruing under a lease after an assignment was not a debt due or to grow due. In re Havener, 23 N. Y. Supp. 1092, 1093, 70 Hun. 56.

GROWING CROPS.

"Growing," as used in Acts N. C. 1844, c. 35, which enacts that it shall not be lawful for any officer to levy an execution on any growing crop, "imports that the crop is not come to maturity, but is green or not made." Shannon v. Jones, 34 N. C. 206, 209.

A "growing crop" is one which exists in contemplation of law from the time the seed is deposited in the ground until after it is harvested, since at the time the seed is sown it loses the qualities of a chattel, and becomes a part of the freehold, and will pass with it. Wilkinson v. Ketler, 69 Ala. 435.

A will giving a certain person a tract of land, with the crops thereon, whether "gathered or growing" at the time of testator's death, means the crops made the year the testator died, and those of the preceding year remaining on the land, and those brought thither from other plantations to be stored. Carnagy v. Woodcock (Va.) 2 Munf. 234, 239, 5 Am. Dec. 470.

In a mortgage conveying "all crops growing and to be grown" upon certain specified land, the mortgage covers all crops on such land which have been previously sown and are then growing; and although it is void as to the crops thereafter to be grown on the land, that fact does not affect its validity as to the crops then growing. Luce v. Moorhead, 73 Iowa, 498, 35 N. W. 598, 599, 5 Am. St. Rep. 695.

A mortgage describing the property mortgaged as "oats now growing" does not cover oats which have been cut and partially threshed. "Vegetable bodies are growing while their bulk is being enlarged by the natural addition of matter through ducts." Ford v. Sutherland, 2 Mont. 440, 442 (citing Webst. Dict.).

Alfalfa is not exempt from taxation as "growing crops," under Pol. Code, § 3607, exempting growing crops from taxation. Miller v. Kern County, 70 Pac. 549, 553, 137 Cal. 516.

As part of realty.

The general rule of common law is that growing crops form a part of the real estate to which they are attached and from which they draw nourishment, and unless there has been a severance of them from the land they follow the title thereof. Wootton v. White, 44 Atl. 1026, 1027, 90 Md. 64, 78 Am. St. Rep. 425.

"Growing annual crops" for many purposes are and always have been considered chattels. At common law growing crops were universally held to be goods, and they were subject to all the leading consequences of being goods, as seizure on execution. Kingsley v. Holbrook, 45 N. H. 313, 319, 86 Am. Dec. 173.

It is well settled in this commonwealth that growing crops are personal property, subject, however, to pass with and as appurtenant to the realty unless severed by reservation or exception therefrom. Bear v. Bitzer, 16 Pa. (4 Harris) 175, 178, 55 Am. Dec. 490; Wilkins v. Vashbinder (Pa.) 7 Watts, 378, 379. Such was the rule of the common law, and uniformly held in England not to have been altered by the statute against frauds and perjuries. Backenstoss v. Stahler's Adm'r's, 33 Pa. (9 Casey) 251, 254, 75 Am. Dec. 592.

A growing crop is an interest in land, and a part of the freehold, and passes by a deed conveying the land, without more. Steele v. Farber, 37 Mo. 71, 79.

"Growing crops" are not land, within the meaning of the clause of the statute of frauds requiring contracts affecting lands to be in writing. At common law growing crops are uniformly held to be goods. Green v. Armstrong, 1 Denio, 550, 554.

GROWING TIMBER.

It is elementary knowledge that "growing timber" forms a part of the realty, and like any other part of the estate may be separated from the rest by express reservation or grant; that, even when so separated, it retains its distinctive character as an incident of real property so long as it remains uncut, but, when cut and severed from the soil, it becomes personal property, to which title may be acquired, as in case of other chattels, by simple contracts, either oral or written. Emerson v. Shores, 49 Atl. 1051, 1052, 95 Me. 237, 85 Am. St. Rep. 404.

GROWING UP IN CRIME.

The term "growing up in crime," as used in Const. art. 8, § 12, providing that the Legislature may provide for the safe-keeping, education, and employment of all children who are growing up in mendicancy or crime, refers not only to a minor who is a criminal, who has been or is now committing a crime, but also to a status; that is, a tendency in the direction of crime. A youth who is incorrigible is "growing up in crime." Who is more likely to eventually become a criminal than a youth who is so far advanced in following his own will as to have become incorrigible, incapable of being corrected or amended, bad beyond correction, irreclaimable, by those upon whom society and the laws place the duty of training him in proper conduct as a member of society? Scott v. Flowers, 84 N. W. 81, 60 Neb. 675.

GROWN.

A complaint averring that defendant converted to its own use wheat "grown" by said D. upon the said premises is broad enough to allow proof of the several acts done and performed by D. in growing the grain. It imports that the grain was produced by agencies set in motion by D., and implies that he had possession of the land and was the owner of the crop. Donovan

v. St. Anthony & D. Elevator Co., 75 N. W. 809, 810, 7 N. D. 513, 68 Am. St. Rep. 674.

GRUB STAKE.

This is a peculiar and novel character of contract, common in the early mining history of the state, where two parties enter into a common venture, one furnishing the grub and the other the labor, in prospecting for valuable mining properties. Such ventures were joint in their character, and all valuable discoveries would inure to the equal benefit of both. The courts declared such ventures to partake of the character of qualified partnerships. Berry v. Woodburn, 107 Cal. 504, 512, 40 Pac. 802, 804.

"Grub stake" is a term colloquially applied to a prospecting contract, and in its usual scope is simply a common venture, wherein one party, called the "outfitter," furnishes the supplies or grub, and the other, called the "prospector," performs the labor, and all discoveries inure to the benefit of the parties in the proportion fixed by the agreement. Hartney v. Gosling, 68 Pac. 1118, 1123, 10 Wyo. 346.

"Grub stake" is a contract by the terms of which one party is to furnish the necessary provisions, tools, powder, etc., and the other party agrees to prospect and locate mineral lands, and do the work necessary to the location of mining claims thereon, the interest thus acquired in the property to be held jointly by the parties. Meylette v. Brennan, 38 Pac. 75, 20 Colo. 242.

GUANO.

The term "guano," as used in a policy of insurance, though, strictly speaking, it does not embrace every kind of fertilizer used for agricultural purposes, where at the time the policy was issued the insurer knew that the insured had fertilizer on hand, but did not have any guano, was intended to embrace such fertilizer. Planters' Mut. Ins. Co. of Washington County v. Engle, 52 Md. 468, 481.

GUARANTEE.

He to whom a guaranty is made. This word is also used, as a noun, to denote the contract of guaranty or the obligation of a guarantor, and, as a verb, to denote the action of assuming the responsibility of a guarantor. But, on the general principle of legal orthography—that the title of the person to whom the action passes over should end in "ee," as "donee," "grantee," "payee," "bailee," "drawee," etc.—it seems better to use this word only as the correlative of "guarantor," and to spell the verb, and also the name of the contract, "guaranty." Black, Law Dict.

GUARANTIED.

See "Sales Guaranteed."

Generally the use of the word "guarantied," as applied to dividends upon preferred stock, whether in connection with the word "preferred," or alone, has not been held to import an absolute liability. Field v. Lamson & Goodnow Mfg. Co., 38 N. E. 1126, 1128, 162 Mass. 388, 27 L. R. A. 136 (citing Williston v. Michigan Southern & N. I. R. Co., 95 Mass. [13 Allen] 401; Taft v. Hartford, P. & F. R. Co., 8 R. I. 310, 5 Am. Rep. 575; Lockhart v. Van Alstyne, 31 Mich. 76, 18 Am. Rep. 156; Boardman v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 84 N. Y. 178; Miller v. Ratterman, 47 Ohio St. 141, 24 N. E. 496; Stevens v. South Devon R. Co., 9 Hare, 315).

GUARANTOR.

See, also, "Guaranty."

A "guarantor" is one who agrees to see the engagement of another performed. Barnett v. Wing, 16 N. Y. Supp. 567, 569, 62 Hun, 125.

Guarantors are sureties for others, who are the principals. Read v. Cutts, 7 Me. (7 Greenl.) 186, 189, 22 Am. Dec. 184.

A guarantor is a surety. Conger v. Babbet, 24 N. W. 569, 67 Iowa, 13.

A guarantor is one who writes his name on the back of a promissory note for the purpose of giving it security, and not for the purpose of transfer. First Nat. Bank of San Diego v. Babcock, 29 Pac. 415, 416, 94 Cal. 96, 28 Am. St. Rep. 94.

In a note signed by P., under which is the signature of C., with the words "Security for the fulfillment of the above," C. was not a "guarantor," but an immediate party. His name was signed at the foot, beneath that of P., the principal debtor, but, to exclude misconception of his character in the transaction, with the marginal annexation of the words "Security for the fulfillment of the above," which are not inconsistent with the direct engagement. They serve to note that he had signed, not as a "guarantor," but as a "surety." They are not technical words in a contract of guaranty, and the juxtaposition of the signatures as well as the absence of apt words to indicate a contingent responsibility, shows that the parties intended to be jointly bound. Craddock v. Armor (Pa.) 10 Watts, 258.

Where defendant wrote the words, "I guaranty the payment of the within note," he was a guarantor, and not a surety. Ox- ford Bank v. Haynes, 25 Mass. (8 Pick.) 423, 19 Am. Dec. 334.

"The difference between a maker of a note and an indorser or guarantor is that the contract of the first by its terms imports an unconditional obligation to pay money, and that of the last by its terms imports a conditional obligation. The rules of law settle this species of contracts, as well as others, and prescribe how they may be created, their legal effect, and the mode of enforcement." Aud v. Magruder, 10 Cal. 282, 290.

GUARANTY.

See "Absolute Guaranty"; "Collateral Guaranty"; "Conditional Guaranty"; "Continuing Guaranty"; "General Guaranty"; "Special Guaranty"; "Strict Guaranty."

A "guaranty" is defined to be a promise to answer for the payment of some debt or the performance of some duty in case of the failure of another person, who in the first instance is liable for such payment or performance. Gallagher v. Nichols, 60 N. Y. 438, 444; Barnett v. Wing, 62 Hun, 125, 128, 16 N. Y. Supp. 567; Gallagher v. Nichols (N. Y.) 16 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 337, 338; Manrow v. Durham (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 584, 591 (citing 3 Kent, Comm. 121); Andrews v. Pope, 35 S. E. 817, 818, 126 N. C. 472; Beeker v. Saunders, 28 N. C. 380, 381; Carter v. McGehee, 61 N. C. 431, 432; Spencer v. Carter, 49 N. C. 287, 289; Redfield v. Haight, 27 Conn. 81, 37; Middleton Bank v. Magill, 5 Conn. 28, 70; Deming v. Bull, 10 Conn. 409; Paine v. Stewart, 33 Conn. 516; Parker v. Culvertson (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1122, 1126; Tidoute Sav. Bank v. Libbey, 77 N. W. 182, 183, 101 Wis. 193, 70 Am. St. Rep. 907; Abbott v. Brown, 22 N. E. 813, 814, 131 Ill. 108; Gridley v. Capen, 72 Ill. 11, 13; Drake v. Markle, 21 Ind. 433, 436, 83 Am. Dec. 358 (citing 1 Bouv. Law Dict.); Wood v. Bevan & Bro., 8 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 189, 191 (citing Johnston v. Chapman, 3 Pen. & W. 18).

A guaranty is defined by Judge Story to be "an undertaking by one person to be answerable for the payment of some debt or the due performance of some contract or duty by another person, who himself remains liable to pay or perform the same." Durham v. Manrow, 2 N. Y. (2 Comst.) 533, 548; Abbott v. Brown, 22 N. E. 813, 814, 131 Ill. 108.

A guaranty is a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3091; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4625; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1969; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 3600; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2787.

A guaranty is an agreement by one person to answer to another for a debt, default, or miscarriage of a third person. Buckingham v. Murray's Ex'r, 30 Atl. 779, 780, 7 Houst. 176; Wallace, Muller & Co. v. Leber, 47 Atl. 430, 431, 65 N. J. Law, 195; Lachman v. Block (La.) 15 South. 649, 651; Welsh v. Ebersole, 75 Va. 651, 656; Hall v. Farmer, 5 Denio (N. Y.) 484, 487; Bowen v. Needles Nat. Bank (U. S.) 87 Fed. 430, 440.

"Guaranty" is an obligation for the ability or solvency of another. Leonard v. Wood, 2 Chest. Co. Rep. 329, 330 (citing Relgart v. White, 52 Pa. [2 P. F. Smith] 438).

"Guaranty is where one is bound to another, who hath the land, to warrant the same to him, which may be by two ways; that is, by act of the law, etc., or by deed of the party who grants by deed or fine to warrant it to him." Roseman v. Hughey (S. C.) Rice, 437, 438 (Quoting Termes de la Ley).

A contract of guaranty is that the principal is able and willing and that he will perform an engagement which he has undertaken or is about to undertake, and that in the event of failure the guarantor will answer for the consequences. It is a cumulative collateral engagement by which the guarantor agrees that his principal is able and will perform a contract which he has made or is about to make, and that if he fail he will, on being notified thereof, pay resulting damages. La Rose v. Logansport Nat. Bank, 102 Ind. 332, 335, 1 N. E. 805, 807 (citing Relgart v. White, 52 Pa. [2 P. F. Smith] 438).

A guaranty may be broad as, or broader or narrower than, the contract between the principal debtor and his creditor. The terms of the guaranty measure the liability of the guarantor, but do not constitute the contract between the debtor and creditor. The contract of guaranty is a contract between the guarantor and the person assured. The person whose conduct or acts are assured is not a necessary party to a contract of guaranty. The contract between the person thus assured and the person whose acts are assured is a separate matter. Mt. Calvary Church v. Albers, 73 S. W. 508, 512, 174 Mo. 331.

A guaranty is a contract of indemnity, which binds the party who gives it only in default of him for whose benefit it is given; and from the nature of such a contract it results that the debtor must be resorted to in the first instance. Williams v. Collins, 4 N. C. 382, 388.

A contract of guaranty or suretyship is said to be strictissimi juris, and one in which the guarantor has the right of prescribing the exact terms upon which he will enter into the obligation, and to insist on his discharge if those terms are not observed. It is not a question whether he is harmed by a deviation to which he has not assented.

Schoonover v. Osborne, 79 N. W. 263, 264, 108 Iowa, 453.

A contract of guaranty is like every other contract in this: that there must be two or more parties to the contract and the minds of the parties must assent. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Stuttgart & A. R. R. Co. (U. S.) 92 Fed. 246, 248.

Acceptance and notice thereof.

De Colyar states the essential requisites of a contract of guaranty to be (1) the mutual assent of the parties; (2) that the parties be capable of contracting; (3) that each be supported by a valuable consideration. With regard to the mutual assent of the parties he says: "Every contract includes a concurrence of intention in two parties, one of whom promises something to the other, who on his part accepts such promise. Until, therefore, an acceptance be given (which must be an absolute and unconditional acceptance of the previous offer), the promisor is not liable. In accordance with this doctrine it has been decided that the mere offer of guaranty is not binding until acceptance by the person to whom the offer is made. Till then, it is revocable by the party making it." Lachman v. Block (La.) 15 South. 649, 651.

A letter, in which the writer thereof, after recommending a certain person as worthy of credit, adds, "If, in addition to the foregoing expressions, you should require any individual guaranty, I shall have no objection to give you that pledge," is not a guaranty, but is rather a proposition leading to a guaranty, and was not binding where for more than two years no notice was given the writer that it was meant to be accepted or that the party to whom it was written required any individual guaranty of him. Stafford v. Low (N. Y.) 16 Johns. 67, 68.

Where one exhibited a letter to himself containing the following words: "For the amount of such goods as you wish to purchase on six months' credit * * * I will guaranty at 2½ per cent.," and on the faith of such letter obtained goods, the letter constituted a collateral guaranty, in which seasonable notice of acceptance was necessary in order to bind the guarantor. Bradley v. Cary, 8 Me. (8 Greenl.) 234, 238.

As an absolute agreement.

A guaranty may be absolute (that is, for the payment of the bill or note), or conditional (that is, a guaranty that it is collectible by due diligence). Esberg-Bachman Leaf-Tobacco Co. v. Heid (U. S.) 62 Fed. 962, 963.

"Guaranty," as used in a contract whereby a party undertook to "pay and guaranty" the debt of a third person, is not used in its technical sense, but will be construed as an absolute agreement to pay. Packer v. Benton, 35 Conn. 343, 348, 95 Am. Dec. 246.

As agree or promise.

The word "guaranty," in an indorsement on a note, "I hereby guaranty payment of the within, and waive demand, notice of protest, and protest," will not be construed in its technical sense, but as signifying "agree, promise, or undertake"; and hence the agreement was that of an indorser, as otherwise demand and notice of nonpayment would not be necessary. Delsman v. Friedlander, 66 Pac. 297, 298, 40 Or. 33.

"Guaranty," as used in a paper reciting that "for value received I guaranty" to a certain person "that I will pay" him a certain sum per month on certain conditions, is equivalent to "promise." Thayer v. Wild, 107 Mass. 449, 452.

In a contract for furnishing boilers for the construction of a building, one of the provisions contained the guaranty as to the boilers, and another one used the word "agreement"; and it was contended that a letter written in relation to such contract, which used the word "guaranty," referred to the portion of the contract alone where the guaranties were expressly used. It was argued that the word "guaranty" is not synonymous with the word "agreement," but ordinarily signifies such an undertaking as to some fact or performance as is enforceable as well after as before delivery and acceptance, and does not include matters of description or conditions which would be waived by acceptance of the goods. Technically a guaranty, where the word is used in the sense of "warranty," is an express or implied statement of something which a party undertakes shall be a part of the contract, and, though part of the contract, collateral to the express object of it, and that selling a particular thing by its proper description cannot with accuracy be said to create a warranty; but the word "guaranty" in such a contract is not to be taken in absolute literality. The question is, not what is the technical meaning of the word, but what did the parties intend it to refer to; and in this sense the provision of the contract constitutes a guaranty. Heine Safety Boiler Co. v. Francis Bros. & Jellet (U. S.) 105 Fed. 413, 417.

That the word "guaranty" is usually employed to signify a remote liability is admitted; but it does not thence follow that it is not frequently used to mean a direct or positive engagement. Its ordinary acceptance is "to secure," "to promise," "to bind," "to agree," "to warrant," and "to defend." It is often inserted in deeds of conveyance, and when it is used, unless its sense is limited or extended by the context of the writing or the legal consequence of the act, it is synonymous with "promise," "agree," "warrant," or "defend." Gaster v. Ashley, 1 Ark. (1 Pike) 325, 333.

As a collateral agreement.

A guaranty is not a direct engagement to pay one's own debt, or perform an obligation resting primarily on the guarantor; for it assumes the liability of another as principal, for whom the guarantor becomes surety. The engagement is in aid of and collateral to the original liability of the principal debtor or party for whom the guaranty is given. Hall v. Farmer (N. Y.) 5 Denio, 484, 487; Welsh v. Ebersole, 75 Va. 851, 857; Carpenter v. Thompson, 34 Atl. 105, 106, 66 Conn. 457; Cochran v. Dawson (Pa.) 1 Miles, 276, 277.

A guaranty or warranty is not an independent agreement, but a mere incident and part of the principal contract of sale, and when the latter is formally reduced to writing whatever incidents exist are presumed by the rules of evidence to have been incorporated thereunder. Jones v. Alley, 17 Minn. 292, 295 (Gil. 269, 272).

The contract of an absolute guaranty is that, if the principal fails to pay, the guarantor will. If it were not so, it would not be a guaranty, but an independent undertaking. Dickerson v. Derrickson, 39 Ill. 574. Hence a guaranty to pay costs and expenses incurred in collecting a note does not include costs and expenses incurred in suing the guarantor himself upon the guaranty. Abbott v. Brown, 22 N. E. 813, 814, 131 Ill. 108.

To make a promise a contract of guaranty, there must be a primary liability of a third person to the promisee, which continues after the promise is made. An agreement by a stockholder in a corporation that if a party would invest in stock, and if such stock afterwards became worthless the stockholder would repay the sum invested, was not a guaranty. Kilbride v. Moss, 45 Pac. 812, 113 Cal. 432, 54 Am. St. Rep. 361.

A guaranty is a contract for and of itself, but it also has relation to some other contract or obligation, with reference to which it is collateral. A guaranty of a note is a special contract, and the guarantor is not in any sense a party to the note. Coleman v. Fuller, 11 S. E. 175, 176, 105 N. C. 328, 8 L. R. A. 380.

A guaranty is collateral, and refers to some contract in which some one else is principal. Where a railroad company received goods at Pittsburg, Pa., destined for Hudson, Wis., stipulating against responsibility as a carrier beyond its own line, but guarantying that the cost of transportation to Hudson should not exceed a certain sum, less than the aggregate of the charges on the several lines between Pittsburg and Hudson at the usual rates, the other connecting lines on the route having no knowledge or notice of the guaranty, the word "guaranty" imported that the parties contemplated that the successive carriers on the route were at liberty to act each for itself and wholly independent of the others. Schneider v. Evans, 25 Wis. 241, 258, 3 Am. Rep. 58.

The contract contained in a writing in the following words: "Please send to W. goods to the amount of $100, and I will guaranty the same in four months"—was a collateral undertaking to pay in case W. did not, and was, therefore, strictly a guaranty for the debt of another. This is the primary meaning of "guaranty," though it may be readily conceded that the word may be used in such a connection with other words as to constitute an original contract. Dole v. Young, 41 Mass. (24 Pick.) 250, 252.

As a concurrent agreement.

A guaranty of a contract implies ex vi termini that it was a concurrent act and a part of the original agreement. Therefore a writing under a promissory note, in the words "I guaranty the above," and signed by a stranger to the note, was prima facie a part of the original transaction, and, being so, the consideration for the note would operate, also, as a consideration for the guaranty. Leonard v. Vredenburg (N. Y.) 8 Johns. 29, 40, 5 Am. Dec. 317.

Consideration.

A guaranty, in its commercial sense, is an undertaking by one person to be answerable for the debt or obligation of another, and it is essential to its validity that it shall be based upon a sufficient consideration. Clune v. Ford, 8 N. Y. Supp. 719, 720, 55 Hun, 479.

A guaranty is a collateral engagement to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, and must be made on a sufficient consideration. It is a contract in and of itself, but also has relation to some other contract, or some obligation that refers to it, which is collateral. Where the guaranty is executed at or before the time of the execution of the main contract, and both contracts form parts of the same transaction, one consideration may support both contracts. In all cases where the guaranty is executed after the execution of the original contract, or after a sale thereof, and not in pursuance of any understanding, had at the time of the execution of the original contract or at the time of the sale, that such guaranty should be executed, neither the consideration for the original contract nor the consideration for the sale can support a guaranty. Briggs v. Latham, 13 Pac. 129, 131, 36 Kan. 205.

General or special.

Guaranties are distinguished in the law as being either general or special; special guaranties being those which are operated in favor of the particular persons only to whom they are addressed, while general guaranties are open for acceptance by the public generally. The true distinction between general and special guaranties, as contained in letters of credit, is that on the faith of a general guaranty any person is entitled to advance money or incur liability on complying with its terms, and can recover the same as though specially named therein. Evansville Nat. Bank v. Kaufmann, 93 N. Y. 273, 276, 45 Am. Rep. 204.

Indorsement distinguished.

A guaranty is an engagement to pay in default of solvency in the debtor, provided due diligence be used to obtain payment from him. The contract of a guarantor differs from that of an indorser. In the latter case the acknowledgment is to pay if the maker does not, upon demand, after due notice. Something more than demand and notice of nonpayment is required to support an action on a guaranty. The contract for due diligence requires that a suit be brought within a reasonable time after the maturity of the claim, and be duly prosecuted to judgment and execution, before an action can be sustained against the guarantor. Brown v. Brooks, 25 Pa. (1 Casey) 210, 212.

In its broadest popular sense, "indorse" is sometimes synonymous with "guaranty." Greer v. Featherstone (Tex.) 68 S. W. 48, 50; Tatum v. Bonner, 27 Miss. (5 Cushm.) 760, 765.

As indemnify or save harmless.

"Guaranty" means "indemnify" or "save harmless." Bausman v. Credit Guarantee Co., 47 Minn. 377, 379, 50 N. W. 496.

Notice of default.

A guaranty is a contract that some particular thing shall be done exactly as it is agreed to be done, whether it is to be done by one person or another, and whether there be a prior or a principal contractor or not. Generally notice of a breach, where a third person is to do the act guaranteed, need not be given before suit, because knowledge of the default is as open to the inquiry of the guarantor as it is to the one who is guaranteed. Consequently a contract whereby C. guaranteed to B. "the full and fair performance" of the contract of A. was a contract of guaranty, and B., upon the breach of A.'s contract, could immediately maintain an action against C. Redfield v. Haight, 27 Conn. 31, 37.

Personal liability imported.

A guaranty imports a personal liability exclusively. Sather Banking Co. v. Arthur B. Briggs Co., 72 Pac. 352, 353, 138 Cal. 724.

As security.

In a lease of timber land, providing that it is agreed and understood by the parties thereto that the wood and timber on the above described premises shall be held by the lessor as guaranty for the payment of the sum named as rent, the term "guaranty" means "security" or "lien"—that the plaintiff should hold the wood and timber as security for the price thereof, and that he should have a lien upon the same. Wilkie v. Day, 6 N. E. 542, 544, 141 Mass. 68.

Suretyship distinguished.

In a strict collateral guaranty the guarantor undertakes, in the event the principal fails to do what he has promised, to pay damages for such failure. A guarantor undertakes to pay such damages as a result of the principal's default. A surety undertakes to do the particular thing if the principal fails. Nading v. McGregor, 121 Ind. 465, 470, 23 N. E. 283, 6 L. R. A. 686; Newcomb Bros. v. Wall Paper Co. v. Emerson, 17 Ind. App. 482, 46 N. E. 1018, 1020; Conduitt v. Ryan, 3 Ind. App. 1, 29 N. E. 160; Wheeler v. Rohrer, 21 Ind. App. 477, 52 N. E. 780; Durand & Kasper Co. v. Rockwell, 54 N. E. 771, 772, 23 Ind. App. 11; G. F. Wittmer Lumber Co. v. Rice, 55 N. E. 868, 23 Ind. App. 586.

A guaranty is an undertaking that the debtor shall pay; suretyship, an undertaking that the debt shall be paid. Shearer v. R. S. Peale & Co., 9 Ind. App. 282, 36 N. E. 455.

The terms "surety" and "guarantor" are often confounded, from the fact that a guarantor is in common acceptance a surety for another. The true distinction seems to be this: that a surety is in the first instance answerable for the debt for which he makes himself responsible, while a guarantor is only liable where default is made by the party whose undertaking is guaranteed. Courtis v. Dennis, 48 Mass. (7 Metc.) 510, 518, 519.

The words "surety" and "guarantor" are often used as synonymous, but they are not so in fact. Both are bound for another person. A surety is, however, usually bound with his principal by the same instrument, executed at the same time, and upon the same consideration. Treweek v. Howard, 39 Pac. 20, 21, 105 Cal. 434.

While the undertaking of a guarantor technically differs from that of a surety, still the contract of guaranty is the obligation of a surety. Both are accessory contracts. That of a surety is in some sense conditional; that of a guarantor is strictly so. A guaranty is secondary, while a suretyship is a primary obligation. Hooper v. Hooper, 31 Atl. 508, 510, 81 Md. 155, 48 Am. St. Rep. 493.

The distinction between a surety and a guarantor is that the former enters into the contract primarily for the benefit of the debtor, while in the latter the benefit of the principal debtor is no part of the inducement to him to contract. In other words, a guarantor is one who enters into the contract mainly for his own benefit, and not for the benefit of the principal debtor. In a strict guaranty the guarantor does not undertake to do a thing which his principal is bound to do, but his obligation is that the principal shall perform such act as he is bound to perform, or, in the event he fails, that the guarantor will pay such damages as may result from the failure. Cole Mfg. Co. v. Morton, 60 Pac. 587, 589, 24 Mont. 58.

The terms "guarantor" and "surety" are frequently used interchangeably, and for this reason a great confusion has arisen in the books as to the proper distinction to be drawn between them. A guarantor is a surety, in the sense that he obligates himself to pay the debt of another. A surety binds himself to perform if the principal does not, without regard to his ability to do so. His contract is equally absolute with that of his principal. They may be sued in the same action, and judgment may be entered up against both. A guarantor, on the other hand, does not contract that the principal will pay, but simply that he is able to do so. In other words, the guarantor guarantees nothing but the solvency of the principal. Manry v. Waxelbaum Co., 33 S. E. 701, 703, 108 Ga. 14.

See "Understanding."

As warranty.

"Warranty" and "guaranty," being derivatives from the same root, are identical in signification and effect; the one usually, but not always, denoting a covenant in a conveyance, and the other denoting a parole promise. Ayres v. Findley, 1 Pa. (1 Barr) 501.

In the strict sense of the word, "guaranty" or "guarantee" applies to an undertaking by another, though it is sometimes used in the sense of "warranty" or "warrant." Field v. Lamson & Goodnow Mfg. Co., 38 N. E. 1126, 1128, 162 Mass. 388, 27 L. R. A. 136 (citing Wiley v. Inhabitants of Athol, 150 Mass. 434, 23 N. E. 311, 6 L. R. A. 342).

In an agreement in connection with the sale of electric storage batteries that, "In event the equipments are furnished under the proposals made, we will guaranty for a period of four years that the cost of renewal of batteries shall not exceed" a certain sum, the word "guaranty" was used in the sense of "warranty"; it being evident that the intention was that the vendor would renew the batteries as required at such a sum. Accumulator Co. v. Dubuque St. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 64 Fed. 70, 76, 12 C. C. A. 37.

Where a contract for the sale of iron ore guaranteed that it would contain a yield of 50 per cent. of iron, the word "guaranteed" manifestly meant "warranted," and there was not a technical guaranty. Martinez v. Earnshaw (Pa.) 38 Wkly. Notes Cas. 498, 502.

A guaranty, in its strict legal and commercial sense, is said to be an undertaking by one person to be answerable for the payment of some debt or due performance of some contract or duty by another, who himself remains liable to pay or perform the same. Originally the words "warranty" and "guaranty" were the same; the letter "g" of the Norman French being convertible with the "w" of the German and English, as in the name of William or Guillaume. "Warranty" is applied to a contract as to title, quality, or quantity of something sold. A guaranty is held to be a contract by which one person is bound to another for the fulfillment of a promise or engagement of a third party. A guaranty is, perhaps, always understood, in its strict legal and commercial sense, as a collateral warranty against some default or event in futuro, while a warranty is generally understood as an absolute undertaking in present. Any form of words expressing an undertaking or consideration to insure another against delinquency against a third party may constitute a guaranty, and any words showing an undertaking as to quality or title of the thing sold may amount to a warranty. Sturges v. Bank of Circleville, 11 Ohio St. 153, 169, 78 Am. Dec. 296.

In legal contemplation there is a wide difference between "warranty" and "guaranty." The term "warranty" is an engagement or understanding forming a part of the transaction. It is an absolute understanding or liability on the part of the warrantor, and the contract is void unless it is strictly and literally performed. A guaranty, on the other hand, is a collateral promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another. Consequently an instruction in a life insurance case: "Warranty means more than agreement. It means a guaranty"—is erroneous. Masons' Union Life Ins. Ass'n v. Brockman, 50 N. E. 493, 497, 20 Ind. App. 206.

Written contract not required.

Ordinarily, when one agrees to pay the debt of another which has already been contracted, the party is strictly a guarantor, and his guaranty must be in writing; but when the contract is originally made with the party sought to be charged, and the party seeking to enforce the contract relied exclusively on the responsibility of such party, the contract is an original one, and need not be in writing. Meldrum v. Kenefick, 89 N. W. 863, 865, 15 S. D. 370.

GUARANTY AND SAVE HARMLESS.

The expression "guaranty and save harmless" is commonly, if not universally, used in covenants of indemnity. The phrase is tautological, and, taken as a whole, has the same meaning as the words "save harmless" would have, if used alone. Traders' Nat. Bank v. Washington Water Power Co., 61 Pac. 152, 154, 22 Wash. 467.

GUARANTY COMPANY.

A guaranty or security company, within the meaning of St. 1899, § 273, is such a company as may become surety for another. An insurance company is not a guaranty or security company within the meaning of the term, and therefore is not within the provision of a statute imposing a tax on guaranty or security companies and "the like." Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Coulter, 74 S. W. 1050, 1052, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 193.

GUARANTY FUND.

A statute of New York provides that, whenever any policy of life insurance issued by a domestic company shall lapse for the nonpayment of any premium, the "reserve on such policy" shall, on demand made, with surrender of the policy, within six months after the lapse, be applied, as shall have been agreed, to continue the policy in force at its full amount so long as such amount will purchase temporary insurance. The policy of a New York company stipulated to insure the assured for one year, accompanied by an agreement to renew the insurance from year to year, without examination, on the payment of a fixed annual premium, and provided that the excess of such premiums over operating expenses and the assured's share of death losses should constitute a "guaranty fund," to apply in reduction of later premiums, and after five years to extend the insurance in case of lapse. Held, that the fund classed in the policy as a "guaranty fund" was embraced within the meaning of the words "reserve on such policy," as used in the statute. Nielson v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc., 73 Pac. 168, 169, 139 Cal. 332, 96 Am. St. Rep. 146.

GUARANTY INSURANCE.

"Guaranty insurance" is a contract whereby one for a consideration agrees to indemnify another against loss arising from the want of integrity, fidelity, or insolvency of employes and persons holding positions of trust, against insolvency of debtors, losses in trade, losses from nonpayment of notes, and other evidences of indebtedness, or against breach of contract. It includes other forms of insurance, which are specially classified as "fidelity guaranty," "credit guaranty," etc. People v. Rose, 51 N. E. 246, 247, 174 Ill. 310, 44 L. R. A. 124.

"Guaranty insurance" is defined by Mr. Frost in his work (section 2) as follows: "For purposes of classification and treatment, guaranty insurance contracts may be divided into three general classes: those of fidelity, commercial, and judicial insurance." Cowles v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 72 Pac. 1032, 1033, 82 Wash. 120.

GUARANTY OF COLLECTION.

A guaranty of collection requires the diligent prosecution of the original debtor by legal remedies, without effect as a condition precedent to liability on such guaranty. Dyer v. Gibson, 16 Wis. 557; Schmitz v. Langhaar, 88 N. Y. 503, 506; Cumpston v. McNair (N. Y.) 1 Wend. 457, 460; unless it is made to appear that the pursuit of such remedies would be fruitless. Texas City Imp. Co. v. Griswold (Tex.) 41 S. W. 513.

A "guaranty of collection" is sometimes defined as an undertaking to pay a debt on condition that the person to whom the guaranty is given shall diligently prosecute the principal debtor without avail, or that the debt will be paid if the person be prosecuted with reasonable diligence, or that the debt is collectible in due course of law. A guaranty of collection only guarantees the collectibility or goodness of the note, and does not amount to an absolute guaranty of payment. New York Security & Trust Co. v. Lombard Inv. Co. (U. S.) 73 Fed. 537, 552.

A guaranty indorsed on a promissory note, "that we guaranty the collection of the within note," is to be construed as equivalent to the phrase "that we guaranty the collection of the within note by due course of law." Burt v. Horner (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 501, 503.

When the words, "Collection guaranteed and notice of protest waived," are written on the back of a promissory note by the payee thereof, they mean that the transferee takes as an indorsee and not as an assignee of a note, for such words constitute an indorsement, with an enlarged liability. State National Bank v. Haylen, 16 N. W. 754, 755, 14 Neb. 480.

Guaranty of payment distinguished.

A guaranty of collection of a note differs from one for payment, in this: that the guarantor undertakes only to pay the debt upon the condition that the guarantee shall diligently prosecute the principal debtor without avail, and this means the prosecution of a suit against the principal debtor to judgment and execution. The legal remedies are only exhausted upon the proper return of an execution unsatisfied for want of goods whereon to levy. Getty v. Schantz (U. S.) 100 Fed. 577, 578, 40 C. C. A. 560.

There is a broad distinction between "guaranty of payment" and "guaranty of collection." The former is an absolute, unconditional undertaking on the part of the guarantor that the maker will pay the note, while the latter is an undertaking to pay if payment cannot, by reasonable diligence, be obtained from the principal debtor. Cowles v. Peck, 10 Atl. 569, 570, 55 Conn. 251, 3 Am. St. Rep. 44.

GUARANTY OF DIVIDEND.

A guaranty of a dividend by a corporation is nothing more than a pledge of the funds, legally applicable to the purposes of a dividend. It is a dividend, and not a debt. Taft v. Hartford, P. & F. R. Co., 8 R. I. 310, 333, 5 Am. Rep. 575.

GUARANTY OF PAYMENT.

A guaranty of payment of a note is an absolute undertaking on the part of the guarantor that the maker will pay the note when due, or that the guarantor will pay the debt at maturity if the maker does not, and the contract of the guarantor is broken upon the failure of the maker to meet his obligation. Hernley v. Brannum, 55 N. E. 512, 514, 23 Ind. App. 388 (citing Baylies, Sur. p. 17; Brown v. Curtiss, 2 N. Y. [2 Comst.] 225; Allen v. Rightmere [N. Y.] 20 Johns. 365, 11 Am. Dec. 288); New York Security & Trust Co. v. Lombard Inv. Co. (U. S.) 73 Fed. 537, 552.

A guaranty of payment of a note is an absolute undertaking on the part of the guarantor, for a valuable consideration, to pay the debt at maturity in case the principal debtor does not; and the guarantee in such case may sue the guarantor at once for the debt, if not paid at maturity. Getty v. Schantz (U. S.) 100 Fed. 577, 578, 40 C. C. A. 560; Day v. Elmore, 4 Wis. 190, 193.

A guaranty of payment of a note may be absolute (that is, for the payment of a bill or note) or conditional (that is, a guaranty that it is collectible by due diligence). Hanna v. Savage, 35 Pac. 127, 129, 7 Wash. 414.

An indorsement on a note, that "I hereby guaranty the payment of the principal and interest of the within note," creates an absolute guaranty of the payment. National Guaranty Loan & Trust Co. v. Fly, 69 S. W. 231, 232, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 533.

Contract of indemnity distinguished.

See, also, "Indemnity."

There is a well-understood difference between a guaranty of payment and a contract of indemnity against loss as the result of the nonpayment of a debt. In the first case the liability of the guarantor is fixed by the failure of the principal debtor to pay at maturity, or at the time when payment was guaranteed. In the second, the contract partakes of the nature of a guaranty of collection; no liability being incurred until after, by the use of due and reasonable diligence, the guarantee has become unable to collect the debt from the principal debtor. Pierce v. Merrill, 61 Pac. 64, 66, 128 Cal. 464, 79 Am. St. Rep. 56 (citing Burton v. Dewey, 46 Pac. 325, 4 Kan. App. 589).

Guaranty of collection distinguished.

See "Guaranty of Collection."

GUARDIAN.

See "General Guardian"; "Natural Guardian"; "Special Guardian."

A guardian is a person appointed to take care of the person or property of another. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 2807; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 139; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 236; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3808; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 330.

A guardian is one that legally has the care and management of the person, or the estate, or both, of a child, during his minority, whose father has deceased. Bass v. Cook (Ala.) 4 Port. 390, 392 (citing Reeves, Dom. Rel. 311).

A guardian is a person upon whom the law imposes the duty of looking after the pecuniary interests of his ward. Sparhawk v. Allen, 21 N. H. (1 Post.) 27.

"Guardian" is a general term, applicable to both guardians of the property and guardians of the person of a ward. The term "guardian," without words of limitation, describes one who is charged with the care and custody of the property and person of the ward. Burger v. Frakes, 23 N. W. 746, 747, 67 Iowa, 460.

A guardian is one who is entitled to the custody of the person of an infant. Wilson v. Mene-chas, 20 Pac. 468, 469, 40 Kan. 648.

Rev. Laws 1799, which provides that, if the personal estate and rents and profits of the real estate be not sufficient for the maintenance and education of the ward, the orphans' court of the proper county, on full investigation thereof, may from time to time order the guardian to sell such parts of the ward's lands, tenements, hereditaments, real estate, etc., means such guardians as are named in the previous section of the act; that is, testamentary guardians, or guardians in socage. Graham v. Houghtalin, 30 N. J. Law (1 Vroom) 552, 560.

Code 1871, c. 45, § 2173, which provides that no action shall be brought to recover any property heretofore sold by any guardian by virtue of the order of any probate court in the state on the ground of the invalidity of such sale, unless, etc., will be construed to include persons appointed guardians of minors not fatherless. Hall v. Wells, 54 Miss. 289, 297.

The word "guardian," as used in the statute authorizing the courts of probate to appoint guardians to all minors under the age for choosing guardians, who have no father, guardian, or master, has reference to a guardian appointed by the court of probate; and the right of the mother, as natural guardian, to the custody of her minor child after the death of the father, is inferior to the right of a guardian appointed by the court of probate. Macready v. Wilcox, 33 Conn. 321, 327, 328.

As agent.

See "Agent."

Guardian ad litem.

Within the meaning of Sanb. & B. Ann. St. § 2447, providing that when any judge of a county court shall be an administrator, executor, or guardian of any ward, he shall be disqualified to act in relation to that estate, the word "guardian," being used in connection with the words "executors or administrators," will be construed to mean some trustee charged with the duty of caring for property or looking after some interest then pending, for which he must account to the court, and concerning which the court must make some decision, and will not include a guardian ad litem of an infant, who was such three years prior to election as county judge. Richter v. Leiby's Estate, 83 N. W. 694, 695, 107 Wis. 404.

As legal representative.

See "Legal Representative."

Next friend.

The term "guardian," as used in the citing part of a scire facias ad audiendum errores, in which a party is described as guardian of another, and the former party is described in the recital of such writ and in the writ of error as the next friend of the latter party, will be construed to mean next friend. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n of City of New York v. Weller, 11 South. 786, 788, 30 Fla. 210.

As occupant or trustee.

See "Occupant—Occupier."

As trustee of an express trust, see "Express Trust."

GUARDIAN AD LITEM.

A guardian ad litem is an attorney appointed to conduct or care for a particular matter in court. He has charge neither of the person nor the property of the infant, and is not accountable to the court, save as an attorney is always accountable for the faithful discharge of his duty. So that a guardian ad litem is not included under a statute providing that a judge who shall be an administrator, executor, or guardian of any ward shall be disqualified to act in relation to the estate. A guardian ad litem is not a guardian, as used in the statute. Richter v. Leiby's Estate, 83 N. W. 694, 695, 107 Wis. 404.

GUARDIAN BY NATURE.

A guardian by nature is the father of the ward, and perhaps, on his death, the mother. On the part of the father, this guardianship extends to the age of 21 years of the child, but to the custody of his person only. Such guardian has neither possession nor control of the estate, whether real or personal. Kline v. Beebe, 6 Conn. 494, 500; Mauro v. Ritchie (U. S.) 16 Fed. 1171, 1175.

GUARDIAN BY STATUTE.

A "guardian by statute," in English law, means a guardian appointed by the father's will. As used in this country, it means a guardian appointed by the deed or will of the father or mother, and not guardians appointed by virtue of some statute. Huson v. Green, 16 S. El. 255, 256, 88 Ga. 722.

GUARDIAN OF THE PERSON.

A guardian of the person is one who has been lawfully invested with the care of the person of an infant whose father has died, and is considered as standing in the place of the father. Nicholson v. Spencer, 11 Ga. 607, 609.

GUARDIANSHIP.

See "Testamentary Guardianship."

A guardianship is a trust, and it peculiarly and exclusively belongs to the chancellor. A guardian must first be called to account, before the surety is liable. Stilwell v. Mills (N. Y.) 19 Johns. 304.

Guardianship is a trust coupled with an interest, and, when two guardians are appointed, and one of them dies, it follows from the nature of the trust that it must survive. Guardians are in this respect analogous to administrators. People v. Byron (N. Y.) 3 Johns. Cas. 53, 58.

GUARDIANSHIP BY ELECTION.

"Guardianship by election" is mentioned by some of the English writers, but never recognized in this country. Lord Coke, in Co. Litt. 87b, speaks of an heir under the age of 14 inheriting the rents charge, common of pasture, or such like thing, being able to choose his own guardian in certain cases; but it is remarked by Mr. Hargrave that it is not mentioned as to how or before whom such election should be made. Mauro v. Ritchie (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 1171, 1175.

GUARDIANSHIP FOR NURTURE.

Guardianship for nurture extended only to the custody of the persons of those infants who were not heirs apparent, and continued only until their age of 14 years, and none could have it but the father or mother. It only occurs where the infant is without any other guardian. After 14 the infant is at liberty to choose his guardian. This form of guardianship cannot exist in this country, because it is applicable only to such children as are not heirs apparent. Mauro v. Ritchie (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 1171, 1175.

At common law the guardian for nurture took charge of the person and personal estate, but if the ward held real estate by socage tenure, the guardian took the charge of his body and lands. Appeal of Arthur (Pa.) 1 Grant, Cas. 55, 56.

GUARDIANSHIP IN CHIVALRY.

Guardianship in chivalry existed only when the infant inherited land holden by knight's service. This guardian had the custody of the person and lands of the infant until his full age of 21, and took the profits to his own use, without account; and also the value of the marriage of his ward. The infant had no right to elect a guardian. This tenure was abolished by the statute 12 Car. II, c. 24, and with the tenure went the right of guardianship connected with that tenure. A guardian in chivalry never existed in the United States. Mauro v. Ritchie (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 1171, 1175.

GUARDIANSHIP IN SOCAGE.

Guardianship in socage arises only when the infant has land by descent, which takes place when socage lands descend to the infant while under 14 years of age, and ceases when the infant arrives at the age of 14 years, unless no other guardian is appointed for him. Tyler on Coverture & Infancy. Under the common law, the right and duty of a guardian in socage were originally exclusively confined to real estate, but by degrees they were extended so as to embrace personality. This extension at common law, though prevalent in England, was not followed in this state; and, in the absence of authority or decision, it cannot be said that in this state such guardian ever obtained title to or control over personal property of an infant. Foley v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 64 Hun, 63, 66, 18 N. Y. Supp. 615.

Guardianship in socage arose, like that in chivalry, wholly out of tenure. It was necessary that the ward should have inherited land holden in socage. It continued only until the heir attained the age of 14, although some have said that it continued until the age of 21, unless the ward, after the age of 14, should have elected another guardian. The guardian in socage had the custody of the person and of the lands, but wholly for the benefit of the ward. The guardian in socage must be the next of kin to whom the lands of the infant cannot by any possibility descend. This form of guardianship does not exist in this country. Mauro v. Ritchie (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 1171, 1175.

A guardian in socage is a guardian who has custody of the land, and is entitled to the profits of the same for the benefit of the heirs. He has an interest in the estate, may avow in his own name, and may, of course, have trespass. Byrne v. Van Hoesen (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 66, 67.

A guardian in socage has not only the care of the land, but also an interest in it. He is said to be dominus pro tempore, and to have the seisin of the land, una cum exitibus. He may let it for years, and the lessee may have an ejectione firmæ thereupon. Van Doren v. Everitt, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 460, 462, 8 Am. Dec. 615.

At common law, if lands held in socage came to an infant by descent, his nearest relative, who could not possibly inherit the lands, was his guardian in socage until the age of 14 years, and until the infant selected a guardian for himself. By the Act Concerning Tenures, all lands granted by the people of New York since July 4, 1776, are declared allodial and not feudal. Held, that since, by the statute of descent, land acquired by children through their maternal relations cannot go to the father, the father can be a guardian in socage as to his child's land so acquired, but that such guardianship shall only extend to lands granted by the state prior to the Revolution. Combs v. Jackson (N. Y.) 2 Wend. 153, 157, 19 Am. Dec. 568.

GUARDS.

See "Cattle Guard."

Hay placed in the engine or deckroom of a passenger steamer, though the room be inclosed by bulkheads, is upon the decks or guards of the steamer, within the meaning of Act July 23, 1866 (14 Stat. 227), prohibiting ignitable commodities from being carried on the decks or guards of passenger steamers unless protected, etc. Union Ins. Co. v. Shaw (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 580, 582.

GUEST.

A guest is a lodger at a hotel. Comer v. State, 26 Tex. App. 509, 513, 10 S. W. 106, 107 (citing Webst. Dict.).

A "guest" is defined as a visitor sojourning in the house or entertained at the table of another. Odell v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 45 N. Y. Supp. 464, 465, 18 App. Div. 12 (citing Cent. Dict.).

A "guest" is defined as "a traveler who lodges at an inn or tavern with the consent of the keeper." State v. Johnson, 4 Wash. 593, 594, 30 Pac. 672, 673 (citing Black's Law Dict. tit. "Guest").

The term "guest" includes one who merely goes to an inn for the purpose of temporary refreshment, either food or drink. McDaniels v. Robinson, 20 Vt. 316, 330, 62 Am. Dec. 567.

A man who merely enters a restaurant to procure a meal or refreshments is not a guest. Carpenter v. Taylor (N. Y.) 1 Hill. 193.

The term "guest," as used when speaking of a guest of a hotel or inn, would include one who merely purchased liquor at the hotel or inn. McDonald v. Edgerton (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 560, 562.

Duration of stay.

The term "guest" includes a person who took a room in a hotel, and took part of his meals there, although he only lodged and boarded there a part of the time. McDaniels v. Robinson, 26 Vt. 316, 330, 62 Am. Dec. 567.

A guest is a traveler or a wayfarer who comes to an inn and lodges there, and it makes no difference whether he stays a week, a month, or longer, providing he retains his character as a traveler. Johnson v. Reynolds, 3 Kan. 257, 261; Jalie v. Cardinal, 35 Wis. 118, 128.

The term "guest" includes a traveler who goes to a house held out to be an inn for the purpose of receiving such entertainment as he has occasion for. "A traveler who enters an inn as a guest does not cease to be a guest by purposing to remain a given number of days, or by ascertaining the price that will be charged for his entertainment, or by paying in advance for a part or the whole of the entertainment, or paying for what he has occasion for as his wants are supplied." Pinkerton v. Woodward, 33 Cal. 557, 597, 91 Am. Dec. 657.

The guest comes to the inn without any bargain for time, and remains without one, and may go when he pleases, paying only for the actual entertainment which he receives; and the fact that one stayed a long time at an inn is not sufficient to make him a boarder, and not a guest. Shoecraft v. Bailey, 25 Iowa, 553, 555; Metzger v. Schnabel, 52 N. Y. Supp. 105, 106, 23 Misc. Rep. 698.

Fixing price.

"Guest," as the term is used in speaking of a guest of an inn, would include one who resided at a hotel, paying $6 a week for his room, which he had been informed was the regular price to a guest, although he stayed at the hotel for a period of a month. Smith v. Keys (N. Y.) 2 Thomp. & C. 650, 651.

Mere fixing of the price to be paid does not make the person a boarder, rather than a guest, so as to render the house a boarding house, rather than an inn. In re Brewster, 80 N. Y. Supp. 666, 670, 39 Misc. Rep. 689 (citing Hancock v. Rand, 94 N. Y. 1, 7, 46 Am. Rep. 112).

Where a person rented a room, which was cared for by the hotel keeper, but no particular time had been bargained for, though the price had been agreed upon in advance, he was a guest, as far as the liability of the hotel keeper for loss of his effects was concerned. Metzger v. Schnabel, 52 N. Y. Supp. 105, 106, 23 Misc. Rep. 698.

A guest is a traveler, that is, a mere transient or temporary visitor who takes board and lodging at an inn or hotel. The fact that such person contracted for board and lodging at a less price than the hotel or innkeeper usually charged does not change the fact that he was a mere traveler, or temporary, transient visitor. A guest for a single night might make a special contract as to the price to be paid for his lodging, and, whether it were more or less than the usual price, it would not affect his character as guest. The character of guest does not depend on the payment of any particular price, but on other facts. So long as the character of traveler or mere temporary and transient visitor exists, the relation of guest and innkeeper exists. Beale v. Posey, 72 Ala. 323, 331.

As the term is used in speaking of the guest of an inn, a guest is one who is temporarily at the inn for the purpose of obtaining shelter or refreshment, under an implied contract to pay for the same. Hence one who is there under a special contract for his board is not a guest, within the meaning of the law which makes the innkeeper liable for the loss of goods of his guests. Jeffords v. Crump (Pa.) 12 Phila. 500, 501; Carter v. Hobbs, 12 Mich. 52, 56, 83 Am. Dec. 762.

A guest of a hotel is one who is a mere temporary sojourner there, intending to rest a week or two, and then proceeding on her journey. The fact that on her arrival the person applied for entertainment, before being assigned to her room, ascertained what she would have to pay for the room and board, does not change her character from that of a guest to that of a boarder; there being no reduction in the price in consideration of an agreement to remain a definite time or as a boarder, and there being nothing upon which an understanding could be inferred between her and the proprietor that she was to be received as a boarder, and not as a guest. Fay v. Pacific Imp. Co., 26 Pac. 1099, 1100, 93 Cal. 253, 16 L. R. A. 188, 27 Am. St. Rep. 198.

A guest is a person who goes to an inn as a wayfarer and traveler, and is received by the innkeeper into his inn. Neither the length of time that a person remains at an inn, nor any agreement he may make as to the price of board per day or per week, deprives him of his character as traveler and guest, provided he retains his status as a traveler in other respects. Jalie v. Cardinal, 35 Wis. 118, 128.

The prominent idea of the term "guest" is that he must be a traveler, wayfarer, or transient comer to an inn for lodging or entertainment. In Russell v. Fagan (Del.) 8 Atl. 258, 7 Houst. 389, it is said that "every one who is received into an inn, and has entertainment there, for which the innkeeper has remuneration or reward for his services, is a guest. The relation of host and guest exists. This general definition, however, only includes those who are in legal sense travelers or wayfarers, and boarders or persons who reside in the same place are not embraced by it." The distinction between a guest and boarder, which it is difficult to draw, and which is variously stated, is based mainly upon the fact that boarders contract for a definite stay at specific prices. One who had engaged rooms and board for himself and family at a hotel for two or three weeks at rates given to persons remaining longer than a week, and was assigned rooms on the floor occupied by boarders, is not a guest, but a mere boarder at the hotel. Meacham v. Galloway, 52 S. W. 859, 861, 102 Tenn. 415, 46 L. R. A. 319, 73 Am. St. Rep. 886.

Dependent on intent.

In order to constitute one a guest of an inn, so that the innkeeper will be responsible for his goods, it is necessary that one should visit the inn for the purpose which the common law recognizes as the purpose for which inns are kept; that is, for the purpose of shelter and refreshment. Carter

v. Hobbs, 12 Mich. 52, 56, 83 Am. Dec. 762; Arcade Hotel Co. v. Wyatt, 4 N. E. 398, 405, 44 Ohio St. 32, 58 Am. Rep. 785.

Where a visit is made to an inn by one who does not require the present entertainment or accommodations of such inn, but whose purpose is simply to deposit his money for safe-keeping, such person is not a guest of the inn. Arcade Hotel Co. v. Wiatt, 4 N. E. 398, 405, 44 Ohio St. 32, 58 Am. Rep. 785. So, also, one who went to a hotel merely for the purpose of attending a ball, but who neither roomed nor obtained his meals there. Carter v. Hobbs, 12 Mich. 52, 56, 83 Am. Dec. 762.

A guest is a traveler or transient comer who puts up at an inn for a lawful purpose—to receive its customary lodging and entertainment. One who takes a room solely to commit an offense against the laws of the state is not a guest at the hotel, within the legal sense of the term. The relation of landlord and guest was never established between them. It is essential that a person should have come from a distance, to constitute a guest. It does not include every one who goes to an inn for convenience to accomplish some purpose. Curtis v. Murphy, 22 N. W. 825, 828, 63 Wis. 4, 53 Am. Rep. 242.

Boarder distinguished.

See "Boarder."

Keeping horse sufficient.

"Guest," in the ordinary acceptance of its meaning, and according to Webster, is "a stranger; one who comes from a distance, and takes lodging at a place either for a night or for a longer time; a visitor, a stranger or friend, entertained in the house or at the table of another, whether by invitation or otherwise." To be a guest at an inn, something more than the mere stopping of another for convenience is necessary. It is one who relies on or adopts the inn as his home for the time being, though the length of time which the guest remains will not affect his right as such, provided he live there in the transitory character of a guest. There must be a person to be entertained, to constitute a guest. Where, therefore, there is no person to be entertained, there is no guest. Merely feeding his horse does not constitute its master a constructive guest of an innkeeper. Ingalsbee v. Wood (N. Y.) 36 Barb. 452, 460.

"Guests," as used in the law of innkeeper's liability, includes not only those who obtain food and lodging of an innkeeper, but also is properly applied to a traveler who obtains entertainment for his beasts, paying a fixed charge therefor; and under such circumstances the relation of innkeeper and guest exists, so as to make the innkeeper liable as an insurer of the animals while in his possession. Russell v. Fagan (Del.) 8 Atl. 258, 7 Houst. 389.

A guest is a traveler who is received as such at an inn. "It is clearly settled that to constitute a guest, in legal contemplation, it is not essential that he should be a lodger or have any refreshment at the inn. If he leaves his horse there, the innkeeper is chargeable on account of the benefit he is to receive for the keeping of the horse," and hence he is liable for the theft of the harness of the horse. Mason v. Thompson, 26 Mass. (9 Pick.) 280, 285, 20 Am. Dec. 471.

If a man set his horse at an inn, though he lives in another place, that makes him a guest, and the innkeeper is obliged to receive him, for the innkeeper gains by the horse, and therefore that makes the owner a guest, though he was absent. Holt, C. J., dissenting, said this was rather the business of a man that keeps a livery stable than of an innkeeper, and that it was the lodging of the man at the inn that makes him a guest. Yorke v. Greenough, 2 Ld. Raym. 866, 868; McDaniels v. Robinson, 26 Vt. 316, 330, 62 Am. Dec. 567.

Plaintiff, by leaving his horse at an inn, was a "guest" as much as if he had stayed himself, and the horse might be retained as security for the payment of the keeping. York v. Grindstone, 1 Salk. 388.

Leaving goods sufficient.

"In order to be a guest, within the meaning of rules relative to the liability of an innkeeper for the goods of his guest, and relative to giving liens thereon, it is not necessary that the person claimed to be a guest should be actually infra hospitium at the time the loss happened. For example, if a traveler leaves his horse at the inn, and then goes out to dine or lodge with a friend, he does not thereby cease to be a guest, and the rights and liabilities of the parties remain the same as though the traveler had not left the inn; and, if the owner leave the inn and goes to another town, intending to be absent two or three days, it seems that the whole rule holds good, so far as relates to property for the care and keeping of which the host is to receive a compensation; but it is otherwise in relation to inanimate property, from which the host receives no advantage, and, if that be stolen during such absence of the guest, the innkeeper will not be answerable." One who has neither been at an inn, nor intends going there, does not become a guest by merely sending his goods to be taken care of by the innkeeper. Grinnell v. Cooke (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 485-488, 38 Am. Dec. 663.

The term would include one who, after having become a guest and left goods with the proprietor of the inn, goes away for a brief period. McDonald v. Edgerton (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 560, 562.

Lodger distinguished.

See "Lodger."

Roomer.

In speaking of the duties and obligations of innkeepers, the term "guest" implies a traveler stopping at an inn. It does not include a railroad conductor making regular trips, and stopping over at each end of his route at hotels, where he rents a room by the month. Horner v. Harvey, 5 Pac. 329, 330, 3 N. M. 197.

Traveler.

Any one away from home, receiving the accommodation of an inn as a traveler, is a guest, and entitled to hold the innkeeper responsible as such. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Lowe, 44 N. W. 226, 227, 28 Neb. 239, 6 L. R. A. 809, 26 Am. St. Rep. 325.

Any one away from home, receiving accommodations at an inn as a traveler, is a guest, though he be a townsman or neighbor. Walling v. Potter, 35 Conn. 183, 185.

The term "guest" is used to designate a traveler who stops at, and is received as a traveler at, a hotel. Ross v. Mellin, 32 N. W. 172, 173, 36 Minn. 421.

While a guest is a traveler, it is not necessary that he should come from another state or country, or from any distant place. Any person going from his own home, whatever the distance may be, and applying for and receiving accommodations at a hotel, is a traveler, and therefore a guest. One who has no other place of abode than a room in a hotel, for which he pays rent by the week, and in which he keeps his personal effects, is not a guest of the hotel. State v. Johnson, 30 Pac. 672, 673, 4 Wash. 593.

If a person goes to an inn as a wayfarer and a traveler, and the innkeeper receives him as such, he becomes the innkeeper's guest, and the relation of landlord and guest is instantly established between them. Neither the length of time that a man remains at an inn, nor any agreement he may make as to the price of board per day, deprives him of his character as a traveler and a guest, provided he retains his status of a traveler in other respects. Norcross v. Norcross, 53 Me. 163, 169.

Visitor at inn.

The term "guest" does not include a neighbor or friend who comes to an inn on the invitation of the innkeeper, nor does it include a person who comes on a special contract to sojourn at an inn. Manning v. Wells, 28 Tenn. (9 Humph.) 746, 748, 51 Am. Dec. 688.

GUEST (In Liquor Law).

Under the definition of "guest" in Liquor Tax Law, § 31, as one who, during regular meal hours, and in good faith, comes to a hotel for a meal, and actually orders and receives such meal, a person is not a guest who only orders liquor, and to whom no food is served, except a sandwich, which is not eaten. In re Kinzel, 59 N. Y. Supp. 682, 684, 28 Misc. Rep. 622.

"Guests," as used in Pub. St. 1882, p. 100, § 9, cl. 2, restricting the sale of liquors by innkeepers on Sundays to their guests, means persons who had resorted to his inn or hotel for food or lodging. Persons who resort to an inn on the Lord's Day for the purpose of procuring and drinking liquor are not guests, within the meaning of the statute. Commonwealth v. Moore, 13 N. E. 893, 895, 145 Mass. 244.

The term "guest" is defined in Liquor Tax Law, § 31, as, first, a person who in good faith occupies a room in a hotel as a temporary home, and pays the regular and customary charges for such occupancy, but who does not occupy such room for the purpose of having liquor served therein; or, second, a person who, during the hours when meals are regularly served therein, resorts to the hotel for the purpose of obtaining, and actually orders and obtains, at such time, in good faith, a meal therein. The mere service of a sandwich with a glass of beer to the customer of a saloon does not render the customer a guest. In re Schuyler, 71 N. Y. Supp. 437, 438, 63 App. Div. 206.

According to the common usage of English speech, the word "guest" signifies a relation determined by outward circumstances, and not by inward intent. So that where a person resorts to an inn, expecting to make, and makes, a substantial purchase of food, though an undisclosed reason of his wanting the food is that he may enjoy the accompanying pleasure of a bottle of wine, he is a guest, within the protection of the statute permitting a hotel keeper to supply liquor on Sunday to guests who have resorted to his house for food or lodging. Commonwealth v. Regan, 64 N. E. 407, 182 Mass. 22.

Where a hotel keeper sells whisky at the hotel to casual callers, and only incidentally has sandwiches served with drinks, such persons are not guests, within the meaning of Liquor Tax Law (Laws 1897, p. 236, c. 312) § 31, subd. 2, in that they did not resort to the hotel for the purpose of obtaining, and did not order and actually obtain at such time, a meal therein in good faith. In re Cullinan, 83 N. Y. Supp. 581, 41 Misc. Rep. 3.

GUIDON.

A guidon is an old and well-known form of a small flag or streamer, used for a variety of purposes—amongst others, “as the flag of a guild or fraternity.” Webst. Dict. “It is broad at the end next the staff, and pointed, rounded, or notched at the other end.” Caldwell v. Powell (U. S.) 71 Fed. 970, 971 (citing Cent. Dict.).

GUILTY.

See “Not Guilty”; “Plea of Guilty.”

Guilty not criminally, but negligently, see “Negligently Guilty.”

The word “guilty” is defined by our best lexicographers to mean “having guilt; justly chargeable with a crime; not innocent; criminal.” Hence we say that a man is guilty of an offense when he has committed such offense. Commonwealth v. Walter, 83 Pa. 105, 108, 24 Am. Rep. 154.

The word “guilty” universally, in law, implies a violation of law—a commission of an act or omission of a duty under circumstances which render the commission or omission unlawful. When it is said that the law is made for the protection of the innocent by a due punishment of the guilty, and that it is better than ninety-nine guilty persons should escape than that one innocent should be punished, the term “guilty” is not asserted of persons who do or have done acts which may or may not be unlawful, according to circumstances, but all those who actually do or have done acts attended by such circumstances as render them illegal. Jessie v. State, 28 Miss. (6 Cushm.) 100, 103.

A general finding of guilty will be interpreted as guilty of all that the indictment well alleges. It is sometimes stated that such finding, where different grades of the offense are charged, means guilty of the highest grade, but this is only another form of saying that it means guilty of all because a higher grade includes the lower. Porter v. State, 21 S. W. 467, 57 Ark. 267.

“Guilty,” as used in a verdict by a jury which finds the defendant guilty, signifies guilty in manner and form as charged in the indictment. It is a finding of the truth of all the material averments in the indictment constituting the offense charged. State v. White, 25 Wis. 359.

A verdict of a jury that the defendant is guilty, without more, would mean guilty of the whole matter charged; but where, in an action to recover a forfeiture provided by law in case a property owner shall “intentionally make a false statement of his holdings,” the jury returned a verdict of “guilty, not criminally, but negligently,” the latter words explain the former, showing that they did not consider him guilty of intentional false statement, but of using too little care, and it was, in effect, a verdict of not guilty, since the statute makes no provision for negligent false statements. State v. Wolfrum, 60 N. W. 799, 800, 88 Wis. 481.

The phrase “guilty of conveying away such slave,” as contained in a statute providing that “if any person shall be found guilty of conveying away,” etc., he shall be punished, etc., implies a knowledge that the person conveyed away was a slave, coupled with an intention to carry him away. The phrase “wrongfully and illegally conveyed away a slave” is not of the same import, and lacks the essential ingredients of knowledge and intention. Boice v. Gibbons, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 324, 330.

A verdict in a criminal case stating that “we, the jury, find defendant guilty,” is not a sufficiently egregious blunder in spelling to vitiate the verdict, but the word written comes near enough to “guilty” to authorize judgment and sentence as on an accurate and regular verdict of guilty. Higginbotham v. State, 29 South. 410, 412, 42 Fla. 573, 89 Am. St. Rep. 237.

In holding that a verdict finding that the defendant was “guilty” of the offense as charged in an indictment was not invalid by reason of the misspelling of the word “guilty,” the court says that “formerly this character of verdict was held so uncertain in its terms as not to afford the basis of a judgment, and a number of cases were reversed on the imperfect spelling of the word ‘guilty.’ See Taylor v. State, 5 Tex. App. 569; Harwell v. State, 22 Tex. App. 251, 2 S. W. 606. But since the rendition of the last-mentioned case the rule has been different. This court has held a number of verdicts in which the word ‘guilty’ was misspelled—being written in some ‘guilty,’ ‘guily,’ ‘guilty’—sufficient; the rule being that, where the sense is clear, neither incorrect orthography nor ungrammatical language will render a verdict illegal or void, and that it is to be reasonably construed, and in such manner as to give it the meaning intended to be conveyed by the jury.” McGee v. State, 45 S. W. 709, 710, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 190 (citing Birdwell v. State [Tex.] 20 S. W. 556; Shelton v. State, 27 Tex. App. 443, 11 S. W. 457, 11 Am. St. Rep. 200; Stepp v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 349, 20 S. W. 753; Attaway v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 475, 20 S. W. 925; Roberts v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 83, 84, 24 S. W. 895; Harris v. State [Tex.] 34 S. W. 922; Price v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 403, 37 S. W. 743).

As negligent.

In a finding that defendant was guilty of not providing an additional conductor for the management of the car, and was guilty of putting on cars in the management of a young and inefficient conductor, and was guilty of not coming to a full stop at a certain place, etc., "guilty" should be construed to mean negligent. Sirk v. Marion St. Ry. Co., 39 N. E. 421, 422, 11 Ind. App. 680.

GUILTY AS CHARGED.

As the crime of murder involves sufficient capacity to distinguish between right and wrong, the legal interpretation of every verdict of guilty, as charged, is that the jury believes from all the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the accused was guilty, and was therefore responsible criminally for his acts. Davis v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 353, 358, 160 U. S. 469, 40 L. Ed. 499.

GUILTY CONNECTION.

The words "guilty connection," in common parlance, when applied to a man and woman, mean a carnal connection. State v. George, 29 N. C. 321, 324.

GULF.

In Co. Litt. 5, it is said that a gulf is water and land, and therefore by grant thereof the soil doth pass. Goodrich v. Eastern R. R., 37 N. H. 149-164.

"A gulf is usually an arm of the sea which seems to have encroached on the land, such as the Gulf of Mexico." See Mitch. Mod. Geog. "Gulf: An arm of the ocean." Ency. Brit. "All the gulfs and all the inland seas form only portions detached, but not entirely separated, from that universal sea denominated the ocean." First Encyclopedia of Geography. The Orient (U. S.) 16 Fed. 915, 920.

GULF OF MEXICO.

"The Gulf of Mexico is a basin of the Atlantic Ocean inclosed by the United States, the West Indies, and Mexico." The Orient (U. S.) 16 Fed. 915, 920.

GUM SUBSTITUTE.

The ordinary meaning of the words "gum substitute" is a substitute for gum, but the use of the words in a tariff act imposing a duty on gum substitute is to be determined by the jury, where there is evidence of trade usage. The term is to receive the same meaning given in ordinary commercial operations, unless a different trade meaning is shown by a preponderance of the evidence.

It was determined by the jury in the case at bar that glucose and grape sugar were not dutiable as gum substitute. Weilbacher v. Meritt (U. S.) 37 Fed. 85.

GUN.

See "Shotgun Barrels."

A gun, in the usual sense, is a weapon which throws a projectile or missile to a distance; a firearm for throwing a projectile with gunpowder. An air gun is not a gun or weapon, in the ordinary signification of the words, but is imitative only of a real gun, to give it dignity to a boy to play soldier with. Harris v. Cameron, 51 N. W. 437, 438, 81 Wis. 239, 29 Am. St. Rep. 891.

GUN COTTON.

Gun cotton is an explosive obtained by immersing vegetable fiber in nitric and sulphuric acids, and subsequent drying. Celluloid Mfg. Co. v. Zylonite Co. (U. S.) 26 Fed. 692.

GUNPOWDER.

Gunpowder is a mixture of saltpeter, sulphur, and charcoal, separately pulverized, then granulated and dried. It is held, however, that all articles containing these constituents, even if highly inflammable, and in a measure explosive, are not necessarily gunpowder, so that a stipulation in a policy of fire insurance that, if gunpowder is kept on the premises insured without the written consent of the insurer, the policy will be void, will not invalidate the policy for the keeping of fireworks, though they are largely composed of the same ingredients as gunpowder. Tischler v. California Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 4 Pac. 1169, 1170, 66 Cal. 178.

GURGES.

"In Co. Litt. 5, it is laid down that stagnum (in English, a pool) consists of water and land, and therefore by the name of stagnum or a pool the water and land shall pass also. In the same manner, gorges (a deep pit of water) consisteth of water and land, and therefore by the grant thereof by that name the soil doth pass." Johnson v. Rayner, 72 Mass. (6 Gray) 107-110.

GUTTER.

A gutter is a part of the street designed to drain and carry off water. Warren v. Henly, 31 Iowa, 31, 36.

As used in a municipal ordinance making it criminal to obstruct a gutter, a gutter "is a ditch or a conduit calculated to allow the passage of water from one point to another in a certain direction. A mere excavation, without an outlet, would not be a gutter." Willis v. State, 42 N. W. 920, 921, 27 Neb. 98.

A city ordinance provided that, when any sidewalks should be established, the commissioner of highways should grade the same, set the curbstones and pave the gutters, and construct the sidewalk, and the abutting owners should be assessed therefor their just and proportionate part of the expense of paving the walk, but that no part of the expense of grading the street, setting the curbstones, or paving the gutters should be so assessed, but should be paid for by the city. Held, that the word "gutters" meant the gutters between the sidewalk and that part of the street devoted to carriage travel. Dickinson v. City of Worcester, 138 Mass. 555, 562.

H

H.

Where an assessor making an assessment used the abbreviations "h, l, and stable," such abbreviations were intelligible, and properly used to mean "house, lot, and stable." Alden v. City of Newark, 36 N. J. Law (7 Vroom) 288.

A description in an assessment, "Samuel Barber, h., 60 feet, Linden St.," could only be construed as "house, 60 feet, Linden St."; and, as such words cannot be held to mean that it is a house 60 feet on Linden street, which is the significance of the description, and the mere location of the lot upon the street without the number is insufficient, the abbreviated description did not identify the lot, and was therefore not sufficient. Parker v. City of Elizabeth, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 689, 693.

HABANA.

The word "Habana" must be taken as a part of the mark which the plaintiff wants protected. Like the other words, it is Spanish, and commonly used in this country where that sort of tobacco is grown. The use of the word "Habana" on a label, when in fact the cigars on which the label appeared were merely Havana filler, is such a deceit on the public that equity will furnish no relief against an infringement. Solis Cigar Co. v. Pozo, 26 Pac. 556, 558, 16 Colo. 388, 25 Am. St. Rep. 279.

HABEAS CORPUS.

For the meaning of the term "habeas corpus," resort must unquestionably be had to the common law, but the power to award the writ by any of the courts of the United States must be given by written law. Ex parte Bollman, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 75, 94, 2 L. Ed. 554.

The common-law writ of habeas corpus was a writ in behalf of liberty, and its purpose was to deliver a prisoner from unjust imprisonment and illegal and improper restraint. People v. Walts, 25 N. E. 266, 267, 122 N. Y. 238; People v. Ciarcia, 63 N. Y. Supp. 497, 49 App. Div. 90. See, also, Ex parte Watkins, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.) 193, 201, 7 L. Ed. 650.

The writ of habeas corpus is a highly privileged writ, and has for its object the release by judicial decree of persons who are restrained of their liberty, or detained from the control of those who are entitled to the custody of them. Code Prac. art. 787, defining the scope and province of this writ, provides that habeas corpus is an order in writing issued in the name of the state, by a judge of competent jurisdiction, and directed to the person who has another in his custody, and detains him in confinement, commanding him to bring before the judge the person thus detained, at the time and place appointed, and state the reason for which he thus keeps him imprisoned and deprived of his liberty. Prieto v. St. Alphonsus Convent of Mercy, 27 South. 153, 170, 52 La. Ann. 631, 47 L. R. A. 656.

"The writ of habeas corpus is a writ of right. 2 Kent, Comm. 226. It is designed to give the person in confinement, or who is restrained of his liberty, an immediate opportunity to test the question of law involved in his imprisonment, or, as it is put in some of the state Constitutions, the citizen is entitled to the privilege of this writ in the most free, easy, cheap, expeditious, and ample manner." In re Leggat, 62 N. Y. Supp. 208, 210, 47 App. Div. 381.

The writ of habeas corpus is a writ of right, guarantied by Const. art. 1, § 13, which issues in behalf of any one who is illegally restrained of his liberty, and may be allowed by the supreme, district, or circuit court, or any judge thereof. Shaw v. McHenry, 2 N. W. 1096, 1098, 52 Iowa, 182.

The writ of habeas corpus is undoubtedly an immediate remedy for every illegal imprisonment. Commonwealth v. Brower (Pa.) 9 Kulp, 317-319; Ex parte Hays, 47 Pac. 612, 613, 15 Utah, 77.

The writ of habeas corpus was well known to the common law, and has been regarded by English jurists as one of the greatest safeguards to the liberty of the subject. Its great object is the liberation of those who may be imprisoned without just cause, and it has been so favorably regarded in this country that the provisions of the English act, 31 Car. II, c. 2, have been substantially adopted by the several states. We have even gone further, and, by the twenty-seventh section of the Bill of Rights in our Constitution, provided that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, except in case of rebellion or invasion, and then only if the public safety demand it. Wright v. State, 5 Ind. 290, 294, 61 Am. Dec. 90.

The history of the writ of habeas corpus is lost in antiquity. It was in use before Magna Charta, and came to us as a part of our inheritance from the mother country, and exists as a part of the common law of the state. It is intended and well adapted to effect the great object secured in England by Magna Charta, and made a part of the Constitution, that no person shall be deprived of his liberty without due process of law. This writ cannot be abrogated or its efficiency curtailed by legislative action. Cases within the relief afforded by it cannot, until the people voluntarily surrender the right to this greatest of all writs by an amendment of the organic law, be placed beyond its reach and remedial action. The privilege of the writ cannot even be temporarily suspended, except for the safety of the state, in cases of rebellion or invasion. In re Dill, 32 Kan. 668, 685, 5 Pac. 39, 45, 49 Am. Rep. 505; People v. Liscomb, 60 N. Y. 559, 568, 19 Am. Rep. 211.

The object of the habeas corpus act was to protect the liberty of individual citizens, and the danger of oppression is not so great in civil matters as in the case of crimes or supposed crimes. Governments often magnify real crimes, and sometimes impute offenses falsely to innocent persons, for the purpose of oppression. From this quarter has generally arisen the danger to liberty, and it may be for those reasons that the Legislature failed to impose the same penalty upon officers for a refusal to issue or return a habeas corpus in civil cases that is imposed in criminal cases. Hecker v. Jarrett (Pa.) 1 Bin. 373, 376, 377.

Habeas corpus is well termed the greatest writ of the common law, because it assures and secures personal liberty by simple and direct process available to every citizen. Its place is above debate and dissension. People v. Wells, 68 N. Y. Supp. 58, 60, 57 App. Div. 140.

As action, controversy, or suit.

See "Action"; "Controversy"; "Suit—Suited."

As appellate in nature.

Habeas corpus is in the nature of a writ of error to examine the legality of the commitment. Ex parte Watkins, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.) 193, 201, 7 L. Ed. 650.

The question brought forward on a habeas corpus is always distinct from that which is involved in the case itself. The question whether the individual shall be imprisoned is always distinct from the question whether he shall be convicted or acquitted of the charge on which he is to be tried, and therefore those questions are separated, and may be decided in different courts. The decision that the individual shall be imprisoned must always precede the application for a writ of habeas corpus, and this writ must always be for the purpose of revising this decision, and therefore appellate in its nature. Ex parte Bollman, 8

U. S. (4 Cranch) 75, 94, 97, 98, 101, 2 L. Ed. 554. See, also, Ex parte Mooney, 26 W. Va. 36, 39, 53 Am. Rep. 59.

✓ The writ of habeas corpus is not a writ of error, and cannot be used to authorize the exercise of appellate jurisdiction. Ex parte Clawson (Utah) 5 Pac. 74, 76. Nor can it be used to perform the functions of an appeal. Price v. McCarty (U. S.) 89 Fed. 84, 85, 32 C. C. A. 162; Holman v. City of Austin, 34 Tex. 668, 670.

The writ of habeas corpus cannot be used as a writ of error, nor will one court review the proceedings of another court of concurrent jurisdiction in that manner; and especially so if it is by some fact dehors the record that the judgment complained of is to be determined to have been improperly rendered. People v. District Court, 45 Pac. 402, 403, 22 Colo. 422.

Habeas corpus is not a writ of error. It cannot bring a case before the court in such a manner that it can exercise any kind of appellate jurisdiction. On habeas corpus, the judgment, even of the subordinate court, cannot be disregarded, reversed, or set aside, however clearly it may appear to be erroneous, and however plain it may be that it ought to be reversed, if it was before the court on appeal or writ of error. The court can only look to the record to see whether a judgment exists, and has no power to say whether it is right or wrong. It is conclusively presumed to be right until it is regularly brought up for revision. Ex parte Hardy, 68 Ala. 303, 330.

As civil or criminal proceeding.

A habeas corpus proceeding cannot be said to be a criminal action, for, while it is frequently invoked by criminals or other persons charged with crime, it is not a criminal action, so far as the parties to the cause are concerned. Its office is to inquire into the legality of the custody of the applicant, and sometimes the applicant is charged with crime; but it is frequently sued out for the purpose of determining the proper care and legal custody of children, and is in no sense criminal in its application. The following cases are to the effect that habeas corpus proceedings are in their nature civil proceedings: State v. Superior Court of King County, 72 Pac. 1040, 1041, 32 Wash. 143 (citing Ex parte Tom Tong, 108 U. S. 556, 2 Sup. Ct. 871, 27 L. Ed. 826; In re Van Sclaver, 42 Neb. 772, 60 N. W. 1037, 47 Am. St. Rep. 730; Henderson v. James, 52 Ohio St. 242, 39 N. E. 805, 27 L. R. A. 290; Kurtz v. Moffitt, 115 U. S. 487, 6 Sup. Ct. 148, 29 L. Ed. 458; Cross v. Burke, 146 U. S. 82, 13 Sup. Ct. 22, 36 L. Ed. 896; People v. Dewey, 50 N. Y. Supp. 1013, 23 Misc. Rep. 267; In re Reynolds (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 592; In re Borrego, 8 N. M. 655, 46 Pac. 211).

An appeal from a judgment in habeas corpus proceedings, adjudging defendant lawfully detained under a certain information, did not suspend prosecution of the information; nor does Ballinger's Codes & St. §§ 6506, 6529, providing for a stay of proceedings by appeal in criminal cases, contemplate such a stay. State v. Fenton, 70 Pac. 741, 742, 30 Wash. 325.

Habeas corpus is not a criminal action, within the definition given in Comp. Laws 1879, c. 80, § 7. It is, indeed, not an action at all, but a special proceeding, and in many cases it is a purely civil remedy, as where it is sought in behalf of the parents to obtain custody of a child or for the relief of imprisoned debtors; but it is a criminal case when it is sought for the relief of a party charged with crime, who, upon examination before a magistrate, has been committed for trial. It being, in effect, an appeal from such examination, and therefore is a criminal case, within the scope of Laws 1881, c. 108, § 1. Gleason v. McPherson County Com'rs, 1 Pac. 384, 30 Kan. 53.

Many are accustomed to regard the writ as almost obsolete and of little practical value, but the writ is as much a palladium of liberty to-day as it was during the abuses existing in the days of the ancient English sovereigns. It is to the credit of an advanced civilization that the necessity for the issuance of the writ rarely ever arises. The common-law writ became so little respected in England that it no longer afforded real or substantial benefits to English subjects, and it was not until after the passage of St. 31 Car. II, known as the "Habeas Corpus Act," that the writ came to be thoroughly recognized in its fullest scope. The writ with which we are now dealing under our Codes was the one known to the common law as the "habeas corpus ad subiciendum," and was issued in cases of illegal detention. It was not, strictly speaking, either a civil or a criminal action. It was not a proceeding in a suit, but was a summary application by the person detained. It was, as Lord Coke described it, festinum remedium. The proceeding is sometimes characterized as a cause or action, but erroneously so; and it has been called a civil or criminal proceeding according to whether the person is held in custody on a criminal charge, or by private restraint. Simmons v. Georgia Iron & Coal Co., 43 S. E. 780, 782, 117 Ga. 305, 61 L. R. A. 739.

The purpose of the writ of habeas corpus is to inquire into and remove any unlawful restraint upon the liberty of a person. If in this proceeding it appears that such person is restrained by reason of his supposed violation of some criminal law, or quasi criminal law, as offense against a person or contempt of court, then the proceeding must be classed as a criminal case, although the court should be of the opinion that the act does not constitute a violation of such law, or that the evidence is insufficient to establish the act, or that the supposed law does not exist or is void; but, if such person is not restrained by reason of such violation of law, then the proceeding must be classed as a civil case. It is the cause of restraint which determines whether the proceeding to remove the restraint be a civil or criminal case. A proceeding by habeas corpus to determine a parent's right to the custody of her minor child is a civil action. Legate v. Legate, 28 S. W. 281, 282, 87 Tex. 248.

A procedure by habeas corpus can in no legal sense be regarded as a suit or controversy between private parties, and, even when not used to relieve against illegal restraint under a criminal charge, cannot, in the proper sense of the term, be regarded as a civil suit. It should rather be held the exercise of a special jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution and laws upon either the courts or judges for the prompt relief of the citizen against any improper interference with his personal liberty. Consequently it does not come under the provisions of the Code allowing an appeal to the Supreme Court in civil suits. McFarland v. Johnson, 27 Tex. 105, 109.

Determination as to custody of children.

The common-law writ of habeas corpus was a writ in behalf of liberty, and its purpose was to deliver a prisoner from unjust imprisonment and illegal and improper restraint. It was not a proceeding calculated to try the rights of parents and guardians to the custody of infant children. It was of frequent use, however, when children were detained from their parents or guardians, on the ground that absence from legal custody was equivalent to illegal restraint and imprisonment. In the case of children of the age of discretion, the object of the writ was usually accomplished by allowing the party restrained the exercise of his volition; but, in the case of an infant of an age to be incapable of determining what was best for itself, the court or officer made the determination for it, and in so doing the child's welfare was the chief end in view. People v. Buffett, 78 N. Y. Supp. 175, 177, 75 App. Div. 365 (quoting from People v. Walts, 25 N. E. 266, 267, 122 N. Y. 238); People v. Clarcia, 63 N. Y. Supp. 497, 498, 49 App. Div. 90.

As directed to individuals.

The writ of habeas corpus never goes to courts, but to individuals only, to inquire into the legality of the imprisonment complained of. State v. First Judicial Dist Ct., 63 Pac. 395, 399, 24 Mont. 539.

Examination of jurisdictional questions.

Habeas corpus is an appropriate and legal remedy for the release of a prisoner who is restrained of his liberty by virtue of process issuing under the order or judgment of a court only in cases where there is a total want or else an excess of jurisdiction; and hence, where the court had jurisdiction both of the subject-matter and of the prisoner's person, he cannot be discharged on habeas corpus. Ex parte State, 71 Ala. 371, 375.

Habeas corpus is a common-law writ, and it is not available to inquire into the mere legality or justice of a judgment or mandate; but the term "legality or justice," as used in the rule, is not deemed to include questions of jurisdiction or power, and the want of jurisdiction of the tribunal to pronounce the judgment or mandate by which the person is placed and detained in custody furnishes to him the right to resort to the writ for relief. People v. Stout, 30 N. Y. Supp. 898, 902, 81 Hun, 336. See, also, People v. Liscomb, 60 N. Y. 559, 568, 569, 19 Am. Rep. 211.

The writ of habeas corpus is the remedy which the law gives for the enforcement of the civil right of personal liberty. Resort to it sometimes becomes necessary, because of what is done to enforce laws for the punishment of crimes, but the judicial proceeding under it is not to inquire into the criminal act which is complained of, but into the right of liberty notwithstanding the act. Proceedings to enforce civil rights are civil proceedings, and proceedings for the punishment of crime are criminal proceedings, so that habeas corpus is a civil proceeding. The writ of habeas corpus never takes the place of the writ of error, and is confined to jurisdictional defects when it is resorted to merely for the purpose of liberating a prisoner detained in custody to await his trial on the charge of being guilty of a criminal offense. Yet the questions whether there was any evidence for the magistrate to act upon, and whether the complaint charges any offense known to the law, are jurisdictional matters, and, in determining them, it can examine the evidence only sufficiently to discover whether there was any substantial ground for the exercise of judgment by the committing magistrate, it cannot go beyond that, and weigh the evidence. State v. Huegin, 85 N. W. 1046, 1052, 1057, 110 Wis. 189. See, also, Ex parte Lucas, 61 S. W. 218, 219, 226, 160 Mo. 218.

Production of the body of the prisoner.

An essential element of the remedy by habeas corpus is the power to compel the production of the body of the prisoner before the judge. It is this very feature which is embodied in the distinctive words which give the name to the writ. Nebraska Children's Home Soc. v. State, 78 N. W. 267, 269, 57 Neb. 765.

Injustice of arrest.

The office and object of the writ are to ascertain whether the prisoner can legally be detained in custody, and, if sufficient ground for his detention by the government is shown, he is not to be discharged for defects in the original arrest or commitment. Price v. McCarty (U. S.) 89 Fed. 84, 85, 32 C. C. A. 162.

Innocent parties are daily arrested by due process of law, and, if that gave the courts of the United States power to issue writs of habeas corpus to inquire into the justice or injustice of their arrest, every criminal case in the state would be tried first on habeas corpus. The courts of the United States, while they have carefully maintained their own powers, have been scrupulously careful not to encroach upon the powers of the state courts. In re Bergen (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 261, 263.

As a prerogative writ.

The writ of habeas corpus was from its inception a prerogative writ. At common law it stood upon the same footing as other writs of that character—such as a quo warranto, mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, etc.—and was dealt with on the like general grounds and principles. The proceedings under it, as in all prerogative writs, were regarded as appellate in their character. In re Miller (N. Y.) 1 Daly, 562, 574; Ex parte Watkins, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.) 193, 201, 7 L. Ed. 650.

Punishment for detention.

The one object of the writ of habeas corpus is to relieve the party detained from an illegal restraint. If this is accomplished before the jurisdiction of the court attaches by the service of the writ, there is nothing upon which it can attach. It is not the object or intention of the writ to punish the respondent or afford the party redress for his illegal detention; but the question occupies a different attitude after the jurisdiction of the court has attached. It cannot then be defeated by the wrongful act of either of the parties. Ex parte Coupland, 28 Tex. 386, 390.

As writ of inquiry.

The writ of habeas corpus is essentially a writ of inquiry, and upon matters of which the state itself is concerned, in aid of right and liberty. Thus a habeas corpus proceeding by the husband, as relator, against a wife, cannot be said to be a proceeding between husband and wife. State v. Michel, 30 South. 122, 125, 105 La. 741, 54 L. R. A. 927.

HABEAS CORPUS AD DELIBERANDUM ET RECIPIENDUM.

The writ of habeas corpus ad deliberandum et recipiendum issues when it is necessary to remove a prisoner to be tried by the proper jurisdiction wherein the fact was committed. Ex parte Bollman, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 75, 97, 2 L. Ed. 554 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 129).

HABEAS CORPUS AD FACIENDUM ET RECIPIENDUM.

The common writ ad faciendum et recipiendum issues out of any of the courts of Westminster Hall when a person is sued in some inferior jurisdiction, and it is desirable to remove the action into the superior court, commanding the inferior judges to produce the body of the defendant, together with the day and cause of his caption and detainer, to do and receive whatever the King's court shall consider in that behalf. This writ is grantable of common right, without any motion in court, and instantly supersedes all proceedings in the court below. Ex parte Bollman, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 75, 97, 2 L. Ed. 554 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 129).

HABEAS CORPUS AD PROSEQUENDUM.

The writ of habeas corpus ad prosequendum issues when it is necessary to remove a prisoner in order to prosecute in the proper jurisdiction wherein the fact was committed. Ex parte Bollman, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 75, 97, 2 L. Ed. 554 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 129).

HABEAS CORPUS AD RESPONDENDUM.

The writ of habeas corpus ad respondendum lies when a man hath a cause of action against one who is confined by the process of some inferior court, in order to remove the prisoner and charge him with this new action in the court above. Ex parte Bollman, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 75, 94, 2 L. Ed. 554 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 129).

HABEAS CORPUS AD SATISFACIENDUM.

The writ of habeas corpus ad satisfaciendum lies when a prisoner hath had judgment against him in an action, and the plaintiff is desirous to bring him up to some superior court to charge him with process of execution. Ex parte Bollman, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 75, 95, 2 L. Ed. 554 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 129).

HABEAS CORPUS AD TESTIFICANDUM.

The writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum issues to bring a witness into court to bear testimony in the cause. Ex parte Bollman, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 75, 97, 2 L. Ed. 554 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 129).

The writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum, under any practice, either in this country or England, never issued except to bring a witness competent and qualified to testify when brought, and never to bring a person who could not testify when brought, by reason of his being disqualified as a witness. Ex parte Marmaduke, 91 Mo. 228, 250, 4 S. W. 91, 92, 60 Am. Rep. 250.

HABENDUM.

In ancient conveyancing lore, the office of an habendum was "to determine the interest granted, or to lessen, enlarge, explain, or qualify the premises." Modern use has changed its signification. It is now the office of the premises "rightly to name the grantor and grantee, and to comprehend the certainty of the thing granted," and an habendum has become in most cases a mere form where the estate is mentioned in the premises. 2 Burrill, Law Dict. 555, 821. If the habendum cannot be reconciled with the premises, so that full effect may be given to both, it must give way, and the latter will stand. Clapp v. Byrnes, 3 App. Div. 284, 286, 287, 38 N. Y. Supp. 1063, 1067.

The office of an habendum is to name the grantee, and limit the certainty of the estate in the subject of the grant. Sumner v. Williams, 8 Mass. 162, 175, 5 Am. Dec. 83; Horn v. Broyles (Tenn.) 62 S. W. 297, 306.

The object of the habendum clause is said to be to set down against the name of the grantee the estate that is to be made and limited, or the time that the grantee shall have in the thing granted or demised, and to what use. New York Indians v. United States, 18 Sup. Ct. 531, 535, 170 U. S. 1, 42 L. Ed. 927 (citing Shep. Touch. 74).

The office of the habendum in a deed is to properly determine what interest or estate is granted by the deed. Miller v. Graham, 25 S. E. 165, 168, 47 S. C. 288 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 241; McLeod v. Tarrant, 39 S. C. 271, 17 S. E. 773, 20 L. R. A. 846).

It is the office of the habendum to qualify and explain the general words of the premises. Redstrake v. Townsend, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 372, 377, 378.

The habendum of a deed is that part which declares and limits the use of the thing conveyed. Stockton v. Martin (S. C.) 2 Bay, 471, 473.

The office of the habendum in a deed is to limit and define the estate which the grantee is to have in the property granted. It is not an essential part of a deed. Hart v. Gardner, 20 South. 877, 878, 74 Miss. 153.

Chancellor Kent remarks that in modern conveyancing the habendum clause in deeds has degenerated into a mere useless form, for the premises contain the names of the parties and the specification of the thing granted, and the deed becomes effectual without any habendum. Hafner v. Irwin, 20 N. C. 570, 571, 34 Am. Dec. 390.

As contradicting or defeating estate granted.

The habendum may explain and enlarge or qualify, but cannot contradict or defeat, the estate granted by the premises. New York Indians v. United States, 18 Sup. Ct. 531, 535, 170 U. S. 1, 42 L. Ed. 927.

The habendum part of a deed was usually used to determine the interest granted, or to lessen, enlarge, explain, or qualify the premises. But it cannot perform the office of divesting an estate already vested by the deed, for it is void if it be repugnant to the estate granted in the premises. Hafner v. Irwin, 20 N. C. 570, 571, 34 Am. Dec. 390.

An estate granted may be designated and made certain in the habendum clause, where it enlarges and explains, but is not inconsistent with, the previous parts of the instrument. Jackson v. Ireland (N. Y.) 3 Wend. 99, 102.

As enlarging subject-matter of grant.

The habendum of a deed does not grant the estate, but only limits its certainty, and cannot enlarge the premises. Nothing can be limited in the habendum of a deed which has not been given in the premises, because, the premises being that part of a deed in which the thing is granted, it follows that the habendum, which is only used for the purpose of limiting the certainty of the estate, cannot increase the gift, for in that case the grantee would in fact take a fee, which was never given to him. Brown v. Manter, 21 N. H. (1 Fost.) 528, 533, 53 Am. Dec. 223.

It is the office of the habendum sometimes to enlarge the estate granted, but never to extend the subject-matter of the grant, and accordingly, where a deed describing the land granted by metes, and the habendum read, "to have and to hold the premises with all their appurtenances," the phrase "with all their appurtenances" did not operate to convey an easement consisting of the right to the use of water conducted artificially onto the premises from other land of the grantor. Manning v. Smith, 6 Conn. 289, 292.

HABIT.

See "Good Habits"; "Intemperate Habits"; "Temperate Habits."

See "Confirmed Habits of Intoxication"; "Continuing Habits of Intoxication."

The word "habit" is defined to be a fixed or established custom; ordinary course of conduct. Conner v. Citizens' St. R. Co., 45 N. E. 662, 666, 146 Ind. 430; Tatum v. State, 63 Ala. 147, 152.

Habit is the customary conduct of a person, to pursue which he has acquired a tendency from frequent repetitions of the same act. State v. Skillcorn, 73 N. W. 503, 504, 104 Iowa, 97.

Habit is a customary state; a disposition acquired by frequent repetition; aptitude by doing frequently the same thing; usage; established manner. When a person has repeatedly acted in a particular way at intervals, whether regular or irregular, for such length of time that we can predicate with reasonable assurance that he will continue to act so, we may affirm that this is his habit. State v. Robinson, 20 South. 30, 31, 111 Ala. 482 (citing State v. Savage, 89 Ala. 1, 7 South. 183, 7 L. R. A. 426).

"Habit is the disposition of a person toward a certain thing." Seigler v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 14 Atl. 237, 238.

It need not be the uniform or unvarying rule, but, to be a habit, it must be the ordinary course of conduct—the general rule or custom. Tatum v. State, 63 Ala. 147, 152.

Single or occasional acts.

The word "habit" has a clear, well-understood meaning, being nearly the same as "custom," and cannot be applied to a single act. Lynch v. Bates, 38 N. E. 806, 808, 139 Ind. 206.

A habit of using intoxicating liquors means more than an occasional or incidental use. Supreme Lodge K. P. v. Foster, 59 N. E. 877, 880, 26 Ind. App. 333.

"When we speak of the habits of a person, we refer to his customary conduct, to pursue which he has acquired a tendency from frequent repetition of the same acts. It would be incorrect to say that a man has a habit of anything from a single act. A habit of early rising, for example, could not be affirmed of one because he was once seen on the streets in the morning before the sun had risen; nor could intemperate habits be imputed to him because his appearance and actions on that occasion might indicate a night of indulgence. Hence a representation in an insurance policy that the insured was of temperate habits was not made untrue by the fact that he may have had an attack of delirium tremens from an exceptional overindulgence. Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co. v. Foley, 105 U. S. 350, 354, 26 L. Ed. 1055.

On the sale of a negro, the vendor warranted that the negro was not addicted to the habit of running away. The negro was kept in jail for five months preceding the day of the sale for running away, and soon after the sale he ran away again. Held, that the two cases should be considered sufficient to constitute his acts a habit, within the meaning of that word as used in a warranty of sale. Macarty v. Bagnleres (La.) 1 Mart. (O. S.) 149, 150.

Where a statute prohibits the sale of liquor to a person in the habit of getting intoxicated, the word "habit" should be construed to mean the involuntary tendency of becoming intoxicated, which is acquired by frequent repetition, and therefore might include a case where a person was proved to have been drunk for three to five times within two years prior to the alleged infringement of the statute. Murphy v. People, 90 Ill. 59, 60.

HABITABLE.

Where one lets a house for people to live in, and agrees to keep it in good repair, he is bound by the dictates of common reason, as well as by those of common law, to both make and keep it habitable—that is, reasonably fit for the occupation of a tenant of the class which occupies it. Miller v. McCardell, 33 Atl. 445, 446, 19 R. I. 304, 30 L. R. A. 682.

HABITANCY.

The term "habitancy" "expresses the fact of residence at a place with the intent to regard and make it a home. The act and intent must concur, and the intent may be inferred from declarations and conduct. In general terms, one may be designated as an inhabitant of that place which constitutes the principal seat of his residence, of his business pursuits, connections, attachments, and of his political and municipal relations." Lyman v. Fiske, 34 Mass. (17 Pick.) 231, 234, 28 Am. Dec. 293; Inhabitants of Abington v. Inhabitants of North Bridgewater, 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 170, 177, 178; Hairston v. Hairston, 27 Miss. (5 Cushm.) 704, 711, 61 Am. Dec. 500.

The word "habitancy" is more comprehensive than "domicile." In some respects, "habitancy" includes "domicile," and embraces citizenship and municipal relations. Hairston v. Hairston, 27 Miss. (5 Cushm.) 704, 711, 61 Am. Dec. 500.

HABITATION.

See "Right of Habitation"; "Separation of Habitation."

"Habitation" is defined to be a place of abode; a place to dwell in. Holmes v. Oregon & C. R. Co. (U. S.) 5 Fed. 523, 527.

The word "habitation," in 1 Rev. Code, c. 104, § 7, p. 37, requiring nuncupative wills to be made at the habitation of the testator, means dwelling house or home. Its meaning is the same as in the original statute, 29 Car. II, c. 3, § 19, which uses the term "house, or his or her habitation or dwelling." Nowlin's Adm'r v. Scott (Va.) 10 Grat. 64, 65.

"The constitutional definition of 'habitation' is the place where a man dwells or has his home; in other words, his domicile." Harvard College v. Gore, 22 Mass. (5 Pick.) 370, 372.

Where one stops for a long time in a place for the management of his business affairs, while he resided with his family at another place, he had simply a habitation at the former place, and not a domicile. Union Hotel Co. v. Hersee, 79 N. Y. 454, 463, 35 Am. Rep. 536.

HABITUAL.

The word "habitual" is defined by Webster as constant; customary; accustomed; usual; common; ordinary; regular; familiar; and this is certainly the common understanding of the meaning of the word. Peltz v. Printz, 40 Atl. 486, 186 Pa. 347.

"Habitual" means formed or acquired by or resulting from habit; frequent use or custom; formed by repeated impressions. Hilton v. State, 53 S. W. 113, 115, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 190.

HABITUAL CARNAL INTERCOURSE.

The expression "habitual carnal intercourse," as used in Pen. Code, art. 333, defining adultery as habitual carnal intercourse with each other, without living together, of a man and woman, when either is lawfully married to some other person, is not such an expression as needs explanation, for the jury is competent to understand what is meant by the language in common use, and what is meant by "habitual carnal intercourse"; the word "habitual" not being one of technical signification, but should be understood in its common acceptation. Collum v. State, 10 Tex. App. 708, 710.

HABITUAL CRIMINAL.

When a person is hereafter convicted of a felony, who has been, before that conviction, convicted in this state of any other crime, he may be adjudged by the court, in addition to other punishment inflicted upon him, to be an habitual criminal. A person convicted of a misdemeanor, who has been already five times convicted in this state of a misdemeanor, may be adjudged by the court, in addition to or instead of other punishment, to be an habitual criminal. Cr. Code N. Y. 1903, § 510.

Whoever has been previously twice convicted of crime, sentenced, and committed to prison, in this or any other state, or once in this or once at least in any other state, for terms of not less than three years each, shall, upon conviction of a felony committed in this state, other than murder in the first or second degree, be deemed to be an habitual criminal. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4067.

HABITUAL CRUEL AND INHUMAN TREATMENT.

"Habitual cruel and inhuman treatment," as used in Rev. St. p. 147, § 51, entitling a wife to a divorce for habitual cruel and inhuman treatment, means actual violence, or a reasonable apprehension of bodily harm. Injured susceptibilities do not suffice for so grave a judgment as one of divorce. "Occasional outbursts of passion will not do it, nor mere abuse, however gross. Words of menace, however, are sufficient, if they be of such a character and are accompanied by such circumstances as would justify a belief in their seriousness; that is, they must impress the person to whom they are addressed, not as idle words, not as a form of intemperate expression, but as importing action, and in that sense conveying the reality of the threat of bodily harm. The authorities in support of the rule are numerous. Ruckman v. Ruckman (N. Y.) 58 How. Prac. 278, 279 (citing Perry v. Perry [N. Y.] 2 Paige, 501; Burr v. Burr [N. Y.] 10 Paige, 20, 31, 32, 33; Mason v. Mason [N. Y.] 1 Edw. Ch. 278).

Under a statute providing that "habitual cruel and inhuman treatment," marked by personal violence, shall be cause for divorce, it is held that the treatment must be habitual; the court remarking that a single act of violence ordinarily would not suffice. It might never be repeated. The violence, however, need not be frequent. It is not necessary for personal violence to attend the daily intercourse of the parties. If the treatment is persistently cruel and inhuman, and is occasionally characterized by personal violence, so as to beget the apprehension that it is liable to occur again at any time, it is sufficient. Johns v. Johns, 57 Miss. 530, 531, 532.

Under a statute authorizing divorce for "habitual cruel and inhuman treatment," it is held that where a husband struck his wife, attempted to kick her, called her by abusive epithets, at times refused to speak to her for months, supplied her scantily with clothing, and told her to leave and get a divorce, there was "habitual cruel and inhuman treatment," within the meaning of the statute. Pillar v. Pillar, 22 Wis. 658, 659.

HABITUAL DRUNKARD.

See, also, "Habitual Drunkenness or Intoxication"; "Habitual Intemperance."

An habitual drunkard is one who has formed the habit, and indulged in it, of drinking to excess and becoming intoxicated, whether daily or continuously or periodically, with sober intervals of a greater or less extent.—Miller v. Gleason, 18 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 374, 10 O. C. D. 20, 21.

An habitual drunkard is one who makes it a habit, or who habitually becomes intoxicated by the voluntary use of intoxicating liquors. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 5060h.

An habitual drunkard is one who has the habit of indulging in intoxicating drink so firmly fixed that he becomes drunk whenever the temptation is presented by his being near where liquor is sold. Magahay v. Magahay, 35 Mich. 210.

An habitual drunkard is one who has acquired a fixed habit of drunkenness. An instruction properly declares the law which tells the jury that an habitual drunkard is a person given to inebriety or excessive use of intoxicating drink, who has lost the power or will, by frequent indulgence, to control his appetite for it. Sitton v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 84 Mo. App. 208, 212.

"Bouvier defines an habitual drunkard to be a person given to inebriety or the excessive use of intoxicating drinks, who has lost the power or will, by frequent indulgence, to control his appetite for it. 'Habitual drunkenness,' said Harrison, J., 'or the degree or the course of intemperance that amounts to it, cannot be exactly defined. We may, however, say, in general terms, that one is addicted to habitual drunkenness who has a fixed habit of frequently getting drunk, and he may be so addicted though he may not oftener be drunk than sober, and he may be sober for weeks.' Brown v. Brown, 38 Ark. 324, 328. 'Occasional acts of drunkenness do not make one an habitual drunkard, nor is it necessary that he should be continually in an intoxicated state. A man may be an habitual drunkard, and yet be sober for days and weeks together. The rule is, has he a fixed habit of drunkenness?' Ludwick v. Commonwealth, 18 Pa. (6 Harris) 172, 174. 'He is an habitual drunkard,' says the court in Commonwealth v. Whitney, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 85, 'whose habit is to get drunk; whose inebriety has become habitual.' Poland, P. J., says: 'The fair definition of "habitual drunkard" we suppose to be one who is in the habit of getting drunk, or who commonly or frequently is drunk; and we do not suppose it necessary, to satisfy those terms, that a man be shown to be constantly or universally drunk.' McBee v. McBee, 29 Pac. 887, 888, 22 Or. 329, 29 Am. St. Rep. 613 (citing State v. Pratt, 34 Vt. 323, 334). See, also, Magahay v. Magahay, 35 Mich. 210; Murphy v. People, 90 Ill. 59, 60; Mack v. Handy, 2 South. 181, 183, 39 La. Ann. 497.

An habitual drunkard is a person whose habits of drunkenness are confirmed and continual. Gourlay v. Gourlay, 19 Atl. 142, 143, 16 R. I. 705.

"Neither does a single nor an occasional excess make a man an habitual drunkard, but if the habit and rule of a man's life is to indulge periodically, and with increasing frequency and violence, in excessive fits of intemperance, such a use of liquor may properly cause the finding of habitual drunkenness." Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Muskegon Nat. Bank, 7 Sup. Ct. 1221, 1225, 122 U. S. 501, 30 L. Ed. 1100.

One who has a fixed habit of drunkenness, and who is habituated to intemperance whenever the opportunity offers—he himself making the opportunity—filling his flask, silently drinking by himself, and getting continually drunk, is an habitual drunkard. Appeal of Miskey, 107 Pa. 611, 626.

In construing a statute authorizing the imprisonment in any inebriate or insane asylum of any person convicted of being an inebriate, habitual, or common drunkard, it was said that "just what would make a person such is not very clearly defined. Manifestly, it was intended that the drunkenness should be repeated to the extent of becoming habitual; but just how frequently it should occur, or the extent of the delirium or stupefaction, is left, as a matter of fact, to be determined by those who might differ widely in regard to it. Such conviction is not made dependent upon his inability to attend to business, nor to any want of physical self-control, nor upon his being dangerous to himself or others." Such a statute is in violation of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, § 1, which declares that no state shall deprive any person of liberty without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. State v. Ryan, 36 N. W. 823, 827, 70 Wis. 676.

Delirium tremens.

One who has so indulged in intoxicating liquors as to become subject to delirium tremens may properly be regarded as an habitual drunkard. Menkins v. Lightner, 18 Ill. (8 Peck) 282, 284, 285.

Inability to control appetite.

An habitual drunkard is a person given to inebriety or the excessive use of intoxicating drink, and who has lost the power of will, by frequent indulgence, to control his appetite for it; and therefore where, in a suit for divorce, it was proved that defendant for a period of two years prior to the beginning of the suit was frequently and customarily or habitually given to the excessive use of intoxicating drink, and had during such two years or more lost the power of his will to control his appetite, he was an habitual drunkard, within the statute authorizing a divorce on that ground. Richards v. Richards, 19 Ill. App. (19 Bradw.) 465, 467.

In McBee v. McBee, 22 Or. 329, 29 Pac. 887, 29 Am. St. Rep. 613, the court, after a review of all the authorities, concludes that there must be frequent and regular recurrence of excessive indulgence in intoxicating drinks, to constitute an habitual drunkard. It is not necessary that he should drink liquors to excess, and become intoxicated every day, or even every week, but there must be such frequent repetition of excessive indulgence as to engender a fixed habit of drunkenness. Occasional acts of intoxication are not sufficient to make one an habitual drunkard. There must be the involuntary tendency to become intoxicated as often as the temptation is presented, which comes from a fixed habit, acquired from frequent and excessive indulgence. The man is reduced to that pitiable condition in which he either makes no vigorous effort to resist and overcome the habit, or his will has become so enfeebled by the indulgence that resistance is impossible. There is generated in him, by frequent and excessive indulgence, a fixed habit of drunkenness, which he is liable to exhibit at any time when the opportunity is afforded. This is what is meant by "habitual drunkenness," as a ground for divorce. Bizer v. Bizer, 81 N. W. 465, 466, 110 Iowa, 248; Walton v. Walton, 8 Pac. 110, 111, 34 Kan. 195.

Loss of reason or capacity for business.

"Habitual drunkards," as used in Sayles' Ann. St. art. 3226, § 4, providing for the execution of a bond by retail liquor dealers, conditioned that they will not sell to habitual drunkards, is used in its common acceptance. It does not refer to an habitual drunkard, as defined in the statutes under the title "Guardian and Ward." The capacity of a person to take care of himself or property is immaterial, within the meaning of the statute quoted. Campbell v. Jones, 21 S. W. 723, 724, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 263.

The fact that a person is for any considerable part of his time intoxicated to such a degree as to deprive him of his ordinary reasoning faculties is prima facie evidence, at least, that he is incapacitated, as an habitual drunkard, to have the control and management of his property, within the meaning of the statute giving the care of habitual drunkards to the court. In re Tracy (N. Y.) 1 Paige, 580, 582.

As question for jury.

"An habitual drunkard" is defined by act relating to liability of liquor sellers for selling intoxicating liquors to habitual drunkards as one who makes it a habit, or who habitually becomes intoxicated by the voluntary use of intoxicating liquors, and it is a question for the jury to determine whether or not a person is an habitual drunkard. Wilson v. White, 69 S. W. 989, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 588.

In an action for libel, for charging that plaintiff was an habitual drunkard, an instruction stating: "I think 'an habitual drunkard' means more than being drunk on two or three occasions within a given time, or two or three times within a given number of months; that it means the use of intoxicating liquors to such an extent as to in some manner disqualify a man from pursuing his avocation; but the jury can, perhaps, define it as well as the court"—was held not to be erroneous by reason of the latter clause. Rude v. Nass, 48 N. W. 555, 558, 79 Wis. 321, 24 Am. St. Rep. 717.

Senile dementia.

A person who indulges in alcoholic intoxicants to such an extent as to impair the mind and produce senile dementia is an habitual drunkard. Robertson v. Lyon, 24 S. C. 266, 272, 273.

HABITUAL DRUNKENNESS OR INTOXICATION.See, also, "Confirmed Drunkenness."

"Habitual drunkenness," as the term is used to designate habitual drunkenness, as the cause of divorce, has reference to the existence of drunkenness as a habit. A frequent and regular recurrence or excess of indulgence in intoxicating drinks constitutes such a habit. Golding v. Golding, 6 Mo. App. 602.

The term "habitual," when applied to drunkenness, as a ground for divorce, implies growth through various and increasing stages until drunkenness becomes a fixed or established habit. McClanahan v. McClanahan, 56 S. W. 858, 861, 104 Tenn. 217.

Habitual drunkenness is drunkenness repeated at intervals, whether regular or irregular, for such a length of time that it can be said with reasonable assurance that such actions will be continued. It need not be the uniform or unvarying rule, but, to be habitual, must be the ordinary course of conduct—the general rule or custom. Occasional exceptions do not destroy the rule, but unless, when occasion offers, there is a disposition or probable inclination to drink to excess, intemperate habits cannot be predicated. If the rule or habit is to drink to intoxication when occasion offers, and sobriety or abstinence is the exception, the condition of habitual drunkenness exists. State v. Robinson, 20 South. 30, 31, 111 Ala. 482 (citing Tatum v. State, 63 Ala. 147, 152; Stanley v. State, 26 Ala. 26; Smith v. State, 55 Ala. 1, 10; Ludwick v. Commonwealth, 18 Pa. [6 Harris] 172; State v. Pratt, 34 Vt. 323; Northwestern Life Ins. Co. v. Muskegon Bank, 122 U. S. 501, 507, 7 Sup. Ct. 1221, 30 L. Ed. 1100).

The terms "habitual drunkenness," "habitual intemperance," "habitual intoxication," and "continued habits of intoxication" are equivalent and capable of the same definition, and are defined as the fixed and irresistible habit of getting drunk. Ring v. Ring, 38 S. E. 330, 332, 112 Ga. 854.

The question of habitual intoxication is a question for the jury. To prove such intoxication, evidence is admissible that the person in question was in the habit of getting intoxicated. The general rule, it is true, forbids the opinions or conclusions of witnesses from being given in evidence. Whether or not a person possesses a certain habit is rather a question of fact than of opinion or conclusion. Gallagher v. People, 11 N. E. 335, 336, 120 Ill. 179.

"Habitual drunkenness" is a distinct act within itself; a condition of body and mind produced by the excessive use of intoxicating liquors—spirituous, vinous, or malt—confirmed by habit. It is usually produced by oft-repeated indulgence in drinking to excess, which is liable to have different effects on different persons, and therefore cannot be described or measured or defined by the causes that produce it in any one instance, any more than insanity or any other condition of body or mind produced by extraneous causes. Trigg v. State, 49 Tex. 645, 663.

Inability to resist temptation.

"Habitual drunkenness," as used in Civ. Code La. art. 128, making habitual drunkenness cause of divorce, means repeated acts of drunkenness, followed by occasional spells of sobriety and moderate drunkenness, with the habit of drinking so fixed that temptation to drink cannot be resisted. De Lesdernier v. De Lesdernier, 14 South. 191, 45 La. Ann. 1364.

Incapacity for business.

"Habitual drunkenness," as used in a statute making habitual drunkenness a ground of divorce, includes fixed habits of drinking to excess, to such a degree as to disqualify the person from attending to his business during the principal portion of the time usually devoted to business. Wheeler v. Wheeler, 5 N. W. 689, 53 Iowa, 511, 36 Am. Rep. 240; Mahone v. Mahone, 19 Cal. 626, 627, 81 Am. Dec. 91.

By "habitual drunkenness," as used in the statute relating to the removal of county officers, is meant the frequent and customary use to excess of intoxicating drinks, resulting in that condition of the body and mind produced by the excessive use of intoxicating liquors, spirituous, vinous, or malt, confirmed by habit. In order to constitute habitual drunkenness, it shall not be necessary to show that the officer is incapable of discharging the duties of his office or taking care of himself; but proof of the fact of habitual drunkenness, to the satisfaction of the judge and jury, shall be sufficient cause of removal, without reference to his capacity or incapacity to discharge the duties of his office. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, arts. 3536, 3537.

Occasional intoxication.

Habitual drunkenness, within the meaning of a statute authorizing a divorce for habitual drunkenness, is not shown by proof of occasional intoxication. Meathe v. Meathe, 47 N. W. 109, 83 Mich. 150.

Proof that defendant drank at times to excess, and that when under the influence of liquor he was boisterous, quarrelsome, and offensive, is not alone sufficient to fill the legal requirement as to habitual drunkenness. Powers v. Powers, 31 N. W. 1, 5, 20 Neb. 529.

Use of opiates.

Habitual drunkenness, as a ground for divorce, includes only alcoholic intoxication, and not that resulting from the habitual use of opiates. Dawson v. Dawson, 23 Mo. App. 169, 170; Burt v. Burt, 46 N. E. 622, 623, 168 Mass. 204; Ring v. Ring, 38 S. E. 330, 332, 112 Ga. 854.

Quarrelsomeness.

Habitual drunkenness, such as is ground for divorce, was not shown by evidence that defendant drank, at times, to excess, and that, when under the influence of liquor, he was boisterous, quarrelsome, and offensive, and at least disgustingly unpleasant. Powers v. Powers, 20 Neb. 529, 536, 31 N. W. 1, 5.

Where the evidence showed that a man had always been in the habit of taking a drink whenever he had a mind to and felt like it, and the habit had grown upon him, until during the last six or seven years he had been in the habit of getting more or less intoxicated when he went to the village, which happened once or twice a week, though he never was so drunk that he could not drive his team home, or put it out after he got there, but was morose and ugly, and sometimes brutal, when filled with liquor, a divorce for habitual drunkenness was properly granted. Berryman v. Berryman, 26 N. W. 789, 59 Mich. 605.

Sober periods.

"Habitual drunkenness" is not exactly definable, but it may be said that one is addicted to habitual drunkenness who has a fixed habit of frequently getting drunk; and he may be so addicted, though not oftener drunk than sober, and though sober for two weeks. Brown v. Brown, 38 Ark. 324, 328.

"Habitual drunkenness," within a statute providing for an action for damages against a dramshop keeper for sales to an habitual drinker, is sufficiently established by evidence that the man in question has a fixed habit of frequently getting drunk, though he is oftener sober than drunk, and is sometimes sober for weeks at a time. Cook v. Newton, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 860.

A charge that "habitual," as applied to intoxication, means continuous; an acquired habit; constant intoxication—was too strong, as it is not necessary, in order to show that a man has been guilty of habitual intoxication, within Civ. Code, § 2427, authorizing a divorce for such cause, to prove that he was continuously and constantly drunk. Fuller v. Fuller, 108 Ga. 256, 257, 33 S. E. 865.

HABITUAL INSANITY.

Habitual insanity is such insanity as is, in its nature, continuous and chronic. Wright v. Market Bank (Tenn.) 60 S. W. 623, 624.

HABITUAL INTEMPERANCE.

"Habitual intemperance," as used in a statute making it a ground for divorce, can only refer to the persistent habit of becoming intoxicated from the use of strong drinks. Burns v. Burns, 13 Fla. 369, 370; McGill v. McGill, 19 Fla. 341, 348.

"The phrase 'habitual intemperance' means the custom or habit of getting drunk; the constant indulgence in such stimulants as wine, brandy, and whisky, whereby intoxication is produced; not the ordinary use, but the habitual use, of them. The habit should be actual or confirmed. It may be intermittent. It need not be continuous, or even of daily occurrence." Mack v. Handy, 2 South. 181, 183, 39 La. Ann. 491; Williams v. Goss, 9 South. 750, 751, 43 La. Ann. 868.

Habitual intemperance is a condition, and when any person gets into that condition he is said to be habitually intemperate. Where a person about once in three weeks becomes intoxicated during the evening to such an extent that the next morning he could not go as usual to his work, and which had continued for a period of two years, he was not affected with habitual intemperance, so as to afford cause to his wife for a divorce on that ground. Dennis v. Dennis, 36

Atl. 34, 36, 68 Conn. 186, 34 L. R. A. 449, 57 Am. St. Rep. 95.

The terms "habitual drunkenness," "habitual intemperance," "habitual intoxication," and "continued habits of intoxication" are equivalent and capable of the same definition, and are defined as the fixed and irresistible habit of getting drunk. Ring v. Ring, 38 S. E. 330, 332, 112 Ga. 854.

The term "habitually intemperate" characterizes one who uses liquors excessively, often or daily. Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Davey, 8 Sup. Ct. 331, 332, 123 U. S. 739, 31 L. Ed. 315.

Incapacity for business.

Habitual intemperance is that degree of intemperance from the use of intoxicating drinks which disqualifies the person a great portion of the time from properly attending to business, Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 144; or which would reasonably inflict a course of great mental anguish upon the innocent party, Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 106; Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2026; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 2742; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 72. The habit need not be of such a character as to render the party at all times incapable of attending to business. Mahone v. Mahone, 19 Cal. 626, 628, 81 Am. Dec. 91.

Use of opiates.

The term "habitual intemperance" means the habit of using intoxicating liquors to excess, and does not include the excessive use of opiates and drugs. Barber v. Barber (Conn.) 14 Law Rep. 375, 376; Burt v. Burt, 46 N. E. 622, 623, 168 Mass. 204; Ring v. Ring, 38 S. E. 330, 332, 112 Ga. 854.

HABITUALLY.

An application for a life insurance policy stating that the applicant did not habitually use intoxicating drinks as a beverage cannot be construed to mean any use of intoxicating drinks which did not make his habits those of a man not uniformly and strictly temperate, and which did not amount to habitual use of such beverage. Swick v. Home Ins. Co. (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 550, 551.

"Habitual use," within the meaning of the rule that a person entitled to the exemption of a team habitually used for certain purposes, does not require that such property has been so used in the past; but, if it has been procured for such habitual use, and the owner has started in the character of the work demanding such use, the property will be held exempt. Bevan v. Hayden, 13 Iowa, 122, 125.

As exclusively.

"Habitually," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 6, exempting from execution the two horses, wagons, and harness by which a peddler habitually earns his living, means customarily or by frequent practice or use. It does not mean exclusively or entirely. And hence the fact that a peddler occasionally used the team and wagon in other ways would not deprive him of the benefit of exemption provided for in the statute. Stanton v. French, 27 Pac. 657, 91 Cal. 274, 25 Am. St. Rep. 191.

The term "habitually earns his living by the use of such property," in a statute exempting horses, etc., so used, from execution, does not apply to horses owned by a coal dealer, and used a part of the time to deliver coal and wood sold by him, and the rest of the time in hauling for others. Dove v. Nunan, 62 Cal. 399, 400.

HABITUALLY CARRYING CONCEALED WEAPONS.

To constitute the offense of habitually carrying concealed weapons, the accused need not have been seen carrying such weapons on any prescribed or particular number of times or occasions, but a jury would be justified in convicting upon evidence that he had been seen once wearing concealed weapons, if the circumstances tended to support the evidence and the charge. Hicks v. Commonwealth (Va.) 7 Grat. 597, 598.

HACKMEN.

See "Public Hackmen."

As common carrier, see "Common Carrier."

HACKNEY COACH.

Under a city charter providing that the common council shall have power to establish ordinances which to them shall seem both useful or necessary for the good rule and government of all residents of said city, and for the further public good, trade, and better government and rule of the city, the council may establish hackney coach stands. Hackney coaches standing in the streets have existed so universally in England, and for so long a period (certainly since 1700, and perhaps further back), that the term "hackney coach" conveys the idea to the mind of a coach standing in the street for hire. Webster defines a hackney coach to be a coach let for hire, commonly that stands in the streets. When, therefore, the Legislature uses the term "hackney coach," it must be deemed to use it in such sense as to cover coaches for hire standing in the streets, as well as those kept in stables for hire. Masterson v. Short (N. Y.) 33 How. Prac. 481, 486.

A vehicle described as a certain wagon drawn by four horses, and used in the transportation of property, and for transferring goods of grocers and merchants, cannot be considered as a hackney coach, within the ordinance requiring a license to keep, hire out, or cause to be run any hackney coach. Snyder v. City of North Lawrence, 8 Kan. 82, 83.

HAD.

See "Have."

HAIR.

"Hair," as used in Revenue Act June 6, 1872, 17 Stat. 231, which reduces the tariff on certain articles 10 per cent., enumerating among those on which the tariff should be reduced all wools, hair of the alpaca, goat, and other animals, and all mantles and other articles wholly or in part of wool and hair of the alpaca, goat, and other animals, does not include bristles of a hog. Von Stade v. Arthur (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 1274.

HAIR CLIPPERS.

Hair clippers are instruments operated on the same principle as shears or scissors, having fingers which run close to the skin and gather and hold the hair, where it can be cut off by the reciprocating action of the cutting blades upon the fingers, and are intended to take the place of shears and scissors in the work of cutting and trimming the hair and whiskers. Koch v. Steeberger (U. S.) 30 Fed. 424, 425.

HAIR SEATING.

Hair seating is a cloth composed of cotton and hair, similar in nature to crinoline cloth; the only difference being that it is more closely woven, and is used mainly for upholstering purposes. Arthur's Ex'rs v. Butterfield, 8 Sup. Ct. 714, 715, 125 U. S. 70, 31 L. Ed. 643.

HALF.

See "North Half"; "West Half."

The terms "north half" and "south half" were used by the owner of a triangular tract of land in making separate conveyances of different portions of the land; the first conveyance describing the north half as beginning in the middle of one of the sides, and running back parallel to another side, of the triangle. After such conveyances the lots were conveyed by the description of "north half" and "south half," and were so assessed for taxes; and, upon failure of the owner of the south half to pay the taxes, it was sold at tax collector's sale and conveyed under the description of "south half." Held, in an action of ejectment, that the common grantor had fixed upon the words "north and south half" a conventional meaning, and that they must be considered to have been so used in the muniment of title under which both parties claimed, and the defendant could claim no greater portion than was designated to him. Grandey v. Casey, 6 S. W. 376, 93 Mo. 595.

As government subdivision.

"Half," as used in a description of premises, in which they are described as the south half of a certain section of land, is a fit and strictly accurate and proper expression to describe the south half in quantity. It may also mean the south half according to the government survey. The intention of the parties is the controlling element as to its meaning. Prentiss v. Brewer, 17 Wis. 635, 644, 86 Am. Dec. 730.

In deeds calling for 30 acres of land off of the south end of the east half of the northwest quarter, etc., of a certain section, the words "east half" have reference to the government subdivision of the quarter section, and not to a subdivision of the quarter section by a line dividing it into two equal parts as to area. Turner v. Union Pac. Ry. Co., 20 S. W. 673, 674, 112 Mo. 542. See, also, Brown v. Hardin, 21 Ark. 324, 327.

"Half," as used in deeds of land according to government survey, ordinarily is used not with reference to the quantity, but with reference to a line which is equidistant from the boundary line of the parcel subdivided; but, where the government has divided a quarter of a section into what it calls "fractional 40's," the government division will govern. Edinger v. Woodke, 86 N. W. 397, 398, 127 Mich. 41.

The general and proper acceptance of the terms "section" and "half section," as well as their construction by the general land department, denotes the land in the sections and subdivisional lines, and not the exact quantity which a perfect admeasurement of an unobstructed surface would declare. Brown v. Hardin, 21 Ark. 324, 337.

As half in quantity.

"Half," as used in a deed conveying the half of a certain tract of land, will be held to mean the half in quantity, and not the part lying on one side of a line drawn midway between, and parallel to, the side lines of the lot. Owen v. Henderson, 47 Pac. 215, 216, 16 Wash. 39, 58 Am. St. Rep. 17; Dart v. Barbour, 32 Mich. 267, 272 (citing Au Gres Boom Co. v. Whitney, 28 Mich. 42).

A deed conveying the east half of certain irregularly shaped lots is presumed to mean the east half in quantity. There is no presumption that the parties intend that the tract conveyed shall be ascertained by the rule of subdivision adopted in government surveys; that is, by running a line equidistant from the opposite sides of the lot. Cogan v. Cook, 22 Minn. 137, 142.

The use of the word "half" in a description of premises to be conveyed as being the south half of a certain farm held not to bind the grantor to convey an exact half of such farm. Heyer v. Lee, 40 Mich. 353, 36, 29 Am. Rep. 537.

Plaintiff and defendant were lessees, the one of the east half, the other of the west half, of a certain lot, which, according to government survey, is bounded on the south by an east and west line, and on the east and west line by north and south lines, and on the north by a meandered lake. Held, that the word "half" should be construed to mean half in quantity, and that the boundary line between the lessee's half was a north and south line dividing the land within the government boundaries into equal acreage, and not one equally distant from the east and west boundaries, though the land was leased to parties for mining purposes only, and the land under the lake might be useful for that purpose. "The literal significance of the word 'half' is one of two equal parts into which anything may be divided." Hartford Iron Min. Co. v. Cambridge Min. Co., 45 N. W. 351, 80 Mich. 491.

A deed contained a description of certain land as follows: "The east half of the east half of the northwest quarter, and the east half of the east half of the southwest fractional quarter, all in section 36, containing 50 acres, being the east half of 100 acres." Held, that the "east half" referred to one-half the quantity of the land, and not to the land lying east of a line drawn through the middle of the tract. Jones v. Pashby, 29 N. W. 374, 378, 62 Mich. 614.

As undivided half.

"Half," when used in a conveyance which conveys the half of any particular piece of property, means an undivided half. Baldwin v. Winslow, 2 Minn. 213, 216 (Gil. 174, 178).

HALF AND HALF.

"Half and half between the parties," as used in a declaration that the capital stock of a corporation should be divided into a certain number of shares, and divided half and half between the parties, should be construed to mean equally divided between the parties; there being three parties. Bates v. Wilson, 24 Pac. 99, 105, 14 Colo. 140.

HALF BLOOD.

As of the blood, see "Blood."

Acts 1796, c. 14, provides that all real estates of inheritance, as well as personal, shall descend to, and be divided between, brothers and sisters as well of the half blood as of the whole blood, in the same proportions as they have heretofore been divided between brothers of the whole and half blood only. Held, that the term "brothers of the whole and half blood only," as used in this paragraph, without any uncertainty or doubt, means brothers of the half blood on the side of the father, exclusive of maternal brothers. Therefore "brothers and sisters of the half blood," in the preceding part of the paragraph, means half blood on the side of the father; otherwise "half blood," in the same sentence, will mean half blood generally, or half blood on the father's side, without any sign or token to indicate that the Legislature intended different meanings to each. Butler v. King, 10 Tenn. (2 Yerg.) 115, 118.

"Kindred of the half blood," as used in Gen. St. c. 91, § 5, providing that kindred of the half blood shall inherit equally with those of the whole blood in the same degree, should be construed to include kindred of the half blood in any degree. Larrabee v. Tucker, 116 Mass. 562.

The statute, providing that there shall be no distinction between the kindred of the whole and of the half blood in regard to inheriting property, is not confined in its application to cases where the ancestor from whom the estate is derived leaves children by different mothers. The children of the same mother, but who have different fathers, are no less brothers and sisters of the half blood than are the children of a common father, but who have different mothers. Oglesby Coal Co. v. Pasco, 79 Ill. 164, 168.

HALF-BLOODED MERINO WOOL.

A promissory note payable in "half-blooded merino wool" is not complied with by the delivery of wool of which a portion is of a less degree of fineness than half-blooded merino, and an equal portion is of a greater degree of fineness than the standard, so that the whole quantity, taken together, would be of the average degree of fineness required. Perry v. Smith, 22 Vt. 301, 309.

HALF BROTHER OR SISTER.

Half-brothers and half-sisters partake of a dual character, being by virtue of their common parent blood half-brothers, and by virtue of the marriage of their several parents half stepbrothers, falling equally within the designation of brother or stepbrother.

In re Weiss' Estate (Pa.) 1 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 209, 210.

HALF BUSHEL.

In the sale of fruit, vegetables, and all other articles sold by weight measure, 1,282 cubic inches shall constitute a half bushel. Pol. Code Idaho 1901, § 616.

HALF PILOTAGE.

Half pilotage is compensation for services which a pilot has put himself in readiness to perform by labor, risk, and cost, and had offered to perform. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 5 Sup. Ct. 826, 832, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. Ed. 158 (citing Southern S. S. Co. of New Orleans v. Port Wardens, 73 U. S. [6 Wall.] 31, 18 L. Ed. 749).

HALF-SISTER.

A half-sister is a woman who has the same father or the same mother with another. Wood v. Mitcham, 92 N. Y. 375, 379.

HALF YEAR.

A half year is 182 days. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3257.

HALL.

A. executed a deed to B., conveying to him a lot of land adjoining another lot owned by Mrs. Pope, on which was situated a large building. The deed contained the following reservation: "And the parties of the first part do hereby reserve out of the above-described property a space three feet wide, running from the rear of Pope's Hall, or where the water is taken from the said hall, across the said lot to P. street, for the purpose of carrying off the water and sewage from the said hall, and also nothing shall be built or erected on the said lot to obstruct the light from the said Pope's Hall." Held, that the term "Pope's Hall" included not only the single room used as an audience room, but the entire building. Pope v. Bell, 37 N. J. Eq. (10 Stew.) 495, 500.

HALLUCINATION.

The medicinal definition of "hallucination" adopted by Worcester is: "Morbid error in one or more of the senses; a presumption of objects which do not in fact make any impression upon the external senses; delirium; delusion." Staples v. Wellington, 58 Me. 453, 459.

"The word 'hallucination' is defined, according to lexicographers, as an error; a blunder; a mistake; a fallacy; and, when used in describing the condition of a person, does not necessarily carry an imputation of insanity." Foster's Ex'rs v. Dickerson, 24 Atl. 253, 257, 64 Vt. 233.

"Hallucination" is defined to be a morbid error in one or more sense. It is not per se insanity, and a party claiming to avoid a contract by reason of temporary hallucination or delusion must show its existence at the time of the contract sought to be avoided, and that it was of a character affecting his capacity to make the contract. McNett v. Cooper (U. S.) 13 Fed. 586, 590.

Hallucinations are errors of eyesight, hearing, and the like, as where the patient imagines that he sees an object when there is none, or hears a voice when no sound strikes his ear. People v. Krist, 90 N. E. 1057, 1060, 168 N. Y. 19.

HAMLET.

"Hamlet" and "vill" are in common acceptance used as synonymous terms; and, where an order is made concerning the overseers of the poor of a hamlet, where such order should be strictly made concerning a vill, the hamlet will be presumed to be a vill, to support the order. Rex v. Morris, 4 Term R. 550, 552.

HAMMER.

"A hammer is a tool or instrument ordinarily used by one man in the performance of manual labor. It may be made an essential part of machinery, when intended to be and is operated by means thereof; but, when disconnected from any other mechanical appliances, and operated singly by muscular strength directly applied, such tool or instrument is not machinery in its most comprehensive signification, or in the meaning of Code 1886, § 2590, subd. 1, providing that an employer is liable for injuries to an employé when the injury is caused by any defect in the machinery used in the business of the master or employer." Georgia Pac. Ry. Co. v. Brooks, 4 South. 289, 291, 84 Ala. 138; Georgia R. & Banking Co. v. Nelms, 83 Ga. 70, 74, 9 S. E. 1049, 20 Am. St. Rep. 308.

HANAPER OFFICE.

In the ordinary or legal court the officina justitiæ is kept, out of which issue all original writs that pass under the great seal. Those writs that related to the subject were originally kept in a hamper, and those that related to the interests of the crown were kept in a little bag. Hence arose the distinction between the hanaper office and the petty bag office. Those offices are at all times open to the subject, who may at any time demand and have, ex debito justitiæ, any writ that he may call for. The denomination "officina justitiæ" was adopted to signify that all justice between man and man proceeded from that source; it being, as it is styled in the books, the shop, mint, or manufactory of justice. Yates v. People (N. Y.) 6 Johns. 337, 363.

HAND.

See "Cash on Hand"; "Die by His Own Hand or Act"; "Die by the Hand of Justice"; "In Hand"; "In Hand Paid"; "In the Hands Of"; "On Hand"; "Under His Hand"; "With Strong Hand"; "Wrought by Hand."

A measure of length equal to four inches, used in measuring the height of horses. A person's signature. In old English law, an oath. Black, Law Dict.

HAND CAR.

Under a statute rendering railroad companies liable for injuries to persons by cars run on their tracks, hand cars are included. Thomas v. Georgia R. & Banking Co., 38 Ga. 222, 224; Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Crocker, 11 South. 262, 264, 95 Ala. 412; Perez v. San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co., 67 S. W. 137, 139, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 255.

HAND LABORERS.

Within the statute giving hand laborers a lien, laborers employed in peeling bark and squaring timber are included. Weed v. Robinson, 14 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 7, 9.

HANDBILL.

The word "handbill," in its usual acceptance in common language, is synonymous with the words "printed circular"; and therefore an indictment for libel, charging in one count that the alleged libelous statements were contained in a printed circular and handbill, is not bad for duplicity, on the ground that a circular is one thing, and a handbill another. People v. McLaughlin, 68 N. Y. Supp. 1108, 1109, 33 Misc. Rep. 691.

HANDKERCHIEF.

"Handkerchiefs," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 349, includes hemstitched handkerchiefs composed of cotton or other vegetable fiber, and embroidered with only an initial letter. United States v. Harden (U. S.) 68 Fed. 182, 183, 15 C. C. A. 358.

The phrase "handkerchiefs or mufflers composed wholly or in part of silk," in Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule A, 30 Stat. 194 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1670], par.

388, fixing a duty thereon, includes mufflers composed of cotton and silk, though the cotton is the component material of chief value. Guiterman v. United States (U. S.) 113 Fed. 994.

HANDLE.

In a finding of a referee in an action against a common carrier for the loss of goods that the freight was handled from the propellers to the warehouse, and from the warehouse to the cars, by one J. M. C., "handled" means only the moving of the goods from the propellers into the warehouse, and from thence into the cars. It does not imply any control over the goods by J. M. C. while in the warehouse, any more than would belong to a machine if one had been used to move the goods. Aetna Ins. Co. v. Wheeler (N. Y.) 5 Lans. 480, 484.

Hauling distinguished.

The words "handling" and "hauling" are not synonymous words. Hauling is a transportation, while handling involves touching, holding, moving, or managing with the hand. And an indictment charging the hauling of liquors is not within Dispensary Act 1896, § 37, prohibiting the handling of liquors. State v. Adams, 27 S. E. 523, 525, 49 S. O. 518.

Transport distinguished.

Within the meaning of the dispensary act of 1895, forbidding the transportation of alcoholic liquors, and providing a penalty for handling and transporting liquors in the nighttime, the terms "transporting" and "handling" are not equivalent words, and do not mean the same thing. "Transporting" means to carry, bear, or convey from one place or country to another, while handling is the act of touching, moving, or managing with the hand. It is clear that there may be a handling of alcoholic liquors, which could not with any appropriateness be described as the transportation thereof. For example, pouring liquor from a blind tiger jug at night might be punished, under section 37, as a handling of contraband liquors in the nighttime, but that could hardly be called a transportation of liquor, however transporting the effect might be. State v. Pickett, 47 S. C. 101, 25 S. E. 46, 47.

As use.

"To handle a commodity" means to buy and sell such commodity; and the power to handle a fund implies the power to use it in making purchases and to sell the thing, etc., for the purpose of changing the investment. So, where a wife's conveyance of her separate property to her husband recited that she appointed him trustee thereof for her children, and that the money was to be used by him in his discretion, and that he agreed to use and handle said money according to his best ability, the husband had power to invest the money in property, and to sell such property and reinvest such money. Scottish-American Mortg. Co. v. Massie, 60 S. W. 544, 545, 94 Tex. 339.

Handling firearms.

The phrase "handling firearms," in an insurance policy exempting the insurer from accidental injuries or death happening while the insured is employed in the manufacture, sale, or transportation of any explosive compound, or handling of firearms, does not apply to the incidental handling of a gun for pleasure or recreation, but only when the employment of the assured calls upon him to handle firearms; and therefore the company is liable for the death of insured, resulting from the accidental discharge of a gun on a pleasure hunting tour. Thomas v. Masons' Fraternal Acc. Ass'n, 71 N. Y. Supp. 692, 693, 64 App. Div. 22.

Whether a person was handling firearms, within the meaning of the qualifying clause of the by-laws of an accident insurance company, depends upon the meaning to be given the word "handling," and, as used in connection with the phrase "in any way," has no different meaning than that to be found in the standard lexicons of the language. "To handle" is defined by the Standard Dictionary as to use the hands upon; to turn, adjust, examine, or feel with the hands; to manage, contrive, or direct with the hands; to use; to ply; to wield; to manipulate, as to handle a musket or oar. By the Century Dictionary (1889) it is defined as "to touch or feel with the hand, or to use the hand or hands upon; to manage by hand; use or wield with manual skill; ply; manipulate; act upon or control by the hand; in general, to manage, direct, control." By Webster's Dictionary (1894) it is defined as "to touch; to manage in using, as a spade or a musket; to wield; often to manage skillfully." From the foregoing definitions, it will be seen that, while the word may be synonymous with such words as "ply," "wield," and "manipulate," none of such words, nor all of them, are its verbal equivalent. It is a more comprehensive term, and includes not only the act of plying, wielding, and manipulating, but touching, using the hands upon, acting upon or controlling by the hands, and other acts. Had the parties used the equivalent of the word, as shown by the foregoing definitions, instead of the word itself, there could be no question that the act in which the plaintiff was engaged at the time of the injury was within the meaning of the qualifying clause of the by-laws. We are unable to see how the legal effect of the language is in any manner changed by the use of a word which comprehends all such acts. Doody v. National Masonic Acc. Ass'n (Neb.) 92 N. W. 613, 614.

HANDSOME.

"Handsome gratuity," as used in a will, is void for uncertainty. Jubber v. Jubber, 9 Sim. 503, 508.

Defendant had a house opposite to plaintiff's house, and, being desirous to let it, told plaintiff that if he would open the windows, and take care of the house and air it, and show it to persons applying to take it, he would make the plaintiff a handsome present, and subsequently gave him £2. In an action to recover as on a contract, Mansfield, C. J., directed the jury that "this was no evidence of any contract, but that it must be inferred that the plaintiff, in undertaking the employment, intended to trust entirely to the generosity of the defendant, and must therefore be content with what the defendant had chosen to give him." The jury, however, thought otherwise, and returned a verdict for plaintiff for £17 15s. damages. On a motion for new trial, Heath and Chambers, JJ., were of opinion that there was sufficient evidence of a contract to do the work and labor for a reasonable compensation, the amount of which the jury, whose province it was, had determined. Jewry v. Busk, 5 Taunt. 302.

HANDWRITING.

"Handwriting" is the cast or form of writing peculiar to each hand or person. In re Hyland's Will, 27 N. Y. Supp. 961, 963.

The term "handwriting" includes generally whatever a party has written with his hand, and not merely his common and usual style of chirography. Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295, 301, 52 Am. Dec. 711.

HAPPEN.

The word "happen" is defined by the words "to come by chance; to fall out, to befall, to come unexpectedly." Sager v. Portsmouth, S. & P. & E. R. Co., 31 Me. 228, 239, 1 Am. Rep. 659.

The phrase "if it shall so happen," when used in a will conveying real estate, will be construed as being a covenant, rather than a condition, if such a construction can be reasonably given to such language. Hartung v. Witte, 18 N. W. 175, 177, 59 Wis. 285.

Casualty implied.

"Happen," as used in Const. art. 7, § 9, providing that, when a vacancy shall "happen" in the office of judge of the supreme or circuit court, such vacancy shall be filled by appointment by the Governor, "has reference to some casualty not provided for by law, which could not be remedied by the usual means of an election. The primary principle established by the Constitution is that judges shall be elected, and the power of temporary appointment seems only to have been conferred from necessity, to cure certain defects which are inseparable from the system adopted." State v. Messmore, 14 Wis. 177, 193.

In the clause of the Constitution, providing that the Governor shall have power to fill up vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Legislature, "happen" does not necessarily imply a casualty, and hence it is not necessary that such vacancy should have occurred since the last session of the Legislature. "That the word 'happen' does not necessarily imply this idea is clear from the dictionary of Crabb, the most accurate philologist of our language: 'To happen, chance.' To happen, that is, to fall out by a hap, is to chance. 'Happen,' respects all events, without including any collateral idea; 'chance' comprehends likewise the idea of the cause, and order of events: whatever comes to pass happens, whether regularly in the course of things, or particularly and out of the order; whatever chances, happens altogether without concert, intention, and often without relation to any other thing. Accidents happen daily which no human foresight could prevent. The newspapers contain an account of all that happened in the course of a day or week. Listeners and busybodies are ready to catch every word that falls in their hearing. See Crabb's Synonyms. The inference is that, whenever or from whatever cause a vacancy exists, it is the duty and power of the executor to fill it. It is enough that the vacancy exists, to confer this power and right to appoint during recess." Bry v. Woodrooff, 13 La. 556, 558.

As happen to exist.

"Happen" as used in Const. § 5, par. 12, providing that, when a vacancy happens during the recess of the Legislature, it is to be filled by the Governor by appointment, does not mean "happen to take place," that is "originate," but means "happen to exist." State v. Kuhl, 17 Atl. 102, 103, 51 N. J. Law (22 Vroom) 191.

Const. U. S. art. 2, § 2, declaring that the President shall have the power to fill all "vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate," means vacancies that may happen to exist during the recess of the Senate. In re Farrow (U. S.) 3 Fed. 112, 113.

The word "happen" may have many significations or meanings, depending much upon its connection with other words, and the circumstances under which it is used. In the proviso to an act approved July 16, 1864, the expression is, "If such vacancy shall happen during the recess of the Legislature," such successors may be appointed, etc.; the word "such" referring to the vacancy just mentioned, which might exist in consequence of death, resignation, or otherwise; that is, in any way or from any cause whatever. "If any such vacancy shall happen," that is, shall occur, shall chance to exist, shall happen to be, during the recess of the Legislature, etc. The substance of both of these sentences might be expressed in this way, without doing any violence to the language: "If there shall happen to be, during the recess of the Legislature, any vacancy in such office, which may exist in consequence of death, resignation, or in any other way, or for any other cause, such successor may be appointed," etc. Opinion of Justices, 45 N. H. 590, 592.

HAPPINESS.

See "Pursuit of Happiness."

"Happiness," as used in determining the question whether the happiness and welfare of certain children are more liable to be promoted in the custody of the mother or the father, does not mean the pleasure of remaining with the parent they love, as compared with the temporary pain of separation, but means that more permanent enjoyment of life which attends upon, and is almost identical with, welfare. English v. English, 32 N. J. Eq. (5 Stew.) 738, 750.

HARASS.

"The word 'harass,' as defined in the standard dictionaries, is synonymous with 'to vex,' and at least as comprehensive as that term, so that an affidavit for a distress warrant stating that it is not issued to injure or harass defendant is sufficient, under a statute requiring the affidavit to state that the warrant is not issued to vex and harass." Biesenbach v. Key, 63 Tex. 79, 81.

The attachment law (Rev. St. art. 153), providing that the affidavit shall further state that the attachment is not used for the purpose of injuring or harassing the defendant, embodies two distinct requirements in suing out a writ of attachment. It contemplates that the plaintiff shall make affidavit that his purpose is not to injure the defendant, in the sense of inducing a damage, loss, or detriment to him, and also that he shall swear that his purpose is not to harass the defendant in the sense in which that word is properly understood. "Injure" and "injury" are words having numerous and comprehensive popular meanings, as well as having a legal import. The varieties of their signification are not important in this connection, further than as may be required to draw a line between these words and the word "harass," and to exclude the latter from being comprehended within the word "injure" or "injury." The synonyms of "harass" are: To weary, jade, tire, perplex, distress, tease, vex, molest, trouble, disturb. They all have relation to mental annoyance, and a troubling of the spirit. An affidavit that the attachment "is not sued out for the purpose of injuring and harassing the said defendants" is insufficient, since such affidavit might be true, while it was affiant's intention to either injure or harass, but not to do both. Moody v. Levy, 58 Tex. 532, 533.

HARBOR.

In construing a statute making the harboring or concealing of an escaped slave a crime, it was said that the word "harbor" is defined by Worcester: "To entertain; to shelter; to rescue; to receive clandestinely and without lawful authority." By Webster: "To shelter; to rescue; to secrete, as to harbor a thief." Worcester defines the word "conceal": "To hide; to keep secret; to secrete; to cover; to disguise;" and Webster: "To hide; to withdraw from observation; to cover or keep from sight." The words in a statute only apply when the person is harbored or concealed with knowledge that he is an escaped slave. Driskill v. Parrish (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 1100, 1103; Ray v. Donnell (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 325, 326.

The term "harbor a dog," within the meaning of the rule that one who harbors a vicious dog is liable for injuries inflicted by him, cannot be applied to the owner of a farm, who rents a house thereon to one who keeps a vicious dog, but the term can only be applied to the tenant. Simpson v. Griggs, 12 N. Y. Supp. 162, 163, 58 Hun, 393.

"Harboring" means protecting. A defendant does not harbor a stray dog, so as to be liable for injuries inflicted by it, by merely permitting it to live under a building in his coal yard. Fitzgerald v. Brophy, 1 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 142.

Assisting escape.

Act Cong. Feb. 12, 1793, § 4, providing that any person who shall harbor or conceal a fugitive from labor, after notice that the person so harbored or concealed was a fugitive from labor, shall forfeit and pay a certain amount, should be construed to mean assistance to escape and reach speedily some distant place, where the master cannot find or reclaim the fugitive, rather than detaining him long in the neighborhood, or secreting him about one's premises. The general definition of the word "harbor" is, according to 1 Bouvier, 460: "To receive, clandestinely and without lawful authority, a person, for the purpose of concealing him, so that another, having the right to the lawful custody of such person, shall be deprived of the same." "To harbor" means to secrete, and hence one who took fugitive slaves into a covered wagon in the night, and drove with speed 12 or 14 miles, so that one was never retaken, the person so doing was guilty of harboring and concealing such fugitives, for there was a clandestine reception of the slaves, without lawful authority, and a concealment of them in a covered wagon, and carrying them onward and away, so as to deprive their owner of their custody. Jones v. Van Zandt, 46 U. S. (5 How.) 221, 224, 12 L. Ed. 122.

As conceal.

The idea of hiding and harboring a negro, within the meaning of an indictment charging that defendant did conceal, harbor, hide, and employ a negro, is included within the meaning of the word "conceal," and therefore a verdict that defendant concealed a negro is sufficient to show that he did hide and harbor him. Cook v. State, 26 Ga. 593, 603.

In Act Cong. 1793, prohibiting any citizen from harboring or concealing fugitive slaves, etc., "harboring" is not synonymous with "concealing." Harboring, within the meaning of the act, consists in any entertainment or shelter for an unlawful purpose. Receiving and entertaining a person clandestinely and for the purpose of concealment may well be called "harboring," as the word is sometimes used; yet one may harbor without concealing; he may afford the entertainment, lodging, and shelter without the purpose or attempt at concealment; and it may be correctly affirmed of him that he has harbored, within the meaning of the statute. Oliver v. Kauffman, 1 Am. Law Reg. 142, 150.

Under a statute imposing a penalty on every person who shall harbor or conceal any runaway slave or slaves, knowing that they are such, to constitute the act of harboring it is sufficient if defendant, knowing the slave to be a runaway, supported and entertained her, or provided her with a home or place of residence, although she went about in the streets, and was seen by the natives; concealment not being a necessary ingredient of the offense of harboring. McElhanev v. State, 24 Ala. 71, 73.

"Harboring" means a fraudulent concealment, and hence, where slaves ran away, and were found in the possession of defendant, who openly maintained them, and gave notice to plaintiff that he would do so until they were recovered by law, there was no harboring. Dark v. Marsh, 4 N. C. 228, 229.

Rev. St. U. S. § 4601, providing that whoever harbors or secretes any deserted seaman shall be liable to a certain penalty, etc., should be construed to mean the furnishing of shelter, food, or lodging clandestinely or with concealment. The reasonable interpretation of its terms would be to hold that the penalty therein provided is denounced not only against all persons who conceal and secrete deserting seamen, but against all persons who knowingly furnish them food, shelter, or other aid, with intent thereby to encourage them to continue in their violation of law, and to defeat the rights of the master and owners of the vessel. United States v. Grant (U. S.) 55 Fed. 414, 415.

Intent implied.

The term "harbor and secrete," applied to the crime, created by statute, of harboring and secreting slaves, was construed not only to include the act of harboring and secreting the slaves, but also to include the intent to defraud the owner of his property. Eells v. People, 5 Ill. (4 Scam.) 498, 509.

In 1 St. 302, § 4, providing for the punishment of any person who shall harbor or conceal any fugitive from labor, after notice that he or she was a fugitive from labor, the word "harbor" means an act evincing an intention to elude the vigilance of the master or his agents, and must be calculated to attain that object. To relieve the hunger of a fugitive would not be within the statute, unless accompanied by acts showing a determination to disregard the law. Jones v. Vanzandt (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 1040, 1043, 1049; Van Metre v. Mitchell (U. S.) 28 Fed. 1036, 1040.

Act Cong. Feb. 12, 1793, § 4, providing that any person who shall harbor or conceal a fugitive from labor, after notice that he or she is a fugitive, shall incur a certain forfeiture, does not mean affording shelter to the fugitive for an hour, a day, or a week, when there is no design to conceal him from the pursuit of the master or his agent, or in any way to defeat the legal right of the master to his services. The acts done must be with a view to elude the claim of the master, after notice or knowledge that the person is a fugitive from labor. If, from motives of humanity, a person permit fugitives to remain with him for a short time after notice of their real character, without any design thereby to elude the claim of the owner, he does not harbor or conceal them, within the contemplation of the statute. Driskill v. Parrish (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 1100, 1103.

HARBOR (Noun).

See "New York Harbor."

A harbor is defined to be a bay or inlet of the sea, in which ships can moor and be sheltered from the fury of the winds and heavy seas. "Any navigable water where ships can ride in safety." Webst. Dict. So a finding that a harbor extends to a line, inside of which large numbers of vessels seek and find protection from certain storms, is correct. Rowe v. Smith, 51 Conn. 236, 271, 50 Am. Rep. 16.

"Harbor," in its most strict and proper sense, means a safe station for a ship; a place of refuge, shelter, rest. Worcest. Dict. Where a collision took place inside of the bar, and on pilotage ground, it was in a general sense within the harbor of New York; but, being in the lower bay, and not in a part where vessels could either moor or safely lie at anchor, it was not in the harbor in its strict sense. The Aurania and The Republic (U. S.) 29 Fed. 98, 103.

"Harbors," as used in the colonial patents of 1666, 1688, and 1694, granting to the town of Huntington title to all lands south of Long Island Sound, between certain points, including all havens, harbors, etc., includes a body of water lying between projecting necks, and capable of being used as a haven or harbor, though it is not landlocked, and is not a perfectly safe harbor or haven. Board of Trustees of the Town of Huntington v. Lowdnes (U. S.) 40 Fed. 625, 629.

As a boundary.

"Harbor," as used in a grant of land described as bounded by a harbor, will be construed to mean low-water mark of the harbor. Paine v. Woods, 108 Mass. 160, 169.

Any boundary at tide water, by whatever name—whether sea, harbor, or bay—includes the land below the high-water mark, as far as the grantor owns; but a boundary of that land, whether described as shore, beach, or flats, excludes it. City of Boston v. Richardson, 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 146, 155.

A will devising a parcel of land from a larger tract lying on the west side of a harbor, describing such parcel as bounded east on the harbor, at the foot of the bank, should be construed to mean the lands about a bay, as well as the bay itself. Nichols v. Lewis, 15 Conn. 137, 142.

River.

"A harbor, in its usual and ordinary sense, means an indentation in the coast of a lake, sea, or ocean, extending into the country in such a manner as to form an inlet or bay, and sufficiently narrow between the headlands to afford protection to vessels against the wind and storm upon the waters." Gould, Wat. 10; 4 Co. Inst. 140. The word as used in statutes relating to fisheries would not include Grand river at a point three miles upstream from its mouth. People v. Kirsch, 35 N. W. 157, 158, 67 Mich. 539.

As used in Rev. St. c. 82, providing that the pilotage district which includes the harbor of Boston shall extend between certain fixed points, the harbor includes all the ports which use the several channels leading to the city of Boston, and the mouths of the rivers which enter into that harbor; the words "port" and "harbor" being synonymous terms, and clearly including all those ports which use the several channels leading to the city of Boston itself. Martin v. Hilton, 50 Mass. (9 Metc.) 371, 377.

HARBOR FEES.

An ordinance of the city of Washington requiring payment of harbor fees by all vessels, fixed in proportion to the tonnage of such vessels, is in conflict with the provision of the Constitution of the United States that no state shall, without the consent of Congress, levy any duty on tonnage. Such fees, though called "harbor fees," are in fact duties on tonnage. Mayor of Washington v. Barnes, 6 D. C. 230, 231, 234.

HARBOR LINE.

"A harbor line is in fact what it purports to be—the line of a harbor. It marks the boundary of a certain part of the public waters which is reserved for a harbor. The port so reserved is to be protected from encroachment. The rest is to be left to be filled and occupied by the riparian proprietors. Its establishment is equivalent to a legislative declaration that navigation will not be straitened or obstructed by any such filling out." Engs v. Peckham, 11 R. I. 210, 224. See, also, Dawson v. Broome, 53 Atl. 151, 156, 24 R. I. 359.

HARD CIDER.

See "Cider."

HARD-FED HOGS.

The term "hard-fed hogs" is used to designate hogs fed on corn. They are of superior value to other hogs, and thus an assertion that certain hogs are hard or corn fed may constitute a warranty. Bartlett v. Hoppock, 34 N. Y. 118, 119, 88 Am. Dec. 428.

HARD LABOR.

There is a material distinction in the public thought between a sentence to confinement at hard labor, and a sentence to confinement in a designated State Prison, where hard labor would be required of persons sentenced, as a part of the discipline of the prison; and embodying the words "at hard labor" in a sentence which need not be at hard labor gives the stigma an emphasis which the statute does not require, and the sentence should be modified by striking out the words. Gardes v. United States (U. S.) 87 Fed. 172, 184, 30 C. C. A. 596.

A sentence condemning a defendant to hard labor in the penitentiary does not signify that the labor shall be of unusual severity, but means no more than that it is compulsory and continuous during the term of imprisonment. It does not subject the defendant to any other than legal punishment, or to labor of any other kind or degree than must have been endured if the words "hard labor" had been omitted; the penitentiary, under the statutes, being not a mere place for the imprisonment of convicts, but imprisonment in it involving subjection to involuntary or compulsory labor during its continuance. Brown v. State, 74 Ala. 478, 483.

A verdict finding the defendant guilty of manslaughter, and assessing his punishment at 30 months' hard labor, does not necessarily mean hard labor for the county. It may mean hard labor for the state, and be embraced in the punishment usually known as imprisonment in the penitentiary, and does not render the verdict invalid, because the statute provides that, if the period of imprisonment or hard labor is more than 2 years, the sentence must be punishment in the penitentiary. Gunter v. State, 83 Ala. 96, 3 South. 600, 603.

A person was indicted and convicted for permitting three prisoners, respectively charged with arson, counterfeiting, and larceny, to go at large, and was sentenced to five months' imprisonment at hard labor in the county jail, and to pay a fine and costs of prosecution. The act of March 24, 1806, uses the word "hard" in connection with "labor," in reference to the punishment of criminals, but later acts exclude the word. It was held that the use of the word "hard" in connection with labor in the sentence was not a fatal defect, for it should be treated simply as surplusage. Weaver v. Commonwealth, 29 Pa. (5 Casey) 445, 448.

HARD MONEY.

Hard money is a coin of the precious metals, of a certain weight and fineness, with the government's stamp thereon, denoting its value as a medium of exchange or currency. Henry v. Bank of Salina (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 523, 536.

HARDPAN.

Webster defines "hardpan" as a hard stratum of earth, and it is, in a general sense, earth, although more or less compressed and cemented, and is of the same material as earth, namely, clay, gravel, loam, etc.; and it is included in the term "earth," as used in a contract for the excavation of earth at a certain price per yard. Dickinson v. City of Poughkeepsie, 75 N. Y. 65, 76.

"Hardpan" is a name which has long been popularly used among farmers and well diggers to denote a hard, earthy substance, composed of gravel, sand, and clay, very compact, nearly impervious to water, and too hard to be excavated by the spade. Mansfield & S. City R. Co. v. Veeder, 17 Ohio, 385, 389, 397.

"Hardpan" seems to be a term well understood among railroad men. It is not an uncommon word among geologists, and it is sufficiently understood in common speech to designate something different either from common earth or rock, and not to be included in either of them; and it cannot well mean anything else, in a contract for grading, than some intermediate kind of hard material, such as compact, indurated, or cemented earth, sand, gravel, or conglomerate, which could not be dug with a spade or shovel. In short, "hardpan" and "indurated earth or gravel" mean the same thing. Blair v. Corby, 37 Mo. 313, 317.

HARM.

See "Bodily Harm."

HARMLESS.

See "Save Harmless."

HARMONIZE.

The difference between the words "harmonize" and "reconcile" is not sufficiently substantial to render it error for the trial court to instruct the jury that, if they found the evidence apparently conflicting, it is their duty to "harmonize" it. Holdridge v. Lee, 52 N. W. 265, 266, 3 S. D. 134.

HARMONY.

"Harmony," as used in Const. art. 9, § 20, providing that the charter of the city of St. Louis, to be formed by a board of freeholders, should be in harmony with and subject to the Constitution and laws of Missouri, means that no regulation established by the charter, nor any made by its authority, shall do violence either to the declared laws or to the policy or manifest governmental purposes of the state, as shown in her Constitution and statutory enactments. By the word "harmony," in this connection, is not to be understood an exact coincidence in all possible points of comparison. In re Dunn, 9 Mo. App. 255, 260.

HARROW.

A harrow is an implement as important and as generally used by farmers as a plow, and is quite as necessary for the proper cultivation of land as any other agricultural implement, and is in use on every properly cultivated farm. Float spring-tooth harrows have come into general use, and have largely superseded the old-fashioned square and three-cornered harrows or drags, having peg teeth; and I think it needs no argument to show that the combination formed for the purpose of controlling the prices, limiting the production, preventing competition from manufacturers, and also preventing further improvement in them, is contrary to public policy, as declared by the statutes of this state, and by the long line of decisions in this and in other jurisdictions. National Harrow Co. v. El. Bement & Sons, 21 App. Div. 290, 296, 47 N. Y. Supp. 462, 467.

HARRY.

An act of the Legislature was passed, attainting certain persons of treason—among them, Henry Gordon. It appeared that he had been baptized and had always been called and known by the name of Harry. Harry Gordon failed to appear in compliance with the proclamation, and the Legislature then passed a law entitled "An act for the attainder of Harry Gordon." Held, that the names Harry and Henry were not the same names; the court saying: "The use of names is to describe the individual so as to distinguish him from some other person, and therefore, where two names have the same original derivation, or where one is an abbreviation or corruption of the other, but both are taken, promiscuously and according to common use, to be the same, though differing in sound, the use of one for the other is not a material misnomer; but if the name be wholly mistaken—if it be repugnant to truth—the misnomer is fatal." Gordon v. Holliday (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 798, 799 (citing Rex v. Roberts, 2 Strange, 1214).

HARVEST.

The word designates the time when crops of grain and grass are gathered, and does not apply to second crops cut out of the harvest season. Wendall v. Osborne, 18 N. W. 709, 710, 63 Iowa, 99.

HARVESTING.

A policy of fire insurance was issued on a harvesting machine against loss by fire while operating in grain fields, and "in transit from place to place in connection with harvesting"; and the machine was moved the day after the policy was issued from the place where it had been stored since the previous harvesting season to a blacksmith shop, to be repaired, in order to fill contracts for cutting and threshing grain, and while near such shop, eight days after being taken there, and about the day the harvesting season commenced, was burned. Held, that it was not "in transit from place to place in connection with harvesting" at the time it was destroyed. Mawhinerey v. Southern Ins. Co., 32 Pac. 945, 946, 98 Cal. 184, 20 L. R. A. 87.

HAS BEEN.

See "Have Been."

HAT BRAIDS.

"Hat braids," as used in Revenue Acts U. S. 1861-62, means those cotton braids which are used exclusively for enamelling hats and bonnets. Arthur v. Zimmerman, 96 U. S. 124, 125, 24 L. Ed. 770.

HAT TRIMMINGS.

Ribbons made of silk, or of which silk is a contained material of chief value, and commonly and principally used in trimming hats, are hat trimmings, within the meaning of the tariff act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. 488), placing a duty thereon. Cadwalaider v. Wanamaker, 13 Sup. Ct. 979, 980, 149 U. S. 532, 37 L. Ed. 837.

HATH.

See "Have."

HAULING.

The words "handling" and "hauling" are not synonymous words. Hauling is a transportation, while handling involves touching, holding, moving, or managing with the hand; and an indictment charging the hauling of liquors is not within Dispensary Act 1896, § 37, prohibiting the handling of liquors. State v. Adams, 27 S. E. 523, 525, 49 S. C. 518.

The expression "take and haul away," in an indictment charging that the defendant did feloniously steal, take, and haul away certain personal property, was equivalent to "take and carry away," and sufficient to meet the requirements of Code, § 1934, providing that whoever shall feloniously steal, take, and carry away personal goods of another shall be guilty of larceny. Spittorff v. State, 8 N. E. 911, 912, 108 Ind. 171.

HAVANA.

The term "Havana," in a marine policy insuring a vessel and cargo to Havana, was construed to mean the inner harbor, and not the outer harbor or quarantine ground; the latter not being a safe anchorage. Dickey v. United Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 11 Johns. 358, 363.

HAVE.

See "May Have."

All I have, see "All."

An entry that it is "adjudged by the court that the plaintiff in this action have judgment" is equivalent to "hereby have judgment," or "recover judgment," as found in the same connection in ordinary entries of judgment, and is a judgment, and not an order for judgment. Potter v. Eaton, 26 Wis. 382, 383.

A will providing that, on the death of either of "my said daughters, I bequeath to such child or children as my said daughters so dying shall have or leave," etc., the remainder in the lands in which the daughters were given a life estate should be construed to mean that, on the death of each of his daughters, the remainder should go to the children she might have or leave living, and their heirs and assigns; that is to say, to the living children, and to the heirs or assigns of those who might have died, as tenants in common. The clause, therefore, should read (as applied to the singular number), "to such child as my daughter so dying shall have or leave living at her decease, and to the heirs and assigns of such child." Griswold v. Onondaga County Sav. Bank, 93 N. Y. 301, 305.

A devise of certain lots to a granddaughter, "to have and to hold to her, my said granddaughter, her heirs and assigns, forever," vests in the granddaughter a fee simple. Lloyd v. Mitchell, 18 Atl. 599, 136 Pa. 205.

A deed conveying certain property, "to have and to hold said interest and estate of the said D. unto the said M. and his assigns forever," clearly indicates an intention to transfer all the grantor's interest in the property. Hayward v. Ormsbee, 11 Wis. 3, 8.

Continuance or permanency implied.

In a fire policy providing that it should be void if insured should have certain enumerated combustible articles on the premises, the use of "have" was intended only to prevent the permanent and habitual storage of the prohibited articles; and taking them on the premises to clean machinery was not embraced within the meaning of the words, and did not constitute a breach of the condition of the policy. American Cent. Ins. Co. v. Green, 41 S. W. 74, 77, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 531; Krug v. German Fire Ins. Co., 23 Atl. 572, 573, 147 Pa. 272, 30 Am. St. Rep. 729 (citing Mears v. Humboldt Ins. Co., 92 Pa. 15, 37 Am. Rep. 647; Fraim v. National Fire Ins. Co., 32 Atl. 613, 170 Pa. 151, 50 Am. St. Rep. 753; Hall v. Insurance Co. of North America, 58 N. Y. 292, 17 Am. Rep. 255).

The use of the words "hath absconded," in an affidavit for attachment against an absconding debtor, though in the past tense, is a sufficient compliance with a statute requiring the creditor in such case to make complaint on oath that the debtor hath removed or is removing out of the state, or so absconds. If the debtor hath absconded, it may be assumed that he still absconds. Wallis v. Wallace, 7 Miss. (6 How.) 254, 255.

Ownership implied.

A will giving property to a wife, to have during her widowhood, implies custody and right to use. Gee v. Hasbrouck, 87 N. W. 621, 622, 128 Mich. 509.

In Pub. St. c. 184, § 7, providing that the husband shall be entitled to administration of the personal estate of his wife in case of her intestacy, and shall not be compelled to distribute the same among the next of kin, but shall have and retain the surplus thereof, after payment of her debts, for his own use, "have" is of broader significance than "retain," and implies an intention to cover his right to such property in case of administration by another. Kenyon v. Saunders, 30 Atl. 470, 471, 18 R. I. 590, 26 L. R. A. 232.

In construing a will made by an illiterate testator, which stated that a certain beneficiary should have testator's personal property, and another beneficiary should have his real estate, it was held that the latter clause operated to pass the absolute interest to testator, as it was the appropriate meaning of the testator, who did not know that a difference of expression was necessary when applied to real or personal estate. Guthrie's Lessee v. Guthrie (Va.) 1 Call, 7, 13.

The word "have," in a contract in which one party agrees to sell a negro for a certain sum, and which provides that, if such money is not repaid at a certain time, the negro should be returned, but in the meantime that the lender is entitled to have the negro as security, means have the property, and not the possession, in the negro, if there is no change of possession contemplated by the parties. Chapman v. Turner (Va.) 1 Call, 280, 294, 1 Am. Dec. 514.

Where the indictment charged that defendant falsely pretended to H. B., with intent to defraud, that he had one small black mare mule, an instruction "that the word 'had,' as used in the indictment, means more than to assert the mere possession of the mule, but meant to assert the ownership of the mule," was correct. The indictment meant that defendant falsely pretended that he had the mule as owner. Franklin v. State, 52 Ala. 414.

The word "having," in the original statute of wills, authorizing all persons having real estate to dispose thereof by will, was said to import two things—ownership and time of ownership. George v. Green, 13 N. H. 521, 524.

Future time imported.

A will reciting, "creating St. Mary's and creating St. Olave's, I make liable to all debts I have contracted," must be construed to mean "shall contract." Bridgman v. Dove, 3 Atk. 201.

The word "has," in Rev. St. c. 38, § 59, imposing a fine on any person who during the holding of a camp meeting sells or hawks any goods, merchandise, or gives or sells any liquor, without the consent of the parties in charge of such meeting, within one mile thereof, provided that whosoever has his regular place of business within such limits is not required to suspend his business, is to be construed to mean "may have"; and the statute only operates to preclude persons having an established business before the camp meeting commenced from being prohibited from conducting such business during the meeting. The statute is not void as in restraint of trade or creating monopoly. Meyers v. Baker, 12 N. E. 79, 80, 120 Ill. 567, 60 Am. Rep. 580.

A guaranty reciting that, in consideration of parties "having this day advanced a certain sum of money," the grantor thereby undertook to pay the same on default, etc., may mean "in consideration that you have this day advanced," or "in consideration that you shall have this day advanced." Goldshede v. Swan, 1 Exch. 154, 161.

The word "having," in the original statute of wills, authorizing all persons having real estate to dispose thereof by will, was said to import two things—ownership and time of ownership. The rule that the will does not pass land acquired after its execution was thought by Lord Coke to depend upon the use of the word "having" in the statute of wills; but Lord Mansfield says that the same rule held before the statute, when lands were devisable by custom. George v. Green, 13 N. H. 521, 524.

Act March 10, 1873, § 1, providing that when any person has peaceable possession of land under a deed, without notice of any defects invalidating the same, he shall not be ejected therefrom until he is compensated for improvements made by him, refers to the time of making the improvements, and not to the time of the passage of the act; and hence a person who has taken peaceable possession of the land after the passage of the act is entitled to compensation for improvements made thereafter, before he can be ejected therefrom. Wilson v. Red Wing School Dist., 22 Minn. 488, 491.

Present time imported.

Where defendant wrote to another that he might say to "every man you have in your employ" that defendant would pay them, such phrase meant men at that time employed by the one addressed, and had no reference to persons not then employed. McDonald v. Bewick, 5 N. W. 425, 426, 43 Mich. 438.

The words "we have purchased," as used in a transaction in open stock board, do not necessarily import a present transfer of the property to the purchaser, if it appears that the intention of the parties was otherwise. Frazier v. Simmons, 2 N. E. 112, 114, 139 Mass. 531.

Past time imported.

The expression, "we have settled" certain business, is not only grammatically, but according to the usual form of speech, the declaration of an anterior event. Cook v. Swan, 5 Conn. 140, 147.

"Hath," as used in St. 14 Geo. III, providing that no insurance should be made on the life or lives, wherein the assured should have no interest, or by way of gaining or wagering, and that, in all cases wherein the assured "hath" interest in such life, no greater sum should be recovered than the amount or value of such interest, must be construed as necessarily referring to the time of effecting the insurance, and not to the time of the death. Scott v. Dickson, 108 Pa. 6, 13, 56 Am. Rep. 192 (citing Dalby v. Life Ins. Co., 15 C. B. 365).

HAVE BEEN.

An allegation that plaintiff "has been" in all things free from negligence cannot be construed as alleging freedom from negligence at the particular time of the injury, and hence the complaint is demurrable. Richmond Gas Co. v. Baker (Ind.) 39 N. E. 552, 553.

A will making a bequest for the founding of a home for aged, respectable, indigent women who "have been residents of the city of New London," etc., should not be construed to mean only those who had been so at the time the will took effect by the death of the testator, but also to include those who, when the selection should be made under the will, had then been such residents. Colt v. Comstock, 51 Conn. 352, 382, 50 Am. Rep. 29.

The expression "if any person has been found guilty," as used in Rev. Laws, p. 369, §

5, providing that, if any person has been found guilty of conveying away a slave, he shall be liable for the value of the same to the owner, to be recovered in an action of debt or on the case, is equivalent to "if any person shall be found guilty." Boice v. Gibbons, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 324, 327.

Under the act of 1705 relating to hogs, the phrase "have been running at large" cannot be regarded as tantamount to an averment that they were suffered to run at large. They may have been running at large when found by the seizer, without any default of the owner, and, if so, they were not subject to forfeiture. Shaw v. Commonwealth, 72 Pa. (22 P. F. Smith) 68, 70.

The words "have been," as used in a grant providing that when certain sections "have been sold or otherwise disposed of," etc., indicate an act completed at the time the grant was made. Heydenfeldt v. Daney Gold & Silver Min. Co., 10 Nev. 290, 295.

HAVE SOLD.

A contract, which is not sufficient to constitute a deed, in which one of the contracting parties states that "I have sold" certain real estate to the other party to the contract, will be construed to mean "have agreed and contracted to sell." Atwood v. Cobb, 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 227, 230, 26 Am. Dec. 657.

HAVING.

In a warrant committing a person for having been guilty of a contempt, the word "having" was a sufficient averment that the parties had been guilty of contempt. Case of the Sheriff of Middlesex, 11 Adol. & E. 273.

The word "having," in a devise to testator's daughter, which provides that, if the daughter dies without having heirs, then the property should pass to another, is a participle of the present time, and may therefore be considered as being used by the testator as embracing the present time; that is, at the time of the daughter's death, if she should die without having heirs. And taking the word in such sense, it means not only the birth of issue, but that such issue should be in esse at the time of her death. The word "having" is sometimes used as past time, and it has the same meaning as the perfect past participle of the verb "to have," to wit, "having had." Bryson v. Davidson's Ex'r, 5 N. C. 143, 144.

A guaranty stating that, "in consideration of having indorsed," etc., "we hold ourselves accountable, will not be construed to mean that the indorsement was a past act, but to mean that they were indorsed at the request of the guarantors, and hence the consideration for the instrument is not a past consideration, insufficient to sustain the guaranty. Bulkley v. Langdon, 2 Conn. 404, 408.

Where a declaration speaks of the consideration of an agreement as the plaintiff "agreeing to stay" a "certain action," the words necessarily implied a continuing agreement till the action was stayed, and the words of the agreement referred to, "having agreed," necessarily imply the same, so that there was no variance. Tanner v. Moore, 9 Q. B. 1, 6.

HAVING NO INTENTION.

Under a statute declaring that the charges which a creditor is allowed to allege against a debtor who gives notice of his intention to take the poor debtor's oath will be considered in the nature of a suit at law, and allowing the creditor to charge his debtor with having contracted the debt with an intention not to pay the same, it is held that a charge that he contracted the debt, "having no intention" to pay the same, and no expectation that it would be paid, was not a charge under the statute; not intending or having no intention to do a certain act being substantially different from intending or having an intention not to do it. Chamberlain v. Hoogs, 67 Mass. (1 Gray) 172, 174.

HAVEN.

"Haven" is defined by Lord Hale to be "a place for the receipt and safe riding of ships, so situated and secured by land circumjacent that the vessels thereby ride and anchor safely, and are fully protected by the adjacent lands from danger of violent winds." De Longuemere v. New York Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 120, 125, note; United States v. Morel (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1310, 1311.

"Havens," as used in the colonial patents of 1666, 1688, and 1694, granting to the town of Huntington title to all lands south of Long Island Sound, between certain points, including all havens, harbors, etc., includes a body of water lying between projecting necks, and capable of being used as a haven or harbor, though it is not landlocked, and is not a perfectly safe harbor or haven. Board of Trustees of Town of Huntington v. Lowndes (U. S.) 40 Fed. 625, 629; Lowndes v. Board of Trustees, 14 Sup. Ct. 758, 762, 153 U. S. 1, 38 L. Ed. 615.

The term "ports and havens," within the rule that all ports and havens are within the body of the counties of the realms, includes not merely port and haven towns, but all the tide waters included within the harbors and franchises. De Lovio v. Boit (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 418, 429.

The term "rivers, haven, creek, basin, bay, or arm of the sea," in Rev. St. § 5346, providing that an assault committed with a dangerous weapon, or with intent to perpetrate a felony, on board of any vessel belonging in whole or in part to the United States, while in any arm of the sea, or in any river, haven, creek, basin, or bay within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, is limited to the high seas and other waters connected immediately with them, and does not include the rivers connecting the Great Lakes. Ex parte Byers (U. S.) 32 Fed. 404, 405.

HAWKER.

See, also, "Peddler."

The term "hawkers" is defined in Jacob's Law Dictionary as "those deceitful fellows who went from place to place, buying and selling brass, pewter, and other merchandise which ought to be uttered in open market; and the appellation seems to grow from their uncertain wanderings, like persons that with hawks seize their game wherever they can find it." Morrill v. State, 38 Wis. 428, 437, 20 Am. Rep. 12; City of Greensboro v. Williams, 32 S. E. 492, 493, 124 N. C. 167; Wrought Iron Range Co. v. Carver, 183 N. C. 334, 24 S. E. 352, 353; Fisher v. Patterson, 13 Pa. (1 Harris) 335, 336; Grafty v. City of Rushville, 107 Ind. 502, 506, 8 N. E. 609, 57 Am. Rep. 128; City of South Bend v. Martin, 142 Ind. 31, 40, 41 N. E. 315, 29 L. R. A. 531; Levy v. State, 68 N. E. 172, 175, 161 Ind. 251; State v. Montgomery, 92 Me. 433, 437, 439, 43 Atl. 13, 15.

The leading, primary idea of the hawker and peddler is that of an itinerant or traveling trader who carries goods about in order to sell them, and who actually sells them to purchasers, in contradistinction to a trader who has goods for sale, and sells them in a fixed place of business. Commonwealth v. Ober, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 493, 495; State v. Wells (N. H.) 45 Atl. 143, 144, 48 L. R. A. 99; Hewson v. Inhabitants of Township of Englewood (N. J.) 27 Atl. 904, 905, 21 L. R. A. 736; Martin v. Town of Rosedale (Ind.) 29 N. E. 410, 411; Emmons v. City of Lewistown (Ill.) 24 N. E. 58, 59, 8 L. R. A. 328, 22 Am. St. Rep. 540.

A hawker is a trader who goes from place to place, or along the streets of a town, selling the goods which he carries with him, although it is generally understood from the word that a hawker also seeks for purchasers, either by outcry, as the derivation of the word would seem to indicate, or by attracting notice and attention to them as goods for sale by actual exposure or exhibition of them by placards or labels, or by some conventional signal or noise. Clements v. Town of Casper, 35 Pac. 472, 474, 4 Wyo. 494; Graffty v. City of Rushville, 8 N. E. 609, 611, 107 Ind. 502, 57 Am. Rep. 128.

One who in his own person goes from house to house with his goods, and offers them for sale, is a hawker, within Code, § 1735, requiring a hawker and peddler to take out a license. Temple v. Sumner, 51 Miss. 13, 15, 24 Am. Rep. 615.

The term in the act of April 16, 1840, making it criminal for any person to be found hawking without a license, includes the selling of groceries from a canal boat. Fisher v. Patterson, 13 Pa. (1 Harris) 335, 336.

Whoever, except itinerant venders, commercial travelers, selling agents, or dealers in the usual course of business, and persons selling by sample for future delivery, goes from town to town, or from place to place in the same town, carrying for sale or exposing for sale goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be deemed a hawker or peddler, within the meaning of the chapter relating to itinerant merchants, hawkers, and peddlers. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 598, c. 565, § 13.

Buying or exchanging goods.

A hawker primarily means one who sells, and one who buys produce from licensed hucksters in a certain county, to sell again at retail in another, is not a hawker in the former, within the terms of the statute relating to hawking. Lebanon County v. Kline, 2 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 621, 622.

A hawker, within Act March 27, 1848, forbidding any person from selling goods as a hawker, is one who goes about with goods, making sales; and it is not a violation of the act to travel from farm to farm, exchanging the goods of a merchant for farm produce, but taking orders for goods while traveling through the country, and afterwards delivering the goods and taking pay, is a violation of the statute. Commonwealth v. Edson, 2 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 377, 379.

Canvasser of books.

Canvassers of books or publications on the street, or from house to house, taking orders for future delivery, are not hawkers, within the meaning of the statute authorizing villages to license, regulate, etc., hawkers and peddlers. Emmons v. City of Lewistown, 24 N. E. 58, 59, 132 Ill. 380.

Local merchant.

"Hawker," as used in Act 1893, requiring hawkers and peddlers of goods to pay a license fee, means an itinerant trader, who carries goods through the streets from town to town and from place to place, but does not apply to local merchants who carry a stock, and at their store take orders for sewing machines, and deliver them in the country through their agents, and, while in the country, filling orders, occasionally sell from the delivery wagon a new machine, or an old one taken in trade. Alexander v. Greenville County, 27 S. E. 469, 49 S. C. 527.

"Hawker," as used in a city ordinance requiring hawkers, peddlers, and itinerant venders of merchandise to obtain a license, cannot be construed to include one driving a grocer's wagon to the grocer's customers, taking their orders, and afterwards delivering the goods ordered; he not selling or delivering goods in any other way. Hewson v. Inhabitants of Township of Englewood, 27 Atl. 904, 55 N. J. Law (26 Vroom) 522, 21 L. R. A. 736.

Peddler synonymous.

"Hawker," as formerly defined, was an itinerant trader, who, like a peddler, carried his goods with him for sale, but also attracted attention by public outcry or placard or exposure. Now, however, the terms "peddler" and "hawker" are considered equivalent and synonymous, and are so used in an ordinance licensing the vocation of hawker or peddler. Kennedy v. People, 49 Pac. 373, 375, 9 Colo. App. 490. See, also, Emmons v. City of Lewistown, 24 N. E. 58, 59, 132 Ill. 380, 8 L. R. A. 328, 22 Am. St. Rep. 540.

The words "hawkers" and "peddlers" are used synonymously and interchangeably in Acts 1895, c. 4322, § 9, subd. 11, requiring hawkers and peddlers to pay a certain license; and the terms include such persons as are ordinarily and popularly understood to be such; the clause defining a peddler to be an unlicensed traveling peddler, who shall bargain and sell, etc., not being intended to limit, define, or restrict the meaning of the words "hawkers" and "peddlers," but only to class as peddlers certain dealers not included within the popular and ordinary meaning of those words. Chief Justice Shaw in the case of Commonwealth v. Ober, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 493, says that "the leading, primary idea of a hawker and peddler is that of an itinerant or traveling trader, who carries goods about in order to sell them, and who actually sells them to purchasers, in contradistinction to a trader who has goods for sale, and sells them in a fixed place of business. Superadded to this, though perhaps not essential, by a hawker is generally understood one who not only carries goods for sale, but seeks for purchasers either by outcry, which some lexicographers conceive as intimated by the derivation of the word, or by attracting notice and attention to them as goods for sale by actual exhibition or exposure of them by placards or labels, or by conventional signals, like the sound of a horn for the sale of fish." It is there admitted, however, that the distinction drawn is not essential, and all of the standard dictionaries to which we have access give one definition of the word "peddler" as a hawker, and vice versa. So, in many definitions of the term by the courts and text writers, the words are regarded as synonymous, when undefined by statute. Hall v. State, 23 South. 119, 121, 39 Fla. 637 (citing Bish. St. Crimes, § 1074; Fisher v. Patterson, 13 Pa. [1 Harris] 336; City of South Bend v. Martin, 142 Ind. 31, 41 N. E. 315, 29 L. R. A. 531; Emert v. State of Missouri, 15 Sup. Ct. 367, 156 U. S. 296, 39 L. Ed. 430).

The words "peddler" and "hawker" have a settled meaning, independently of statutory definition. The former is an itinerant trader—a person who sells small wares, which he carries with him in traveling about from place to place—while the latter is also a trader who goes from place to place, or along the streets of a town, selling the goods which he carries with him, although it is generally understood from the word that a hawker seeks for purchasers either by outcry, as the derivation of the word would seem to indicate, or by attracting notice and attention to the goods as being for sale, by actual exposure or exhibition of them, by cards or labels, or by conventional signals or signs. Clements v. Town of Casper, 4 Wyo. 494, 500, 35 Pac. 472.

Picture agent.

An agent, in delivering portraits which his principal manufactured under contracts requiring their delivery in frames, sold the frames to the portrait buyers; the option to purchase being given them by the contracts. He did not sell them to others than portrait buyers, or go anywhere to sell them except where he had to deliver portraits. Held, that he was not within Act 1893, requiring hawkers and peddlers of goods to pay a license fee. State v. Coop, 30 S. E. 609, 52 S. C. 508, 41 L. R. A. 501.

Hawking is the offering of goods for sale in the streets by outcry, and includes the soliciting of orders for pictures and frames. City of South Bend v. Martin, 41 N. E. 315, 317, 142 Ind. 31, 29 L. R. A. 531.

Sewing machine agent.

"A hawker is an itinerant trader who goes from place to place and from house to house, carrying for sale and exposing to sale the goods, wares, and merchandise which he carries. He generally deals in small and cheap articles, such as he can conveniently carry in a cart or on his person." The term does not include a sewing machine agent who goes from place to place, exhibiting a sample machine, and soliciting orders to be filled by the company, and delivering on conditional contracts of sale the machines sent him on such order, though occasionally he fills an order by immediate delivery of the sample, and though once he makes an absolute sale. Commonwealth v. Farnum, 114 Mass. 267, 270.

The term "hawker" includes a sewing machine agent who solicits orders, and at the same time offers for sale, and sells and delivers, the sample machine which he carries with him. Emert v. State of Missouri, 15 Sup. Ct. 367, 369, 156 U. S. 296, 39 L. Ed. 430.

Single shipment.

A hawker and peddler is one who travels from town to town, or from plantation to plantation, carrying to sell, or exposing to sale, goods, wares, and merchandise. A single shipment of goods regularly consigned to a certain firm by the owner, and sold by the latter or by the firm for the use and benefit of the former, is not hawking and peddling, within the meaning of a statute licensing hawkers and peddlers. State v. Belcher (S. C.) 1 McMul. 40, 41.

Solicitor of orders for goods.

The term "hawker," as used in Laws 1897, c. 76, § 1, providing that no person shall do any business as a hawker without a license, cannot be construed to include a person who solicited orders for his employers—a firm having a permanent place of business in the state—and subsequently delivered the goods thus ordered; he making no sales on his own account, and carrying no goods about with him for sale. State v. Wells, 45 Atl. 144, 69 N. H. 197, 48 L. R. A. 99. It does not include one who goes about the village, carrying samples, and taking orders for a nonresident firm. Village of Cerro Gordo v. Rawlings, 25 N. E. 1006, 135 Ill. 36; Clements v. Town of Casper, 35 Pac. 472, 474, 4 Wyo. 494; Martin v. Town of Rosedale, 29 N. E. 410, 411, 130 Ind. 109. It includes one going from house to house, offering goods for sale at retail to individuals not dealers in such commodities, whether the goods be carried along for delivery personally, or whether the sales are made for future delivery. Graffy v. City of Rushville, 8 N. E. 609, 611, 107 Ind. 502, 57 Am. Rep. 128.

The term "peddler or hawker," in a village ordinance requiring the licensing of peddlers or hawkers, does not include a nonresident merchant tailor exhibiting samples of cloth, and taking orders for suits of clothing to be made and delivered afterward. Radebaugh v. Plain City, 11 Ohio Dec. 612, 613.

Leasing goods with option to purchase.

Within the meaning of a statute requiring hawkers and peddlers to produce proof of good moral character and pay a license fee, one who went about renting clocks for the term of 13 months, at the rent of 25 cents per week, or $13 for the term—the lease providing that the lessee at any time during the term could purchase the clock for the price of $13, and be allowed all rents as a credit on such purchase—is a hawker. Such lease was merely a subterfuge, the real transaction being a sale. Commonwealth v. Harmel, 166 Pa. 89, 94, 30 Atl. 1036, 1037, 27 L. R. A. 388.

HAY.

"Hay" is a generic term, and covers all kinds of hay, so that an interstate commerce rate for hay prevents a contract at a different rate for the transportation of old hay; the single term "hay" including every variety of the article, without regard to its age. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Bowles, 40 S. W. 899, 901, 1 Ind. T. 250.

"Hay" is defined to be grass cut and dried for fodder; grass prepared for preservation. Citing Webster. Hence wild prairie grass is not hay until cut and raked, which involve labor, and in such sense is a product of labor, within the lien law. Emerson v. Hedrick, 42 Ark. 263, 265.

In Reg. v. Good, 17 Ont. 725, it is said that the word "hay" does not import whether it was hay from natural grass, or from grass sown and cultivated. The census shows that six out of every seven tons of hay cut in the state are cultivated grass, only one-seventh being natural grass. Hay is not cultivated like cotton, any more than wheat is cultivated in the sense that corn is; but the court could not therefore lay down the proposition that either wheat or hay is not a cultivated crop, it appearing that the great bulk of hay is in fact cultivated. State v. Crook, 44 S. E. 32, 33, 132 N. C. 1053.

Grass synonymous.

"Hay" means grass that has been cut and dried for fodder, but, where a complaint speaks of hay as growing on land, the complaint will not be held insufficient, as not alleging the destruction of the grass. Baumgartner v. Sturgeon River Boom Co., 79 N. W. 566, 567, 120 Mich. 321.

The term "hay" means the flora of a meadow after it is severed, and is therefore distinguished from the term "grass," which is the hay before it is severed and cured. An allegation, however, in an action for the conversion of grass and hay, did not necessarily import a joinder of two causes of action, one relating to real estate and the other to personalty, since cases may arise where even before severance grass belongs to persons other than the owner of a fee, or even the owner of a possessory estate therein, which ownership may depend on contract. Reed v. McRill, 59 N. W. 775, 41 Neb. 206.

Under a statute declaring it to be arson to willfully burn "any grain, grass, or herbage growing or standing in a field," an indictment for burning haystacks is good. Hay is but grass cut and cured for fodder, and so the words "grass standing in the field" may well include haystacks. State v. Harvey, 42 S. W. 938, 939, 141 Mo. 343.

HAYSTACKS.

Haystacks are included in the provisions of a statute making the burning of grass standing in the field arson. State v. Harvey, 42 S. W. 938, 939, 141 Mo. 342.

HAYWARD.

A hayward is an officer regularly appointed to impound stray cattle. Adams v. Nichols (Vt.) 1 Alk. 316, 319.

HAZARD.

See "Moral Hazard."

To engage in a wager of any kind is a hazard, within the meaning of that word as used in Ky. St. § 1977, subjecting to fine one who shall engage in any hazard or game on which money is bet, won, or lost. Cheek v. Commonwealth, 37 S. W. 152, 100 Ky. 1.

The word "hazard," in its direct philological sense, means chance, luck, or accident, rather than mere uncertainty or contingency. But the word, in a statute authorizing a suit for restitution by any person who has paid money lost on any game, hazard, or sport, does not include an election bet, in view of the fact that a subsequent clause of the statute authorizes a like action by a bettor on any game, sport, or pastime against a depositor for money staked and unpaid to the winner, as the word "hazard" is to be understood ejusdem generis, as importing some chance or risk, like its associate terms, "game," "sport," or "pastime," which have been construed not to apply to money staked on the event of an election. Graves v. Ford, 42 Ky. (3 B. Mon.) 113, 114.

The terms "bet, hazard, and wager," applied to the result of an election, include the act of selling property for more than its value, payable, or not, upon the contingency of the result of the election. Somers v. State, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 438.

As risk.

Under a provision that a fire policy shall be void if the hazard is increased without the consent of the company in writing, the policy is not voided by an increase in the risk caused by explosives kept in an adjoining house, not under the control of the insured, since the language, "hazard is increased without the consent of the company in writing," should be construed as only applying to the insured premises, or the property under the control of the insured. State Ins. Co. of Des Moines v. Taylor, 24 Pac. 333, 336, 14 Colo. 499, 20 Am. St. Rep. 281.

The mutual hazards assumed by parties when they enter into a partnership relation, and which qualify the terms of partnership agreements, includes sickness, which is the act of God, temporary absence, or death, or other casualties. Hart v. Myers, 12 N. Y. Supp. 140, 141, 25 Abb. N. C. 478.

HAZARDOUS.

See "Not More Hazardous."

"Hazardous," as used in a statute authorizing a board of health to abate nuisances, sources of foulness, or causes of sickness hazardous to the public health, means simply dangerous or perilous. Butterfoss v. Board of Health of City of Lambertville, 40 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 325, 330.

Within the meaning of a statute authorizing boards of health to abate nuisances hazardous to the public health, a fat rendering factory, by the odors from which more than a dozen individuals living in the vicinity were made sick at their stomachs or nauseated, one being sick for two days; another lost his appetite, and on several occasions was unable to eat his meals; one man felt so ill that he was obliged to quit his work; others refused to work because of the stench; and a number of families were obliged to stay indoors and close their windows to protect themselves from the odors—constitutes a hazard to the public health which justified the abatement of such nuisance. Board of Health of Hamilton Tp. v. Neidt (N. J.) 19 Atl. 318, 320.

An appropriation to a more hazardous use, within the meaning of a fire policy on property as part of a manufactory of wool carpets, is not shown by the fact that the making of blankets is substituted for the making of carpets by the factory, as the factory remains a woolen mill. Smith v. Mechanics' & Traders' Fire Ins. Co., 32 N. Y. 399, 403.

The terms "hazardous" and "extrahazardous," as used in an insurance policy authorizing the insured premises to be used for hazardous and extrahazardous purposes, have no technical meaning, and must be taken in their ordinary and popular meaning, of dangerous and extradangerous, and, if unrestricted by other clauses, would authorize the occupancy of such premises for a business in which benzine and gasoline are kept. Russell v. Manufacturers' & Builders' Fire Ins. Co., 52 N. W. 906, 907, 50 Minn. 409.

As the term "hazardous" is used in a fire policy describing the goods as hazardous, it does not include extrahazardous or specially hazardous, as such terms are used to designate different classes of goods. Pindar v. Continental Ins. Co., 38 N. Y. 364, 365, 97 Am. Dec. 795.

HAZARDOUS CONTRACT.

See "Aleatory Contract."

HE.

The use of the pronoun "he" in a note, mortgage, and certificate of sale can have little, if any, greater effect than to raise a suspicion that the person referred to was a male, and not a female. Berniaud v. Beecher, 11 Pac. 802, 804, 71 Cal. 38.

The word "he," in Taylor's St. c. 119, §§ 31-33, authorizing the admission of attorneys in circuit courts, and giving the right to persons so admitted to practice in all courts except the Supreme Court, but providing that, to entitle any one to practice in the latter court, he shall be licensed by order of this court, is not to be construed as applying to females as well as males, notwithstanding the statutory rule of construction that words of the masculine gender may be applied to females unless such construction is inconsistent with the manifest intention of the Legislature, in view of the universal exclusion of females from the bar by the common law, and in the absence of any other evidence of a legislative intent to require their admission. In re Goodell, 39 Wis. 232, 241, 20 Am. Rep. 42.

Under St. 5 & 6 W. IV, c. 76, § 9, requiring that, before a person be put on the burgess list of a borough, "he shall have paid certain rates," the payment must have been by the party's own act. It was not sufficient that another person, without his authority, paid the rate for him. Reg. v. Bridgenorth, 10 Adol. & E. 66, 68.

The pronoun "he," when used in the Penal Code, includes a female as well as a male, unless there is some express declaration to the contrary. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, arts. 21, 22.

The word "he," when used in the revenue act, includes male, female, company, corporation, firm, society, singular or plural number. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1493, c. 120, § 292, subd. 7.

When the word "he" or "his" occurs in the title relating to education, referring to either the members of the city board of directors, county superintendents of common schools, city superintendents, directors, clerks, state board of education, or other school officers, it shall be understood to mean also "she" or "her." Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 2462.

HEAD.

Chief; leading; principal; the upper part or principal source of a stream. Black, Law Dict.

HEAD CHAIR.

A head chair is a part of a block switch—a device used in railroading by which the footings of the ends of the two stationary rails are covered. This device is about 8 inches wide and 15 inches long, and is laid parallel with the tie. Between the rails this head chair presents a convex surface, which rises to a point two inches below the surface of the rails. This device prevents the blocking from reaching the ends of the rails, leaving a space of about two inches and a quarter which is unblocked. The head chairs in common use are made of iron, with a flat surface, and are so constructed as not to interfere with or prevent the furring of the rails. Eastman v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (Mich.) 60 N. W. 309, 310.

HEAD MONEY.

"Head money" is but another term for bounty, which the act of April 23, 1800, § 7, provides shall be paid for each person on board any ship of an enemy at the commencement of an engagement which shall be sunk or destroyed by any ship or vessel belonging to the United States, of equal or inferior force; the same to be divided among the officers and crew in the same manner as prize money. It is not a prize, under the law, but a gratuity which the government has promised to distribute, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, in the same manner as prize money is distributed. In re Farragut, 7 D. C. 94, 97.

HEAD OF BUREAU.

The term as used in Laws 1873, c. 335, p. 491, which gives to the commissioners of the fire department of the city of New York power to remove certain officers from office, except the heads of bureaus or regular clerks, does not include a superintendent of telegraph in the fire department. People v. Board of Fire Com'rs of City of New York, 86 N. Y. 149, 151.

HEAD OF CORPORATION.

The California process act declares that the summons in a suit against a corporation may be served on the president or other head of the corporation. Held, that where a city charter declared that the president of the board of trustees should be the governor of the city, and that he should be the general executive officer of the city government, head of the police, and general executive head of the city, the president of such board was the president or other head of the corporation, within the meaning of such process act, and was the proper person to be served with summons thereunder in a suit against the city. City of Sacramento v. Fowle, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 119, 122, 22 L. Ed. 592.

HEAD OF DEPARTMENT.

Heads of principal department, see "Principal Department."

"Heads of departments," as used in Const. art. 2, § 2, providing that Congress may by law invest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of the departments, means members of the Cabinet. United States v. Mouat, 8 Sup. Ct. 505, 506, 124 U. S. 303, 31 L. Ed. 463.

A city charter providing that every head of a department and person in the section named, except as otherwise provided, should hold his office for the term of six years—the terms of office of all such heads of departments and persons to commence on the 1st day of May—means every head of department and person in the section named, except as therein otherwise provided. Gilroy v. Smith, 5 N. Y. Supp. 784, 787.

The commissioner of pensions is not a head of a department, within the Constitution, prescribing by whom officers of the United States shall be appointed. United States v. Germaine, 99 U. S. 508, 511, 25 L. Ed. 482; United States v. Van Leuven (U. S.) 62 Fed. 62, 65.

HEAD OF A FAMILY.

As to what constitutes family, in the phrase "head of family," see "Family."

The head of a family is a person in charge of a family, which is a collective body of persons living in one house under one head or management. The relations between them must be of a permanent and domestic character, not that of those abiding temporarily together as strangers. The head of a family need not necessarily be a husband or father, but may be any person who has charge or manages the affairs of the collective body residing together. Duncan v. Frank, 8 Mo. App. 286, 289.

"The head of a family primarily is the husband or father. One may be such head, however, without being either. Thus a mother may become such upon the death of the husband. So a son having mother, brothers, and sisters, or either, depending on him for a support and living, in a household which he controls, might be such head; and yet in each case he must, for the purpose of this inquiry, stand in the place of a father—he must be the master, in law, of the family.” The term is thus used in a statute creating exemptions in favor of a head of a family. Per Wright, J., in Whalen v. Cadman, 11 Iowa, 226, 227.

A statute requiring a juror to be the head of a family means one in a position to exercise some degree of authority or control over the conduct and means of support of a person or persons who live with him, and who look to him for guidance and support. Even the relations of parents and son may be such as to place the son at the head of the family. This relation would subsist if his parents lived with him, and looked to and depended on him for support. Territory v. Lopez, 2 Pac. 364, 365, 3 N. M. (Johns.) 104.

“Head of a family,” as used in Code, § 3072, which provides that, when a decedent leaves a widow, all personal property which in his hands, as the head of a family, would be exempt from execution, shall be set apart as her property in her own right, and be exempt as in the hands of the decedent, means one upon whom a family depends for support; but, in order to constitute one the head of a family, he must actually support it. A mere legal liability for the support of one's wife would not constitute one the head of a family. There must exist the family relation. Linton v. Crosby, 9 N. W. 311, 312, 56 Iowa, 386, 41 Am. Rep. 107.

The phrase “head of a family,” when used in statutes, shall include any person who has charge of children, relatives, or others living with such person. Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 7342, subd. 29.

The phrase “head of a family,” as used in the chapter relating to homesteads, includes within its meaning: First. The husband, when the claimant is a married person. Second. Every person who has residing on the premises with him or her, and under his care and maintenance, either (1) his or her minor child, or the minor child of his or her deceased wife or husband; (2) a minor brother or sister, or the minor child of a deceased brother or sister; (3) a father, mother, grandfather, or grandmother; (4) the father or mother, grandfather or grandmother, of a deceased husband or wife; (5) an unmarried sister, or any other of the relatives mentioned in this section who have attained the age of majority, and are unable to take care of or support themselves. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 6214; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1261; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1694. A like definition is given in Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2494, and Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 5238, except that it is there provided that the phrase includes, also, the wife, when the claimant is a married person. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3625, and

Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 1154, add “but in no case are both husband and wife entitled each to a homestead.”

Under a statute providing that a homestead may be selected “by any head of a family,” and declaring that the phrase “head of a family” shall include the husband, when the claimant is a married person, and that the husband or other head of a family must execute and file with the recorder a declaration containing a statement showing that the person making it is the head of a family, the statement in such a declaration that the party making it is the head of a family is sufficient, and he need not state that he is married, or who were the members of his family. Security Loan & Trust Co. v. Kauffman, 41 Pac. 467, 468, 108 Cal. 214.

Father with widowed daughter.

A father who has living in his house with him a widowed daughter and her infant children is the head of a family, within the homestead laws, allowing a homestead to the head of a family. Blackwell v. Broughton, 56 Ga. 390, 391.

Guardian.

A guardian of one minor child is the head of such a family of minor children, under the Constitution and laws, as will entitle him to the homestead. Rountree v. Dennard, 59 Ga. 629, 630, 27 Am. Rep. 401.

As householder.

The head of a family, within the homestead exemption statute, is a householder or person on whom other members of the household are dependent for support, or to whom such householder owes a duty. Brokaw v. Ogle, 48 N. E. 394, 397, 170 Ill. 115.

In the Constitutional provision that every householder or head of a family shall be entitled to claim an exemption, the terms “householder” and “head of a family” are convertible, and employed as explanatory one of the other. Each signifies one who provides for a family; one who keeps house with his family; a master or a mistress of a dwelling house. In Calhoun v. Williams (Va.) 32 Grat. 18, 34 Am. Rep. 759, the term “householder” was held to signify one who occupies such a relationship towards persons living with him as to entitle them to a legal or moral right to look to him for support. This relation of dependence and support constitutes the one upon whom the burden is cast, the head of a family. Oppenheimer v. Myers, 39 S. E. 218, 220, 99 Va. 582.

Husband and wife jointly.

In Washington Territory, by virtue of the statutes giving the wife equal control with the husband over the affairs of the family, the husband is not the head of the family, but that position is held jointly by the husband and wife. Rosencrantz v. Territory, 5 Pac. 305, 2 Wash. T. 267.

Husband during absence or separation of wife.

While a marriage de jure exists, the husband is the head of a family, within the meaning of a homestead act, though his family may consist only of a wife who has left him. Gates v. Steele, 4 S. W. 53, 54, 48 Ark. 539; Brown v. Brown's Adm'r, 68 Mo. 388, 391.

A married man is the head of a family, within the homestead act, and entitled to homestead exemptions as such, though his wife may have deserted him, and may be residing in another state, and he is living in improper relations with another woman. Whitehead v. Tapp, 69 Mo. 415.

The term "head of a family," as used in exemption statutes, includes a man whose wife and children are temporarily absent from the city, even though he has ceased to keep house. State, to Use of Codding, v. Finn, 8 Mo. App. 261-264.

Under Const. art. 1, § 14, providing that no distinction shall ever be made by law between resident aliens and citizens in reference to the possession, enjoyment, or descent of property, an alien resident of the state, whose wife and children still remain in England, is entitled to the protection of the exemption laws. These benefits are secured to him not because of the residence of his family, but his own. They attach to him in his own right, as the head of a family actually residing here. That his family did not accompany him in his removal to our state is of no consequence, so long as he came with the settled purpose of abandoning his residence in England, and on his arrival fixed upon this state as his home, to which he intends to bring them. People ex rel. Dobson v. McClay, 2 Neb. 7, 9.

A husband whose family resides out of the state, and which he supports, is nevertheless the head of a family, within the exemption laws. Pettit v. Muskegon Booming Co., 41 N. W. 900, 901, 74 Mich. 214.

Where a wife moved to another state, taking her children with her, and there obtained a divorce from her husband, and was awarded the custody of the children, the husband, while he continued to furnish support for the children, notwithstanding the divorce, was the head of a family, and entitled to the benefit of the exemption law. Roberts v. Moudy, 30 Neb. 683, 46 N. W. 1013, 27 Am. St. Rep. 426.

Married not synonymous.

In a statute providing for homestead exemptions and exemptions of personal property to a person who is married or the head of a family, the expressions "married" and "head of a family" are not synonymous or mere equivalents the one for the other. All of either sex who are either married or the heads of families are entitled to the exemptions, and, where the homestead belongs to the wife, who dies, leaving minor children, it becomes the homestead of such minor children, to the exclusion of the husband's right to curtesy during the minority of such children. Thompson v. King, 54 Ark. 9, 11, 14 S. W. 925, 926.

Nonresidents.

Act 1869, relating to the exemption of the wages of certain persons in the hands of employers, and providing that the wages of laborers, mechanics, and clerks who are the heads of families, in the hands of those by whom such laborers, mechanics, or clerks may be employed, shall be exempt from the operation of attachment, execution, and garnishee process, applies as well to heads of families who are not residents of the state as to those who are residents of the state. Wright v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 27 N. W. 90, 92, 19 Neb. 175, 56 Am. St. Rep. 747.

Partnership.

A partnership cannot be the head of a family, within the meaning of a state law allowing property of a certain value to be selected and claimed as exempt by heads of families. In re Lentz (U. S.) 97 Fed. 486, 487; State ex rel. Billingsley v. Spencer, 64 Mo. 355, 356, 27 Am. Rep. 244.

A partnership is a legal, but not a social, entity, and consequently cannot be regarded as the head of a family, within the meaning of an exemption statute. Lynch v. Englehardt-Winning-Davison Mercantile Co., 96 N. W. 524, 525, 1 Neb. (unof.) 528.

Two equal partners, living together in the same house, and under a contract that their employes, as a part of the consideration, should board and lodge them at their house, and all—partners and employes—should eat at the same table, would not of itself constitute the family relation, within the meaning of the statute requiring jurors to be heads of families. Such relation must consist of some tie closer in its moral obligation, and of greater permanence in its character, than merely boarding employes during the limited term of their service; and as to two equal partners living and messing together as a matter of convenience and economy, perhaps, in their business relations, neither could be considered the head of the other, in the sense of the family relation. Territory v. Lopez, 2 Pac. 364, 365, 8 N. M. (Johns.) 104.

Single person.

A woman who has never been married and has no children is not a family, or head of a family, so as to be entitled to hold a homestead. Woodworth v. Comstock, 92 Mass. (10 Allen) 425.

The term "head of a family," within the homestead exemption statute, does not apply to an unmarried man having no inmate of his house depending on him, although he has hired servants or laborers in his employ. Cochran v. Miller, 74 Ala. 50, 57; Garaty v. Du Bose, 5 S. C. (5 Rich.) 493, 499; Calhoun v. McLendon, 42 Ga. 405, 406; Calhoun v. Williams (Va.) 32 Grat. 18, 20, 34 Am. Rep. 759.

"Head of a family," within the meaning of the clause of the Texas Constitution exempting a homestead to the head of a family, does not include an unmarried man having orphan children bound to him under the apprentice laws of Texas, and keeping house, hiring servants, and conducting the household. In re Summers (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 379, 380.

The term "head of a family," within the meaning of the statutes of South Carolina creating exemptions in favor of the head of a family, does not include an unmarried person who adopts another's child, and maintains servants and a household. In re Lambson (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 1047, 1048.

Single person supporting relatives.

An unmarried man residing with his mother, paying the rent and household expenses, and supporting his mother, is the head of a family, within the exemption laws. State, to Use of Smythe, v. Kane, 42 Mo. App. 253, 255; Parsons v. Livingston, 11 Iowa, 104, 106, 77 Am. Dec. 135.

Though a man supporting his widowed mother and sisters, and living with them, is ordinarily deemed the head of the family, within the exemption law, it is not so when the claim of exemption is invoked against an execution issued under a judgment obtained against him by his wife for maintenance. Spengler v. Kaufman, 46 Mo. App. 644, 649.

A man may be the head of a family, within the meaning of the exemption act, though he has neither wife nor children. It is not necessary that the relation of husband and wife should exist in every case to constitute a family, and, where a brother had his widowed sister and her children living with him, and he supported them, he will be considered manager of the house and head of the family. Wade v. Jones, 20 Mo. 75, 77, 61 Am. Dec. 584. Contra, see Dendy v. Gamble, 64 Ga. 528.

The term "head of the family," in the constitutional provision providing that the homestead of any married man or head of the family shall not be incumbered, except, etc., includes a son of a former owner of the homestead, who succeeds his deceased father in the care of his minor sisters, who continue to live with him in the family mansion when not at school. Greenwood v. Maddox, 27 Ark. 648, 658.

The term "head of a family," in the exemption law, means any one upon whom others are dependent for support, where they live in a family relation, and would include a man who lives with his invalid sister and supports her, though his sister owns the property on which they live. Moyer v. Drummond, 10 S. E. 952, 953, 32 S. C. 165, 7 L. R. A. 747, 17 Am. St. Rep. 850.

The man who controls, supervises, and manages the affairs of the house is the head of the family, and such a man need not necessarily be a husband or father. So it is held that a person who resides with his widow mother and two sisters, who are wholly dependent upon him for their support and maintenance, is the head of the family, within the meaning of an exemption in a garnishment statute. Rolater v. King, 73 Pac. 291, 292, 18 Okl. 37.

Where one's mother, brothers, and sisters lived on his land, and in his house with him, and he, to this extent, at least, contributed to their support, he was, though unmarried, the head of the family, within the homestead act of 1875, providing that the homestead, on the death of the head of the family, shall pass to the widow and children, etc. Broyles v. Cox, 54 S. W. 488, 489, 153 Mo. 242, 77 Am. St. Rep. 714.

Where a bachelor lived on a farm owned by him, a widowed sister living with him, making the farm her home, and having her furniture there, and paying no board, they constituted a family, though she, owing to ill health, spent much of her time visiting with other relatives; and he was entitled to the farm as a homestead exempt from seizure for his debts, as the head of a family, under the Missouri homestead exemption laws. Bailey v. Comings (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 367, 368.

Within the meaning of Rev. Code, § 3625, defining "head of family," as used in the chapter relating to homestead exemptions, as including "every person who has residing on the premises with him or her, and under his or her care and maintenance, either . . . a minor brother or sister . . . or an unmarried sister, or any of the relatives mentioned in this section who have attained the age of majority, and are unable to take care of or support themselves," an unmarried man who had living with him a brother who was afflicted with asthma, who was unable to do manual labor, except to work in the garden for an hour or two in the morning, and who was practically without any means of support, and who required more or less care all the time, and some days required constant attendance, and whose wife, who lived with them, had no property or means of any kind—such unmarried man furnishing all the provisions and the clothing and expenses necessary for the house—was the head of a family, and entitled to the homestead exemption as such. Webster v. McGauvarn, 78 N. W. 80, 81, 8 N. D. 274.

Rev. St. §§ 5480, 5483, providing, among the exemptions granted to heads of families and widows, that every person who has a family and every widow may hold the following property, to wit, the personal earnings of the debtor, and the personal earnings of his or her minor child or children, when it is made to appear that such earnings are necessary to the support of such debtor, or of his or her family, do not include a debtor residing with his widowed mother and invalid brother, who are supported by him. The words of the statute suggest and imply support or maintenance by a parent. The exemption from execution and attachment of the personal earnings of the debtor, and of his or her minor child or children, points to the parental relation, and to one as the head of a family who is under a legal obligation to provide for their support. Riley v. Hitzler, 32 N. E. 753, 49 Ohio St. 651.

Within the meaning of Const. Ark. art. 9, § 3, which exempts the homestead of any resident of the state who is married or the head of a family, the term "head of a family" should be given a broader construction than merely applying it to the husband or father; and, while it is true that there is some conflict of authority as to whether an unmarried man can be the head of a family, the weight of authority is in favor of considering every person the head of a family who keeps house, and has living with him and is supporting some persons whom it is either his legal or moral duty to support, so that an unmarried man, who owns a house in which he resides with his widowed mother and minor brother, who are not able to support themselves unaided, and to whose support he contributes from his wages, is the head of the family. In re Morrison (U. S.) 110 Fed. 734, 735.

"Although in general it is the husband, father, or mother who is the head of the family, yet, where a son of full age assumes the obligation of providing for the widowed mother and her children, with whom he lives, and who are dependent upon him, he is, in legal contemplation, the head of the family; and the provision of Rev. St. c. 134, § 31, apply to him, as such, and will protect from sale or execution for his debts grain belonging to him, not exceeding what is required for the food of the family." Connaughton v. Sands, 32 Wis. 387, 392.

The clause of the Constitution entitling the head of a family to a homestead, includes an unmarried man whose indigent mother and sisters live with him and are supported by him. "A husband, a widow, a guardian or trustee, who represents those who are dependent upon him or her for a support, and is the head of a family of such dependents, is entitled to a homestead; and we see no reason why the same rule does not apply in favor of the head of any other household of dependents whom it is his legal duty to support." Marsh v. Lazenby, 41 Ga. 153, 154.

An unmarried woman who has the care and custody of her minor child is entitled to an exemption under a statute exempting a certain amount of property of the head of a family; and this is true even though she has never been married, and the child is illegitimate. Ellis v. White, 47 Cal. 73, 75.

"Head of family," as used in the statute providing that the homestead of the head of a family shall be exempt from sale on execution, etc., would include a feme sole who has living with her, and dependent on her for support, an invalid sister, though it does not appear that she lives on the land in which the homestead is claimed. Chamberlain v. Brown, 11 S. E. 439, 33 S. C. 597.

The term "head of a family," within the meaning of the homestead exemption law, includes an unmarried woman living upon premises owned by her, and having living with her two children of a deceased sister, for whom she provides and cares. Arnold v. Waltz, 6 N. W. 40, 53 Iowa, 706, 38 Am. Rep. 248.

"Head of the family," within the meaning of the homestead law, does not apply to a daughter owning a half interest in the premises occupied by her parents, with whom she does not live, but whom she and her brother help to support. It is plain that the daughter does not control, supervise, or manage the homestead. It is one thing to aid one's parents by remittances from time to time, and quite another to assume control of their household, and manage and supervise the matters about the house. Ridenour-Baker Grocery Co. v. Mouroe, 43 S. W. 633, 634, 142 Mo. 165.

Widow.

A widow with two infant children wholly dependent on her for support is a "head of a family," within the meaning of a constitutional provision that every householder or head of a family shall be entitled to claim certain exemptions. Oppenheim v. Myers, 99 Va. 582, 586, 39 S. E. 218.

In Bachman v. Crawford, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 213, 215, 39 Am. Dec. 163, a widow who had gone with her children to live with her father, who owned land and permitted her children to cultivate such land as they chose, was correctly held to be the head of a family. Judge Green in the opinion in this case, in defining "head of a family," goes on the idea that the party must have a family circle, with his wife or children, or other similar relations, at a place of residence within his own home or house, or in some one else's house over whom he exercised the control, and over which he has the direction as the head. The very idea of a family is plural, carrying with it the notion of more than one, and such parties occupying a peculiar social relation to each other. There must be a home, and a family circle at that home of one or more under his control. That home may be the occupation of an entire house, or it may be of a single room. If his family are there habitually with him, or usually with him, this is his home, and that of such family as he has. Searcy v. Short, 69 Tenn. (1 Lea) 749, 751.

Widow without children.

The term "head of the family," within the meaning of the homestead act, includes a husband while living, and upon his death the widow takes that capacity, and all the incidents, privileges, and responsibilities attached to it. The leading idea is the protection of the family. To carry out this intent any individual of either sex may be the head of the family. It is not necessary that the head of the family should be a married person. As the primary object of the law was the protection of the family, when the family ceases to exist, the reason for the privilege is gone. Revalk v. Kraemer, 8 Cal. 66, 72, 68 Am. Dec. 304.

The term "head of a family" does not include a widow who has no children living with her dependent on her for support, and therefore she is not entitled to a homestead out of the property of her deceased husband as the head of a family, according to the true intent and meaning of the Constitution of 1868. Kidd v. Lester, 46 Ga. 231.

The term "head of a family," as used in statutes providing that the homestead of the "head of a family" is exempt from sale on execution, includes a widow who undertakes to support and care for the minor children of her deceased husband by a former marriage. Holloway v. Holloway, 12 S. E. 943, 944, 86 Ga. 576, 11 L. R. A. 518, 22 Am. St. Rep. 484; Lathrop v. Soldiers' Loan & Building Ass'n, 45 Ga. 483, 485.

That a widow has no child or children is no ground for holding that she is not the head of a family, entitled to the homestead exemption allowed by the Constitution. Bradley v. Rodelsperger, 3 S. C. 226.

"Head of a family" does not include a widow residing in her house, with no other persons save her employes and servants. Murdock v. Dalby, 13 Mo. App. 41, 47.

"Head of a family," as used in Rev. St. § 2343, providing that the homestead shall be exempt from execution when owned by the head of a family, should be construed to include a wife whose husband had occupied the premises as a homestead until forced to leave, about the close of the Civil War, by the disturbed condition of the country, when they removed to another state, where he shortly afterward died; the wife, who had no children, then returning to the homestead and residing thereon, keeping house with her brother. Leake v. King, 85 Mo. 413, 417.

The term "head of a family," within the meaning of exemption laws, includes a widow, who has been left in the possession of a farm and its appointments by her husband's death, and who has cultivated it as such for eleven years, it being her only means of support; and this is true, although her children are married and not living with her, and though she has rented the farm to another person, who uses her stock in its cultivation, she having reserved one room in the house for her own occupation. Collier v. Latimer, 67 Tenn. (8 Baxt.) 420, 35 Am. Rep. 711.

The term "head of a family," in Code 1873, § 3072, providing that a debtor who is the head of a family may hold certain property exempt from execution, does not include a widow living alone, though she once had others living with her who depended on her for support. Emerson v. Leonard, 65 N. W. 153, 154, 96 Iowa, 311, 59 Am. St. Rep. 372.

Const. 1870, art. 11, § 11, providing that a homestead in the possession of each head of a family to the value of a certain sum should be exempt from sale under legal process during the life of such head of a family, should be construed to include a widow residing on her dower land, keeping house, and having the charge of the orphan children of a sister and children of a sister of her late husband. The phrase "head of a family" would clearly embrace a husband with a wife and children, or a husband with a wife alone, occupying a homestead. Ex parte Brien, 2 Tenn. Ch. 33, 35.

Widower.

The term "head of a family," as used in Gen. St. 1897, c. 118, § 3, was held not to include a husband, who after the death of his wife placed his two children with relatives, disposed of nearly all of his household goods, and lived at different places as a boarder, but did not reside with either of his children. Gibson v. Gross, 54 Pac. 796, 8 Kan. App. 548.

The "head of a family," within the exemption laws, includes "a widower having a minor child residing with him and supported by him at his dwelling place. Probably the primary signification would be the husband and father of a wife and children, residing together; but the term cannot be thus restricted, especially when used in a statute requiring a liberal construction in order to accomplish the humane object of the statute. One may be the head of a family who is not a husband or father, provided he is the head or manager of a household of collected persons." Barney v. Leeds, 51 N. H. 253, 265.

Within exemption laws, a "head of a family" would include a man whose wife had moved out of the state and obtained a divorce, decreeing that she have the custody of the children, provided he continued to contribute to the support of the said children. Roberts v. Moudy, 46 N. W. 1013, 30 Neb. 683, 27 Am. St. Rep. 428.

The term "head of a family," in the homestead laws, applies to a negro father living with a child of a woman with whom he had lived as husband and wife prior to the Civil War, and who was included in the act of 1865, declaring such persons to be lawfully married. Myers v. Ham, 20 S. C. 522, 528.

Widower with adopted child.

A man, whose wife and children die after he has informally adopted a niece, with whom he continues to live, is a head of a family, within the meaning of the statute giving a homestead exemption to heads of families. "The authorities in this state, as well as elsewhere, show very clearly that it is not necessary that the relation of husband and wife or parent and child should exist in order to constitute a family. Nor is it necessary that there should be any blood relationship between one claiming to be the head of a family and the members thereof, nor is it necessary that there should be any legal obligation on the part of one claiming to be the head of a family to support the members thereof, but a moral duty arising from ties of consanguinity or affinity, or perhaps other similar relations, will be sufficient. But those who are said to constitute the family must be persons who are in some measure dependent upon the head of the family for support, and who have a right to expect the same, and who, therefore, have an interest in the head of the family, holding a portion at least of his property, and would be prejudiced by its seizure and sale under execution. Fant v. Gist, 15 S. E. 721, 36 S. C. 576.

"Head of a family," within the meaning of the exemption laws of Georgia, exempting a homestead to the head of a family, includes a man whose wife is deceased, but who maintains a house, and hires servants, and resides therein with a widow not related by blood to him, but whom he and his wife had educated and regarded as their adopted daughter, but had failed to adopt in accordance with the law. In re Taylor (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 730.

"Head of a family" does not include a childless widower, who shelters, but does not support, an informally adopted daughter and her husband. Hill v. Franklin, 54 Miss. 632, 634.

Wife.

The husband, and not the wife, is primarily the "head of the family," and as a result merely of the conjugal relation, a wife, who is a debtor, does not occupy the relation of head of the family, for the purpose of claiming exemptions, though the statute provides that the wife, when a claimant, is included within the meaning of the phrase "head of the family," but that under certain conditions, which may be shown to exist from necessity, the wife may be compelled to accept the burden of maintaining the family, and in such exceptional conditions the law concedes to her the family headship for the purpose of claiming exemptions. Ness v. Jones, 88 N. W. 706, 708, 10 N. D. 587, 88 Am. St. Rep. 755.

A married woman living with her husband is not the head of the family; for, where the husband and wife are living together, the law recognizes the husband as the head of the family, so that a wife is not entitled to an exemption, under a statute authorizing a homestead exemption to the head of a family, while she is living with her husband. Bennett v. Trust Co. of Georgia, 32 S. E. 625, 626, 106 Ga. 578.

The term "head of the family" is used in reference to the relation existing between the members of the family as recognized by law and the usage of society. There may be a head of the family when there is no marriage relation existing. When, however, the marriage relation does exist, the headship of the family would not be one of fact, but of law. That it is a question of law when the husband is resting under no disability cannot be doubted. One reason, and only one, can be given. It is this: The universal sentiment of the people is, and has been for ages, that the husband is the head of the family. The term was used by the Legislature in the statute in question in its universally accepted significance. Van Doran v. Marden, 48 Iowa, 186. Thus a wife is not the head of the family, even though she own the land upon which the family live and from which they derive their living. McGinnis v. Wood, 47 Pac. 492, 495, 4 Okl. 499. Contra, see McPhee v. O'Rourke, 15 Pac. 420, 10 Colo. 301, 3 Am. St. Rep. 579.

A wife, residing with her husband, is not shown to be the "head of the family," within the meaning of the exemption laws, by the mere fact that she is on the premises, and that the property thereon is her sole and separate property, and that she has children by a former husband residing with her. Clinton v. Kidwell, 82 Ill. 427, 429.

Under Const. Va. art. 11, which secures to every householder or "head of the family" a homestead exemption, a married woman who holds the title to the property, although living with her husband, is entitled to claim the exemption as against her own creditors. She is the head of the family, either alone or jointly with her husband, for homestead purposes. Richardson v. Woodward (U. S.) 104 Fed. 873, 876, 44 C. C. A. 235.

Where a woman, a resident of Kansas, at the time of her marriage, marries a man in Missouri, who had never been a resident of Kansas, and who had no residence anywhere, and who did not live with his wife in Kansas, to which she returned, she may be a head of a family in Kansas, so as to hold property exempt from judicial process. Adams Exp. Co. v. McConnell, 27 Kan. 238, 240.

Where a wife, although doing business in her own name and with her own money, does not have exclusive charge of the family, managing and controlling the earnings and productions of the family, and the financial and business interests necessary to support and keep it together, she is not the "head of the family," within the meaning of exemption laws. John V. Farwell Co. v. Martin, 65 Ill. App. 55.

A married woman, whose husband lives in another county and occasionally visits her and sends her money, all the children being of age, is not a householder or head of a family. Oppenheimer v. Myers, 39 S. E. 218, 219, 99 Va. 582.

Wife supporting family.

Where a husband absconded, and the maintenance and support of the family thereby devolved upon the wife, she was the head of the family, and as such entitled to the exemption of property allowed by law to the head of the family. State v. Wilson, 31 Neb. 462, 48 N. W. 147; Frazier v. Syas, 4 N. W. 934, 935, 10 Neb. 115, 35 Am. Rep. 466. So, also, where by the departure of her husband for temporary or permanent purposes the maintenance and support of the family devolved upon the wife. "To hold that by a departure of the husband the family would be deprived of the right to hold such property would in effect destroy the beneficent purpose of exemption laws." Hamilton v. Fleming, 41 N. W. 1002, 1004, 26 Neb. 240.

Within the statute of exemptions, the head of a family includes a married woman who has been abandoned by her husband, but who is living with and supporting her child, Nash v. Norment, 5 Mo. App. 545.

The terms "householder" and "head of a family," within the meaning of the exemption statute, may be properly used to characterize a married woman, who separates from her husband, though by agreement, and maintains herself and family without the aid of her husband. Kenley v. Hudelson, 99 Ill. 493, 500, 39 Am. Rep. 81.

A married woman, on whom a family is dependent for maintenance, is the head of the family; the husband being an invalid. Schaller v. Kurtz, 41 N. W. 642, 25 Neb. 655; Linander v. Longstaff, 63 N. W. 775, 7 S. D. 157. So, also, where he was a cripple and unable to work, and contributed nothing for the support of the family, while the wife solely supported the family. State v. Houck, 49 N. W. 462, 32 Neb. 525.

Where the husband had been insane, but was so far recovered as to live at home with his wife and children, doing nothing, however, toward his own support or that of the family, while the wife, with the assistance of her children, carried on the farm on which they lived, taking the actual control and management of the farm, she thereby made herself the head of the family, and as such was entitled to the exemption allowed by statute to the head of a family. Temple v. Freed, 21 Ill. App. 238, 239.

Under Code, § 1753, declaring that the husband is the head of the family, a wife living with her husband could not be the head of the family, though the husband was physically unable to work, and she had a separate estate, and supported herself and minor children. Johnson v. Little, 17 S. E. 294, 295, 90 Ga. 781.

Const. art. 9, § 2, exempts certain "personal property of any resident of this state" who is "married or the head of a family" from seizure on attachment or sale on execution or other process from any court, etc. Held, that this provision of the statute did not apply to men alone, but was applicable to one of either sex who was charged with the care and maintenance of a family, and that it would include a married woman who has a separate estate. Memphis & L. R. Ry. Co. v. Adams, 46 Ark. 159, 163.

The term "head of the family," within the meaning of the homestead law, applies to a husband, and not to his wife, though her four minor children live and are supported by her in a building constructed with her own earnings, while the husband for eight years has slept in a cabin back of the house, is indolent, and has worked a little at intervals, and testifies that it was his fault that he has not been steadily at work, and who has often left home after quarrels with his wife. Barry v. Western Assur. Co., 49 Pac. 148, 149, 19 Mont. 571, 61 Am. St. Rep. 530.

In Indian treaties.

Dancing Rapids Creek Treaty 1830, between the United States and the Choctaw

Nation (article 19), provides that each head of a family who has cultivated 30 acres of land during the year of 1830 should have three quarter sections of land, to include his improvements, etc. Held, that the term "head of a family," mentioned in the treaty, must be presumed to mean one who is so in the Choctaw sense of the term, or according to the usages and customs of that nation, which might include a white man married to a woman who was a member of the Indian nation, he having adopted her domicile and lived within the territory belonging to the nation. Turner v. Fish, 28 Miss. (6 Cushm.) 306, 311.

The phrase "head of an Indian family," as used in treaties with the Indians of 1817 and 1819, giving to each and every head of an Indian family certain lands, etc., should be construed to include a white man who has married an Indian woman. Morgan v. Fowler, 10 Tenn. (2 Yerg.) 450, 455.

HEAD OF STREAM.

The head of a stream, meaning the origin thereof, is seldom to be found in a spring or fountain whose center can be readily taken, but in a swamp overspreading several acres of ground, through which the water flows in guts of various directions, except in a drought, when some of them become dry or stagnant, or the motion of them becomes different from another, or what was a water channel at one season may have none existing in it at another season. So a finding that a certain spot is "at or about" the head of a stream is a sufficient designation of the head of the stream. State v. Coleman, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 98, 104.

The "head of a creek" means the source of the longest branch, unless general reputation has given the appellation to another. Davis v. Bryant, 5 Ky. (2 Bibb) 110, 113.

The "head of a stream," called for in a boundary, is the highest point on the stream which furnishes a continuous stream of water, and not necessarily its longest prong. Uhl v. Reynolds (Ky.) 64 S. W. 498.

HEAD OF WATER.

The term "head of water," as occurring in a contract calling for water power to be used in propelling a mill, being a technical term in hydraulics, constitutes "words of art," and as such may be properly explained by an expert witness. Cargill v. Thompson, 59 N. W. 638, 640, 57 Minn. 534.

A covenant in a lease provided that a head of not less than eight feet, measuring from the tail race of the mill at its lowest stage of water, should be maintained. In an action on the lease, the question was suggested whether this meant the lowest operating stage, or stage when the water is being furnished to the mill and it is being operated, or meant the stage when the mill was at rest and but little water running through the tail race. It was held that the term "head of water" was a word of art or a highly technical term in the science of hydraulics, and that an expert might testify as to its meaning, if there was any, for measuring to ascertain the head of water—whether to measure from the surface of the water in the tail race when the mill is in operation, or to measure from the surface of the water when the mill is at rest, and, prima facie construed, the words of the lease mean the lowest stage of water at any time, without reference to whether the mill was running or not, though its apparent meaning might be modified by expert testimony. Cargill v. Thompson, 59 N. W. 638, 640, 641, 57 Minn. 534.

In an action for flooding plaintiff's land by raising a dam, the court, in speaking of the word "head," as applied to water power in moving water wheels, said: "I had supposed that it was a matter of common knowledge that the signification of the term, when water is applied to such use, is the vertical distance between the water in a dam or place from whence it is drawn to the tail water of the wheel by which the power is communicated to the machinery, and unless it is shown that the water at the bottom of the dam is on the same level as the tail water of the wheel it would afford no evidence of the head." Shearer v. Middleton, 50 N. W. 737, 739, 88 Mich. 621.

HEAD ON.

See "Meeting Head on."

HEADACHE.

Where, in an application for life insurance, a general question precedes an enumeration of specific disorders inquired about, and directs the attention to such of them as are properly called diseases, a negative answer by the insured to a question whether he has "headaches" is not a misrepresentation, by reason of the fact that, when he is overworked, he is subject to headaches. The question concerning headaches has, in our opinion, no reference to occasional and temporary attacks of that character, which proceed from and evidence no vice in the constitution, but rather the result of casual causes. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Simpson (Tex.) 28 S. W. 837, 838.

HEADING.

As used in 71 Ohio Laws, p. 81, providing that all ballots shall be printed on plain white printing paper, without any device to distinguish one from the other, except the word at the head of the ticket, and that whenever any ballot with a "certain designated heading" shall contain printed thereon, in place of another, any name not found on the regular ballot having such heading, such name shall be regarded as having been placed there for the purpose of fraud, has reference only to the words at the top of the ticket, which designate the party, and does not apply to the other words on the ballot, which designate each class of offices to be filled. Roller v. Truesdale, 26 Ohio St. 586, 592.

HEADQUARTERS.

"Headquarters," as used in Laws 1883, c. 356, as amended by Laws 1886, c. 205, providing that the Governor shall appoint some suitable person, who shall be designated "commissioner of statistics of labor," with headquarters in the new capitol at Albany, means not temporary headquarters, but permanent headquarters during his term of office. It does not mean that he is to occupy the corridors, rotunda, or some other open space in the capitol. Obviously it means that, like other public officers, he is to have a room in the capitol for his occupation and for the discharge of his duties. The statute gives him the right to such a room, and thus it is made the duty of those who by law have charge of the capitol to assign him a room, and if they should refuse to do so they could be compelled by mandamus. People v. Peck, 34 N. E. 347, 350, 138 N. Y. 386, 20 L. R. A. 381.

Of railroad.

In reference to the place of business of a corporation, "headquarters" is synonymous with the words "principal office"; neither term signifying the location of the purely administrative offices of the company. Jossey v. Georgia & A. Ry., 28 S. E. 273, 274, 102 Ga. 706.

"Headquarters," as used in Sp. Laws 1879, c. 182, voting bonds to a certain railroad, provided the eastern terminus, general offices, and headquarters of said railroad should be in a certain city, should be construed to mean the headquarters of the railroad maintained for the purpose of the operation and management thereof. State v. City of Minneapolis, 21 N. W. 722, 723, 32 Minn. 501.

HEADRIGHT CERTIFICATES.

A headright certificate is a certificate issued under authority of Act Jan. 4, 1839, by which it was provided that every person immigrating to the republic between October 1, 1837, and January 1, 1840, who was the head of a family and actually resided with in the government with his or her family, should be entitled to a conditional grant of 640 acres of land; the conditions of the grant being that both grantee and his or her family should reside permanently within the republic and perform all conditions required of other citizens for the term of three years, after which time he should receive an unconditional deed for the grant of land. It was provided that no sale of the claim should be valid and binding on the person selling the same until an unconditional deed should be obtained, and that in no case should a grant be made except on satisfactory proof that all the provisions and conditions of the law had been complied with. Cannon's Adm'r v. Vaughan, 12 Tex. 399, 401; Turner v. Hart, 10 Tex. 438, 441.

HEADACHE WAFERS.

The phrase "headache wafers," employed as the name of a medicine, being in common use and descriptive, is such that no exclusive right to the same as a trade-mark can be obtained. Gessler v. Grieb, 48 N. W. 1098, 1100, 80 Wis. 21, 27 Am. St. Rep. 20.

HEALERS.

The term "healers" is used by the believers of Christian Science to designate those who attempt demonstrations of the science, and who treat disease without the use of any material means whatever. "They do not claim to cure all bodily ills, but they attribute their failures, not to the nature of the illness, but to the imperfect realization by the healer of the divine mind, since to them the possibilities of Christian Science are infinite. It is their belief, on the other hand, that, when a patient does recover, the healer has realized sufficiently the truths as taught by 'Science and Health' and the Bible, and has, by his understanding of the power of God as thus demonstrated by Christian Science, been able to remove the imperfections of which the disease was the result." These beliefs, being founded on the religious convictions of those professing them, do not authorize the court to say that they are mentally unsound. In re Brush's Will, 72 N. Y. Supp. 421, 425, 35 Misc. Rep. 689.

HEALTH.

See "Board of Health"; "Good Health"; "Sound Health."

Act March 23, 1871, incorporating the city of Paterson, creates a department of health, and enacts that for the preservation and promotion of the health of the city that department would have power to regulate and control the manner of erecting and constructing dwelling houses and other buildings in said city, but contains no general welfare clause, or clause conferring general police powers. Held, that the power of such department to regulate the erection, etc., of buildings, is limited to such matters as affect health, in the sense of freedom from disease, and it has not the power to regulate the thickness of the outside walls of buildings, etc. Hubbard v. City of Paterson, 45 N. J. Law (16 Vroom) 310, 312, 46 Am. Rep. 772.

HEALTHY.

The act of Vermont of 1797, relating to a settlement that might be gained by a "healthy and able-bodied person" by a continuous residence for one year, did not mean that such person should invariably continue in health throughout the year, nor remain wholly exempt from those accidents which might impair his physical energies for a time; but it was sufficient if the words of the statute could be predicated of the person in his usual condition. Town of Starksboro v. Town of Hinesburgh, 15 Vt. 200, 209.

"The term properly applies to a condition of the body, and not to the mind. We do not say that a person has a healthy mind when we wish to convey the idea of a sound intellect, nor do we say that a person has an unhealthy mind when we wish to convey the idea of a weak intellect." Nelson v. Biggers, 6 Ga. 205, 206.

Judge Pearson, in Bell v. Jeffreys, 35 N. C. 356, in holding that myopia, or shortness of sight, in a negro slave, was unsoundness, though not unhealthiness, within the meaning of a warranty that a slave was sound and healthy, said that "the word 'healthy,' in its ordinary acceptation, means free from disease or bodily ailment, or a state of the system peculiarly susceptible or liable to disease or bodily ailments." A defect in the structure of the little fingers of a slave can be no more a want of soundness in health, in the ordinary acceptation of the term "health," than myopia, or shortness of sight. Harrell v. Norvill, 50 N. C. 29, 32.

A statement by a seller of a horse to the purchaser that the horse is healthy and sound, though made with the knowledge that it is false, is merely a statement of a falsehood, and does not constitute a false pretense. State v. Holmes, 82 N. C. 607, 608.

HEAR.

The words "receive, hear, and determine," in Act March 3, 1803, c. 93, § 2, authorizing appeals from the District Courts of the United States to the Circuit Court, and requiring the Circuit Court to receive, hear, and determine such appeals, does not authorize a retrial by jury of a cause which has been tried by jury in the District Court. United States v. Wonson (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 745, 747.

The Constitution, in providing that the concurrence of four justices present at the argument is necessary for a judgment by the court in bank, and that if four justices so present do not concur in a judgment all the justices qualified to sit in the cause shall "hear the argument," does not mean that the justices qualified to sit shall literally hear the argument, but means that the argument shall be considered by the court. Niles v. Edwards, 30 Pac. 134, 135, 95 Cal. 41.

As implying power to determine.

"Hear," as used in Laws 1887, p. 30, providing that, when a petition to organize an irrigation district is presented, the board of supervisors shall hear the same, and may adjourn the hearing from time to time, and on the final hearing may make such changes in the proposed boundaries as they may find to be proper, and shall establish and define such boundaries, cannot be held to include the power to determine the entire merits of the petition, in view of the affirmative requirements contained in the same sentence that on its final hearing the board shall establish and define such boundaries. Bradley v. Fallbrook Irr. Dist. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 948, 962.

The term "hear," in the consent of a party that a court may hear his cause, amounts to a consent that it shall make a decree therein, and a consent that the court shall decree in the case wholly abandons the objection arising from the want of parties. Mayo v. Murchie (Va.) 3 Munf. 358, 397.

HEAR AND DETERMINE.

Authority to hear and determine a cause is jurisdiction to try and decide all the questions involved in the controversy. Quarl v. Abbett, 1 N. E. 476, 480, 102 Ind. 233, 52 Am. Rep. 662.

The power to hear and determine is an essential ingredient of original jurisdiction, and the authority to examine and correct errors is the distinguishing characteristic of appellate power. To hear and determine a criminal case is to proceed after bill found, and to try the issues of fact and pass sentence. Commonwealth v. Simpson (Pa.) 2 Grant, Cas. 438, 439 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 270).

The words "hear and determine" refer to judicial determination after the hearing and weighing of testimony on both sides, and do not include an ex parte accounting. Stan ton v. United States (U. S.) 37 Fed. 252, 255.

The power to hear and determine, in a statute authorizing the board of claims to hear and determine certain claims, includes power to reject, as well as to allow. Cole v. State, 6 N. E. 277, 278, 102 N. Y. 48.

HEARD.

The right guaranteed by the Constitution of Texas to the accused in all criminal cases of being heard by himself or counsel, or both, gives him a right to be heard in person as well as by counsel in the trial court; but it does not give him the right to be taken from jail to the appellate court and be heard by himself there on the consideration of his appeal. Tooke v. State, 3 S. W. 782, 783, 23 Tex. App. 10.

As implying oral argument.

The use of "heard," in Bill of Rights, § 24, providing that the right to be heard in all civil cases in the court of last resort, by appeal, error, or otherwise, shall not be denied, does not indicate that an oral presentation of a controversy to the court should not be refused, but was intended in the sense of review, and hence Sup. Ct. Rule 2, § 3, providing for the submission of the cause without argument, is not unauthorized. Schmidt v. Boyle, 74 N. W. 964, 965, 54 Neb. 387.

"Heard," as used in the Constitution, providing that, within 30 days after judgment has been pronounced in a cause by a judge, an order may be made that it be heard and decided in bank, merely means that the cause may, after such judgment, be considered and determined by the court in bank, and does not necessarily imply that an additional or oral argument must be made or listened to before it can be so considered and determined. "The term 'heard' as here used is taken from the practice in equity procedure, and corresponds to the term 'trial' as used in cases of law. It signifies the consideration and determination of a cause by the court or by a judge, as distinguished from the trial of a cause, which is a term more properly predicated of its determination by a jury." Niles v. Edwards, 30 Pac. 134, 135, 95 Cal. 41.

As importing a trial.

Laws 1873, c. 335, § 25, providing that the heads of all departments in the city of New York, and all other persons whose appointment is in this section provided for, may be removed by the mayor for cause after an opportunity to be heard, "implies that a hearing must be had, which is equivalent to a trial." People v. Thompson, 94 N. Y. 451, 465.

HEARD FROM.

"Heard from," as used when saying that one person has not heard from another, refers to some direct personal communication by letter or otherwise. Hence, in an action for divorce under the New Hampshire statutes, which declare that absence for three years without being heard of is a ground for divorce, proof that the party had not been "heard from" is not equivalent to proof that the party had not been "heard of." Fellows v. Fellows, 8 N. H. 160, 162.

HEARING.See "Final Hearing or Trial."

The term "hearing," within the removal statute, requiring a petition for removal to be made before the final hearing or trial of the suit, refers to equity suits. Waggener v. Cheek (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 1324, 1325; Vannevar v. Bryant, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 41, 43, 22 L. Ed. 476; Wooster v. Handy (U. S.) 23 Fed. 49, 53; Chandler v. Coe, 56 N. H. 184, 186, 22 Am. Rep. 437; Akerly v. Vilas, 24 Wis. 165, 171, 1 Am. Rep. 166; Jones v. Foster, 20 N. W. 785, 786, 61 Wis. 25; Burson v. National Park Bank of New York, 40 Ind. 173, 179, 13 Am. Rep. 285.

"Hearing" is an equity term, properly applied to the argument and consideration of the case at the several stages of its orderly progress, and, when applied to that upon which the case is absolutely determined, it is qualified by the word "final." Miller v. Tobin (U. S.) 18 Fed. 609, 616.

The trial of a chancery suit is called a "hearing," and, technically considered, this includes not only the introduction of the evidence and arguments of the solicitors, but the pronouncing of the decree by the chancellor. Babcock v. Wolf, 70 Iowa, 676, 679, 28 N. W. 490.

A hearing in equity is the trial of a case, including the introduction of evidence, the argument of the solicitors, and the decree of the chancellor. It is clear that the words are not used in such technical sense in Act June 6, 1900, c. 803, 31 Stat. 660 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 550], providing that where, upon a hearing in equity, an injunction shall be granted or continued, or a receiver appointed, an appeal may be taken from such interlocutory order; for the statute applies to interlocutory orders only. It is true the statute does not say "on an ex parte hearing," nor does it say "on the hearing of both parties," nor "on an adversary hearing"; but the words "hearing in equity" could not have been used in their technical sense, and therefore we must place on them some other interpretation, and one that will not defeat the purpose of Congress. When a motion to appoint a receiver is heard by the court and granted, whether on the averment and prayer of the bill or on a petition in the pending suit, there has certainly been a "hearing," in the ordinary sense in which the word is used. Joseph Dry Goods Co. v. Hecht (U. S.) 120 Fed. 760, 763, 57 C. C. A. 64.

In construing the federal removal act of 1866, requiring applications to remove cases from the state to the federal courts to be made "before the trial or final hearing," it was said: "It is well known to every lawyer, and must have been understood in Congress, that according to the general usage by the bench and bar the term 'trial' is uniformly, though perhaps not universally, applied to the actual litigation of the merits in an action at law, as contradistinguished from the debate on the merits in a case in equity, and that 'hearing' is a term more precisely applied to equity cases and others savoring of civil law forms, as contradistinguished from those proceedings which are either grounded on the common law or are shaped by analogy to its forms and methods. It is, then, reasonable to suppose that in using the term 'trial,' Congress referred to proceedings of a common-law nature, and in using the term 'hearing' had in contemplation cases of equitable cognizance and any others of a civil law nature within the reason of the enactment, and that in using both terms they intended to mark and preserve the distinction which exists between them, and prescribe and confine their application to their respective subjects." Crane v. Reeder, 28 Mich. 527, 535, 15 Am. Rep. 223.

A stipulation of attorneys for the respective parties, which declares that the compensation of the referee shall be a certain sum per day for "every hearing," does not include days appointed for a hearing, but on which no hearing in fact was had, and when, in advance of the time appointed, the parties had agreed on a postponement, and in pursuance thereof had omitted to appear before the referee. Mead v. Tuckerman, 12 N. E. 64, 65, 105 N. Y. 557.

Within the legal signification of the term "hearing," as applied to objections made to commissioners appointed to assess damages for street improvements, is meant simply the receiving of facts and arguments thereon for the sake of deciding correctly, and, in the absence of statutory requirements that the objections should be in writing, it is not necessary that written objections be made as a basis for such hearing. Merritt v. Village of Portchester (N. Y.) 8 Hun, 40, 45.

Code 1892, § 933, provides that "when the trial of any case, civil or criminal, has been commenced and is in progress," and the time for the expiration of the term as fixed by law arrives, the court may proceed with "such trial or hearing," and bring it to a conclusion, in the same manner and with the like effect as if the stated term had not expired. Section 1522 provides that words and phrases are used in statutes in their ordinary meaning, and technical words and phrases in their technical meaning. Held that, as used in section 933, the hearing of a criminal case commenced, not at the later stage when jeopardy attaches, but at the instant the court enters on the impaneling of a jury for an investigation of the matters of fact presented by the pleadings. Lipcomb v. State, 25 South. 158, 164, 76 Miss. 223.

As examination of issues.

In a statute relating to seizure and search of property, providing that the property taken shall be safely kept so long as necessary for the purpose of being produced or used as evidence on the trial, and that if, on the hearing, it appears that the warrant was issued without probable cause, the complainant may be required to pay the costs, the words "trial" and "hearing" are generally understood as meaning a judicial examination of the issue between the parties, whether of law or of fact. Glennon v. Britton, 155 Ill. 232, 243, 40 N. E. 594, 598.

Rev. Laws, § 2976, providing that if the commissioners appointed for the apportionment of expenses in repairing a highway and bridge among the towns to be benefited should, on an examination of all the circumstances relating to the road, be of the opinion that a town would be excessively burdened by defraying all the expenses, they should give reasonable notice to one or more of the selectmen of such towns as they deem especially benefited by the road or bridge of the time and place for a "hearing in the premises," embraces all the questions which are to be considered and passed upon by the commissioners. It covers the whole, and not a part, of the questions involved. After such notice is given, the whole matter is open for hearing and final determination. Town of Weybridge v. Town of Addison, 57 Vt. 569, 574.

Power to administer remedy implied.

The term "hearing," in a statute providing that reports of commissioners on proposed improvements shall be received, and a time shall be fixed by the court for hearing the report, necessarily implies the power to administer some adequate remedy. Adams v. City of Shelbyville, 57 N. E. 114, 121, 154 Ind. 467, 49 L. R. A. 797, 77 Am. St. Rep. 484.

Within the provision entitling a deputy marshal to a per diem for attendance before a commissioner as for hearing, where a case was set for trial on the day, but the defendant failed to appear, and his bond was estreated, and an attachment issued, there was a hearing, so as to entitle him to his fee; the commissioners' court being open in order to determine the question of default. Puleston v. United States (U. S.) 88 Fed. 970, 975.

Preliminary hearing.

As used in a statute allowing a United States marshal attendance fees for the "hearing and deciding" of criminal cases, the phrase is not confined to the actual trial of the cause on its merits, but includes a hearing on the question of admissions to bail, or on motion to adjourn, or on arraignment or commitment. Kinney v. United States (U. S.) 54 Fed. 313, 316.

"Hearing and deciding" any criminal charges, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 847, allowing a United States commissioner five dollars a day for the time necessarily employed in hearing and deciding any criminal charges, includes hearing and deciding motions on bail and the sufficiency thereof, and motions for continuance. United States v. Jones, 10 Sup. Ct. 615, 616, 134 U. S. 483, 33 L. Ed. 1007.

Within the meaning of Rev. St. § 847, fixing the fees of commissioners, and allowing them "for hearing and deciding on criminal charges $5 a day for the time necessarily employed," the hearing referred to is an examination of a prisoner charged with a crime or misdemeanor and of the witnesses for the prosecution and defense, and it does not include the examination of complaining witnesses to determine whether a warrant shall issue. United States v. Patterson, 14 Sup. Ct. 20, 21, 150 U. S. 65, 68, 37 L. Ed. 999.

Testimony required.

The mere inspection of a mine by arbitrators appointed to determine a controversy in relation thereto, without taking testimony or deciding points involved in the litigation, is not a "hearing," at which all the arbitrators are required to be present. Glass Pandery Consol. Min. Co. v. Meyer Min. Co., 1 Pac. 443, 445, 7 Colo. 51.

HEARING ON BILL AND ANSWER.

A hearing in the chancery practice on the bill and answer has a definite legal meaning. It is when the complainant files no replication to the answer. In that case the complainant takes the risk of recovering upon his allegations and the defendant's answer; all the statements in the answer being taken as true, whether responsive to the bill or not. Fall v. Simmons, 6 Ga. 265, 268.

HEARSAY EVIDENCE.

"The term 'hearsay,'" says Mr. Greenleaf, "is used in reference to that which is written as well as that which is spoken, and in its legal sense denotes that kind of evidence which does not derive its value solely from the credit given to the witness himself, but rests also in part on the veracity and competency of some other person." State v. Ah Lee, 23 Pac. 424, 425, 18 Or. 540; Hopt v. Utah, 4 Sup. Ct. 202, 205, 110 U. S. 574, 28 L. Ed. 262; Morell v. Morell, 60 N. E. 1092, 1093, 157 Ind. 179; Dixon v. La- bry (Ky.) 29 S. W. 21, 22; Shaw v. People (N. Y.) 5 Thomp. & C. 439, 444, 2 Cow. Cr. R. 200, 204.

Hearsay evidence is not admissible to prove which of two persons, claiming by the same name a particular grant or reservation made by the treaty of Saginaw between the United States and the Chippewa Indians, was the person intended. Hearsay evidence is a statement which a witness professes to have heard, made by a third person as to some particular transaction or thing; literally, what the witness says he heard another person say. 1 Starkie, Ev. 229. To justify the introduction of hearsay evidence it must be shown to fall within some one of the exceptions recognized by the adjudged cases on that subject. These are divided by Mr. Greenleaf into four classes: (1) Those relating to matters of public and general interest; (2) those relating to ancient possession; (3) declarations against interest; (4) dying declarations, and some others of a miscellaneous nature. While the treaty itself was a public transaction, and perhaps a matter of public and general interest, the question as to which of two individuals was the person to whom a certain grant or reservation was made in such treaty was not one in which the public was interested, and could not be shown by hearsay evidence. Stockton v. Williams (Mich.) 1 Doug. 546, 570.

Hearsay evidence is a statement made by a person not called as a witness, which is received in evidence on the trial; and to this class dying declarations belong. People v. Kraft, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1034, 1035, 91 Hun. 474. Under this rule a narrative of a past transaction will be excluded, but where the question to be ascertained simply is whether the declaration was made, and not whether it was true, the fact testified to depends solely upon the credibility of the witness, and is therefore strictly and properly original evidence. Shaw v. People (N. Y.) 5 Thomp. & C. 439, 444.

"Fame," says Crabb, "has a reference to the thing which gives birth to it. It goes about of itself, without any apparent instrumentality. . . . Hearsay refers to the receivers of that which is said, and hence it is limited to a small number of reporters or speakers. Fame serves to establish a character, either to a person or thing. There is a distinction, therefore, between hearsay and evidence of repute." Commonwealth v. Murr (Pa.) 42 Wkly. Notes Cas. 263.

Testimony which purports to relate what a testator said, after making a will, in relation to the causes which influenced him to make it, is in the category of hearsay evidence. Schierbaum v. Schemme, 57 S. W. 526, 530, 157 Mo. 1.

Evidence as to what a witness said at a former trial had between different parties is hearsay evidence. Boardman v. Reed, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 328, 341, 8 L. Ed. 415.

Proof of the general reputation of a person for sobriety among those employed with him is hearsay evidence. Intemperance, sobriety, and drunkenness are facts, to be proven like other facts. Stevens v. San Francisco & N. P. R. Co., 35 Pac. 165, 169, 100 Cal. 554.

HEARSE.

A hearse is a carriage for conveying the dead to the grave (Webst. Dict.), and is exempt under a statute exempting wagons. Spikes v. Burgess, 27 N. W. 184, 65 Wis. 428.

HEART DISEASE.

A statement that "phlebitis and heart disease" were the cause of a death is not necessarily equivalent to a statement that organic heart disease had existed for any length of time, or existed at the time of death; phlebitis being an inflammation of the veins, capable of being communicated to the lining membranes of the heart, so that an inflammation of the heart is produced which is denominated "endocarditis" and is apt to result fatally. In such case, however, the acute inflammation of the veins should be regarded as the primary cause, and heart disease as the result or secondary cause, of the death. Succession of Bidwell, 27 South. 281, 284, 52 La. Ann. 744.

"Heart disease," within the meaning of a question in an application for a life policy whether the applicant's parents, etc., have been afflicted with consumption, scrofula, insanity, epilepsy, disease of the heart, or other hereditary disease, is to be construed only as an inquiry whether such relatives have been afflicted by such disease in a hereditary form; the word "other" in the question plainly indicating that the inquiry is so limited. Gridley v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 2, 3.

HEAT.

In a contract with a carrier to transport a lot of hogs for plaintiff from Buffalo to Albany, plaintiff assumed the risk of injuries in consequence of heat, etc., in consideration of a reduced rate of freight. Held, that the phrase "injuries in consequence of heat" should be construed as exempting defendant from injuries by heat, the result of negligence of defendant's employes in not watering and cooling the hogs by wetting, since the common-law liability of carriers does not apply to live stock, but in the transportation thereof they were only liable for negligence, and hence such meaning must be given to the words of exemption, if they are to have any effect. Cragin v. New York Cent. R. Co., 51 N. Y. 61, 64, 10 Am. Rep. 559.

HEAT OF PASSION.

See "Sudden Heat and Passion."

The term "heat of passion," used to characterize murder in the second degree, is not used in its technical sense, but as a condition of mind, contradistinguished from a cool state of blood. State v. Wieners, 66 Mo. 13, 25.

The phrase "heat of passion" has a technical meaning, and should not be used in an instruction without explanation. State v. Andrew, 76 Mo. 101, 105.

By "heat of passion" is not meant passion or anger which comes from an old grudge, or no immediate cause of provocation, but it means passion or anger suddenly aroused at the time by some immediate reasonable provocation by words or acts of deceased at the time. State v. Seaton, 17 S. W. 169, 171, 106 Mo. 198.

Anger synonyms.

See "Anger."

As caused by just or lawful provocation.

The heat of passion that will take away the malice from an act manifestly dangerous to human life, and reduce homicide to manslaughter, must be caused by lawful provocation. State v. Wilson, 11 S. W. 985, 988, 98 Mo. 440.

"Heat of passion" at common law meant the heated state of the blood caused by a lawful provocation. In drawing the distinction between the two degrees of murder, passion or excitement of mind is divided into two phases. One phase reduces the act to murder in the second degree, and the other to manslaughter. When used in the definition of the various degrees of manslaughter, it is used in its ordinary common-law sense; that is, such heat of passion as is produced by a lawful provocation. The other is that passion which is produced by a just provocation. Opprobrious language, insulting gestures, and the like are a just provocation. Where the passion or excitement of mind is produced by such provocation to the extent that it materially interferes with the judgment and reason, an act done at once under its immediate influence is done in the heat of passion. State v. Bulling, 15 S. W. 367, 371, 105 Mo. 204.

The words "in the heat of passion," in the statutory definition of voluntary manslaughter, mean any heat of passion recognized by law, whether produced by a just cause or provocation, or a lawful, adequate, or reasonable cause. State v. Berkley, 109 Mo. 665, 673, 19 S. W. 192.

As result of altercation.

It is held that an instruction that "heat of passion" means a quarrel, an altercation, in which the party killed is immediately concerned—that is, the heat of passion must not be all on one side, but there must be sufficient cause for it—is erroneous; the court observing that it is not always necessary to the existence of heat of passion that there should be a quarrel or altercation, in which the party killed is immediately concerned, but that, if the contemplated heat of passion actually exists, it would palliate the offense if the accused should, while thus excited, kill some other than the one engaged in the altercation with him. It was further said that the instruction was erroneous in stating that the heat of passion must not be all on one side, and that there must be sufficient cause for it. In criticism of this portion of the instruction the court said that the accused might be severely injured and his passions excited by the acts of one who was entirely cool and deliberate. Wilson v. People (N. Y.) 4 Parker, Cr. R. 619, 646.

HEAVILY INVOLVED.

The expression "heavily involved in debt," in a testamentary provision that the rents and profits of certain property should be paid to a beneficiary, unless he became heavily involved in debt, is not of such vague and uncertain meaning as to make it void for uncertainty; but the court can ascertain from proof when the beneficiary is heavily involved in debt. First Nat. Bank v. Nashville Trust Co. (Tenn.) 62 S. W. 392, 403.

HEAVY ARTICLE.

A charter of a railroad company prescribed a maximum rate of charge for the transportation of heavy articles by the 100 pounds and of articles of measurement by the cubic foot. It was held that it was properly left to the jury to determine whether cotton in bales were heavy articles, within the meaning which custom had given to those terms at the date of the charter. The term "heavy" is a comparative term as applied to different articles. Iron is heavy, feathers are light or bulky, yet a pound of feathers is as heavy as a pound of iron. Hence an article is heavy when a certain bulk has a certain weight, while one which has the same bulk, but weighs less, will not be heavy. On this principle we call iron heavy and feathers light. The difficulty is in drawing the line of demarcation or in ascertaining when the weight of an article, compared with its bulk, makes it a heavy article. It may be said that lint cotton is not heavy, and that cotton compressed in very small bales, as is now done by powerful steam or hydraulic presses, is heavy. Considering bales of cotton as usually packed by farmers, with the bulk of 35 cubic feet, weighing only 460 pounds, they are not heavy articles. Elder v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co., 13 S. C. 279, 281.

"Heavy articles," as used in the charter of a railroad company, providing that for the transportation of goods, produce, merchandise, and other articles it should not charge an amount exceeding 50 cents per 100 pounds for each 100 miles on heavy articles, and 15 cents per cubic foot on articles of measurement for every 100 miles, cannot be construed as a matter of law to include cotton packed in bales in the manner used for the purpose of transportation; but such question is to be determined by the customs and usages of railroads and carriers at the date of the charter. The term "heavy articles" is used in a technical sense, and not according to its popular sense, from the fact that it is contrasted with articles of measurement. Bonham v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co., 13 S. C. 267. A bale of cotton is a "heavy article," and not an article of measurement, according to the custom and practice with railroads and common carriers in South Carolina. Bonham v. Railroad Co., 16 S. C. 633.

HEIFER.

A heifer is a young cow, so that, under an indictment for stealing a heifer, one could not be convicted of stealing a bull, and a conviction for such offense is not a bar to a prosecution for stealing a bull. State v. McMinn, 34 Ark. 160, 162.

A heifer is a young cow, but the term does not include calves. Milligan v. Jefferson Co., 2 Mont. 543, 546.

As a cow.

In Dow v. Smith, 7 Vt. 465, 29 Am. Dec. 202, and in Freeman v. Carpenter, 10 Vt. 433, 33 Am. Dec. 210, it was decided that a heifer was a cow, within the meaning of a statute exempting cows from execution. Mundell v. Hammond, 40 Vt. 641, 645. See, also, Stirman v. Smith (Ky.) 10 S. W. 131, 132; Johnson v. Babcock, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 583.

In a writ in a replevin suit an animal was described as a heifer, and in the certificate of appraisement was described as a cow. Held, that the words should be construed as practically synonymous, and hence there was no variance justifying the dismissal of the writ. Pomeroy v. Trimper, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 398, 403, 85 Am. Dec. 714.

"In Carruth v. Grassie, 77 Mass. (11 Gray) 211, 71 Am. Dec. 707, under a statute exempting a cow, a heifer only 20 months old, and not giving milk for more than a year thereafter, was held to be exempt; it appearing that the owner was raising it for his family cow." Mallory v. Berry, 16 Kan. 293, 295.

Proof that an animal stolen was a heifer was held not to be a variance under an indictment charging the theft of a cow. People v. Soto, 49 Cal. 67, 70; Parker v. State, 39 Ala. 365.

Where an indictment charges the larceny of a heifer, there is no variance between it and the verdict fixing the value of the cow stolen at a certain sum, as a heifer is defined to be a young cow. Garvin v. State, 52 Miss. 207, 209.

HEIR.

"To heir an estate" is a common expression, which means "to take as heir; to inherit." Hall v. Chaffee, 14 N. H. 215, 224.

The definition of the word "heir" is "to inherit" or "to succeed to," and cannot be applied to any less estate in land than that held by the ancestor, from whom the heir inherits or to whose property right he succeeds. Thus a testator's contract with his daughter to refund certain money to her if she did not heir a certain portion of his land at his death was not fulfilled by a devise of a life estate to her, with remainder to his other children in the event of her death without issue. Parrott v. Graves' Ex'x (Ky.) 32 S. W. 605, 606.

HEIR APPARENT.

An heir apparent is one whose right of inheritance is indefeasible, provided he outlives the ancestor, as the eldest son, who must by the common law of England become the heir of his father on his death. Jones v. Fleming (N. Y.) 37 Hun, 227, 230.

"Heirs apparent" is a term which applies to those who will probably inherit from a live ancestor. Ward v. Stow, 17 N. C. 509, 512, 27 Am. Dec. 238.

HEIR PRESUMPTIVE.

An heir presumptive is one who, if the ancestor should die immediately, would succeed to the estate, but whose right of inheritance may be defeated by the birth of a nearer heir. Jones v. Fleming (N. Y.) 37 Hun, 227, 230.

"Heirs presumptive" is a term which applies to those who will probably inherit from a live ancestor. Ward v. Stow, 17 N. C. 509, 512, 27 Am. Dec. 238.

He who is the nearest relation of the deceased capable of inheriting is presumed to be heir, and is called the "presumptive heir." This quality is given to him before the decease of the person from whom he is to inherit, as well as after the opening of the succession, until he has accepted or renounced it. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 880.

HEIRESS.

In the provision of a will: "I do order and will, at the death of my wife, M., that all property undisposed of shall be sold or divided in the following manner, that is: My brother J. to have one share, my nephew J. S. C. one share, my brother R. C.'s heirs another share, my brother T.'s heirs a fourth share, and my sister S. C.'s heiress a fifth share," the word "heiress" is construed to mean heirs. Chadwick v. Chadwick, 37 N. J. Eq. (10 Stew.) 71, 76.

HEIRS.

See "Adopted Heir"; "Beneficiary Heir"; "Die Without Heirs"; "Expectant Heir"; "Forced Heir"; "Lawful Heirs"; "Legal Heirs"; "Legitimate Heir"; "Natural Heirs"; "Present Heirs"; "Right Heir"; "Unconditional Heirs."

All my heirs, see "All."

At common law an heir is he who is born in lawful wedlock, and upon whom the law casts the estate in lands, tenements, or hereditaments immediately on the death of the ancestor. Hoover v. Smith, 54 Atl. 102, 96 Md. 393.

At common law an heir is one who is born or begotten in legal wedlock, and upon whom the law casts the estate in lands, tenements, and hereditaments immediately upon the death of the ancestor. Jarboe v. Hey, 122 Mo. 341, 353, 26 S. W. 968.

An heir at common law has been defined to be one born in lawful matrimony, who succeeds by descent, right of blood, and the act of God to lands, tenements, or hereditaments, being an estate of inheritance. Fletcher v. Holmes, 32 Ind. 497, 510; Lord v. Bourne, 63 Me. 368, 379, 18 Am. Rep. 234; Richardson v. Martin, 55 N. H. 45, 47; Sewall v. Roberts, 115 Mass. 262, 268; Meadowcroft v. Winnebago County, 54 N. E. 949, 950, 181 Ill. 504.

The heirs of a decedent are those of his kindred on whom the law, immediately on his decease, casts the estate in real property. Appeal of Dodge, 106 Pa. 216, 220, 51 Am. Rep. 519 (citing 2 Minor, Inst. 452; 2 Bl. Comm. 201); Hiester v. Yenger, 31 Atl. 122, 123, 166 Pa. 445; McCarthy v. Marsh, 5 N. Y. (1 Seld.) 263, 275; Phillips v. Carpenter, 44 N. W. 898, 899, 79 Iowa, 600; Oroom v. Herring, 11 N. C. 393, 394; Stith's Heirs v. Barnes, 4 N. C. 96, 98, 6 Am. Dec. 547; Nye v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 36 N. E. 429, 436, 9 Ind. App. 131; Barclay v. Cameron, 25 Tex. 232, 233, 242; Brooks v. Evetts, 33 Tex. 732, 742; Lavery v. Egan, 9 N. E. 747, 749, 143 Mass. 389; In re Donahue's Estate, 36 Cal. 329, 332; Ewing v. Barnes, 40 N. E. 325, 327, 156 Ill. 61; Long v. Beaumont, 1 P. Wms. 229.

By the word "heirs" is properly meant those upon whom the law casts the real estate immediately upon the death of the ancestor. Howell v. Gifford, 53 Atl. 1074, 1077, 64 N. J. Eq. 180; Brown v. Merchants' Bank of Appleton City, 66 Mo. App. 427, 431.

"The word heirs, when first introduced into charters and feoffments, was a word of very great importance. It enlarged the right of the vassal from one held either at the will of the lord or for his own life to a permanent and hereditary interest. It signified an undertaking of the lord that he would accept the heir as his vassal. It was in effect simply a stipulation for the renewal of the lease upon the same terms with the heir of the first lessee. Unless the lord bound himself that the fief should go to the heir of his vassal, the heir had no rights in it on the death of the ancestor or the lord; for the absolute owner of the soil might bestow the fief upon any stranger who would enter into homage and do fealty to him for the land upon such new services as he might impose." Sanborn v. Sanborn, 62 N. H. 631, 634.

In the Roman law and in the modern civil law, "hæres," or "heir," has a more extended significance than in the common law. The term is applied to all persons entitled to succeed to the estate of one deceased, whether by act of the party or by operation of law, and whether the property be real or personal in its nature. Adams v. Akerlund, 168 Ill. 632, 639, 48 N. E. 454, 457; Butterfield v. Sawyer, 58 N. E. 602, 604, 187 Ill. 598, 52 L. R. A. 75, 79 Am. St. Rep. 246.

Heirs are those persons in whom real estate vests by operation of law on the death of one who was last seised. Dukes v. Faulk, 16 S. E. 122, 127, 37 S. C. 255, 34 Am. St. Rep. 745.

The word "heir" has a technical significance, and, when uncontrolled by the context, designates the person appointed by law to succeed to the real estate in question in case of intestacy. Gauch v. St. Louis Mut. Life Ins. Co., 88 Ill. 251, 30 Am. Rep. 554; Cook v. First Universalist Church, 49 Atl. 389, 390, 23 R. I. 62; In re Aspden's Estate (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 37, 59; Nye v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 36 N. E. 429, 436, 9 Ind.

App. 131; Lincoln v. Aldrich, 21 N. E. 671, 149 Mass. 368, 4 L. R. A. 215; Olney v. Lovering, 45 N. E. 766, 167 Mass. 446; Merrill v. Preston, 135 Mass. 451, 457; Lawton v. Corlies, 27 N. E. 847, 848, 127 N. Y. 100; Proctor v. Clark, 12 L. R. A. 721, 724, 154 Mass. 45, 27 N. E. 673; Alexander v. Wallace, 76 Tenn. (8 Lea) 569, 570.

The word "heir" in a will, when uncontrolled by the context, designates the person appointed by law to succeed to the estate in question as in case of intestacy. Kelley v. Vigas, 112 Ill. 242, 245, 54 Am. Rep. 235.

The word "heir" of itself imports succession to the property ab intestato. Lavery v. Egan, 9 N. E. 747, 749, 143 Mass. 389.

"The word 'heirs' in itself imports succession to property by death, and, as the persons or the heirs of one deceased are designated by law, the heirs must be either those persons who by law would succeed to the real estate, or those who would succeed to the personal estate of the person whose heirs they are called, if that person had died intestate; and it is said that, if the property is personal, the inference is that those persons are meant who would succeed to personal estate, if the owner had died intestate, and who have been sometimes styled the 'statutory next of kin' or 'heirs of personalty.'" Swazey v. Jaques, 10 N. C. 758, 761.

The word "heirs" expresses the relation of persons to a deceased ancestor, and not to a living one. Its primary import relates to the succession to real property, but, when it is used to denote succession or substitution in connection with a legacy of personal property, it may have the sense of denoting the persons on whom the law will cast the succession to that class of property. Cushman v. Horton, 59 N. Y. 149, 151; Fabens v. Fabens, 5 N. E. 650, 652, 141 Mass. 395.

The word "heirs," in the strict legal meaning, when speaking of heirs of a certain person, includes all who will take if the deceased dies intestate leaving an estate composed entirely of real property. But in a case in which testator directed that his residuary estate, which consisted of nothing but personalty, should be paid to his heirs according to the laws and statutes of the state, the same as if he had died intestate, was construed, in view of the fact that testator, who had drawn the will himself, was not a lawyer, and that he had no relatives, except a sister and the children and grandchildren of other brothers and sisters, to be so ambiguous as to justify the admission of extrinsic evidence and the examination of other parts of the will for an explanation of the meaning in which he used the term. Armstrong v. Galusha, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1-4, 43 App. Div. 248.

"Heirs" is a technical word, and when it is made use of in any legal instrument there is a presumption more or less strong, according to the circumstances, that it is employed in a technical sense; but in common speech the word is frequently used to indicate those who claim in any manner the ownership of any species of property by reason of the death of an owner, and may then include next of kin and legatees, as well as those who take by descent. In wills, which are often very informal instruments and drawn without legal assistance, the word is sometimes employed with quite as little regard to the technical sense. The context may determine the meaning, and, when it does, effect must be given to the instrument accordingly. Hascall v. Cox, 13 N. W. 807, 808, 49 Mich. 435.

When land is devised to a person and his heirs, or to the heirs of a person named, the word "heirs" must be construed to embrace those only who are heirs in the strict legal sense of the term, unless there is something on the face of will to show that the word "heirs" was used by the testator in a more enlarged sense. Heard v. Horton, 1 Denio. 165, 169, 43 Am. Dec. 659; Heath v. Hewitt, 1 N. Y. Supp. 492, 49 Hun, 12; Shaw v. Robinson, 20 S. E. 161, 162, 42 S. C. 342.

An heir is one upon whom the law casts his ancestor's estate on the death of his ancestor; so that under a deed to one and the heirs of her body, forever, but, if she die without issue, then to her mother and her heirs, where the mother died leaving her as sole heir and she had three adult children, the title was not marketable, as it could not then be determined what heirs she would have. Rozier v. Graham, 48 S. W. 470, 471, 146 Mo. 352.

"The word 'heirs' is nomen generalis simum," and in a comprehensive sense may include all kinds of heirs." Miller v. Churchill, 78 N. C. 372, 373.

In a will providing that the principal and income of the estate should be divided into four equal parts, one to each of four of the testator's children and to their heirs and assigns, forever, the word "heirs" appears to have been used as if it were a general word, which might mean those who were properly so, or "executors and administrators," or family or children. Bradlee v. Andrews, 137 Mass. 50, 53.

The word "heirs," when used in a will in which there is nothing to show a different intention on the part of a testator, "means all who are to take generally, without exception, as a class of inheritable persons." Van Olinder v. Carpenter, 19 N. E. 868, 871, 127 Ill. 42, 2 L. R. A. 455, 11 Am. St. Rep. 92.

An heir is one who takes by descent. Inhabitants of Elliot v. Spinney, 69 Me. 31, 32.

The word "heirs," in its ordinary meaning, is descriptive of those persons upon whom the law, upon the death of the ancestor, would cast the inheritance, including all possible heirs to take from generation to generation. Ewing v. Barnes, 40 N. E. 325, 327, 156 Ill. 61; Brooks v. Evetts, 33 Tex. 732, 742.

An heir is he who succeeds by descent to the inheritance of an ancestor, and in this sense the word comprehends all heirs and the heirs of heirs ad infinitum. Ward v. Stow, 17 N. C. 509, 512, 27 Am. Dec. 238; Merrill v. Atkin, 59 Ill. 19, 21.

The word "heir" not only means one to whom an estate has descended from his immediate ancestor, but includes one who has inherited through several successive descents. Castro v. Tennent, 44 Cal. 253, 262.

The term "heir" implies all those legal qualifications which the laws require in the persons who represent or stand in that place. Heir is one who succeeds by descent to lands. He must be such an one as is capable of inheriting the lands of an ancestor. State v. Engle, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 347, 366.

An heir at law is simply one who succeeds to the estate of a deceased person under the statute of a country or a state, or the decision of an Indian tribe. The law or decision for a country and state or an Indian tribe may make any person an heir; and, if not made an heir by such law, the person is not an heir. O'Brien v. Bugbee, 26 Pac. 428, 432, 46 Kan. 1; McKinney v. Stewart, 5 Kan. 384, 392; Delashmutt v. Parrent, 20 Pac. 504, 505, 40 Kan. 641; Appeal of Nice, 50 Pa. (14 Wright) 143, 148.

Ordinarily the statute of distribution must be looked to, to ascertain the persons who are entitled to the character of heirs. Dukes v. Faulk, 16 S. E. 122, 126, 37 S. C. 255, 34 Am. St. Rep. 745.

"Heirs," as used in Sp. Act Feb. 7, 1856, entitled, "An act for the relief of the heirs of C. S. H.," authorizing and requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue to the heirs of C. S. H. a headright certificate for a certain amount of land, etc., refers to the person or persons entitled to the estate of C. S. H. under the law of descent which was in force at the time of his death. Goodrich v. O'Connor, 52 Tex. 375, 378.

The heirs of a person are those whom the law appoints to succeed to his estate, in case he dies without disposing of it by will. In California, where the heirs of a person are determined by the provisions of the Code, the use of the term "heirs" in an instrument of conveyance to designate the persons in whom the estate granted is to pass will, in the absence of any qualifying term, be construed to mean his heirs as thus ascertained. Like all other legal terms, the word, when unexplained and uncontrolled by the context, is to be construed according to its strict technical import. Where a husband's deed to his wife provided that the property should, on her death, go to their children then living, and, in case of the death of any of such children, then to their heir or heirs, the words "heir or heirs" did not refer to children, but included all the heirs of such children as the law appointed to succeed to their estates. Hochstein v. Berg-hauser, 56 Pac. 547, 549, 123 Cal. 681.

Where a will devised land to those persons "who are natural heirs at law" of a third person, the phrase "heirs at law" did not mean the children of the third party, but were employed in their natural and proper sense, as including all those persons who should be capable of inheriting from him, or taking his property under the statute of distribution, if he died intestate. Tingier v. Chamberlin, 42 Atl. 718, 719, 71 Conn. 466.

A bequest of the proceeds of bank stock to a certain person for life, and providing that after her decease the stock should be sold and the proceeds equally divided among certain persons "or their heirs," means that the proceeds should be paid to such persons as would be entitled to them as their representatives by the law of the country; that is to say, they were not, in case of the death of one of the children, to go to the survivors, but to be considered as if vested in the deceased child. Appeal of McGill, 61 Pa. (11 P. F. Smith) 46, 50.

An heir is whoever by the laws of the country hath right to inherit or succeed to an estate immediately upon the death of an owner, and is different as the law varies in different countries. Larabee v. Larabee (Conn.) 1 Root, 555, 556.

The person who has become the universal successor of the deceased, who is possessed of all his property and rights, and who is subject to the charges for which the estate is responsible, is called the "heir," no matter whether he be such by law, by the institution of a testament, or otherwise. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 884.

The term "heirs," as used in an act of Congress in which the United States relinquished title to land to the heirs of a British subject, should be construed in the sense fixed to the term in the United States, and not as referring to the English law of primogeniture. It was a mere act of grace, and doubtless intended for the benefit of the heirs of such person in the enlarged sense in which that term is understood in the United States. Eslava v. Farmer's Heirs, 7 Ala. 543, 560.

The word "heirs," as used in the chapter relating to the distribution of estates, shall be construed as meaning the person or persons to whom land, tenements, and hereditaments descend as provided by the rule for the descent of real property. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 4643.

As word of limitation.

The words "heirs" and "heirs of the body," in their primary or natural sense, are words of limitation, and not words of purchase. Taylor v. Gould (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 388, 395; Schoonmaker v. Sheely (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 485, 490; Nelson v. Davis, 35 Ind. 474, 478; Shimer v. Mann, 99 Ind. 190, 191, 50 Am. Rep. 82; Brasher v. Marsh, 15 Ohio St. 103, 112; Pritchard v. James, 20 S. W. 216, 217, 93 Ky. 306.

An unbroken line of decisions in Pennsylvania establishes that the word "heirs," when uncontrolled by the expressed intention of the will, is to be taken as a word of limitation. Grimes v. Shirk, 32 Atl. 113, 118, 169 Pa. 74 (citing Appeal of Muhlenberg, 103 Pa. 587; Appeal of McGill, 61 Pa. [11 P. F. Smith] 46; Appeal of Provenchere, 67 Pa. [17 P. F. Smith] 463; Appeal of Eby, 84 Pa. 241). See, also, Appeal of Cocklins, 2 Atl. 363, 364, 111 Pa. 26; Appeal of Charles (Pa.) 2 Penny. 164, 169; Campbell v. Jamison, 8 Pa. (8 Barr) 498, 500; Appeal of Barnett, 104 Pa. 342; In re Bowlby's Estate, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 108, 109.

The word "heirs" must be regarded as a word of limitation, unless the superadded words make it clear that the testator employed it in a different sense from that annexed to it by the law. Allen v. Craft, 9 N. E. 919, 921, 109 Ind. 476, 58 Am. Rep. 425; Chamberlain v. Runkle, 63 N. E. 486, 488, 28 Ind. App. 599 (quoting Gallini v. Gallini, 5 Barn. & Adol. 621, which is also quoted in Shimer v. Mann, 99 Ind. 190, 193, 50 Am. Rep. 82); Siceloff v. Redman's Adm'r, 26 Ind. 251, 261; *Patterson v. "Where the ancestor takes a freehold for life, and by the same conveyance, whether a deed or devise, an estate is limited, either mediately or immediately, to his heirs, the word 'heirs' is a word of limitation, not of purchase, and the fee vests in the ancestor." McFeely's Lessee v. Moore's Heirs, 5 Ohio (5 Ham.) 464, 466, 24 Am. Dec. 314 (citing Shelley's Case, 1 Coke, 104); Armstrong v. Lane's Heirs, 12 Ohio, 287, 290.

The word "heirs," as used in deeds, is sometimes construed to mean children, but that is never so when the word is used in its technical, legal sense; and it will not be construed to mean children in a conveyance to one and her heirs, but, in case of no heirs, the land to revert to the parties of the first part, with a habendum, "to have and to hold the said premises unto the said party of the second part, her heirs and assigns, forever"; the word "heirs" being a word of limitation, and not one of purchase. Davis v. Sturgeon, 64 N. E. 1016, 1017, 198 Ill. 520.

Where a deed conveys an estate for life, with fee simple to the grantee's heirs, the word "heirs," under the rule in Shelley's Case, must be construed as a word of limitation, and not of purchase, and the grantee will take an estate in fee simple. Tucker v. Williams, 23 S. E. 90, 117 N. C. 119.

Within the meaning of a trust deed, reciting that upon the death of a cestui que trust the trustee shall transfer, convey, pay over, and deliver to a party named, or his heirs, the said trust fund, etc., "his heirs" are usually words of limitation, denoting heirs generally, or the whole line of heirs in succession, and therefore limiting or marking out the estate granted; but they may be words of purchase, where used to designate a particular person or persons who may stand in the relation of heirs at the happening of a certain event or at a certain period in the future, and the gift or grant may be alternative. So, also, adverbs of time ordinarily refer only to the time when the estate will vest in possession, and not when it will vest in interest; but if there is no direct gift or grant to take effect in the present, and the element of futurity is annexed to the substance of the gift itself, such terms may create an estate to commence in interest, and not in possession merely, at such future time. Hobbie v. Ogden, 53 N. E. 104, 106, 178 Ill. 357 (citing Ebey v. Adams, 135 Ill. 80, 25 N. E. 1013, 10 L. R. A. 162).

4 Wds. & P.—18

Prior to the Revised Statutes a devise to a person, without adding the words "and to his heirs," would only create a life estate, and, although those words are not now necessary to create a fee, their use ordinarily only serves as a limitation to vest the fee in the devisee. Thurber v. Chambers, 66 N. Y. 42, 46; Loring v. Elliot, 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 568, 572, 574.

In limitations to another for life, with the remainder over to his heirs or the heirs of his body, the heirs do not take remainder at all, but the word "heirs" is regarded as defining or limiting the estate which the first taker has, and his heirs take by descent, and not by purchase. So if a man by his will gives an estate to his devisee for life, with a remainder to his own heirs, they do not at common law take as remaindermen by the will, but by descent as reversioners and heirs; that being regarded as the better title. Akers v. Clark, 56 N. E. 296, 184 Ill. 136, 75 Am. St. Rep. 152 (citing 2 Washb. Real Prop. 242).

The word "heirs," in a deed to a married woman, "unto her and her heirs and assigns," does not designate persons who are to take, but is a limitation only, and used to describe the character of the estate conveyed to her; that is, a fee simple estate, an estate unincumbered by conditions of any kind. Rank v. Rank, 18 Atl. 827, 828, 120 Pa. 191.

In the case of Riggin v. Love, 72 Ill. 553, there was a deed conveying the premises to E. during her life, and at her death unto her husband, and in case of his death before hers then unto his "heirs at law." The husband died testate in the lifetime of his wife, and the words "heirs at law," although in the alternative provision, were construed not to be words of purchase, but words of limitation, because the property conveyed to him would have descended precisely as designated by those words. It is only where the future period is annexed to the grant that such terms would make it alternative. Hobbie v. Ogden, 53 N. E. 104, 106, 178 Ill. 357.

As used in a will by which testator bequeathed his personal estate to legatees, to be equally divided between them and their heirs and assigns, forever, the word "heirs" is a word of limitation, and not of purchase, although in regard to personal estate it is unnecessary and surplusage, merely expressing what the law would have said, had the testator been silent on the subject. Armstrong v. Moran (N. Y.) 1 Bradf. Sur. 314, 315; Zabriskie v. Huyler, 51 Atl. 197, 198, 62 N. J. Eq. 697; Palmer v. Munsell (N. J.) 46 Atl. 1094; Wood v. Seaver, 33 N. E. 587, 588, 158 Mass. 411.

After devising property to his wife and son, testator provided that, in case of their deaths and no heirs to them be left, the property should revert to his brothers. He authorized his executors, as guardians of his minor son, to dispose of the property left to the son, and reinvest as they might deem most advantageous for his maintenance. Held, that "heirs" did not mean children, and absolute estates were created in the wife and son. Hennegar v. Deadrick (Tenn.) 54 S. W. 138, 140.

The word "heirs," as used in a will devising lands to the testator's daughter and the lawful heirs of her body, declaring it to be the testator's wish that the daughter's husband should have no control or management of the property, and appointing a trustee for his daughter and her heirs to manage the same, was a word of limitation. McCauley v. Buckner, 8 S. W. 196, 197, 87 Ky. 191.

As word of purchase or description.

The words "heirs" and "their heirs" are technically words of limitation, but when used in wills they will be construed as words of purchase, when it sufficiently appears that the term is used to designate a particular person or particular persons who may stand in that relation at the happening of a certain event or at a certain period, and not to the whole line of heirs in succession. Ebey v. Adams, 25 N. E. 1013, 1016, 135 Ill. 80, 10 L. R. A. 162; Gittings v. M'Dermott, 2 Mylne & K. 69, 73; Drake v. Pell (N. Y.) 3 Edw. Ch. 251, 270; Durbin v. Redman, 40 N. E. 133, 134, 140 Ind. 694; Wettach v. Horn, 50 Atl. 1001, 1002, 201 Pa. 201; Hamilton v. Wentworth, 58 Me. 101, 105.

The word "heirs," as used in a will giving property to the heirs of testator's children, should be construed as descriptive of a class of beneficiaries. Wyman v. Johnson, 59 S. W. 250, 252, 68 Ark. 369.

The word "heirs," as used in a deed whereby the grantor conveyed certain land to a trustee for the benefit of his divorced wife, and providing that upon the death of the wife the trustee should transfer and deliver the property to the grantor or his heirs, is used as a word of purchase, and not a word of limitation; the gift of the remainder being alternative or substitutional, and the language of the deed being in effect as if it had directed that the trustee should pay the remainder after the death of the wife to the grantor, if he be then living, or, in the event of his death before the death of the wife, then to his heirs. Hobbie v. Ogden, 72 Ill. App. 242, 250, 254.

By Civ. Code, § 779, the word "heirs" is changed from a word of limitation to one of purchase, and becomes a specific designation of a class which will have the right to the property upon the termination of the life estate, so that its use in the granting clause of a deed is not repugnant to a habendum clause creating a life estate. Barnett v. Barnett, 37 Pac. 1049, 1050, 104 Cal. 298.

Where a fund is bequeathed in trust to pay the interest to testator's wife, and on her death the fund to be paid to his right heirs, on the death of the wife the fund went to the testator's heirs at common law. The words "right heirs" were as plain a descriptio personarum as though the testator had mentioned the parties by their individual names. His right heirs were his heirs at common law, and he used the words properly as words of purchase. In re McCrea's Estate, 36 Atl. 412, 413, 180 Pa. 81.

The word "heirs," as used in a will giving a life estate to testator's widow, and providing that on the death of the widow one-half of testator's estate, both real and personal, shall be divided among testator's brothers and sisters and "their heirs, forever," should be construed "to designate to whom the division should be made in case of the death of any of his brothers and sisters, using them as words of purchase, and not of descent or limitation." Flournoy's Devisees v. Flournoy's Ex'r, 64 Ky. (1 Bush) 515, 526.

By the use of the term "lawful heirs," in a will bequeathing to the testator's son "the one-half of my said effects, or to each of his lawful heirs," etc., the testator intended to provide against the lapse of any of its provisions. The testator intended that, if the primary legatee did not live to take the legacy, his child or children should take it by way of substitution, and the term "lawful heirs" was used as synonymous with children of the legatees. Cody v. Bunn's Ex'r, 18 Atl. 857, 858, 48 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 131.

The words "legal heirs," as used in a will giving the rents and proceeds of real estate to testator's sons, and on the death of any one of them the proportion of such rents and profits which he would have received, if living, to be paid to his legal heirs, and the dividends and income of the personal estate to be paid thereafter to the legal heirs of such deceased son, and upon the decease of all the sons the personal property was given upon the further trust and to the use of the legal heirs of all the sons in equal proportion, mean the persons who would by the statute succeed to the real estate in case of intestacy. "It was not intended to denote succession; that is, to invest the estate in legatees as successors of or substitutes for the sons of the testator, so that they would take the same estate in nature and quality as that which would have come to them by descent. They are to take by force of the will as purchasers. The words are used to designate the persons who are to take the personal and real estate as independent objects. It is, therefore, to be interpreted as a mere term of description, who in the prescribed contingency are to take the estate. There being nothing in the will to vary or change the natural or ordinary sense of the word 'heirs,' it must be held to describe those persons who, on the death of the sons, are to take the real estate, if it had been held in their right, and had not been the subject of a devise." Clarke v. Cordis, 86 Mass. (4 Allen) 466, 479.

The word "heirs," in a deed conveying land to one for life, and from and after her death to her husband, if he be alive, and to his lawful heirs, to and for their sole use and benefit, forever, is a word of purchase, and not of limitation. Bishop v. Tinsley, 41 S. E. 895, 898, 64 S. C. 180.

A grant of land to A., to continue for a yard to build vessels in by A. and his heirs, so long as they shall see fit, but, if they cease to use it for this purpose, not to be sold by them, but forever to remain to B. and his heirs, gives A. no more than an estate for life, and the remainder to B. is good; it being said that "heirs," as used in that part of the deed, is only descriptive of the persons for whose use the estate is conveyed, and cannot enlarge the estate. Rutty v. Tyler (Conn.) 3 Day, 470, 471.

The word "heirs," as used in the grant of a patent to one and his heirs or assigns, cannot be regarded as a definition of the patentee's own interest in the patent. There is nothing technical in the word when so used, and it indicates the persons who are to have the benefit of the patent in the event of the death of the patentee; but the absolute character of the interest of the patentee is not attributable to it, and if the word "heirs" were not used in the grant, the patent would not end with the life of the patentee, but would still possess a descendible or inheritable quality. The exercise of the right vested is not in its nature dependent on the continued existence of the persons whose merit earned the reward. De La Vergne Refrigerating Machine Co. v. Featherstone, 13 Sup. Ct. 283, 285, 147 U. S. 209, 37 L. Ed. 138.

Adopted child.

"Lawful heirs," as used in a will giving the residue of the testator's estate to his lawful heirs, means the testator's brothers and sisters, and the children of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation, and does not include the testator's adopted child, where an attempt had been made by the testator to revoke the adoption, notwithstanding the revocation might have been invalid. The proper terms to designate the relation of an adopted child is that of "adopted heir," or "heir by adoption." The relation of an heir by adoption is an exceptional and unusual one, and does not come within the original and usual meaning of the words

"lawful heirs," and those words ought not to be held ex vi termini to include an adopted heir. Reinders v. Koppelman, 7 S. W. 288, 290, 94 Mo. 338; In re Session's Estate, 38 N. W. 249, 254, 70 Mich. 297, 14 Am. St. Rep. 500.

Adults in homestead law.

Const. Fla. 1868, art. 9, § 3, providing that the exemption of a homestead to the head of a family residing in the state should accrue to his heirs, includes an adult son and an adult grandson, the son of a daughter deceased at the death of the head of the family, notwithstanding they were not at his death living at the home place. Miller v. Finegan, 7 South. 140, 141, 26 Fla. 29, 6 L. R. A. 813.

Alien.

The alien issue of a person are not his heirs in law, for they have no inheritable blood. Orr v. Hodgson, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 453, 461, 4 L. Ed. 613.

Blood relations.

Where a testatrix used the word "heirs" in her will, in which she dealt with both real and personal property, devising the same to her heirs, the term was not used in its legal sense, but rather in a popular sense to designate the blood relations of the testatrix and embraces no one not thus related. Tillman v. Davis, 95 N. Y. 17, 25, 47 Am. Rep. 1 (cited and approved in Lyons v. Yerex, 58 N. W. 1112, 1113, 100 Mich. 214, 43 Am. St. Rep. 452).

"Heirs," as ordinarily used in a will, means those who would take the testator's property under the statutes in case of intestacy; but this meaning may be controlled by the context, and as used in a will, in which the testator, after giving certain property of his two grandsons, provided that, in case of the death of both without leaving an heir, the property should revert to the testator's estate, to be expended by the executors for charitable purposes, "or given to any of my heirs who are in need, or not in very comfortable circumstances," does not mean those who would take the testator's property under the statutes had he made no will, but means those who, upon the death of both of the testator's grandsons without issue, would be his other blood relations, and who might have become his heirs in case of the death of both his grandsons without issue. It does not include all relatives, however remote. Webster v. Morris, 28 N. W. 353, 363, 66 Wis. 366, 57 Am. Rep. 278.

It is well known that persons unskilled in the law use the word "heirs" as descriptive of a class of persons who cannot in fact take as heirs. In recognition of this doctrine the words "heirs at law" have been construed to mean adopted children, next of kin, heirs of particular class or description, heirs presumptive, heirs apparent, heirs at the date of the will, heirs at the decease of the testator, or heirs even at a later date. The construction rests in each particular case upon an ascertainment of the testator's intention from the words used, from the context of the instrument, and from the surrounding circumstances. A citizen of the United States, though a native of Norway, in his will devised his real estate to the wife for life, remainder over one-half to the heirs and one-half to the heirs of his wife. He had no children, and his heirs were all non-resident aliens. Held, that under the will he intended to deliver one-half of his estate to those of his own blood who would have inherited it, but for Acts 22d Gen. Assem. c. 85, providing that nonresident aliens are prohibited from acquiring title by descent or devise, except as thereafter provided. Furenes v. Severtson, 71 N. W. 196, 197, 102 Iowa, 322.

Children.

The words "children," "issue," and "heirs" are not synonymous terms. They are technical terms, and have each acquired a peculiar and appropriate meaning. Clarkson v. Hatton, 44 S. W. 761, 762, 143 Mo. 47, 39 L. R. A. 748, 65 Am. St. Rep. 635.

A testator may use the word "heir" aside from its usual legal sense, if the plain intention manifested in the will shows that it was not employed in its legal sense. A mere presumed intention will not control its legal signification and operation, but with words of explanation, showing the manifest intent of testator, it can be made a word of purchase. King v. Beck, 15 Ohio, 559, 562.

In a suitable case the court may adopt the reading of the word "heirs" as meaning children or heirs of the body, but where the effect of the changed reading would be to defeat the clearly expressed intent of the testator and to reduce an expressed gift in fee simple to a lesser estate, the court would hardly feel authorized to do so. Walsh v. McCutcheon, 41 Atl. 813, 814, 71 Conn. 283.

From the fact that the estate of deceased persons usually descend to their children, the term "heirs" is frequently regarded as synonymous with "children." Durfee v. MacNeil, 50 N. E. 721, 722, 58 Ohio St. 238. But this arises not from the word alone but from the context, the manner and cause of speaking. Croom v. Herring, 11 N. C. 393, 395; Wyman v. Johnson, 59 S. W. 250, 252, 68 Ark. 369.

There is doubtless a technical difference in the meaning of the two words "heirs" and "children," and yet in common speech they are often used as synonymous. The technical distinction between the terms is not to be resorted to in the construction of a will, except in nicely balanced cases. Appeal of Lockwood, 10 Atl. 517, 519, 55 Conn. 157.

"When the general term 'heirs' is used in a will, it will be construed to mean 'child' or 'children,' if the context shows that such was the intent of the testator." Brown v. Harmon, 73 Ind. 412, 416 (citing Jones v. Miller, 13 Ind. 337; Rusing v. Rusing, 25 Ind. 63). And this applies to deeds, as well as to wills. Griswold v. Hicks, 24 N. E. 63, 64, 132 Ill. 494, 22 Am. St. Rep. 549; Bland v. Bland, 103 Ill. 11, 17; Summers v. Smith, 21 N. E. 191, 193, 127 Ill. 645; Smith v. Kimbell, 38 N. E. 1029, 1030, 153 Ill. 368; Fishback v. Joesting, 56 N. E. 62, 63, 183 Ill. 463; Plummer v. Shepherd, 51 Atl. 173, 174, 94 Md. 466; Albert v. Albert, 12 Atl. 11, 14, 68 Md. 352; Demarest v. Hopper, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 599, 611; Lott v. Thompson, 15 S. E. 278, 279, 36 S. C. 38; Tucker v. Tucker, 78 Ky. 503, 504; Appeal of Haverstick, 103 Pa. 394, 396; In re Hunt's Estate, 19 Atl. 548, 549, 133 Pa. 260; Jacobs v. Jacobs, 42 Iowa, 600, 606; Maguire v. Moore, 18 S. W. 897, 899, 108 Mo. 267; Boman v. Boman (U. S.) 49 Fed. 329, 331, 1 O. C. A. 274; Conger v. Lowe, 24 N. E. 889, 891, 124 Ind. 368, 9 L. R. A. 165.

In order to construe the word "heirs" as meaning children, a child must be in existence when the will is made; yet, if such is not the case, the only effect would be to construe the word "heirs" as meaning heirs proper as to realty and next of kin as to personality, and then, if children are in existence when the bequest took effect, they would take as such heirs or next of kin. The word "heirs" is flexible, and may mean next of kin or heir at law, according to the nature of property given. Ingram v. Smith, 38 Tenn. (1 Head) 411, 426.

Where the words "children" and "heirs" are used in the same instrument in speaking of the same persons, the word "heirs" will be construed to mean "children"; such usage being treated as sufficient evidence of the intention to use the word "heirs" in the sense of "children." Appeal of Ulrich, 86 Pa. 386, 392, 27 Am. Rep. 707; Criswell v. Grumbling, 107 Pa. 408, 413; Warn v. Brown, 102 Pa. 347, 352, 13 Wkly. Notes Cas. 458, 461. So, too, where the words "heirs" and "issue" are used interchangeably. Findlay's Lessee v. Riddle (Pa.) 3 Bin. 139, 148, 160, 5 Am. Dec. 355; Johnson v. Brasington, 34 N. Y. Supp. 200, 201, 86 Hun, 106; Scott v. Guernsey, 48 N. Y. 106, 122; Hawn v. Banks (N. Y.) 4 Edw. Ch. 664, 665; Britton v. Johnson (S. C.) 2 Hill, Eq. 430, 433; *Anthony v. Where a bequest is given to one, with remainder to another in case he leaves no heirs, and the remainderman would be an heir in the technical sense of the term, the word "heirs" will be construed to mean "children." Sain v. Baker, 38 S. E. 858, 859, 128 N. C. 256; Durfee v. MacNeill, 50 N. E. 721, 722, 58 Ohio St. 238; Baxter v. Winn, 13 S. E. 634, 87 Ga. 239; Boyd v. Robinson, 23 S. W. 72, 81, 93 Tenn. 1; Findley v. Hill, 82 South. 497, 498, 133 Ala. 229. Contra, holding that "heirs" meant heirs of the body, since, if the devisee died leaving grandchildren, but no children, the intention of the testator would be defeated, see Lee v. Lee, 46 Ky. (7 B. Mon.) 605, 607; Davis v. Davis, 39 N. J. Eq. (12 Stew.) 13, 14; Beatty v. Trustees of Cory Universalist Soc., 39 N. J. Eq. (12 Stew.) 452, 463; Bruere v. Bruere, 85 N. J. Eq. (8 Stew.) 432, 435; Smith v. Kimbell, 38 N. E. 1020, 1030, 153 Ill. 368.

Where a will describes certain beneficiaries as the heirs of another person, whom the testator assumes to be living, the word "heirs" will be construed to mean "children." Vannorsdall v. Van Deventer (N. Y.) 51 Barb. 137, 146; Hear v. Horton (N. Y.) 1 Denlo. 165, 168, 169, 43 Am. Dec. 639; Heath v. Hewitt, 27 N. E. 959, 961, 127 N. Y. 166, 13 L. R. A. 46, 24 Am. St. Rep. 438; Feltman v. Butts, 71 Ky. (8 Bush) 115, 120; Starnes v. Hill, 16 S. E. 1011, 1018, 112 N. C. 1, 22 L. R. A. 598 (citing Ward v. Stowe, 17 N. C. 500, 27 Am. Dec. 238; Stevens v. Flannagan, 30 N. E. 898, 899, 131 Ind. 122; Arrants v. Crumley [Tenn.] 48 S. W. 342, 343; See v. Derr, 24 N. W. 108, 109, 57 Mich. 369).

The word "heir," as used in statutes providing that, if the life of any person is lost by the carelessness or unskillfulness of another person or persons, company, corporation, or their agents, servants, or employes, then the widow, heir, or personal representative shall have right to recover damages therefor, will be construed as meaning "child," and not in its comprehensive sense. Lintz v. Holy Terror Min. Co., 83 N. W. 570, 571, 13 S. D. 489 (citing Noble v. City of Seattle, 19 Wash. 133, 52 Pac. 1013, 50 L. R. A. 822); Henderson's Adm'r v. Kentucky Cent. R. Co., 5 S. W. 875, 876, 86 Ky. 389; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Coppage (Ky.) 13 S. W. 1086; Hindry v. Holt, 51 Pac. 1002, 1003, 24 Colo. 464, 39 L. R. A. 351, 65 Am. St. Rep. 235.

Technically persons in life can have no heirs, and therefore, where property was conveyed in trust for the benefit of the present, as well as the future, heirs of T. and R., the word "heirs" meant "children." Read v. Fite, 27 Tenn. (8 Humph.) 328, 330. See, also, Chess-Carley Co. v. Purtell, 74 Ga. 467, 468.

The term "heir," in a devise, has been construed to mean "child," by reason of the fact that the testator spoke in the will of the parent of such heir. Dawson v. Schaefer, 30 Atl. 91, 92, 52 N. J. Eq. (7 Dick.) 341; In re Scott's Estate, 29 Atl. 877, 878, 163 Pa. 165; Eldridge v. Eldridge, 3 Atl. 61, 62, 41 N. J. Eq. (14 Stew.) 89, 91; Canfield v. Fallon, 57 N. Y. Supp. 149, 151, 26 Misc. Rep. 345. So a provision that the heirs of a person are to receive their share on attaining their majority indicates that the word "heir" means "children." Canfield v. Fallon, 57 N. Y. Supp. 149, 151, 26 Misc. Rep. 345; Underwood v. Robbins, 20 N. E. 230, 231, 117 Ind. 308; Jones v. Miller, 13 Ind. 337, 338; Patrick v. Morehead, 85 N. C. 62, 66, 39 Am. Rep. 684.

A will giving property to a beneficiary and limiting the property to another person, in case such beneficiary dies without an "heir at death," will be construed to mean "child" or "descendant." Robinson v. Bishop, 23 Ark. 378, 387.

Children are included in the word "heirs" in a deed to B. and her heirs, naming them, when the designated persons were her children. Brasington v. Hanson, 149 Pa. 289, 290, 24 Atl. 344.

Where by statute estates tail have been abolished, the creation of a contingent remainder on the death of the devisee without heirs indicates an intention that the word "heirs" was used in the sense of "children." King v. Beck, 15 Ohio, 559, 562.

"It is well settled that the word 'heir' will be construed to mean 'child,' when it is plain that the testator employed it in that sense." It is so used in a will devising land to the testatrix's daughter, which provides that, in case the daughter shall die having no heirs born to her, the land will revert to the estate, and be divided among the heirs of the testatrix, but which provides that it is not to be sold until after there shall have been an heir born to the body of the daughter, as it is manifest in the last clause that such is the intention of the testatrix. Es-sick v. Caple, 30 N. E. 900, 901, 131 Ind. 207.

The word "heirs," as used in a deed to A. and his heirs by B., his wife, is to be construed to mean the living children of A. and B. Tinder v. Tinder, 30 N. E. 1077, 131 Ind. 381.

The word "heirs," as used in a deed, the consideration of which is love and affection, from A. to the heirs of B., there being three children living of B. when the deed was executed, passed the title to those three children. Tharp v. Yarbrough, 4 S. E. 915, 916, 79 Ga. 382, 11 Am. St. Rep. 439. So, also, in wills. Strain v. Sweeny, 45 N. E. 201, 203, 163 Ill. 603.

The word "heirs" will be construed to mean "children," when from the whole will such appears to have been the intention of the testator; but where a devise was limited to H. "and his heirs," and where in another part of the will the testator spoke of the "estate hereby devised to H.," and the only intention in the will that the word was to be taken as one of purchase, rather than of limitation, was the fact that the words "and his heirs" were interlined, the word was not synonymous with "children," but was a word of limitation. Thurber v. Chambers, 86 N. Y. 42, 46.

The knowledge by testator, in giving to his daughters and their heirs, that some of the daughters were dead at the time of the execution of the will, is not sufficient to make the word "heirs" mean "children"; but the testator must express his intention in his will. Appeal of Barnett, 104 Pa. 342, 348.

Under the Spanish law in the state of Texas, prior to the act of the Republic of Dec. 18, 1837, the widow of a person dying intestate, without children, but leaving other relatives capable of inheriting, did not inherit the deceased husband's estate. By that act the survivor of the husband or wife dying intestate leaving no heirs inherits the estate of the deceased spouse. It was held that the act did not change the pre-existing law, so that the widow of the person so dying intestate would succeed by inheritance to the estate of her husband; the word "heirs" not being limited to children, but including other relatives by blood capable of inheriting. Branch v. Tex. Lumber Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 56 Fed. 707, 710, 6 C. C. A. 92.

Children living at execution of will.

"Legal heirs," as used by a testator in a will declaring that certain property should descend to his legal heirs, should be construed to mean the testator's then living children, who he probably expected would be alive when he died, and not his children, his grandchildren, or his collateral relations, who might be alive at the death of the testator's widow, who was entitled to a prior life estate, since, if he meant the former, a vested remainder in fee passed to his living heirs at the time of his death, but, if he meant the latter, then only a contingent remainder was created, and it could not be determined where the fee might eventually go, and, such contingent remainders not being favored, they will not be created where the testator's words are susceptible of another result. Bunting v. Speck, 21 Pac. 288, 300, 41 Kan. 424, 3 L. R. A. 690.

Collateral heirs or parents.

"Heirs at law," in its general definition, "is not limited to children. It may be used, and often is used, in cases where there are no children, and as including parents, brothers and sisters," etc. Boman v. Boman, 49 Fed. 329, 331, 1 C. C. A. 274.

A testator devised and bequeathed all his property, real and personal, to his widow, "to keep and enjoy during her lifetime, and after her death, what shall be left shall be divided equally among 'my heirs and her heirs,' share and share alike." Both testator and his wife were childless and had collateral heirs only. Held, that by the phrase "my heirs and her heirs" he meant collateral, and not lineal, heirs. "It was impossible that anybody else could have been within the intent of the testator." Appeal of Follweiler, 102 Pa. 581, 583.

As used in the constitution of a mutual benefit life association, declaring that the object of the order is to afford financial aid and benefit to widows, orphans, and heirs or devisees of the deceased members of the order, "heirs" is not to be taken "in its restricted sense, but includes any one to whom the estate of the deceased might pass by operation of law, and thus would, in many cases, include persons who were but distantly related by blood to the deceased member, who had never been members of his family, and with whom he had no personal acquaintance." Lamont v. Grand Lodge Iowa Legion of Honor (U. S.) 31 Fed. 177, 179.

Where there is nothing in any other parts of a will that throws any light upon the meaning which the testator intended should be given to his use of the word "heirs," it will be taken in its primary and legal sense as referring to those who would take or inherit from him upon his death. Under such rule, a provision that the remainder, after two life estates, was "to be equally divided among the children or heirs" of a son, conveyed the estate to the collateral heirs of the son on his death without heirs of the body. Johnson v. Brasington, 50 N. E. 859, 136 N. Y. 181.

The term "heir," as used in Gen. St. c. 57, § 2, providing that the widow, heir, or personal representative of one whose life is lost by the willful neglect of another may sue the person causing the death, and may recover punitive damages means child, and does not include parents or collateral relatives. Jordon's Adm'r v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co., 11 S. W. 1013, 89 Ky. 40 ceding, Henderson's Adm'r v. Kentucky Cent. R. Co., 5 S. W. 875, 86 Ky. 389; Henning's Adm'r v. Louisville Leather Co. (Ky.) 12 S. W. 550.

The term "heir," as used in Code, § 2337, which provides that, if a devisee dies before the testator, his heirs shall inherit the land so devised to him, unless from the terms of the will a contrary intent is manifest, is used in its ordinary sense, and is not limited to children, and hence would include a brother of the deceased. Blackman v. Wadsworth, 21 N. W. 190, 192, 65 Iowa, 80.

Where an insurance policy is made payable to the insured's wife, heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, and the wife died before insured, who, when he died, left no heirs but brothers and sisters, it was held they came within the term "heirs." Silvers v. Michigan Mut. Ben. Ass'n, 53 N. W. 935, 937, 94 Mich. 39.

The word "heirs" is one of the strongest and most expressive terms in the law, and when employed it will be given its settled legal meaning, unless the context shows in the clearest and most decisive manner that the parties who used it intended that it should have some other meaning. Heirs are lineal and collateral, but the generic term includes both classes. Children in the lifetime of the parents may be heirs presumptive, but they are not heirs. A provision in an antenuptial agreement that land shall descend to the heirs of the parties, the same as it would if they were not married, includes collateral heirs, though when the agreement was made each party had children. McNutt v. McNutt, 116 Ind. 545, 560, 19 N. E. 115, 123, 2 L. R. A. 372.

The word "heir," in the statute giving the widow, heir, or personal representative of any person killed by willful neglect a right to sue, etc., is equivalent only to "child," and no right of action exists in favor of a father. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Coppage (Ky.) 13 S. W. 1086.

Descendants or issue.

The word "heirs," as used in a will, "when unexplained or uncontrolled by the context or other provisions, has a technical meaning, which may not be departed from." But it is often used in a different sense, as meaning only children and issue. It is in all cases a question of intention. Haley v. City of Boston, 108 Mass. 576, 579. The word "heir," when used in a will, will be construed in its ordinary legal acceptance, unless the intention of the testator to use it in some other sense is clear and decisive. Gold v. Judson, 21 Conn. 618, 624; Williamson v. Williamson, 57 Ky. (18 B. Mon.) 329, 271; Loring v. Thorndike, 87 Mass. (5 Allen) 257, 269; Long v. Beaumont, 1 P.

Wms. 229; Stith's Heirs v. Barnes, 4 N. C. 96, 98, 6 Am. Dec. 547.

It is well settled that in construing wills the words "heirs at law," or "issue," will be given either their large or restricted sense as best exemplifies the wishes of the testator. In re Cramer, 69 N. Y. Supp. 299, 300, 59 App. Div. 541.

Within the meaning of a will providing that upon the death of the testator's wife his estate shall be equally divided between her children and his children then living, or their heirs, the word "heirs" was not used in its technical sense, but in the sense of issue or descendants. Schwencke v. Haffner, 50 N. Y. Supp. 165, 166, 22 Misc. Rep. 293. See, also, Speakman v. Speakman, 8 Hare, 180, 186; Chadwick v. Chadwick, 37 N. J. Eq. (10 Stew.) 71, 76.

Where a bequest is given to one, with remainder to another, in case the devisee die without heirs, and the remainderman would be an heir of the devisee, the word "heirs" will be construed "issue." Kiah v. Grenier, 56 N. Y. 220, 225; Randolph v. Randolph, 40 N. J. Eq. (13 Stew.) 73, 74, 77; Baldwin v. Taylor, 37 N. J. Eq. (10 Stew.) 78, 80; Coles v. Ayres, 27 Atl. 375, 376, 156 Pa. 197; Titzell v. Cochran (Pa.) 10 Atl. 9, 11; Goodell v. Hibbard, 32 Mich. 47, 52; Francks v. Whitaker, 21 S. E. 175, 176, 116 N. C. 518.

Where a devise is to A. and his heirs, and, if he die without issue, to B. and his heirs, the words "die without issue" will limit the meaning of the word "heirs" in the primary devise, so that it will be equivalent to the word "issue." Den v. Gifford, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 46, 51; Gifford v. Choate, 100 Mass. 343, 345; Kingsland v. Rapelye (N. Y.) 3 Edw. Ch. 1, 9. Contra, see Carter v. Reddish, 32 Ohio St. 1, 14.

In a contract between two sisters, providing that, if either of them should die before the other without a living heir, the survivor should become sole owner of a note held by them jointly, the words "living heir" should be construed to mean "issue"; for to say that one sister died without a living heir, and at the same time leaving a surviving sister, would be absurd, unless the word "heir" was construed to mean "issue." Taylor v. Smith, 21 S. E. 202, 203, 116 N. C. 531.

The words "legal heirs," as used in the phrase "his children or legal heirs," are equivalent to "descendants," and the entire phrase has the force of the word "issue." Sheeley v. Neidhammer, 37 Atl. 939, 940, 182 Pa. 163.

The word "heirs," as used in the codicil of a will providing that the twelfth clause of said will shall apply to testator's granddaughter and her heirs as though she had been originally named therein, which clause provides that, "if any of said grandchildren shall die previous to the death of my daughter leaving issue, then I direct that such issue shall take the share to which their parents would be entitled under the will, said share to be received by said grandchildren or their descendants free from control or claim of any husband," is used synonymously with "issue" and "descendants," as used in such twelfth clause. Cochrane v. Kip, 46 N. Y. Supp. 148, 152, 19 App. Div. 272.

"Lawful heirs," as used in the clause of a will as follows: "It is further my will that, if any of my sons and daughters die without lawful heirs, then in that case their portion reverts back to my heirs in common, share and share alike"—means "lawful issue." Appeal of Biddle, 69 Pa. (19 P. F. Smith) 190, 194.

Devisees or legatees.

Popularly the word "heirs" often includes devisees; the persons who are made heirs; "haeredes facti." Clark v. Scott, 67 Pa. (17 P. F. Smith) 446, 452.

The word "heirs" is commonly used by laymen to indicate the persons entitled by will or otherwise to share in the estates of decedents; hence it is held that "heir" may be regarded as a synonym of "legatee." Graham v. De Yambert, 17 South. 355, 356, 106 Ala. 279.

"Heirs" is sometimes used to mean devisees, legatees, or distributees, when it appears from the will that such was the obvious intention of the testator. Greenwood v. Murray, 9 N. W. 629, 631, 28 Minn. 120.

In common parlance the term "heir" is often employed to denote a person who acquires or may receive property, either personal or real, by right of blood relation. As used in a will, in which testatrix, after giving various legacies, gave to her husband the use of her real estate for life, "the principal to go to my heirs after his death," the word "heirs" will be held to mean those to whom she gave legacies, since any other construction would deprive them of the estate already willed to them. In re Harvey's Estate, 30 N. Y. Supp. 1, 2, 80 Hun. 371.

The word "heirs," as used in the residuary clause of a will providing that "the balance of my estate shall be equally divided among all the heirs herein named," should be construed as synonymous with "legatees," and to refer to those heirs who took under the will. Townsend's Ex'rs v. Townsend, 25 Ohio St. 477, 489; Eisman v. Poindexter, 52 Ind. 401. And though they were not limited to testator's heirs. In re Hull's Will, 63 N. Y. Supp. 725, 30 Misc. Rep. 281. Contra, see Appeal of Porter, 45 Pa. (9 Wright) 201, 207.

A testator, having made a will by which he devised the principal part of his estate to his wife and children, and directed that his slaves should be emancipated, subsequently added a codicil providing that "my heirs shall not be entitled to the provision made for them, unless they shall give security to the court for such negroes' good behavior." Held, that the word "heirs," as so used in a will, should be construed to mean those to whom he had devised his estate. In re Weir's Will, 39 Ky. (9 Dana) 434, 442.

Where testator's will disposed of all his personal property by various bequests, and by a codicil he directed that certain stocks should be reserved from sale, and that the executor should pay over the dividends as they accrued to the heirs of the testator, the word "heirs" should be construed to mean the legatees under the will. Collier v. Collier's Ex'rs, 3 Ohio St. 369, 375.

The term "heirs at law," as used in a will directing that "all of testatrix's personal estate shall be divided equally among her children and heirs at law," should be construed to mean the legatees named in the will. Roland v. Miller, 100 Pa. 47, 51.

In an accounting for settlement of an estate showing a balance due the executors, it was agreed that such matter should be submitted to arbitration. The articles of submission provided that the arbitrators "shall find what is due the estate by each heir by including the pro rata for each, which we promise to pay to present date." Held, that the word "heir," as used in the articles of submission, should be construed to refer only to the devisees named in the testator's will, and by "pro rata" was meant the proportion which each devisee was to pay of the claims against the estate. Cross' Ex'rs v. Cross, 17 N. J. Eq. (2 C. E. Green) 288, 291.

Rev. St. art. 2248, prohibiting parties from testifying in actions by or against the heirs or legal representatives of the decedent, does not include legatees. Newton v. Newton, 14 S. W. 157, 158, 77 Tex. 508.

In construing a statute giving widows who elect to take against their husband's will such interest in the real estate of the husband as the widows of intestates are entitled to under existing laws, the court says that whatever difficulty may seem to arise is removed if the word "heirs" was used, as it probably was, in the popular sense, under which all persons who should take the estate of a decedent, whether by virtue of his will or by operation of law, are equally comprehended. In re Petterson's Estate, 45 Atl. 654, 195 Pa. 78.

Where a testator, who was residuary legatee in the will of his brother, made a will giving to his brother's widow "the proportion coming to me as heir of" the said brother, the word "heir" cannot be construed in its technical sense, but in its most general sense, as indicating the person upon whom property devolves on the death of another, either by law or by will. Shapleigh v. Shapleigh, 44 Atl. 107, 108, 69 N. H. 577.

The word "heir," in an act to provide for the descent of intestate estates of and to illegitimates, is confined to those who take intestate, as distinguished from testate, estates, and whoever claims under a will claims, not as an heir or by descent, but by purchase as a devisee or legatee. Lyon v. Lyon 34 Atl. 180, 183, 88 Me. 395.

A testator, having bequeathed certain legacies to his grandchildren, devised his real estate to his wife for life, naming also residuary devisees. In a codicil to his will he gave his wife a power to sell the real estate, subject to the approval of the heirs of the testator living at the time of the sale. Held, that the word "heirs" referred either to those who would have taken the real estate by descent, had there been no will, or those who were interested in his whole estate by the provisions of the will rather than merely the residuary devisees of the real estate. Hoyt v. Hoyt, 85 N. Y. 142, 151.

An heir is one who inherits, one who takes an estate by descent, as distinguished from the devisee, who takes by will. Burrill, Law Dict. Technically, in law, an heir is the person upon whom the law casts an estate in real property immediately on the death of the ancestor, as distinguished from one who takes by will, as a legatee or devisee, and one who succeeds by law to personal property as the next of kin. Cent. Dict. Lyon v. Lyon 34 Atl. 180, 183, 88 Me. 395.

In Pennsylvania, when the word "heirs" is used as a word of purchase, it means statutory heirs—those persons designated by the intestate act to take the estate not disposed of by last will and testament. Clark v. Scott, 67 Pa. (17 P. F. Smith) 446, 452.

Distributees.

The words "heir" and "distributee" are, when technically construed, not interchangeable. The first applies to an estate of inheritance; the heir takes the land, but not the personalty. The word "heir" does not describe one who takes assets in the form of money from a personal representative, and in popular usage is more often used as meaning "child" than "distributee." Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Coppage (Ky.) 13 S. W. 1086.

On a limitation of personal property to heirs, the word will be construed "distributees." Allison v. Allison's Ex'rs (Va.) 44 S. E. 904, 908, 63 L. R. A. 920.

In a bequest of personalty, unless a contrary intent is indicated by the will, the words "heirs," "heirs at law," or "lawful or legal heirs" signify the testator's heirs as ascertained by the statutes of distribution. Appeal of McKee, 104 Pa. 571, 573; Appeal of Baskin, 3 Pa. (3 Barr) 304, 307, 45 Am. Dec. 641; Appeal of Eby, 84 Pa. 241, 245; In re Ashton's Estate, 19 Atl. 699, 700, 134 Pa. 390; In re Comly's Estate, 20 Atl. 397, 398, 136 Pa. 153; North Western Masonic Aid Ass'n v. Jones, 26 Atl. 253, 254, 154 Pa. 99, 35 Am. St. Rep. 810; Lord v. Bourne, 63 Me. 368, 379; Wright v. Trustees of M. E. Church (N. Y.) Hoff. Ch. 202, 212; Freeman v. Knight, 37 N. C. 72, 76; Corbitt v. Corbitt, 54 N. C. 114, 117; Clay v. Clay, 63 Ky. (2 Duv.) 295, 296; Kendall v. Gleason, 25 N. E. 838, 840, 152 Mass. 457, 9 L. R. A. 509; White v. Stanfield, 15 N. E. 919, 924, 146 Mass. 424; Ruggles v. Randall, 38 Atl. 885, 887, 70 Conn. 44; Cogan v. McCabe, 52 N. Y. Supp. 48, 51, 23 Misc. Rep. 739. So, also, in a conveyance of personalty. Sweet v. Dutton, 109 Mass. 589, 591, 12 Am. Rep. 744; Tompkins v. Levy, 6 South. 340, 348, 87 Ala. 263, 13 Am. St. Rep. 31; Montignani v. Blade, 145 N. Y. 111, 39 N. E. 719, 720; In re Fidelity Trust & Guaranty Co., 68 N. Y. Supp. 257, 260, 57 App. Div. 532; Armstrong v. Galusha, 43 App. Div. 248, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1. It is too well settled to need citation of many authorities for its support that the term "heirs," when used with reference to those to whom personal estate is given, means those who take by law or under the statute of distribution. Lee v. Baird, 44 S. E. 605, 609, 132 N. C. 755 (citing Burgin v. Patton, 58 N. C. 425, 428). The word "heirs," in a bequest of personalty, signifies heirs as ascertained by the statute of distribution, unless a contrary intent is indicated by the will. In re Gilmor's Estate, 26 Atl. 614, 617, 154 Pa. 523, 35 Am. St. Rep. 855. The word "heirs," in a certificate of life insurance, where there is no context to explain it, means those who would under the statute of distribution be entitled to the personal estate of the insured. Johnson v. Knights of Honor, 13 S. W. 794, 58 Ark. 255, 8 L. R. A. 732.

"In the common use of language, the children of a deceased intestate leaving personal property only would be called his 'heirs,' and such use of the term would be justified by the definitions of the word 'heir' by lexicographers; but technically they would not take the estate of the deceased as heirs, but they would take it as distributees, according to the rules established by the existing laws." As used in Acts 1848, c. 73, which provides that the real and personal estate of a married woman who shall die intestate shall descend or be distributed to her heirs, the word "heirs" was evidently intended to designate those persons who were entitled to the property of the deceased according to the laws then in force. Mace v. Cushman, 45 Me. 250, 262.

In a policy of life insurance, providing that money to become due upon the death of the person insured shall be payable to his heirs, the word "heirs" means the persons entitled to the surplus of his estate under the statute of distribution. Leavitt v. Dunn, 28 Atl. 590, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 309, 44 Am. St. Rep. 402; Northwestern Masonic Aid Ass'n v. Jones, 26 Atl. 253, 254, 154 Pa. 99, 35 Am. St. Rep. 810; Johnson v. Knights of Honor, 13 S. W. 794, 795, 53 Ark. 255, 8 L. R. A. 732; Hubbard v. Turner, 20 S. E. 640, 641, 93 Ga. 752, 30 L. R. A. 593; Walsh v. Walsh, 20 N. Y. Supp. 933, 935, 60 Hun, 297; Hubbard v. Turner, 20 S. E. 640, 641, 93 Ga. 752, 30 L. R. A. 593; Elsev v. Odd Fellows' Mut. Relief Ass'n, 7 N. E. 844, 845, 142 Mass. 224.

Under the New York decisions the meaning and scope of the word "heirs," when used to designate those who are to take personal property, either in a will or in any document having the same effect as a testament, as in an insurance policy, are to be determined from the context and the circumstances, so that, where it appears that the insured changed the beneficiary from his wife to his heirs, the word "heirs" will be construed to mean those who would take his personal estate in case of intestacy. Knights Templars & Masonic Mutual Aid Ass'n v. Greene (U. S.) 79 Fed. 461, 467.

Where a mixed fund of realty and personality is given to heirs, the testator's heirs take the land, as provided by the statute of descents, and his next of kin take the personality, as prescribed by the statute of distributions. Alexander v. Wallace, 76 Tenn. (8 Lea) 569, 570; Croom v. Herring, 11 N. C. 393, 398. Contra, holding that heirs at law would not include those who would be entitled to a share of personal property under the statute of distributions. Lombard v. Boyden, 87 Mass. (5 Allen) 249, 255.

The word "heirs," as used in a will in which the testator, after certain devises and bequests, directed all the residue of his estate to be divided among his legal heirs according to the laws of Michigan should be construed to mean distributees and not those who take by descent. Hascall v. Cox, 13 N. W. 807, 808, 49 Mich. 435.

The word "heirs," in Code Civ. Proc. § 377, allowing heirs to recover for the death of an adult by wrongful act, includes all of those capable of inheriting from the deceased generally, uncontrolled by limitation of statutes relating to the distribution of community property, and hence includes minor children of deceased. Redfield v. Oakland Consol. St. R. Co., 42 Pac. 822, 825, 110 Cal. 277.

Grandchildren.

The word "heirs" is not limited in its own meaning or by anything in the will to children, and applies either to children or to his more remote descendants, whichever may be his heirs, if he be dead. Barber v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. Ry. Co., 17 Sup. Ct. 488, 494, 166 U. S. 83, 41 L. Ed. 925.

"Heirs," as used in a will, means children living at the time of the will, and does not include grandchildren. Watson v. Watson, 19 S. W. 543, 110 Mo. 164.

In the award of arbitrators that the personal property in dispute should be equally divided among the heirs of a certain person, the award should be construed liberally, and therefore the term "heirs," or "heirs at law," may be construed to mean all such persons' children living, and the issue or children of any of them who died in his lifetime; the grandchildren taking by right of representation. Smith v. Smith (Va.) 4 Rand. 95, 103.

In Huss v. Stephens, 51 Pa. (1 P. F. Smith) 282, where a grant was to the heirs of A. "in consideration of the natural love and affection he bath for his grandchildren," the grant was held good, and the word "heirs" applied to the grandchildren as persons in being and competent to take. Darrah v. Darrah, 52 Atl. 183, 184, 202 Pa. 492.

A testator, who at the date of his will and of his death had four children living and four others who had previously died leaving children, devised his real estate to his wife for life, and directed the remainder thereof to be divided in equal shares between his children and their heirs, respectively. Held, that the word "heirs" should be construed to mean "grandchildren," and that the real estate should be distributed in equal shares between the surviving children and the representatives of the dead ones. Appeal of Bond, 31 Conn. 183, 192.

The term "legal heirs," in a will in which testator directed that after the termination of a precedent life estate his son should receive 40 acres of land and the residue should be divided equally among all his legal heirs, was construed to be limited to the grandchildren of testator, and thus limit the son to the lands specifically devised to him. The term "legal heirs" will be construed to mean "children," when it clearly appears that such was the intention of the deceased; and the principle is not different for grandchildren, when definitely referred to, as in the will in question. Griffin v. Ulen, 39 N. E. 254, 255, 139 Ind. 565.

Heirs construed as heir.

The word "heirs," as used in a will devising certain land to his heirs, should be construed to mean "heir," where a daughter of the testator was his sole heir. The use of the plural word "heirs" cannot exclude the idea that the testator's intent was to limit the estate to his daughter in case of her being the sole heir. The word "heir" is "nomen collectivum," and embraces all legally entitled to partake of the inheritance, and is interchangeable with the term "heirs." The converse is also true. Stokes v. Van Wyck, 3 S. E. 387, 390, 83 Va. 724.

A testator, having executed his will, giving in trust, for the benefit of his sole and only child, property consisting of nonancestral real estate and personal property, and directing that, "in case my said child should die without issue" her surviving, then all and singular property so devised shall pass to and vest in my heirs at law, died, leaving surviving him his said child, and also his wife, a brother, and two sisters, who survived the child. Held, that the words "heirs at law" would be construed so that the property should take the identical course under the will that it would have taken under the statute of descent and distribution, if the testator had died childless and intestate, and that, since under such statutes the widow would succeed to the property, the words "heirs at law" would be construed to mean "heir at law," and that the property would go to the widow. The term "heirs at law," though used in the plural number, refers to a class, and the class cannot be deprived of the bounty merely because the number of persons composing the class does not correspond with the number of the noun used in describing it. Weston v. Weston, 38 Ohio St. 473, 478.

Heir apparent or presumptive.

"In the strictly proper sense of the word 'heir,' no one is an heir until after the death of the ancestor; yet we use the word 'heirs' as including heirs at law, heirs presumptive, and heirs apparent. In arriving at its true meaning in a particular will, we must look at all parts of the will to see in what sense the word is used by the testator." McKelvey v. McKelvey, 1 N. E. 594, 597, 43 Ohio St. 213; Darblison v. Beaumont, 1 P. Wms. 229, 232; Heard v. Horton (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 165, 167; Stith's Heirs v. Barnes, 4 N. C. 96, 98, 6 Am. Dec. 547; Barber v. Pittsburg, F. W. & C. R. Co., 17 Sup. Ct. 488, 494, 166 U. S. 83, 41 L. Ed. 925.

When the will shows on its face that the person whose heirs are referred to is to the knowledge of the testator at that time living, it is obvious that "heirs" is not used in its strict technical sense, but means in the case of land heirs apparent, or those who would be the heirs were the living ancestor deceased, and in the case of personal property next of kin, or those who would be such were the ancestor deceased. So the use of the term in a will personally drawn by an unskillful testator, in referring to the heirs of a son mentioned several times in the will as living, will be construed to mean those who will be the heirs or next of kin of the son, if dead. Montignani v. Blade, 39 N. E. 719, 720, 145 N. Y. 111.

"The term 'heir' is not always used in the law as denoting a person whose ancestor is dead. There are many cases where it applies, though the ancestor be living, and there it means the heir apparent. In this sense it is frequently used in statutes and in legal documents." As used in a note promising to pay the heirs of B. a certain sum, the word was construed to mean the child and presumptive heir of B., and it was held that such child might maintain an action on the note before the death of the father. Lockwood v. Jesup, 9 Conn. 272, 273; Cox v. Beltzhoover, 11 Mo. 142, 146, 47 Am. Dec. 145.

The word "heirs," in a will giving the income of property held in trust to be applied to the support of the testator's son during his life, and after the son's death the principal, with any accumulated interest, to be divided equally among the rest of testator's heirs who may be living at the time of the son's decease, exclusive of his wife and any child which he has or may have, should be construed to mean heirs apparent; the son having died previously to the testator. Morton v. Barrett, 22 Me. (9 Shep.) 257, 262, 39 Am. Dec. 575.

Testator gave his real property to his wife for life, and "after the death of my wife, then half of said property to go to my lawful heirs and the other half to the lawful heirs of my said wife." He had no children, and expected none. Held, that the words "lawful heirs of my said wife" was not used in its technical sense as meaning "her children," etc., but meant those persons who, whenever her interest ceased, from whatever cause, would be entitled to take as his and her next of kin and apparent heirs at that time. Howell v. Ackerman, 11 S. W. 819, 820, 89 Ky. 22.

When, in a will, an immediate devise is made to the heirs of a person known to be living, the word "heirs" under such circumstances should be interpreted to mean heirs apparent or children. Reid v. Stuart, 13 W. Va. 338, 347.

The word "heir," when used in a will, is to be taken in its technical sense, unless there is in the will a plain demonstration that the testator used it in a different sense, in which case effect will be given to his intention. There is some support for the doctrine that, if it is shown aliunde that the testator knew that the person whose heirs are mentioned was alive at the making of his will, it will have the effect to change the meaning of the word "heirs" from its strict legal, to a less accurate and popular, sense. But where a will left all of testator's property to his wife for life, and on the termination of her life estate gave one-third to the heirs of a sister, who was living at the time of the death of testator's wife, such devise lapsed, because the sister being then living, she had no heirs, and there was, therefore, no one to take such third. Irvine v. Newlin, 63 Miss. 192, 196, 197.

The word "heirs" is a legal term, to be construed according to its strict legal import, unless there is something in the context to control the meaning. Sometimes it means children or issue, where it is plain that it is used in a popular sense as a word of description, referring to a certain class of persons; but in a deed, where there is no reason to depart from the technical meaning, it is given its usual signification. In the ordinary signification of the word "heir," no one could be an heir of another before her death. Gardiner v. Fay, 65 N. E. 825, 182 Mass. 492 (citing Wheatland v. Wheatland, 48 Mass. [7 Metc.] 169; Putnam v. Story, 132 Mass. 205; Wason v. Ranney, 167 Mass. 159, 45 N. E. 85.

A deed to C.'s heirs, while C. is living, is void for uncertainty as to grantee, since the grantor may have meant heirs, or he may have meant children, and if he meant heirs, C. while living could have none, and if he meant those who would become C.'s heirs on his death, that also is a matter of great uncertainty until C. dies. Booker v. Tarwater, 37 N. E. 979, 982, 138 Ind. 385.

Technically persons in life can have no heirs, and hence a deed to the "heirs of B.," B. being at that time living, vests the title in the children of B. in esse. Grimes v. Or-rand, 49 Tenn. (2 Heisk.) 298, 301.

A deed conveyed premises to grantor's sister and to her heirs by her present husband, for ever. It was held that, as the sister and her husband were living, there were no persons in esse who answered to the description of heirs, in consequence of the maxim: "No one can be heir during the life of his ancestor." The husband and sister being both living, the word "heirs" could not be construed as descriptio personarum of the children then living, and must be construed in its strict legal sense, as a word of limitation and not of purchase. Rivard v. Glens-hof (N. Y.) 35 Hun, 247, 249, 251.

Heirs at law, or lawful or right heirs.

The term "heirs" is synonymous with "lawful heirs," or "right heirs." In re Ken-yon, 20 Atl. 294, 297, 17 R. I. 149.

The terms "lawful heirs," "right heirs," and "heirs" are synonymous. Their signifi-cation is fixed by the law, and when they are used in a deed or will, without any superadded words or phrases indicating a dif-ferent meaning, they are always understood to be used according to their legal accepta-tion. Harris v. McLaran, 30 Miss. 533, 571.

The word "heirs," as used in a note as follows: "For full value received, I promise to pay to the legal heirs of C. K. F., four years after his death, $16," etc., means legal heirs in the popular sense of that term; that is, those persons who bore such relation to C. K. F. as would constitute them legal heirs at the time of his death—the children and issue of any deceased child. Love v. Francis, 29 N. W. 843, 848, 63 Mich. 181, 6 Am. St. Rep. 290.

An heir is one who receives, inherits, or is entitled to succeed to the possession of any property after the death of the owner; one in whom the title of an estate vests on the death of the proprietor. As used in a will providing that, if "my son die without heirs, such legacies, after his widow, are to go to the heirs of T.," the word "heirs" is used in its ordinary signification of heirs at law, and not in the sense of descendants, children, or heirs of the body. Newcomb v. Lush, 32 N. Y. Supp. 526, 529, 84 Hun, 254.

Heirs living at death of testator or an-cestor.

"Ordinarily the term 'heirs,' or 'heirs at law,' is used to designate those persons who answer this description at the death of the testator. The word 'heirs,' in its strict and technical import, applies to the person or persons appointed by law to succeed to the estate in case of intestacy." 2 Bl. Comm. 201; Rawson v. Rawson, 52 Ill. 62. Hence, where the word occurs in a will, it will be held to apply to those who are heirs of the testator at his death, unless the intention of the testator to refer to those who shall be his heirs at a period subsequent to his death is plainly manifested in the will. Kellett v. Shepard, 28 N. E. 751, 755, 34 N. E. 254, 139 Ill. 433; Clark v. Shawen, 60 N. E. 116, 118, 190 Ill. 47. See, also, Burton v. Gagnon, 54 N. E. 279, 283, 180 Ill. 345; Wright v. Gooden (Del.) 6 Houst. 397, 419; Abbott v. Brad-street, 85 Mass. (3 Allen) 587, 589; Adams v. Jones, 57 N. E. 362, 363, 176 Mass. 185; Minot v. Tappan, 122 Mass. 535, 536; *Dove v. The words "heirs," "heirs at law," or "lawful heirs," when used in a will giving property to one with remainder to his heirs, etc., will be construed to mean heirs or issue living at the death of the person named as ancestor. Woodham v. Maverick, 2 Liv. Law Mag. 487; Taggart v. Murray, 53 N. Y. 233, 238; Leake v. Watson, 21 Atl. 1075, 1076, 60 Conn. 498; Forrest v. Porch, 45 S. W. 676, 100 Tenn. 391; Reinders v. Koppelman, 68 Mo. 482, 30 Am. Rep. 802; Moore v. Gary, 48 N. E. 630, 632, 149 Ind. 51 (construing Rev. St. 1843, § 73); In re Moore's Estate, 46 N. E. 960, 961, 152 N. Y. 602 (construing 1 Rev. St. N. Y. p. 724, § 22).

When a remainder is limited to take effect on the death of any person without heirs, or heirs of his body, or without issue, the word "heirs" or "issue" shall be construed to mean heirs or issue living at the death of the person named as ancestor. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 4383; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 2046; Yocum v. Siler, 160 Mo. 281, 295, 297, 61 S. W. 208.

When a balance or residue in lands, tenements, goods, or property, is limited by writing or otherwise to take effect after the decease of any person without heirs, or bodily heirs, or successors, the words "heirs" and "successors" shall be so construed as to mean heirs or successors living at the time of the decease of the person styled ancestor. Comp. Laws N. M. § 2044.

A testator created a trust fund for the benefit of his nephews and nieces, or their legal heirs, directing that the proceeds therefrom should be paid to such nephews and nieces, or those who should legally represent them. The children of a nephew who died before the testator were embraced within the designation of "legal heirs," and were entitled to share in the proceeds of the trust fund, taking the place of their ancestor. Connecticut Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Holister, 50 Atl. 750, 751, 74 Conn. 228.

Heirs of the body.

The word "heirs," as used in a devise of property to a certain person, remainder over if said person die without issue or heirs, being used in connection with the word "issue," will be construed to mean heirs of the body. Albee v. Carpenter, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 382, 386; Wood v. Taylor, 30 N. Y. Supp. 433, 434, 9 Misc. Rep. 640; Fisk v. Keene, 35 Me. 349, 355; Gifford v. Choate, 100 Mass. 343, 345; Kingsland v. Rapelye (N. Y.) 3 Edw. Ch. 1, 9; Thurston v. Thurston, 6 R. I. 296, 300; Snider v. Snider, 54 N. E. 676, 160 N. Y. 151; Cochran v. Cochran, 17 Atl. 981, 982, 127 Pa. 486.

Testator devised his real estate to three of his sons, to be "equally divided between them, to them and the heirs of their body, lawfully begotten," except that, if either died without legal issue, his estate to be equally divided between the survivors or their legal heirs. Held, that the phrase "legal heirs" should be construed to mean "heirs of their bodies." Perry v. Kline, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 118, 123.

A will giving property to testator's son, and providing that, in case he should die without heir, it should be equally divided among testator's brothers and sisters, means heir of the body of the son, his lineal descendant. Benson v. Linthicum, 23 Atl. 133, 134, 75 Md. 141; In re Moore's Estate, 33 N. Y. Supp. 419, 421, 11 Misc. Rep. 436; Crockett v. Robinson, 46 N. H. 454, 458.

The word "heirs," in a will giving all testator's property to two specified grandchildren, share and share alike, and providing that, on the death of either without heir or heirs, the share of the decedent should go to the survivor, was said not to have been used in its primary or broader sense, as indicating the persons who would take in case of intestacy, but must have been employed in the restricted sense, as heirs of the body or descendants, for the very obvious reason that the survivor would be an heir of the deceased, and could not have been within the contemplation of the testatrix. Johnson v. Brasington, 50 N. E. 859, 156 N. Y. 181; In re Cramer, 63 N. E. 279, 280, 170 N. Y. 271.

In a devise of an estate to a man and his heirs, and if he die without leaving heirs then to his brother or any other person who may be an heir, the word "heirs" is construed to mean heirs of the body, so that the devise will operate to convey an estate tail. Turrill v. Northrop, 51 Conn. 33, 37; Lee v. Lee, 46 Ky. (7 B. Mon.) 605, 607.

In a will providing that, if a beneficiary should die without an heir before he should arrive at the age of 21 years, the property given to him should be divided between others named, "heir" is equivalent to "heir of the body." Lippett v. Hopkins (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 567, 568.

In construing a will, in which testator devised certain property to his daughter and to her heirs, forever, but, in case the daughter should die without any heir or heirs, then to another beneficiary, the courts say that by the use of the words "heir or heirs," in the statement of the contingency upon which the estate is to go over, deceased obviously intended to designate the issue or heirs of his daughter's body. Taking the words in this sense, the provision is that, if the daughter shall die without issue, then after her decease the residue of testator's estate shall go over, whatever it may be at the decease of his said daughter. Wilson v. Wilson, 19 Atl. 132, 133, 46 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 321.

Testator gave all his property to his executors, in trust for the support of an illegitimate son, but not to be sold or conveyed. By the third clause he directed the property after the decease of the son to go to such son's heirs when they should become of age, and if he died leaving no heirs or widow to go to the testator's niece, and after the decease of the heirs, if any, of his adopted son, the property should go to testator's niece. Held, that the word "heir" meant the heirs of the son's body, and not heirs generally. Kiah v. Grenier (N. Y.) 1 Thomp. & C. 888, 892.

A will providing that the property devised and bequeathed to testator's daughter was for her own separate use and her heirs, forever, means heirs of the body. Jordan v. Roach, 32 Miss. 481, 604.

"Heirs," as used by a testator in directing that his freehold house and his leaseholds be kept in hand and let to the best advantage, and the produce be divided every year to certain named beneficiaries, or to their "lawful heirs," refers to heirs of the body. Harris v. Davis, 1 Colly. 416, 423.

Husband or wife.

The husband of a devisee cannot be considered one of her "legal heirs," in the sense of the term as used in the devise over to legal heirs. Buck v. Paine, 75 Me. 582, 589; Appeal of Ivins, 106 Pa. 176, 182, 51 Am. Rep. 516; Brown v. Ransey, 74 Ga. 210, 214, 216.

A widow is not an heir of her husband. Wells' Guardian v. Moore, 16 Mo. 478, 481; Lord v. Bourne, 63 Me. 368, 379, 18 Am. Rep. 234.

The widow is an heir at law under the statute. Weston v. Weston, 38 Ohio St. 473, 478.

The term "heir," as used in Const. art. 9, § 3, providing that the exemptions provided for in sections 1 and 2 shall accrue to the heirs of the party having enjoyed or taken the benefit of such exemption, means the persons who shall inherit the property, whether they be infants or adults. It does not include a widow of the deceased owner, when the latter leaves surviving children. Miller v. Finegan, 7 South. 140, 142, 26 Fla. 29.

The word "heirs," as used in Code Iowa, § 2337, providing that, if a devisee dies before the testator, his heirs shall inherit the land so devised to him, unless from the terms of the will a contrary intent is manifest, will not include the widow of a devisee. Blackman v. Wadsworth, 21 N. W. 190, 192, 65 Iowa, 80.

Under a statute providing that, on the death of the husband intestate, the wife shall be entitled to take a certain portion of his estate absolutely, it is held, under a will providing that if any of testator's children, to whom certain property was bequeathed, should die without leaving issue, the share devised to such child should revert to the estate and go to the right heirs of testator, testator's widow is included in the term "heirs"; the court remarking that, in order to ascertain who is the heir, it is necessary only to inquire to whom by the law of the land the estate would pass in case of intestacy. Seabrook's Ex'rs v. Sabrook (S. C.) McMul. Eq. 201, 207. See, also, Croom v. Herring, 11 N. C. 393, 395.

The words "heir or heirs," as used in the will bequeathing a sum to a person and at his death to his heir or heirs, should he have any, should be construed to mean heirs of the body, and will not include his widow. Snider v. Snider, 42 N. Y. Supp. 613, 614, 11 App. Div. 171.

The word "heirs" is often controlled by the words with which it is associated, and as used in the following devise: "I give and devise to my beloved wife, M. E. F., the farm on which we now live in S. county, Ind., to have and to hold so long as she remains my widow, after which said real estate shall be equally divided among my heirs"—it will not be construed as including the widow; her estate being only for so long as she remains unmarried. Wood v. Beasley, 7 N. E. 331, 332, 107 Ind. 37.

The word "heirs," as used in a will directing that the rest of testator's property, such as the stock, farming utensils, and household and kitchen furniture, be sold and equally divided among all his heirs, with the exception of one child, means the testator's children as such, and confines the succession to them as his next of kin, and not as distributees under the statute, and his widow would not take under the residuary clause. Henderson v. Henderson, 46 N. C. 221, 223.

The word "heirs," when used in Pennsylvania, means statutory heirs—that is, those who take under the intestate act—and includes the widow of the deceased person. In re Ryan's Estate (Pa.) 14 Wkly. Notes Cas. 79.

Where a statute provides that the widow of a husband dying intestate is heir to one-half of his real and personal property, if there be any children living, such widow is entitled to share in the proceeds of an insurance policy payable to the husband's legal heirs. Anderson v. Groesbeck, 55 Pac. 1086, 1090, 26 Colo. 3. See, also, Lyons v. Yerex, 58 N. W. 1112, 1113, 100 Mich. 214, 43 Am. St. Rep. 452; Hanson v. Minnesota Scandinavian Relief Ass'n, 60 N. W. 1091, 1093, 59 Minn. 123; Alexander v. Northwestern Masonic Aid Ass'n, 18 N. E. 556, 559, 128 Ill. 558, 2 L. R. A. 161. But where the widow is thereunder entitled only after all the husband's kindred, she has no claim to the fund as against his brothers and sisters. Johnson v. Knights of Honor, 13 S. W. 794, 53 Ark. 255, 8 L. R. A. 732. And where the assured leaves children at his death the policy is payable to them; his widow in such case not being included as a legal heir. Gauch v. St. Louis Mut. Life Ins. Co., 88 Ill. 251, 254, 30 Am. Rep. 554.

Where an insured took out a certificate of membership in a mutual insurance association, which declared that the insurance should be paid to the assured's legal heirs, the term "legal heirs" would be construed to include the insured's widow; the court saying; "We think all this inconsistent with the theory that he used the phrase 'legal heirs' in its ordinary [legal] acceptation, but we think that he intended thereby to designate his wife and children, if he should have any; and this is the meaning often attached to the phrase 'legal heirs' by the unlearned, especially when only personal property is concerned." Kaiser v. Kaiser (N. Y.) 13 Daly, 522.

The word "heirs" signifies to laymen those who take an estate by inheritance; but where the word is used in an insurance policy, in which the applicant stated that he wished the benefit paid to his heirs, and that the beneficiaries stood in relationship to him as wife or daughters, it must be construed as meaning that the benefit should be paid to the widow, or, if the insured left no widow, to his surviving daughters. Addison v. New England Commercial Travelers' Ass'n, 12 N. E. 407, 409, 144 Mass. 591.

The words "heirs at law," in Mansf. Dig. §§ 5225, 5226, giving a right of action to the heirs at law of any person whose death is caused by the wrongful act, negligence, or default of another, are used in contradistinction to "devisees," and include all those entitled to a share in the distribution of the personal estate of persons dying intestate, including the widow. At common law the technical meaning of the term "heir at law" is "one on whom the law casts an estate in real property immediately on the death of the ancestor intestate." St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Needham (U. S.) 52 Fed. 371, 372, 3 C. C. A. 129. So, also, under 2 Hill's Code Wash. § 138. Noble v. City of Seattle, 52 Pac. 1013, 1015, 19 Wash. 133, 40 L. R. A. 822.

Illegitimate children.

The term "heirs at law," as used in a will in which the testator disinherited his nephew, the son of his sister, and provided that "my heirs at law will inherit my undivided estate, but he must have none," referring to the nephew disinherited, the testator leaving no descendants, but there being numerous descendants of testator's illegitimate half-brother, included the descendants of such illegitimate half-brother, considering the fact that testator had kept two of such descendants in his own family, and had treated them with peculiar confidence and affection as nephew and niece, as long as he lived. Strode v. Magowan's Heirs, 65 Ky. (2 Bush) 621, 627.

Where a party, entitled to the benefits of the pre-emption laws of the United States, makes a pre-emption filing in Kansas, but dies before consummating his claim, and his administrator files the necessary papers to complete the same, and upon payment for the land obtains from the United States a patent granting the land to the heirs of the deceased pre-emptor, the word "heirs" is to be construed with reference to the laws of Kansas; and an heir by such law is one who is capable of inheriting from another, or one who succeeds to the estate of a deceased; and as by statute, also, illegitimate children inherit from the father, when such children have been generally and notoriously recognized by him as his own, the word "heirs" will include the illegitimate children. Caldwell v. Miller, 23 Pac. 946, 948, 44 Kan. 12. See, also, Hutchinson Inv. Co. v. Caldwell, 14 Sup. Ct. 504, 505, 152 U. S. 65, 38 L. Ed. 356.

The word "heirs" implies legitimacy and a capability of taking by inheritance. Henderson v. Henderson, 1 Atl. 72, 74, 64 Md. 185.

Legal representatives.

See, also, "Legal Representative"; "Personal Representative"; "Representative."

The term "heirs," as used in a will devising the residue of the testator's estate to a trustee, to be held for the benefit of certain devisees and legatees until a certain year, when "the said trustee may pay over to them, or heirs, their respective portions" of the principal, as well as interest, should be construed to include legal representatives, and not to have been used by the testator in its strict legal sense. Wiggin v. Perkins, 5 Atl. 904, 907, 64 N. H. 36.

The word "heirs," in a will directing that at the time specified for the termination of a trust created thereby the corpus of the estate should be divided into three parts, and the parts should go to the heirs or legal representatives of testator's children, was used in the same meaning as the words "legal representatives" were there used, and describes the persons who are to take the corpus of the estate at the time of the distribution. The words are used in their natural and proper sense, as including all those persons who at that time shall be capable of inheriting from either of the children named, or of taking the property of either of such children under the statute of distributions.

Blakeman v. Sears, 51 Atl. 517, 518, 74 Conn. 516.

The words "or his heirs," in a federal statute authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the accounts of a former pursuer in the navy, and directing the payment of the sum that may be found due him on such adjustment to him or his heirs, are simply words of succession, and descriptive of his estate and the money found to be due him, and were used in the statute in the sense of "personal representatives" and intended to secure the money to his estate in the event of his death before it was paid. Price v. Forrest, 35 Atl. 1075, 1080, 54 N. J. Eq. (9 Dick.) 669.

Next of kin.

The word "heirs," when used by a testator to indicate the beneficiaries of a bequest of personal property, is equivalent to the term "next of kin," in the absence of anything in the will pointing to some other interpretation as more consonant with the testator's intention. In re Sinzheimer (N. Y.) 5 Dem. Sur. 321, 322 (citing Tilman v. Davis, 95 N. Y. 17, 47 Am. Rep. 1); McCormick v. Burke (N. Y.) 2 Dem. Sur. 137, 139; Cushman v. Horton, 1 Hun. 601, 602; Id. (N. Y.) 4 Thomp. & C. 103, 104; Bodine v. Brown, 42 N. Y. Supp. 202, 12 App. Div. 335; Montignani v. Blade, 39 N. E. 719, 720, 145 N. Y. 111; Lord v. Bourne, 63 Me. 368, 379, 18 Am. Rep. 234; Scudder's Ex'rs v. Vanarsdale, 13 N. J. Eq. (2 Beas.) 109, 110; Reen v. Wagner, 26 Atl. 467, 51 N. J. Eq. 1; Tuttle v. Woolworth, 50 Atl. 445, 447, 62 N. J. Eq. 532; Harris v. McLaran, 30 Miss. 533, 555. This is especially so when associated with the words "executors or assigns." Tompkins v. Levy, 6 South. 346, 348, 87 Ala. 263, 13 Am. St. Rep. 31; Martling v. Martling, 39 Atl. 203, 206, 55 N. J. Eq. 771. The word "heirs," in a will giving personal property to a person, or, in case of his death, to his heirs, means next of kin. Trenton Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Donnelly (N. J.) 55 Atl. 92, 94.

A by-law of a mutual benefit association, directing that, in case a member makes no appointment of a beneficiary, his benefit on his death shall be paid to his legal heirs dependent on him, should be construed to mean next of kin. Britton v. Supreme Council of Royal Arcanum, 18 Atl. 675, 679, 46 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 102, 19 Am. St. Rep. 376.

A will in which, after specific legacies to his widow and his brother, the testator devised the remainder of his property, real and personal, to his widow for life, and at her death to his legal heirs as the law provides, other than those mentioned in the will, means those to whom the testator's property would go by descent or by the statute of distributions according to its quality. There being no issue, next of kin in equal degree are the heirs contemplated by the testator. Minot v. Harris, 132 Mass. 528.

The word "heirs," as used in a devise of testator's real estate to his wife for life, remainder to his heirs, should be construed to mean next of kin. Rusing v. Rusing, 25 Ind. 63, 64.

The word "heirs," as used in a marriage settlement directing that personal property belonging to a wife shall be vested in trustees to the use of the husband for life, and after his death to the use of the wife and her heirs, and to no other uses, means "blood relation on whom the law casts the inheritance on the death of the ancestor, and is taken here as next of kin." Tyson v. Tyson, 9 N. C. 472, 481.

Testator died, and his will gave the residue of his estate to a trustee, in trust to keep the real estate in repair and renting, and the personal estate securely invested, and to pay the income of the whole to his daughters, and to hold the principal in one-third parts in trust for the uses and purposes declared by the last will of his daughters, respectively, and in default of wills for the use of the child or children of the daughters, and in default of such will and child and children, or issue of such, then the principal "to the heirs and next of kin of the daughters so dying as provided by the intestate law of Pennsylvania." In this provision there are apt terms which define with precision each of the two classes of beneficiaries, to wit, heirs and next of kin. It has been so often held that, when technical words are used in a will or other instrument, they must have their technical meaning, unless a contrary intent appear, that it would be a mere affectation of learning to cite the authorities. It is impossible not to draw from this language that the distinction between real and personal estate was constantly in the mind of the testator, and that he intended that the principal of the part which constituted the realty should go to the heirs, and that the part which constituted the personality should go to the next of kin. Appeal of Ivin, 106 Pa. 176, 182, 183, 184, 51 Am. Rep. 516.

The words "my heirs" mean next of kin. Borroughs v. Adams, 78 Ind. 160, 161.

In a legacy to the lawful heirs of A., when it appears in the will that the latter is living, the term "heirs" is equivalent to a legacy to his next of kin or to his children. "It is always a question of intention as to the meaning of a testator in the use of the word 'heirs.' If it appear that the intention was for the heirs, properly and technically such, to take the estate, there can be no objection to his title." Simms v. Garrot, 21 N. C. 393, 394.

It is a general and settled rule that upon the devise of real estate to a particular person and to his heirs at law, which is to vest the estate at a future time upon the occurrence of some designated contingency, the words "heirs at law" have their common-law signification, and are not to be construed as meaning next of kin; and the same rule prevails where there is a devise and bequest of the whole real and personal estate embraced in one common provision; or where, there being different provisions, the same expressions are used in reference to each kind of estate; and more particularly where, in administering the estate under the will, the real estate may be blended with and made a part of the share or portion of the personal estate given to a particular legatee. Lombard v. Boyden, 87 Mass. (5 Allen) 249, 254.

In construing an act providing that in all cases where a citizen of this state or of the United States shall die or may have died possessed of or entitled to any real estate, and shall have no heir who can inherit the same, because of alienage, in such case the real estate shall not be considered subject to escheat, but shall be sold, and the proceeds paid to the devisees of the deceased citizen, etc., it was held that the words "shall leave no heir who can inherit" could not be construed to mean "shall leave no heir, next of kin, or devisee who can inherit," by reason of alienage, so that the real property should be sold and the proceeds paid over as required by the act only in such a case, but that the phrase meant, not the next of kin, but an heir that might inherit the real estate under the laws of the state. McLearn v. Wallace, 35 U. S. (10 Pet.) 625, 638, 9 L. Ed. 558.

The word "heirs" is sometimes used as descriptive of the next of kin, or of the person or persons appointed by law to succeed to personal property. In re Aspden's Estate, 2 Fed. Cas. 37, 42.

The word "heirs," when it is used to denote succession in a gift of personalty, is always a misnomer, because "heirs" is a word of limitation, and there can be no limitation, in strictness, of a chattel interest. Its popular meaning comprehends those who succeed to the property of an ancestor, and hence includes next of kin and those who take under the statutes of distribution, as well as heirs at law. The courts are forced to accept this definition where a gift of personalty is to one and his heirs, or to one for his life and then to his heirs. In re Comly's Estate, 20 Atl. 397, 398, 136 Pa. 153; In re Neely's Estate, 25 Atl. 1054, 1058, 155 Pa. 133; In re Ashton's Estate, 19 Atl. 699, 700, 134 Pa. 390; In re McCrea's Estate, 36 Atl. 412, 413, 180 Pa. 81.

Manner and amounts taken fixed.

"A devise to heirs designates not only the persons who are to take, but also the manner and portions in which they are to take, and when there are no words to control the presumption of the will of the testator the law presumes his intention to be that they shall take as heirs will take by the rules of descent." Dagget v. Slack, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 450; Holbrook v. Harrington, 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 102, 104; Rang v. Sanger, 115 Mass. 124, 127; Childs v. Russell, 52 Mass. (11 Metc.) 16, 21.

When a legacy is given to the legal heirs or next of kin of a person, without mentioning the proportion in which the fund is to be divided, it is to be inferred that the legatees should take according to the statute of distributions. Tillinghast v. Cook, 50 Mass. (9 Metc.) 143, 148. See, also, Leavitt v. Dunn, 28 Atl. 590.

The term "heir" carries with it the idea of representation. Bartine v. Davis, 46 Atl. 577, 578, 60 N. J. Eq. 202.

The word "heirs," ex vi termini, implies representation, and this meaning is not changed by being coupled with the word "children," as used in a bequest to testator's daughter and the children and heirs of his sons, so that the estate is to be divided per stirpes, and not per capita. In re Ashburner's Estate, 28 Atl. 361, 159 Pa. 545.

A bequest to the heirs of testator's niece, who died before testator, is a class gift, which, on his death, vests in her descendants who were then living per stirpes; the word "heirs" being used in its primary legal sense, and not to denote those who would succeed to her personal estate under the statute of distributions. Ruggles v. Randall, 38 Atl. 885, 887, 70 Conn. 44. See, also, King v. Savage, 121 Mass. 303, 306.

By the term "legal heirs," as used in a will giving his wife a life estate in the income of his property, and the reversion after her death to the legal heirs, the testator meant to designate those of his collateral kindred to whom the law would have given the property in case of intestacy, and the children of deceased brothers and sisters take per stirpes, and not per capita; the word "legal" seemingly having been used in the sense and to express the idea of "according to law." Woodward v. James, 22 N. E. 150, 152, 115 N. Y. 346. See, also, Bailey v. Bailey, 25 Mich. 185, 190.

A will giving all of testator's estate to his brothers and sister and their children, and in case of the death of either of them to their heirs, carries the gift of the whole estate over to the children who have survived their parents, per capita and not per stirpes; the word "heirs" being of the same meaning as the word "children." Murphy v. Harvey (N. Y.) 4 Edw. Ch. 136, 137.

A devise to heirs simpliciter is per stirpes. The term designates a class only, and it is composed of those upon whom the statute would cast the inheritance if there was no will; and since, to ascertain who they are, resort must be had to the statute, it will determine also the proportion in which they take. But where the will indicates the proportion in which the heirs are to take, the will controls. Consequently, where property was to be "equally divided" among the testator's heirs, such provision of the will controls, and the property was divided per capita. Best v. Farris, 21 Ill. App. 49, 51, 52.

The word "heirs," while generally and technically conveying the idea of representation, is not necessarily always to be understood in that sense. Though a word of limitation, it may be used as one of designation of the devisees in whom at a fixed time the estate devised shall vest in possession. Bisson v. West Shore R. Co., 38 N. E. 104, 105, 143 N. Y. 125.

Where by the terms of a will heirs take as purchasers though it may be necessary, in order to ascertain who the heirs are, to refer to the law of descents, yet such persons will take as individuals per capita, and not per stirpes as representatives of their ancestor. Ward v. Stow, 17 N. C. 509, 512, 27 Am. Dec. 238.

Conditional fee created.

A gift to A., "or to his heirs," or to his representatives, is an absolute gift to A., on condition that he is alive on the death of the testator; but, if he dies in the lifetime of the testator, the gift takes effect in favor of the other persons described as substitutes of the primary legatee. Brokaw v. Hudson's Ex'rs, 27 N. J. Eq. (12 C. E. Green) 135.

By a will certain land and other property was devised to testator's son, and by a subsequent clause it was provided that, if said son "died without heirs, then the property hereby given to him shall be equally divided between" testator's three sisters. Under this will the son took a fee, contingent only upon the event of his dying without heirs, or, as is evidently meant in this will, children, and not a life estate with the remainder to such children. Cowan v. Wells, 73 Tenn. (5 Lea) 652, 682, 684.

Contingent remainder created.

The word "heirs" in its strictly technical sense denotes the person to whom, at the ancestor's decease, the law passes the inheritance. During the life of the ancestor the heir must therefore be considered as a person either not in being or not ascertained, inasmuch as it is uncertain who will fill that character at the time of the ancestor's death. It would seem, then, to follow that the limitation to the heirs of a person in existence, if it had the other qualities of a remainder, must be a contingent remainder. Williamson v. Williamson, 56 Ky. (18 B. Mon.) 829, 367.

Under a will giving land to testator's wife for life, and directing that at her death it should be divided between testator's heirs at law, the remaindermen are uncertain till the death of the testator's wife, and therefore the will creates a contingent remainder. Forrest v. Porch, 45 S. W. 676, 100 Tenn. 391.

In a devise of an estate for the use of a daughter during her natural life, and for the use of the heirs of that daughter after her death, the word "heirs" will be held to have been used in its technical sense, and not in the sense of "children," so that the devise created a contingent remainder for the heirs of the daughter, which does not become vested until after her death. Wallace v. Minor, 10 S. E. 423, 425, 86 Va. 550.

Estate of inheritance created.

The word "heirs," as ordinarily used in a deed, means that an estate of inheritance is created. Unfreville v. Keeler, 1 Thomp. & C. 486, 487; Pierson v. Armstrong, 1 Iowa, 282, 292, 63 Am. Dec. 440.

Fee simple passed.

"In a deed an estate in fee simple could not be created at common law, nor could an estate in fee tail be created under St. Westminster II, without the word "heirs" used in its technical sense of a word of inheritance. See Fountain County Coal & Min. Co. v. Beckleheimer, 102 Ind. 76, 1 N. E. 202, 52 Am. Rep. 645.

The word "heirs" is as necessary in the creation of an estate tail as of a fee simple. 1 Co. Litt. 20a; 4 Kent, Comm. 6; 2 Bl. Comm. 114. Littleton says: "If a man would purchase the lands or tenements in fee simple, it behooveth him to have these words in his purchase, 'To have and to hold to him and his heirs,' for the words 'his heirs' make the estate of inheritance; for if a man purchased lands by these words, 'To have and to hold to him forever,' or 'to have and to hold to him and his assigns forever,' in these two cases he hath but an estate for life, because of the absence of the words 'his heirs,' which words only make an estate of inheritance in all feoffments and grants." Adams v. Ross, 30 N. J. Law (1 Vroom) 505, 512, 82 Am. Dec. 237. And the grantee takes only a life estate in the premises. Clearwater v. Rose (Ind.) 1 Blackf. 137, 138; Gainey v. Briggs, 9 Ark. (4 Eng.) 46, 54.

A conveyance to one and his heirs always creates an estate in fee simple, and it has been settled that no words are so apt and appropriate for this purpose as "heirs." Robinson v. Payne, 58 Miss. 690, 708 (citing

1 Washb. Real Prop. 41, 71; 1 Shars. Bl. Comm. 470; Terrel v. Sayre, 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 598, 601; Harris v. Taylor, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 413, 416; Zabriskie v. Wood, 23 N. J. Eq. (8 C. E. Green) 541, 545; Young v. Kinkead's Adm'r (Ky.) 40 S. W. 776, 777; Keniston v. Adams, 14 Atl. 203, 205, 80 Me. 290.

In a will the legal force of the word "heirs" may sometimes be controlled by the context, but not so in a deed. It is in a deed a term of art, and unless it is used in a deed only an estate for life will pass. Brown v. Mattocks, 103 Pa. 16, 21. When used in a will "heirs" may be controlled in its meaning by the context, but in a deed it is a term of art and indispensable to carry a fee. Phillips v. Sawnk, 13 Atl. 712, 713, 120 Pa. 76, 6 Am. St. Rep. 691.

A devise to one "and his heirs" creates a fee simple, if unqualified by other words; but a restraining power is sometimes given to subsequent words or clauses. Den v. Gifford, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 46, 50; Korn v. Cutler, 26 Conn. 4, 6. So, also, in wills. Appeal of Evans, 51 Conn. 435, 437; Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. v. Chandler, 91 Mass. (9 Allen) 159, 168.

As a general rule the word "heirs," in a mortgage or other deed of conveyance of land, is essential to pass a fee-simple estate; but where the language employed and the recitals and conditions of the mortgage plainly evidence an intention to pass the entire estate, it will be understood to pass such an estate, though the word "heirs" is not employed. Brown v. First Nat. Bank, 6 N. E. 648, 650, 44 Ohio St. 269.

A conveyance to the heirs of a person who has children then living, reserving a life estate in the grantor and another, is a present grant of the fee to such person. Heath v. Hewitt, 127 N. Y. 166, 27 N. E. 959, 13 L. R. A. 46, 24 Am. St. Rep. 438; Rivard v. Gisenhof (N. Y.) 35 Hun, 247, 249.

The application of the principle that in a common-law conveyance the use of the word "heirs" is necessary to create an estate in fee is not affected by the circumstance that the conveyance is made in trust, and that a less estate will not be sufficient to satisfy the trust. Weller v. Rolason, 17 N. J. Eq. (23 C. E. Green) 13, 17.

Where the contrary intention is not clear, or where, in connection with a grant of the fee, or even of a life estate, the word "heirs," "heirs of the body," or other words of inheritance, are used to denote the successive line of those who would be entitled to the estate, a fee simple absolute will pass; fees tail having been abolished by the statute, or, rather, having been declared to be the equivalent of fees simple. Granger v. Granger, 46 N. E. 80, 82, 147 Ind. 95, 36 L. R. A. 186, 190.

A limitation to heirs entitled the ancestor to the whole estate; and this, though the deed might express that the first taker should have a life estate only. Brooks v. Evetts, 33 Tex. 732, 742 (citing 4 Kent, Comm. 215; Hancock v. Butler, 21 Tex. 807); Ewing v. Barnes, 40 N. E. 325, 327, 156 Ill. 61.

A devise to one and his heirs carries the fee to the first taker. Allen v. Craft, 9 N. E. 919, 921, 109 Ind. 476, 58 Am. Rep. 425; Homet v. Bacon, 17 Atl. 584, 585, 126 Pa. 176; Tucker v. Williams, 23 S. E. 90, 117 N. C. 119; Brown v. Bryant, 44 S. W. 399, 400, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 454.

Legacy vested.

The word "heirs," when uncontrolled by the expressed intention of the will, has the effect to vest a legacy which would otherwise be contingent. Appeal of Little, '11 Atl. 520, 527, 117 Pa. 14; Appeal of Muhlenberg, 103 Pa. 587, 593. Consequently a bequest of a testator's whole estate, to be equally divided, after the termination of the life estate, "by giving an equal share to each child or its heirs," vested the legacies in the children, and the share of one dying after the testator, but before the termination of the life estate, was payable to such child's representatives. Appeal of Muhlenberg, 103 Pa. 587, 593; Miller v. Gilbert, 22 N. Y. Supp. 355, 357, 3 Misc. Rep. 43.

The word "heirs," as used in a will directing that executors should, after the decease of the testator's wife, to whom was given a life estate in a certain farm, sell the farm and divide the proceeds equally between the testator's brothers and sisters and their heirs, the children of any that may be dead to have the shares of their deceased parents, should not be construed technically, so as to vest legacies absolutely at the testator's death, so that, on the subsequent death of a legatee during the life of the widow, his legacy would pass to his administrator or other personal representative. This the testator did not intend, but rather that the children of any deceased parent who, if living at the death of the widow, would have been a legatee, should have the share of such deceased parent. Richey v. Johnson, 30 Ohio St. 288, 296. See, also, Lenke v. Watson, 21 Atl. 1075, 1076, 60 Conn. 498.

Testator directed his executors to divide a certain fund into nine equal parts, and to pay over annually one-ninth of the interest of the investment of the whole to each of his nine grandchildren, or, if one of them die leaving heirs, then to such heirs. Held, that the word "heirs," as used by the testator in such connection, imported that the grandchildren were to take a vested interest in the fund placed in trust for them; and thus, if one of the grandchildren died, his share should be paid to such person or persons as would be entitled to it as his legal representative under the law; that is, it was not to go to the survivors, but was to be construed as vested in the deceased child. Appeal of Reed, 11 Atl. 787, 788, 118 Pa. 215, 4 Am. St. Rep. 588.

Where grantor conveys land to the heirs of his son after the termination of life estates reserved to the grantor and his wife, the son having children living at the time of the grant, the conveyance operated to vest a present fee in the children of the son. Heath v. Hewitt, 127 N. Y. 166, 27 N. E. 959, 13 L. R. A. 46, 24 Am. St. Rep. 438.

Conflict of laws.

"Heirs at law," as used in a bequest, must be interpreted in accordance with the meaning of the word in the country of the testator's domicile, since, if at the time of making his will and of his death the testator was domiciled in England and had a reference to its laws, the designation "heirs at law" might indicate a very different person or persons from what might be the case if the testator had been domiciled in another country, and in order to interpret the term it is indispensable that the country by whose laws the will is to be construed should first be ascertained. Harrison v. Nixon, 34 U. S. (9 Pet.) 483, 504, 9 L. Ed. 201.

The term "heirs at law," in a Massachusetts Benefit Association certificate issued to a resident of that state, will be construed in Connecticut by the laws of Massachusetts. Mullen v. Reed, 29 Atl. 478, 479, 64 Conn. 240, 24 L. R. A. 664, 42 Am. St. Rep. 174.

The term "heir at law" means the person or persons on whom lands descend according to the law of the state or kingdom in which they are situated, and hence in North Carolina means the children of a deceased person. Jones v. Jones, 6 N. C. 150, 157.

Personal property.

The word "heirs" is inapplicable to a bequest of personal estate. De La Vergne Refrigerating Machine Co. v. Featherstone, 13 Sup. Ct. 283, 284, 147 U. S. 209, 37 L. Ed. 138; Dukes v. Faulk, 16 S. E. 122, 127, 37 S. C. 255, 34 Am. St. Rep. 745. Hence a bequest of personal property to a person, without adding the word "heirs," or "heirs of his body," carries an absolute estate in the property. De La Vergne Refrigerating Machine Co. v. Featherstone, 13 Sup. Ct. 283, 284, 147 U. S. 209, 37 L. Ed. 138.

The word "heirs" is not strictly proper to designate persons who succeed to the personal estate of an intestate. Tillman v.

Davis, 95 N. Y. 17, 24, 47 Am. Rep. 1; Cook v. First Universalist Church, 49 Atl. 389, 390, 23 R. I. 62.

"The word 'heirs' is used to denote the persons who are entitled by descent to the real estate of a deceased ancestor. It is appropriate to that purpose, and, when used in a pleading in reference to personal estate, it has no meaning, and must be rejected as surplusage." Henry v. Henry, 31 N. C. 278, 279.

"Strictly the words 'heirs' and 'heirs of his body' are inapplicable to personal property. Whereas real estate is conveyed to a man, his heirs and assigns, personal property is assigned to him, his executors, administrators, and assigns." Glover v. Condeil, 45 N. E. 173, 179, 163 Ill. 566, 35 L. R. A. 360.

The will of B., after certain devises and bequests, contained this residuary clause: "All the rest, residue, and remainder, real and personal, I give, devise and bequeath to my heirs, in the same manner as it would be, had I died intestate." Testator at the time of the execution of the will and at the time of his death owned no other real estate save that devised to the wife. Held, that the word "heirs" in the residuary clause referred only to the testator's real estate. Luce v. Dunham, 69 N. Y. 36, 42.

The term "heir" has no legal significance in respect to persons entitled to succeed to the personal property of the intestate. These are now usually signified in judicial proceedings, as well as in judicial decisions, by the term "distributees." Hopkins v. Miller, 92 Ala. 513, 515, 8 South. 750.

In an assignment of all the right and title of and to property, personal, real, or mixed, which the assignor has or may have as heir of another person, the word "heir" is not used in any exact or technical way, and the assignment is intended to convey all the property which the assignor was entitled to receive from the estate of the designated person. Swan v. Warren, 138 Mass. 11, 13.

The words "heirs" and "heirs of the body," applied to personal estate, have been sometimes held to be used synonymously with "children," a construction which, of course, requires an explanatory context. In re Towne's Estate (Pa.) 5 Montg. Co. Rep. 103, 104 (citing 2 Jarm. Wills [5th Am. Ed.] p. 614).

He on whom the law casts an inheritance on the death of the ancestor is designated by the technical word "heir." It could not originally be used to designate on whom the law casts the goods or chattel property, for it casts them on no one. No person was appointed to succeed to the deceased ancestor. On his death they became "bona vacantia," and were seized by the king on that account, and by him as grand almoner applied to pious uses, now considered superstitious. Hence it is that in the common-law vocabulary there could be found no technical word to designate such successor. After one was pointed out by the statute of distributions, the technical word used in regard to inheritance would not answer for that purpose; for very frequently the persons are different, the rules of distribution being very different from the canons of descent. The word "heir," therefore, retains its technical meaning, when standing alone and unexplained by the context. May v. Lewis, 43 S. E. 550, 551, 132 N. C. 115 (citing Croom v. Herring, 11 N. C. 393).

HEIRS AND ASSIGNS.

A grant to one and his heirs and assigns is apt and appropriate to pass a fee simple absolutely, except where these words are accompanied by a collateral limitation, by which the freehold previously granted is restricted. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. v. Chandler, 91 Mass. (9 Allen) 159, 168.

The words "heirs and assigns," as used in the habendum clause of a deed, are not words of purchase, but limitation, and their use in place of "his successors in office," in a deed to a bishop of the Catholic Church, does not render the deed invalid. Morgan v. Johnson (U. S.) 106 Fed. 452, 458, 45 C. C. A. 421.

In Rev. St. U. S. § 2322 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1424], relating to the granting of mining claims, and providing that the locators of all mining claims heretofore or which shall hereafter be made on any mineral vein, ledge, or lode set upon the public domain, their heirs and assigns, etc., shall have the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all the surface included within their lines of location, etc., the words "heirs and assigns" are not words of limitation, but are used to designate the estate conveyed as one of inheritance. Black v. Elkhorn Min. Co. (U. S.) 49 Fed. 549, 552.

"Heirs and assigns," as used in 3 Rev. St. (2d Ed.) p. 226, providing that deeds and conveyances made in pursuance of a former act, which authorized aliens to purchase and hold real estate within the state of New York, should vest the lands conveyed, so far as related to the question of alienism, in the grantees named therein and their heirs and assigns, and should not be restricted in their application to the immediate heirs or assigns of the grantees in such deeds, but would also extend to all persons who might inherit the lands or to whom they might descend or be assigned. Augustus v. Graves (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 595.

The phrase "heirs and assigns," as used in the treaty of 1794 with Great Britain, which provided that neither British subjects holding land within the United States nor their heirs and assigns should be regarded as aliens, so far as in respect to said lands, is to be construed as meaning "all who would in any manner succeed to the title of the alien owner, dividing them into two classes in reference to the mode of acquiring title, to wit, those acquiring title by descent and by purchase; the latter class including devisees." Watson v. Donnelly (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 653, 658.

"Heirs and assigns," as used in a will by which property was left to certain persons, their heirs and assigns, forever, by virtue of 1 Rev. St. p. 729, § 22, must be construed to mean heirs or issue living at the death of the person named as ancestor. Woodham v. Maverick (N. Y.) 2 Liv. Law Mag. 487.

In construing a life policy payable to the legal representatives of insured, "for his heirs and assigns," the court say that the phrase "for his heirs and assigns" is obscure. Whether, in using that language, it was intended that the assured should retain to himself the power of assignment, if he should think fit to exercise it, and if not exercised the trust fund should go to his heirs, or whether the word "assigns" was intended to mean the assigns of the heirs, as if the policy read "his heirs and their assigns," is uncertain. The latter construction would seem to effect the apparent intention of the assured. Golder v. Chandler, 32 Atl. 784, 785, 87 Me. 63.

HEIRS AT LAW.

See "Heirs."

An heir at law "is one who succeeds to the estate of a deceased person." McKinney v. Stewart, 5 Kan. 384, 394.

The phrase "heirs at law" means the same as "heirs general." They are the kindred by blood of a deceased intestate, who inherit his land; those upon whom the law of descent casts the title. Such persons take the land by operation of that law and according to it. Forrest v. Porch, 45 S. W. 676, 100 Tenn. 391.

The term "heirs at law," qualified by other language in a will, has a perfectly definite meaning, which cannot be changed by proof outside of the will itself. In re Lester's Estate, 87 N. W. 654, 115 Iowa, 1.

The term "heirs at law," as used in a will in which the testator devised all his estate, real and personal, to his heirs at law, refers to the person in whom the laws of the state vest the estate of an intestate. It does not mean heirs at the common law. In re Aspden's Estate, 2 Fed. Cas. 37, 42.

HEIRS BY ADOPTION.

The term "heir by adoption" may properly be used to designate a child by adoption, who is "in a limited sense made an heir, not by the law, but by the contract evidenced by the deed of adoption." In re Sessions' Estate, 38 N. W. 249, 254, 70 Mich. 297, 14 Am. St. Rep. 500.

HEIRS BY OR OF THE BLOOD.

The term "heirs by blood," in a devise to testator's niece, and after her death to her heirs by blood, meant those persons whose relationship was by some tie of consanguinity, and excluded all others, such as husband, wife, or adopted children. It included an illegitimate son. Hayden v. Barrett, 52 N. E. 530, 531, 172 Mass. 472, 70 Am. St. Rep. 295.

"Heirs of the blood of the father" means the same thing as "heirs on the part of the father," and includes heirs both in the ascending and descending line. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Patterson, 13 Atl. 369, 68 Md. 606.

HEIRS BY PRESENT HUSBAND.

A grant of land to M. and her heirs, by her present husband, H., is to be construed as conveying a life estate to M., with remainder in fee to the children of M. and H. at the time of the execution of the grant, subject only to be opened to let in after-born children. Lehndorf v. Cope, 13 N. E. 505, 507, 122 Ill. 317.

HEIRS FOREVER.

The words "heirs forever" are ordinarily words of inheritance, and are descriptive of the inheritable character of the estate conveyed, and not of the persons who are to take the estate, and are therefore wholly inappropriate to describe an estate for life. Reed v. Fidelity Trust & Safety Vault Co., 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1895, 1897, 44 S. W. 957, 958.

HEIRS GENERAL.

The term "heirs general" has the same meaning as "heirs at law," and means the kindred by the blood of a deceased intestate, who inherit his land; those upon whom the law of descent casts his title. Forrest v. Porch, 45 S. W. 676, 100 Tenn. 391.

The term "heirs generally," in a deed to the grantor's daughter of an estate for life, with the remainder to her children or child, and in default thereof to her heirs generally, was held not limited in meaning to collateral heirs, but to be used in its commonly accepted legal sense. The term, in view of the statute providing that an adopted child shall be regarded for the purposes of inheritance as a child born in lawful wedlock, includes an adopted child in preference to collateral heirs. Butterfield v. Sawyer, 58 N. E. 602, 604, 187 Ill. 598, 52 L. R. A. 75, 79 Am. St. Rep. 246.

HEIRS LAWFULLY BEGOTTEN.

"Heirs of the body lawfully begotten," as used in a will devising property to H., in case T. H. should die without heirs of his body lawfully begotten, or before they shall arrive at the age of 21 years, was synonymous with the word "issue." Raborg's Adm'r v. Hammond's Adm'r (Md.) 2 Har. & G. 42, 53.

A bequest and devise of personal and real property to a certain person and his "lawfully begotten heir," forever, should be construed to mean lawful issue. Hall's Lessee v. Vandegrift (Pa.) 3 Bin. 374, 386.

A will devising property to a certain person, providing that, if he left "heirs begot in lawful marriage bed," he might appoint to one or more of his sons, implies a devise to such heirs, but does not make them take as heirs in tail. The words, standing alone, would be equivalent to the word "issue." McDonald v. Dunbar (Pa.) 12 Atl. 553, 556.

The legal construction of the words "lawfully begotten heirs," in a devise, is not that they may be satisfied by a descent to any person lawfully begotten who is his heir, though not of his body. In Barret v. Beckford, 1 Ves. Sr. 521, Lord Hardwicke said: "The proper construction of legitimate heirs is 'heirs of his body, lawfully begotten.'" Dewan v. Cox, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 10, 14.

"Heirs lawfully begotten of her body," as used in the following devise: "I lend the use of the negroes K. and G. to my daughter C. during her natural life, and at her death to be equally divided between the heirs lawfully begotten of her body"—is construed to mean the daughter's children living at her death. Prescott v. Prescott's Heirs, 49 Ky. (10 B. Mon.) 56, 60.

A will contained a devise for life, and then over to the children of the tenants for life in fee simple, with a limitation that, if such tenant for life "should die without leaving any heirs, lawfully begotten of their or either of their bodies" then, etc. Held, that the heir or heirs lawfully begotten, in view of the testator, were the children of the tenant for life, who were to take on the tenant's death. Stevenson v. Evans, 10 Ohio St. 307, 315.

HEIRS MALE.

Lord Coke says: "If a man give lands to a man, to him and his 'heirs male,' the law rejects the word 'male,' because there is no such kind of inheritance." This was undoubtedly of a common-law grant or conveyance; for in another place he says: "If a man by his last will devise lands and tenements to a man and to his heirs male, this by construction of law is an estate tail, the law supplying the words 'of his body.'" Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Patterson, 13 Atl. 369, 68 Md. 606. See, also, Weart v. Crusier, 13 Atl. 36, 87, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 475; Crane v. Fogg, 8 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 819, 883.

In Dawes v. Ferrers, 2 P. Wms. 3, Lord Chancellor Macclesfield says: "The words 'heirs male' (in a will) mean 'heirs male of the body,' and would never extend to heirs male in any collateral line." Dewan v. Cox, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 10, 14.

In a devise to testator's nephews for life, with remainder to "their male heirs that they now have or may have hereafter," the expression "male heirs that they now have" is a good description of the male children of the testator's nephews who were then living. The testator meant "heirs apparent," and not "heirs," in its legal signification. The devise of the remainder, therefore, embraced all the sons of a nephew who died before the testator's death, and who were living at the death of the testator. Conklin v. Conklin (N. Y.) 3 Sandf. Ch. 64, 67.

HEIRS MALE OF HIS BODY.

The words "heirs male of his body," or "male heirs of his body," are technical words of limitation, expressing an estate, as the words "heirs of his body" express an estate in fee tail general. By an inflexible rule of law, where such words, without further explanation of their meaning, and whether with or without superadded words of limitation, are applied by the same instrument to define who of the first taker's blood shall take the estate after him, whether his estate as declared be indefinite, or an express estate for life, that estate is enlarged according to the technical meaning of such words. Jillson v. Wilcox, 7 R. I. 515, 518.

"Heirs male of his body," as used in a will leaving property to J. for life, and after his decease to the heirs male of his body for their natural lives, in succession, according to their respective seniorities, or in such proportion as the "said J., their father," shall by deed or will direct, meant sons. Jordan v. Adams, 6 C. B. (N. S.) 748, 764. On appeal the Exchequer Chamber were equally divided. See 9 C. B. (N. S.) 483.

In a devise to A. for life, without impeachment of waste, remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainder, remainder to the "heirs male of the body of A." to be begotten severally, successively, and in remainder, one after another, according to seniority, the elder of such sons and the heirs male of his body being always preferred before the younger of such son and sons and the heirs male of their bodies, and in default of such issue to the "daughter and daughters" of the body of A., the words "heirs male of her body" were explained, by the subsequent words, to mean "first and other sons." Goodtitle v. Herring, 1 East, 264, 275.

HEIRS OF THE BODY.

See "Lineal Heirs of the Body."

The word "heir" or "heirs" is wholly technical, meaning the person or persons who may by law inherit. The words "heirs of the body" are equally technical, meaning such of the offspring or issue as may by law inherit. Black v. Cartmell, 49 Ky. (10 B. Mon.) 188, 193.

The words "natural heirs" and "heirs of the body," in a will and by way of executory devise, are considered as of the same legal import. Smith v. Pendell, 19 Conn. 106, 112, 48 Am. Dec. 146.

The term "bodily heirs" means the class of persons who by law take property by inheritance or succession from another. Donnell v. Mateer's Ex'rs, 40 N. C. 8, 9.

Where the term "heirs of the body" is used in a devise, accompanied by the words "share and share alike," or "equally," or "in equal parts," or kindred words, and "their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns," the statute of distribution must be looked to for the parties who answer that description and take the devise; but the method of distribution is fixed by the devise itself to be per capita and not per stirpes, and the estate is one of purchase, and not of descent. Dukes v. Faulk, 16 S. E. 122, 127, 37 S. C. 255, 34 Am. St. Rep. 745.

As words of limitation.

The phrase "heirs of the body" in its primary and natural sense, "is a phrase of limitation, and not of purchase." Schoonmaker v. Sheely (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 485, 490; Nelson v. Davis, 35 Ind. 474, 478; Burns v. Weesner, 34 N. E. 10, 134 Ind. 442; In re Bacon's Estate, 52 Atl. 135, 138, 202 Pa. 535.

"Heirs of the body" are proper technical words of limitation, when used in a deed. Taylor v. Taylor, 63 Pa. 481, 3 Am. Rep. 565.

"Heirs of the body" are strictly and technically words of limitation. Nothing can convert them into words of purchase but a clearly expressed intention of the testator to use them in an abnormal sense. Linn v. Alexander, 59 Pa. (9 P. F. Smith) 43; Pearsol v. Maxwell (U. S.) 68 Fed. 513, 514; Lanhan v. Wilson (Ky.) 22 S. W. 438; Wilker- son v. Clark, 7 S. E. 319, 320, 80 Ga. 367, 12 Am. St. Rep. 258; Brant v. Gelston (N. Y.) 2 Johns. Cas. 384.

The term "heirs of the body," as used in a deed, can have effect only as words of limitation. Standing by themselves, they are wanting in the element of certainty which is essential in order to treat them as words of purchase. There is a familiar Latin maxim, the meaning of which may well be expressed in English to the effect that "no one is the heir of a living person." There is nothing, therefore, to justify the limitation of the phrase "heirs of her body" to make it include only children living at the date of the deed; for it is to be given effect, if at all, as a description of a class of persons at a subsequent date, when after-born children or remoter descendants would be in esse, and therefore included within the term. Slayton v. Blount, 9 South. 241, 242, 93 Ala. 575.

The words "heirs of the body," etc., are words of limitation, and not of purchase. Notwithstanding the words "and to his, her, or their heirs and assigns," etc., were added, these were to be rejected as repugnant to the estate created by the preceding words. Brant v. Gelston (N. Y.) 2 Johns. Cas. 384.

"Heirs of her body," when used in a bequest of personal property to a certain person and the heirs of her body, must be considered words of limitation, and not words of purchase. Hinson v. Pickett, 1 Hill, Ch. 35, 37; Simms v. Buist, 30 S. E. 400, 402, 152 S. C. 554; Chewning v. Shumate, 32 S. E. 544, 106 Ga. 751; Whatley v. Barker, 4 S. E. 387, 79 Ga. 790; Ewing v. Shropshire, 80 Ga. 374, 7 S. E. 554.

The term "bodily heirs," in a conveyance to a beneficiary and her bodily heirs, is an appropriate term of limitation, and will be so construed, unless it appears from the instrument that it was used by the grantor in the sense of "children." Lanham v. Wilson (Ky.) 22 S. W. 438; Donnell v. Matter's Ex'rs, 40 N. C. 7, 8, 9.

As words of purchase.

"It is a well-settled doctrine of all modern cases that the words 'heirs of the body' may be construed as words of purchase whenever there is anything in the instrument which shows that they were used to designate certain persons answering the description of heirs at the death of the party." Williams v. Allen, 17 Ga. 81, 83.

The words "heirs of the body" ordinarily are words of limitation, and not words of purchase; but they are frequently used in wills to denote children, or as synonymous with "children," and when used in that sense by the testator they must be construed as words of purchase, and not of limitation. Powell v. Glenn, 21 Ala. 458, 465.

A deed to one and the heirs of her body after her death is such a grant as would at common law have fallen within the rule in Shelley's Case, and, being made subsequent to the statute (Code, § 1025) abolishing that rule, is governed by that statute, and therefore such deed operates to convey to the first taker only a life estate, at the termination of which those who are heirs of the body of the life tenant take the remainder by purchase in fee. Wilson v. Alston, 25 South. 225, 226, 122 Ala. 630. See, also, Leathers v. Gray, 2 S. E. 453, 457, 96 N. C. 548.

Adopted child.

The term "bodily heir," in a will, is the exact equivalent of the words "heirs of the body," and hence, while the adoption of a child gives him capacity to inherit as heir and next of kin, it does not make him a bodily heir. Balch v. Johnson, 61 S. W. 289, 290, 106 Tenn. 249.

"Bodily heir" is a well-established technical term, and is defined in And. Law Dict. 508, as "an heir begotten of the body; a lineal descendant." Such heirs are the only ones referred to and included in the term "children" in Rev. St. 1855, c. 32, § 5, providing that any conveyance or devise which would have created an estate tail under St. 13 Edw. I should vest an estate for life only in the grantee or devisee, and on his death the fee should go to his children or their issue, and, if none, then to his heirs, and under such statute the fee would not go to an adopted child of such grantee or devisee. Clarkson v. Hatton, 44 S. W. 761, 762, 143 Mo. 47, 39 L. R. A. 748, 65 Am. St. Rep. 635.

All descendants.

The words "heirs of the body" are held to be of larger significance than the word "children," and, like the word "issue," to include descendants of every degree. Houghton v. Kindall, 89 Mass. (7 Allen) 72, 76, 78.

The phrase "heirs of the body of the father" includes only heirs in the descending line. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Patterson, 13 Atl. 369, 68 Md. 606.

In its technical sense the term "heirs of the body" includes all persons who successfully answer the description of "heirs of the body," and hence it embraces the whole line of lineal descendants to the most remote generation. Technically construed, the expression is one which cannot be used to describe the children or grandchildren of a living person, for "nemo est hæres viventis." Roberts v. Ogbourne, 37 Ala. 174, 178.

A deed conveyed land to "A., to have and to hold unto the said A. during her natural life, and after her death to be equally divided between the lawful heirs of her body." Held, that the words "lawful heirs of her body" meant, not an indefinite succession of heirs, but a remainder at the particular time, absolutely as individuals. Fields v. Watson, 23 S. C. 42, 46.

Children.

The term "heirs of her body," as used in a will bequeathing to testator's daughter a certain sum and to the "heirs of her body" a certain negro girl, means "children." "In a strict sense, no person can sustain the character of heir in the lifetime of the ancestor, but it is always open to inquiry whether the testator used the word according to its strict and proper acceptation, or in a more inaccurate sense to denote children, next of kin," etc. Bailey v. Patterson (S. C.) 3 Rich. Eq. 156, 158; Black v. Cartmell, 49 Ky. (10 B. Mon.) 183, 193.

The term "heirs of the body" is sometimes used in a will in the restricted sense of "children." It is given a meaning according to the apparent intention of the testator manifest in the will. Appeal of Eichelberger, 19 Atl. 1006, 1007, 135 Pa. 160; Pierce v. Ridley, 60 Tenn. (1 Baxt.) 145, 147, 25 Am. Rep. 769; Hickman v. Quinn, 14 Tenn. (6 Yerg.) 96, 103.

The words "heirs of her body," while they have a well-defined technical significance, sometimes have the popular signification of children, and in a conveyance in trust for the use of H. and the heirs of her body during her life and then to her heirs, H. being alive at the time that the deed was executed, the words heirs of her body could not have been used in their technical sense, for nemo est hæres viventis, and hence they must have been used in the sense of children. Shaw v. Robinson, 20 S. E. 161, 162, 42 S. C. 342; Gibson v. Gibson, 49 N. C. 425, 428; Roberts v. Ogbourne, 37 Ala. 174, 179.

In a devise of real estate "in trust for children left by my daughter M. of her body, or the descendants of such child or children, if she leaves no child," and directing that, if the heirs of her body shall fail before arriving at the age of 21, the property shall pass to another, the words "heirs of her body" though ordinarily technical words, used to designate a whole line of descent, are here used by the testatrix merely for the purpose of describing the particular persons who, under the prior limitations, would take the estate, and hence they are synonymous with the words "children left by my said daughter." Boutelle v. City Sav. Bank, 26 Atl. 53, 54, 18 R. I. 177.

The term "heirs of their body," as used in a will providing that a negro willed and devised to testator's daughters was for their support and maintenance and the support and maintenance of the heirs of their bodies, and after their death should descend directly to the heirs of their bodies, should not be construed in its technical legal sense, but as meaning "children." Powell v. Glenn, 21 Ala. 458, 465.

Where testator devised land to his son for life, and after death to the "heirs of his body by him begotten," with remainder over if he should have no "heirs of his body by him begotten" surviving, the modifying words of the term "heirs of his body" limiting that phrase to "children," the rule in Shelley's Case cannot be invoked to extend the devise to the son for life to a devise in fee simple. Granger v. Granger, 46 N. E. 80, 84, 147 Ind. 95, 36 L. R. A. 190; Granger v. Granger, 44 N. E. 189, 147 Ind. 95, 36 L. R. A. 186. See, also, Loving v. Hunter, 16 Tenn. (8 Yerg.) 4, 31; Leathers v. Gray, 2 S. E. 455, 457, 96 N. C. 548.

In a will providing that the interest on a legacy, made a charge on testator's land, be paid to the legatee for life, and directing the payment of the principal to the legatee's bodily heirs at her decease, the term "bodily heirs" is used in the popular sense of "children," and not in its technical sense; so that the legatee takes only a life estate. In re Gerhard's Estate, 28 Atl. 684, 160 Pa. 253; Twelves v. Nevill, 39 Ala. 175, 180.

Code, § 2448, provides in limitations over to heirs that the terms "heirs of the body," "lineal heirs," "lawful heirs," "issue," and like words shall mean "children." Section 2250 provides that a gift to one and the heirs of his body conveys an absolute estate. A testator left to his daughter and her bodily heirs and to his son certain real estate, to be divided when they became of age, providing that his wife have a life interest therein, unless she married or moved away. The daughter married and died after the death of the testator, leaving no children. It was held that the daughter took an absolute fee in the land of an undivided half interest, subject to the right of the widow. Craig v. Ambrose, 4 S. E. 1, 2, 80 Ga. 134.

The expression "bodily heirs," as used in the provision of a will that "the property herein devised to my children is to remain their own during their natural lives, and to descend to their bodily heirs, if any," is equivalent to the expression "heirs of the body" as used in the statute providing that, if a remainder be limited to the heirs of the body of a person to whom a life estate in the same premises is given, the persons who are the heirs of the body of such tenant shall take as purchasers a devise in fee on the termination of the life estate. Stratton v. McKinnie (Tenn.) 62 S. W. 636, 640.

The words "heirs" and "bodily heirs," as contained in a deed reciting that "it is expressly agreed and understood that said second party is to deed or will said lands to the bodily heirs of J. C. Dupoyster,—in other words, the title and possession of said lands is only invested in said second party during his natural lifetime, then to said heirs of J. C. Dupoyster; the second party has the discretion of allotting said lands between said heirs as he may see proper"—mean "children," and B. was vested with only a life estate, remainder to the children of D., which vested in the first-born child, and was subject to be opened to let in the after-born children. Ft. Jefferson Imp. Co. v. Dupoyster, 51 S. W. 810, 812, 108 Ky. 792, 48 L. R. A. 537.

The words "issue of his body" are more flexible than the words "heirs of his body," and courts more readily interpret the former as the synonym of "children," and a more descriptio personarum, than the latter. Daniel v. Whartenby, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 639, 21 L. Ed. 661. In Carpenter v. Van Olinder, 127 Ill. 42, 19 N. E. 868, 2 L. R. A. 455, 11 Am. St. Rep. 92, we construed the words "issue of their bodies" as meaning children. In Butler v. Huestis, 68 Ill. 594, 18 Am. Rep. 589, it was said that the words "issue" and "children" might be construed interchangeably, in order to effectuate the intention of the testator. In Summers v. Smith, 127 Ill. 645, 21 N. E. 191, it was said that every part of the will might be taken into consideration for the purpose of showing that the words "heirs of body," which are less flexible than the words "issue of body," are used synonymously with "children." And in the Summers Case it was held that the words "dying without heirs of body" meant "dying without leaving such heirs of body as the estate would have vested in in fee instantly upon the death of the first taker, as children," etc. Strain v. Sweeny, 45 N. E. 201, 202, 163 Ill. 603.

Grandchildren.

"Heirs of the body," as used in a devise of property to a certain person, remainder over to the heirs of the body of another person, who had children living at the time of the execution of the will, which fact was known to testator, was construed to mean children or descendants and to include grandchildren. Knight v. Knight, 56 N. C. 167, 169.

Heirs generally.

"Heirs of her body," as used in a conveyance of land by a father to his daughter and to the heirs of her body, is to be construed to mean heirs generally, under the rule in Shelley's Case, and vests in the daughter a fee-simple estate. Lane v. Utz, 29 N. E. 772, 130 Ind. 235.

Heirs living at death of life tenant.

"Heirs," as used in a will giving a life estate to one person, and at her death to be paid over to the children who should be the surviving "heirs of her body," means those children who, when the legacy became payable, were the surviving heirs of the body of the life tenant, and not those who were heirs at the testator's death, for, strictly speaking, no one could be an heir of the life tenant until her death. Houghton v. Kendall, 89 Mass. (7 Allen) 72, 75.

Heirs of the body must be persons not only who answer the requirements of lineal descendants of the parent stock, but also such persons who would stand at the date of the death of the life tenant as an heir under the provisions of the statute of distributions. Dukes v. Faulk, 16 S. E. 122, 127, 37 S. C. 255, 34 Am. St. Rep. 745.

Testator bequeathed his property to trustees to pay the income to his daughter S. for her sole use during her life, and at her death to be divided equally among all the heirs of her body, and, if she should have any, the children of any one of her children that might be dead to take collectively what their parent would have been entitled to if living, and if any died before their mother, without issue, the share of such to go to the survivor or survivors, and, in default of such heirs, equally to her brothers and sisters and their heirs. Held, that the phrase "heirs of her body" meant children alive at the daughter's death. Clemens v. Heckscher, 40 Atl. 80, 85, 185 Pa. 476.

Issue.

The term "heir of the body" is a well-established technical term, with which the words "children" or "issue" or "lawful issue" are not synonymous. Sewall v. Roberts, 115 Mass. 262, 276.

The words "heirs of the body" and "issue" are generally equivalent in a will, though the former are regarded as the stronger and more technical terms. Whitworth v. Stuckey (S. C.) 1 Rich. Eq. 404, 412; Smith v. Greer, 6 South. 911, 912, 88 Ala. 414; Raborg's Adm'r v. Hammon's Adm'r (Md.) 2 Har. & G. 42, 53.

The phrase "lawful heir of the body," as used in a will providing that the testator's estate should go to his sons, and that, if either of them should die without any lawful heirs of their body, then the share of said deceased son should go to the surviving brothers, is precisely equivalent to "lawful issue"; that is, children or descendants. Parker v. Parker, 46 Mass. (5 Metc.) 134, 139.

Where it appears from a will that the testator has used the terms "issue" and "heirs of the body" interchangeably, the words "heirs of the body" are not to be construed technically, but as equivalent to "issue." Gallagher v. Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co., 46 Atl. 451, 454, 22 R. I. 141.

In construing a grant to the grantee and the heirs of her body, the court observes that the words "heirs of her body" include all heirs descending from the grantee, and by force of the terms themselves take in the whole generation; that the word "heirs" is stronger than the word "issue"; and that subsequent words in the grant, giving an estate to the heirs and assigns of the heirs of the grantee's body, are either merged in the preceding words or are too uncertain to control them. McGinnis v. McPeake, 2 N. J. Law (1 Penning.) 291, 298.

Contingency created.

"Heirs of her body," within a conveyance of a life estate to a certain woman, with remainder to the heirs of her body surviving her, means descendants; and therefore the person to whom the remainder is to go must be a child or descendant, and the event upon which the estate takes effect is the death of the life tenant leaving some descendant her surviving. The requirement that the reversion should go to an heir of her body her surviving places a contingency upon the remainder, for it could not be determined until the death of the mother whether she would leave an heir of her body her surviving. Hall v. La France Fire-Engine Co., 53 N. E. 513, 514, 158 N. Y. 570 (citing Purdy v. Hayt, 92 N. Y. 446).

A deed granting land to a woman and the heirs of her body, to have and to hold the same unto said woman and the heirs of her body, to her and their heirs and assigns, forever, does not use the words "heirs of her body" in the sense of "children," thereby conveying title to the woman and such children in equal shares, but in its technical sense, and it creates a conditional fee in a woman. Miller v. Graham, 25 S. E. 165, 167, 47 S. C. 288; Archer v. Ellison, 5 S. E. 713, 715, 28 S. C. 238; Simms v. Buist, 30 S. E. 400, 402, 52 S. C. 554.

Estate tail created.

The words "heirs of the body" have by long course of legal interpretation acquired a settled meaning, whereby they impute to the grantor the intention to create an estate of inheritance restricted in the course of descent to the lineal heirs of the ancestor named. Wilson v. Alston, 25 South. 225, 226, 122 Ala. 630.

The words "to one of the heirs of his body and issue" are words of issue, creating an estate tail, and are not words of purchase. Smith v. Greer, 6 South. 911, 912, 88 Ala. 414.

Where a devise is to one and the heirs of his body, the phrase "heirs of his body" creates an estate tail by the rule of the common law. Henderson v. Walthour (Pa.) 15 Atl. 893, 894; Parker v. Parker, 46 Mass. (5 Metc.) 134, 139; Monroe v. Douglass, 5 N. Y. (1 Seld.) 447, 452; McMeekin v. Smith (Ky.) 21 S. W. 353, 354; Ralston v. Truesdell, 35 Atl. 813, 814, 178 Pa. 429; Spachius v. Spachius, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 172, 175; Granger v. Granger, 46 N. E. 80, 82, 147 Ind. 95, 36 L. R. A. 190. But such estate tail is by statute converted into a fee simple. McMeekin v. Smith (Ky.) 21 S. W. 353, 354; Granger v. Granger, 46 N. E. 80, 82, 147 Ind. 95, 36 L. R. A. 190; Smith v. Greer, 6 South. 911, 912, 88 Ala. 414; Seaman v. Harvey (N. Y.) 16 Hun, 71, 73.

The use of the word "children" does not show that the term "heirs of the body" was used in a sense other than its usual technical signification. Monroe v. Douglass, 5 N. Y. (1 Seld.) 447, 452.

The words "to her bodily heirs" are technical words of entail, and thus, when used in a gift of real property to a certain person for life, then to her bodily heirs, the words operate to give the first beneficiary a fee tail, Jones v. Jones, 20 Ga. 699, 700; Middleton v. Smith, 41 Tenn. (1 Cold.) 144, 145; which under the statute became a fee simple absolute, Middleton v. Smith, 41 Tenn. (1 Cold.) 144, 145; Ford v. Cook, 73 Ga. 215, 217.

Personal property.

"Strictly the term 'heirs of his body' is inapplicable to personal property. Whereas real estate is conveyed to a man, his heirs and assigns, personal property is assigned to him, his executors, administrators, and assigns." Glover v. Condell, 45 N. E. 173, 179, 163 Ill. 566, 35 L. R. A. 360.

HEIRS OF MONEY.

The term "heirs of money," used in a will, has no technical meaning. Cook v. First Universalist Church, 49 Atl. 389, 390, 23 R. I. 62.

HEIRS OF THEM.

Where a will gave a life estate to a husband and wife and the fee to the "heirs of them," a contention that the word "heirs" could not be taken in its technical sense on the theory that the heirs of them must be the heirs of both, and that nobody could be the heirs of both except the children of both, and that hence the word "heirs" was equivalent to "children," and a word, not of limitation, but of purchase, was of no merit, but "the heirs of them" was to be construed as "their heirs." Auman v. Auman, 21 Pa. (9 Harris) 343, 347.

usufruct, but grants an absolute estate in the legatee. Succession of Justus, 12 South. 130, 45 La. Ann. 190.

As used in the statute relating to assessment of lands for taxation, and providing that when mineral, mineral water, oil, gas, or coal privileges or interests are held by a party or parties, exclusive of the surface, the same shall be assessed separately to such party or parties, the word "held" means "owned," in the sense, at least, of freehold ownership, and the party to be separately assessed must own the mineral privilege or interest, if not in fee, at least to the extent of a freehold. A mere lessee for years, paying royalty or rent in kind, has a chattel interest; but the whole corpus remains undivided in the lessor. The statute contemplates a case in which another party than the owner of the surface has become the owner of the mineral or coal and holds it as such owner. State v. South Penn Oil Co., 24 S. E. 688, 695, 42 W. Va. 80.

Lands set apart by the state of Texas for the contractor as payment for the construction of the new capitol of Texas, to be conveyed to him from time to time when earned in the progress of the work, was not held by him within the meaning of the statute providing that "land held under a contract for the purchase price belonging to the state" should be taxed. Taylor v. Robinson, 10 S. W. 245, 247, 72 Tex. 364.

As retained in position.

"Held," as used in a patent on an envelope machine, reciting that there was substituted a revolving drum, with rigid fingers projecting from its rim, so arranged that an envelope may be held in the space between two consecutive fingers, and no pressure be exerted on the recently gummed parts while the gum on the seal flap is drying, signifies that the envelope is retained in position against the action of gravity as the drum revolves; and while it may also mean that the envelope is retained in position in relation to the inserting and withdrawing mechanism, this latter feature is merely incidental and subordinate to the main result contemplated. Whitcomb Envelope Co. v. Logan, Swift & Brigham Envelope Co. (U. S.) 63 Fed. 982, 983.

HELD AND FIRMLY BOUND.

The phrase "held and firmly bound," as used in a recognizance providing that the obligors were held and firmly bound in a certain sum for the release from custody and appearance of a defendant charged with passing counterfeit money, has the same force and meaning as "owe and indebted," which was the form of the common-law recognizance. "There is no difference in the condition of the obligations in a recognizance that a party acknowledges that he is 'held and firmly bound' to pay and that he 'owes and is indebted.'" Shattuck v. People, 5 Ill. (4 Scam.) 477, 478.

HELD AS SECURITY.

Gen. St. c. 118, § 27, providing that a creditor may surrender premises held as security for his debt on the insolvency of his debtor and be admitted as a creditor for the amount of his debt, does not include property levied on under execution and set off to the creditor, and which is received by him in full satisfaction of the judgment; and hence such creditor cannot surrender such property, and be admitted as a creditor on the insolvency of his debtor. Wareham Sav. Bank v. Vaughan, 133 Mass. 534, 535.

HELD BY CONTRACT.

A party in possession of real estate under a contract of purchase, and who had paid only part of the purchase money, made application for a fire insurance, and in answer to the question, "Incumbrance—is there any on property?" he answered, "Held by contract." Held, that the answer amounted to a statement that the property was held by contract of purchase, merely subject to a lien in favor of the vendor for the purchase money. Lorillard Fire Ins. Co. v. McCulloch, 21 Ohio St. 176, 179, 8 Am. Rep. 52.

HELD IN TRUST.

The words "held in trust," applied to insured goods, mean goods with which the assured is intrusted, not goods held in trust in the strict technical sense, so held that there was only an equitable obligation in the assured enforceable by a subpoena in chancery, but goods with which the insured was intrusted in the ordinary sense of the word. Hough v. People's Fire Ins. Co., 36 Md. 398, 432; Lucas v. Liverpool & London & Globe Ins. Co., 23 W. Va. 258, 277, 48 Am. Rep. 383; Waters v. Monarch Fire & Life Assur. Co., 5 El. & Bl. 870, 880.

A fire insurance risk taken on property held in trust by those insured refers to that property of which the insured had the care and custody intrusted to them as representatives of others, and for which they were responsible to the owner. Waring v. Indemnity Fire Ins. Co., 45 N. Y. 606, 610, 6 Am. Rep. 146; Roberts v. Firemen's Ins. Co., 30 Atl. 450, 451, 165 Pa. 55, 61, 44 Am. St. Rep. 642; Beidelman v. Powell, 10 Mo. App. 280, 282; Southern Cold Storage & Produce Co. v. A. F. Dechman & Co. (Tex.) 73 S. W. 545, 546.

The term "merchandise held in trust" in a fire policy taken out by a warehouseman on merchandise held in trust is to be understood in its mercantile sense as meaning goods intrusted to the warehouseman for keeping. Home Ins. Co. of New York v. Baltimore Warehouse Co., 93 U. S. 527, 543, 23 L. Ed. 868; Lucas v. Liverpool & London & Globe Ins. Co., 23 W. Va. 258, 277, 48 Am. Rep. 383.

Though the phrase "held in trust," as used in a fire insurance policy to designate goods covered by the policy, does not signify a technical trust, but has a broad meaning, and will include property in the custody of a bailee or mere agent, yet its use will not render of no effect a phrase in the policy that it should be void in case the property should become incumbered with a chattel mortgage. First Nat. Bank of Devil's Lake v. American Cent. Ins. Co. of St. Louis, 60 N. W. 345, 346, 58 Minn. 492.

An insurance effected by a commission merchant was on goods as well as the property of the assured as held by them "in trust or on commission." Held, that the language "held by them in trust or on commission" covered the whole value of the property, and not merely the interest of the party effecting the insurance. De Forest v. Fulton Fire Ins. Co., 1 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Hall) 94, 131; Home Ins. Co. of New York v. Baltimore Warehouse Co., 93 U. S. 527, 543, 23 L. Ed. 868.

Where a commission merchant took out policies of insurance on goods held by him on commission, the phrase "held in trust or on commission" in the policies referred to goods with the care of which the commission merchant was intrusted, and not a trust in the technical sense enforceable in equity. Ferguson v. Pekin Plow Co., 42 S. W. 711, 712, 141 Mo. 161.

Under a statute enacting that all personal estate held in trust by an executor, administrator, agent, or trustee shall be assessed in the town where such executor, etc., resides, it is held that the phrase "held in trust" includes all property which is situated permanently within the state under the control, management, and direction of any person to be held for the benefit and use of some other person; or, in other words, that it is not limited to cases of strict legal trusts. Catlin v. Hull, 21 Vt. 152, 157.

A policy of insurance taken out by a dealer in pianos and other musical instruments, describing the goods insured as "his own, or held in trust," prima facie includes and covers a piano left with him for sale; and in case of loss, where the goods owned by the dealer exceeded in value the amount of the policy, the owner of such piano was entitled to receive a pro rata share of the insurance money collected, although no request had been made to the dealer to insure such piano. Snow v. Carr, 61 Ala. 363, 368, 32 Am. Rep. 3.

Where an insurance policy stated that it covered cotton owned by the insured or held by it in trust or on commission, it was held that the words "held in trust" could not properly be limited to a holding in trust merely for an absolute owner, when it clearly appeared that other parties had an insurable interest in cotton placed in the hands of insured to be compressed, and that there was a standing agreement between the owners and the insured that the latter should carry insurance. California Ins. Co. v. Union Compress Co., 10 Sup. Ct. 365, 369, 133 U. S. 387, 33 L. Ed. 730.

HELD OPEN.

Under Sanb. & B. Ann. St. § 2576, providing that no court shall be held open on a legal holiday, the act of adjourning a cause to another day is an act of holding open. Milwaukee Harvester Co. v. Teasdale, 64 N. W. 422, 423, 91 Wis. 59.

Where a court orders that the court will be held open until a certain day, it does not constitute an adjournment to such a day, but is merely that the adjournment is to a time to be fixed in the future, according to exigencies of business. East Tennessee Iron & Coal Co. v. Wiggin (U. S.) 15 O. C. A. 510, 68 Fed. 446; Harrison v. German-American Fire Ins. Co. (U. S.) 90 Fed. 758, 762; State v. McBain (Wis.) 78 N. W. 602, 603.

"Held open," as used in the record of a justice of the peace that the case is held open, does not mean that the cause should stand open without any limitation, or for a longer time than the justice could have then adjourned it. State v. Bruce, 34 Atl. 701, 702, 68 Vt. 183.

HELEN.

"Helen" is not commonly used as the same as "Ellen," nor is it an abbreviation or corruption of Ellen. The names have been known and generally recognized as different and distinct. Thomas v. Desney, 10 N. W. 315, 316, 57 Iowa, 58.

HELP.

When the word "help" is used in a contract by which plaintiff is to help defendant to effect the sale of certain lands for a certain consideration, and plaintiff renders the services required of him, and both parties, in their pleadings, construe the agreement to mean that plaintiff should use his best efforts to bring about the sale, parol evidence is not admissible to explain the meaning of the word "help." Hooker v. Hyde, 21 N. W. 52, 54, 61 Wis. 204.

"Help," as used in a contract whereby one of the parties agreed "to find help" for the removing of pianos, means only such manual labor as might be reasonably needed in order to accomplish the work of removal. It does not bind the party to pay for the use of an apparatus furnished by the other party to the agreement which considerably facilitated the work of removal. Ladd v. Patten, 68 Me. 97, 98.

HELPER.

"Helper," as used to define the occupation of a person employed in the carding room of a wool factory, is a person whose duty it was to insert the ends of woollen strands in the proper feed spaces in the feed board in front of the creel, to substitute full spools on the creel for those which have been run off empty, and to take off the full spools of carded wool at the back of the machine, and replace them with empty ones. Truntle v. North Star Woollen-Mill Co., 58 N. W. 832, 833, 57 Minn. 52.

The term "servants and helpers," in a statute preferring the claims of servant girls at hotels, boarding houses, restaurants, etc., or other servants and helpers in and about said house of entertainment, includes a clerk or bartender in a hotel. Weaver v. Wheaton, 2 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 428, 430.

HEM.

"Hemmed handkerchiefs," as used in Customs Act March 3, 1883, c. 121, § 1, Schedule I (22 Stat. 505), assessing a duty of 40 per cent. ad valorem on "cotton laces, embroideries, insertings, trimmings, lace curtains, cotton damask, hemmed handkerchiefs, and cotton velvet," should be construed as a denominative and commercial term, meaning those having an ornamented and more extensive hem, and not as a descriptive term, so as to include hemstitched cotton handkerchiefs, known as such in trade and commerce, which merely have a plain cheap hem to prevent raveling. In re H. P. Claffin Co. (U. S.) 52 Fed. 121, 123, 2 C. C. A. 647.

HEMSTITCHED.

"Hemstitched and embroidered," as used in Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 373, relating to the duties on "hemstitched and embroidered" handkerchiefs, do not apply to hemstitched handkerchiefs composed of cotton or other vegetable fiber, and embroidered with only an initial letter. United States v. Harden (U. S.) 68 Fed. 182, 183, 15 C. C. A. 358.

HEMIPLEGY.

Hemiplegy is paralysis of one-half of the body. It is a brain disease, usually caused by a tumor pressing upon the brain.

It may be produced by a blow or anything that causes an undue pressure on the brain. The disease may be either complete or incomplete. When it is complete, one-half of the body is paralyzed; when incomplete, one-half of the body is only partially paralyzed. If the disease comes on quickly, it is called "quick hemiplegy." If it comes on gradually, it is called "chronic." Quick hemiplegy is more apt to affect the mental faculties than chronic. Where, however, hemiplegy is complete, the mental faculties are generally much impaired. Baughman v. Baughman, 4 Pac. 1003, 1005, 32 Kan. 538.

HEN.

The abbreviation "Hen." is universally admitted to represent Henry. Hen. is not, strictly speaking, a name, as Henry is, but the fact is that the letters Hen. are an abbreviation for Henry. People v. Ferguson (N. Y.) 8 Cowen, 102, 107.

HENCE.

See "Go Hence."

"Hence" is sometimes the equivalent of "so." Clem v. State, 33 Ind. 418, 431.

The expression "hence in this case," in an instruction, is the equivalent of "therefore," and must have been so understood by the jury, and not as given in Webster, as "from this cause or reason; as an inference or deduction." Alexander v. People, 96 Ill. 96, 101.

HENCEFORTH.

"Henceforth," as used in a bond on condition that if the receiver should henceforth faithfully discharge the duties of his trust as such receiver, the obligation should be void, is a word of futurity, and upon the face of the bond there could be based no liability for the past failure of the trustee to discharge his duties under the trust. Thomson v. Am. Surety Co. of New York, 62 N. E. 1073, 1074, 170 N. Y. 109.

"Henceforth," as used in a lease bearing date of the 26th of May, and reciting that the lessee is to hold for three years from henceforth, the lease not being delivered until the 20th of June, refers to the date of delivery, and not to the date of the lease, as the lease is of no effect until delivered. United States v. Le Baron (U. S.) 60 U. S. (19 How.) 73, 75, 15 L. Ed. 525 (citing and approving Clayton's Case, 5 Coke, 1).

HENCEFORWARD.

"Henceforward," as used in a resolve providing for the taxation of tenants or land.

does not necessarily convey the idea of perpetuity. It means no more than "hereafter," which may import a permanent or a temporary arrangement, according to the general tenor of the instrument and the nature of the subject-matter about which it is used. Opinion of Chief Justice, 24 Mass. (7 Pick.) 125, 128, note.

HENCHMAN.

A "henchman" is not, according to the ordinary meaning of the word, a policeman. The word signifies servant, page, or hanger-on. Hence, in a newspaper article, which states: "We have been informed that it is the intention of the Democratic bosses to renew the monkey business again at the polls in Snowhill district at the next election. We have also been informed that the Democratic henchmen who participated in this business at the last election received their authority for so doing from the mayor. * * * The mayor is clothed by the charter with extraordinary powers, and can, in the least outbreak of violence which may be probably provoked, appoint and arm any number of special policemen of his own selection, and prescribe their duties. These policemen, as they did at the last election, can go around the polls, and by threats and menaces intimidate and terrorize the voters, and drive them away"—does not authorize an innuendo in an indictment for libel for publishing such an article to the effect that by the word "henchmen" was meant special policemen so appointed. Barnes v. State, 41 Atl. 781, 783, 88 Md. 847.

HER.

The word "her," applied to a person designated by proper names, which are universally applied to females only, indicates that the person referred to is a female. Taylor v. Commonwealth (Va.) 20 Grat. 825, 828.

The use of the personal pronoun "her" in an indictment charging that the defendant did against her consent carnally know J. J. is sufficient to charge that the assault was committed on a female. Warner v. State, 17 S. W. 6, 7, 54 Ark. 660; Battle v. State, 4 Tex. App. 595, 596, 30 Am. Rep. 169; State v. Farmer, 26 N. C. 224, 225; State v. Goings, 20 N. C. 289, 290.

HER CHILDREN.

The words "her children," "our children," and "my children," used by a testator in making devises or bequests to his wife and his children, mean substantially the same, and constitute no ground for any distinction, or a different construction of the gift than the usual acceptation of the term "children." Vaughan v. Vaughan's Ex'r, 33 S. E. 603, 605, 97 Va. 322.

HER REAL ESTATE.

The phrase "her real estate," in Rev. St. 1894, § 1054, Rev. St. 1881, § 1043, which provides that "a divorce granted for misconduct of the husband shall entitle the wife to the same rights, so far as her real estate is concerned, that she would have been entitled to by his death," means the separate real estate of the wife, and has no reference to her husband's real estate. Fletcher v. Monroe, 43 N. E. 1053, 1054, 145 Ind. 56.

HER USE.

A will directing the trustees to pay to a certain person such part of the net income of the trust property as she "shall desire for her use," should be interpreted literally so as to include, besides what she may desire for merely personal uses, what she may desire to maintain or help maintain her family and household and to keep up her house in a style corresponding with the means bequeathed to her. She cannot apply the income to uses foreign to herself; as, for instance, to lend or give it to another for his or her use, not likewise her own. Greene v. Smith, 19 Atl. 1081, 1082, 17 R. I. 28.

HERS.

The use of "hers" in a will giving and bequeathing to testator's wife the horses and farm, with all their appurtenances, and, after such horses, cattle, and other articles were sold for the payment of debts, the balance of such stock, cattle, and all other articles should be hers, should be construed as denoting the idea of entire possession or ownership. Elyton Land Co. v. McElrath (U. S.) 53 Fed. 763, 766, 3 C. C. A. 649.

HERBAGE.

Jacob, in his dictionary, says: "Herbage is the green pasture and fruit of earth provided by nature for the food or bite of cattle. It is apparent from several passages in Brocton, that the word 'herbage' in his day meant feed for cattle in fields and pastures, and nothing more. Acorns, chestnuts, beech nuts, and the like are said by him not to be herbage." A prescriptive right to enter upon land and take herbage does not justify the cutting of grass, the digging of potatoes, or the gathering of apples. Simpson v. Coe, 4 N. H. 301, 302.

HERD.

"Herd" is defined by Webster as a number of beasts assembled together, and "number" as a collection of individuals. Brim v. Jones, 45 Pac. 352, 354, 13 Utah, 440.

"Herd," as used in a complaint that defendant unlawfully and willfully herded, and permitted to have herded, sheep on the land of plaintiff, is not commensurate with purposely driving and intentionally retaining stock upon particular premises, but rather that defendant suffered his sheep to range or graze and pasture on the land. Fry v. Hubner, 57 Pac. 420, 421, 35 Or. 184.

HERDER.

Gen. St. § 1705, provided that any farmer, ranchman, or herder of cattle, or any tavern keeper or livery stable keeper to whom any horses, cattle, etc., should be intrusted for the purpose of feeding, herding, pasturing, etc., should have a lien thereon for their services. It was held that the word "herder," being used in connection with the other words indicating occupations in which the possession and control were transferred to the party feeding, herding, etc., the cattle, did not apply to one who for wages herded cattle, the possession and control of which remained in the owner. Hooker v. McAllister, 40 Pac. 617, 618, 12 Wash. 46.

"Herders," as used in Rev. St. § 848, which provides that any ranchman, farmer, agistor, or herder of cattle to whom any horses, mules, cattle, etc., shall be intrusted and a contract for their keeping be entered into between the parties for the purpose of feeding, etc., shall have a lien on such horses, etc., for the amount that may be due for such feeding, etc., includes only those to whom the cattle, horses, etc., are intrusted under a contract between the parties for their keeping. It would not include persons employed by the month to drive or herd cattle. Underwood v. Birdsell, 9 Pac. 922, 923, 6 Mont. 142.

"Herder," as used in the article relating to domestic animals, means every person having charge or control of any herd of neat cattle, horses or mules, numbering five or more, or any flock of sheep numbering twenty-five or more, as owner, agent, or employé, while subsisting on any public or other range of land to which he has no right of possession, whether personally present with such herd or not. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1544a.

HERE INSERT.

The words "here insert" in a bill of exceptions do not make the matter referred to a part of the bill, though it is set out in another part of the transcript. Midland Ry. Co. v. Trissal, 65 N. E. 543, 545, 30 Ind. App. 77 (citing Brown v. Langner, 25 Ind.

4 Wds. & P.—20

App. 538, 58 N. E. 743; Allen v. Hollingshead, 155 Ind. 178, 57 N. E. 917).

HEREAFTER.

The terms "now" and "hereafter" signify time present and to come, and from the period at which they are used. Chapman v. Holmes' Ex'rs, 10 N. J. Law (5 Halst.) 20, 26.

From 1839 to 1879 there were statutes in Arkansas providing that suits by and against counties might be brought in the circuit court, and the manner of bringing and attacking them. The act of February 27, 1879, provided that "hereafter" a different proceeding should obtain. It was obviously the intent of the Legislature, by the use of the word "hereafter," to make the act purely prospective, and with a saving to suits pending. This being so, the county, having brought a suit in the proper court before the passage of the act, had a right to a final hearing in that court. Nevada County v. Hicks, 8 S. W. 524, 526, 48 Ark. 515, 520.

"Hereafter," as used in Acts 1895, p. 248, § 7, imposing new restrictions on the liquor traffic, and providing for the enforcement of the act in all towns and cities in which a saloon may hereafter be located, cannot be construed as showing that the act does not apply to saloons in existence when it took effect. Nelson v. State, 46 N. E. 941, 943, 17 Ind. App. 403.

The phrase "judgment hereafter rendered," in St. 1895, c. 75, providing that interest shall be included "in every judgment which shall be hereafter rendered for the amount of an abatement of taxes made under" St. 1890, c. 127, applies to every such judgment rendered after the passage of the act, though the petitions were filed before that date. Tremont & S. Mills v. City of Lowell, 42 N. E. 1134, 1135, 165 Mass. 265.

As expressive of duration.

In a contract providing that a name of a certain person could be used upon and as descriptive of any soap or blacking the other parties to the contract may hereafter make, "hereafter" cannot be construed as indicating a grant in perpetuity. The word "hereafter," used as an adverb, does not necessarily refer to unlimited time. Like the word "after," it is not used in common parlance for such purpose; it is not a synonym, for "forever"; it rather indicates the direction in time, merely, to which the context refers, and is limited by it. The duration of the hereafter is usually expressed by some other word, or is inferred from the context. In fact the mind does not rest satisfied with the use of the word "hereafter" in such a case, but naturally inquires and expects to hear in addition how long the hereafter is to last. Dobbins v. Cragin, 23 Atl. 172, 176, 50 N. J. Eq. (5 Dick.) 640.

Const. 1877 declares that homestead exemptions, etc., which have been heretofore set apart by virtue of the Constitution, laws, etc., or which may be hereafter set apart at any time, shall be and remain valid as against all debts and liabilities existing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution to the same extent that they would have been had the Constitution of 1868 not been revised. Held, that the word "hereafter" does not mark a period ending with the actual substitution of the new Constitution for the old, but an undeterminate duration beginning with that substitution; and hence, where a widow of a debtor, who died in 1877, prior to the ratification of the Constitution of 1877, applied in 1878 for a homestead, the homestead provision in the prior Constitution was applicable to her petition. Gerding v. Beall, 63 Ga. 561, 562.

In Laws 1854, c. 402, § 1, giving a lien for labor and materials furnished hereafter, which is retained in the section as amended by Laws 1869, c. 558, "hereafter" continues to speak from the time of the passage of the act of 1854, and applies to and includes all labor and material after that time. Moore v. Mausert, 49 N. Y. 332, 335.

As relating to adoption of Constitution.

The word "hereafter" in a constitutional provision that no county, city, school district, or municipal corporation, except in cases where such corporations have already authorized their bonds to be issued, shall hereafter be allowed to become indebted, etc., has reference to the time of the adoption of the Constitution. List v. City of Wheeling, 7 W. Va. 501, 522.

As relating to execution of power of attorney.

A power of attorney authorizing the entry of the appearance of the grantor of the power in term time or in vacation "at any time hereafter" to file a cognovit and confess judgment, etc., means at any time after the power was executed, confining it to no day or time except after the execution of the power; and hence such appearance could be entered on the day that the warrant of attorney was executed. Thomas v. Mueller, 106 Ill. 36, 43.

As relating to taking effect of ordinance.

"Hereafter," as used in a city ordinance passed on August 7th, expressly to take effect on August 17th, which provides that the city council may at any time hereafter by resolution direct and provide for guttering any of the streets of said city, means after the passage of the ordinance; and hence a resolution for guttering may be passed before the ordinance goes into effect. Kendig v. Knight, 14 N. W. 78, 60 Iowa, 29.

As relating to taking effect of statute.

Rev. St. § 1210d, as amended by Laws 1882, c. 50, provides that every action or proceeding for the recovery of lands heretofore sold or which may hereafter be sold for the nonpayment of taxes heretofore levied shall be commenced within nine months after the recording of the tax deed, and not thereafter, provided that in the case of tax deeds issued prior to the 25th day of March, 1878, the action, if not then barred, must be brought within nine months from that day, and not thereafter. Held, that though the word "heretofore," where it occurs in any statute, is construed ordinarily to mean any time previous to the day such statute takes effect, and the word "hereafter" to mean the time after the statute containing the word takes effect, to construe these words in the law of 1882 would be inconsistent with the manifest intent of the Legislature in enacting it. The words "heretofore" and "hereafter" relate rather to a time prior to the taking effect of section 1210d, and not to the time prior to the taking effect of the act of 1882. It would be stupid and absurd to provide in a law which took effect in 1882 that an action to recover lands sold for taxes where the tax deed was issued prior to March 25, 1878, must be brought within nine months from that day, and not thereafter, for the nine-months limitation would have expired more than three months before the new law went into operation. Gilkey v. Cook, 18 N. W. 639, 641, 60 Wis. 133.

"Hereafter," as used in Act Feb. 25, 1858, which provides that hereafter no mortgage of real estate shall be foreclosed in any other manner than by a civil action in the proper courts, etc., refers to the date of the taking effect of the act, and not to the date of its passage or approval. Thatcher v. Haun, 12 Iowa, 303, 311.

Act 1882, relating to taxation for highway purposes, authorizes the establishment of borough commissions by townships or parts of townships at their option, which shall control and regulate highways, including assessments and disbursements therefor. Section 10 provides that the taxes which shall be hereafter assessed and collected, etc., for rents, or for the improvement or repair of the roads, etc., shall not be applied to the roads without the boundaries of the borough from which the taxes were collected, but that the assessor and collector of the township shall hereafter assess and collect upon and from the taxable inhabitants of the borough, etc., the road tax which shall have been ordered to be raised at the previous annual township election in the same manner as the same has been heretofore assessed, levied, and collected. Held, that the words "hereafter" and "heretofore," as used in such section, did not refer to the date of the enactment of the statute, but to the time when the act became effective by the adoption of its terms in the several townships or parts of townships that elect to establish borough commissions. Commissioners of Matawan v. Horner, 5 Atl. 807, 810, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 441.

In Code 1851, § 1672, which was passed February 5, 1851, but did not take effect until July 1, 1851, fixing the period to be hereafter allowed for the commencement of actions, the word "hereafter" had reference to the date when the Code took effect, and not to the time of its passage. Bennett v. Bevard, 6 Iowa (6 Clarke) 82, 89.

The word "hereafter," as used in Act March 14, 1877, § 2 (Acts Sp. Sess. 1877, p. 59), amending section 561 of the Code, providing that appeals in all cases hereafter tried must be taken within one year from the time judgment is rendered, while it does not import the present time, has reference to the present, and denotes time after. The law must be construed to speak from the time it took effect, as a will speaks from the time of the death of the testator, and the word "hereafter" has reference to that period of time. Evansville & C. R. Co. v. Barbee, 59 Ind. 592, 593.

Laws 1881, c. 411, taking effect January 1, 1882, providing that every county treasurer hereafter elected or appointed should receive a certain salary, relates to a treasurer elected after that day. Erie County Sup'rs v. Jones, 1 N. Y. Supp. 557, 558, 49 Hun, 606.

Whenever the word "hereafter" occurs in any statute, it shall be construed to mean the time after the statute containing the term shall take effect. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4670; Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 4155; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 4971; Code Iowa 1897, § 54; Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 9.

In the construction of statutes the word "hereafter" shall mean any time after the day on which the statute takes effect. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1720, c. 131, § 1, subd. 17.

HEREAFTER ACQUIRED.

"Hereafter acquired," as used in a will giving trustees power to retain all investments, legal or otherwise, and to invest and change investments whenever they shall think advisable, without being restricted to what are known as legal securities, and to sell and convey real estate now held or hereafter acquired, necessarily implies the power to purchase. In re Ingersol's Estate, 31 Atl. 859, 860, 167 Pa. 536, 549.

HEREAFTER BUILT.

Rev. Code, c. 235, § 10, declares that no person shall take any toll or other compensation for grinding grain at any mill hereafter built, unless such mill be established by order of court, pursuant to the provisions of law. Held, that the words "hereafter built" meant a mill thereafter constructed or established for the first time, and hence a mill which had been built and had gone down prior to the statute, and was rebuilt after the passage of such statute, was not within it. Webb v. Commonwealth (Va.) 2 Leigh, 721, 723.

HEREBY.

See "It is Hereby Agreed."

In a statute providing that if the grantee in a mortgage shall fail to record the defeasance he shall not be entitled to or enjoy the benefits and advantages hereby given to a mortgagee, "hereby" means not that particular section alone, but the whole act of which it is a part. Essex County Nat Bank v. Harrison, 40 Atl. 209, 210, 57 N. J. Eq. 91.

The use of "hereby" in Act Feb. 18, 1891, providing that the office of the Commissioner of Agriculture be hereby declared an elective office, and that all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provision of the act be, and the same are hereby, repealed, adds no additional meaning to the statute, and means merely "by this act" or "by this statute." Lane v. Kolb, 9 South. 873, 877, 92 Ala. 636.

A will read, "The rest and residue of my other property to be sold and divided in four equal parts among my aforesaid children; and if any of my daughters shall die without leaving children, their property hereby given to be divided into four equal parts," etc. Held, that the words "hereby given" must be regarded as referring to that property which is directly disposed of under the residuary clause; that "property" is characterized by the word "other," which, when used in a residuary clause, naturally excludes all property the subject of prior express devises in the preceding parts of the will. Renwick v. Smith, 11 S. C. 294, 295, 307.

"Hereby acknowledged," as used in a receipt, constituted an acknowledgment of the receipt of the sum named as of the day when the receipt was made, and cannot be construed as merely an acknowledgment that at certain times in the past the signer had borrowed the sum named in the receipt. Custy v. Donlan, 34 N. E. 360, 159 Mass. 245, 38 Am. St. Rep. 419.

As indicating acts in presenti.

"Hereby," as used in Laws 1889, c. 51, providing that a tax of two-fifths of the mill on each dollar of the taxable property in the state shall be levied, and the proceeds of the levy are hereby appropriated, etc., means an appropriation in present, and constitutes an appropriation from the date the act took effect. Evans v. McCarthy, 22 Pac. 631, 42 Kan. 426.

In a will reciting that upon the death of the survivor of testatrix's brother and sister, and after the sale of her real estate as directed, she hereby gave and bequeathed a certain person, "hereby" means by her presently speaking and operating gift, to be enjoyed upon the death of the brother and sister and the sale of the lands. Chambers v. Sharp, 48 Atl. 222, 224, 61 N. J. Eq. 253.

The words "there be and hereby is granted," as used in an act relating to a grant of lands, constitute a present grant, conveying title immediately, and do not indicate a promise or purpose to grant in futuro, Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Majors, 2 Pac. 322, 5 Mont. 111; United States v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 12 Pac. 769, 770, 6 Mont. 351; McNee v. Donahue, 18 Pac. 438, 440, 76 Cal. 499; Tubbs v. Willhott, 14 Pac. 361, 362, 73 Cal. 61; McLaughlin v. Menotti, 26 Pac. 880, 881, 89 Cal. 354; Tarpey v. Deseret Salt Co., 17 Pac. 631, 633, 5 Utah, 494; Francoeur v. Newhouse (U. S.) 40 Fed. 618, 620; Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Wright (U. S.) 54 Fed. 67, 69, 4 C. C. A. 193; Wright v. Roseberry, 7 Sup. Ct. 985, 987, 121 U. S. 488, 30 L. Ed. 1039; Schulenberg v. Harriman, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 44, 22 L. Ed. 551; St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 11 Sup. Ct. 389, 390, 139 U. S. 1, 35 Sup. Ct. 77; Leavenworth, L. & G. R. Co. v. United States, 92 U. S. 733, 735, 23 L. Ed. 634; Deseret Salt Co. v. Tarpey, 12 Sup. Ct. 158, 161, 142 U. S. 241, 35 L. Ed. 999; which title became attached to the specific sections of land upon the filing of the maps of the definite location of the road, Deseret Salt Co. v. Tarpey, 12 Sup. Ct. 158, 161, 142 U. S. 241, 35 L. Ed. 999; Wells v. Pennington Co., 48 N. W. 305, 306, 2 S. D. 1, 39 Am. St. Rep. 758.

The location of the road and a survey of the lands are necessary to give precision to the grant. When that is done, and the work of constructing is prosecuted with due diligence, the company is entitled to patents to the land granted, and these would take effect as of the date of the act of Congress granting the same. State v. Central Pac. R. Co., 22 Pac. 237, 239, 20 Nev. 372; Tarpey v. Deseret Salt Co., 17 Pac. 631, 633, 5 Utah, 494; Leavenworth, L. & G. R. Co. v. United States, 92 U. S. 733, 735, 23 L. Ed. 634.

HEREDERO.

A term used in the Spanish law. "Es-riche says that anciently the proprietor of any inheritance was so called, and it still preserves this signification in some parts. He proceeds further to state that this signification comes to us from the Roman law; that Justinian, in his Institutes, informs us that the expression 'acto de heredero' is the same as the 'act of the proprietor,' giving as a reason that the ancients called heirs owners or masters. 'Veteres enim hæredes pro dominis appellabant.' Upon which text Cuyas observes that 'heres' comes from 'herus'—lord or owner. Further, as to this word, he says that he is the person who by a testamentary disposition or by law succeeds to the rights which a deceased person held at the time of his death." Emeric v. Alvarado, 2 Pac. 418, 433, 64 Cal. 529.

HEREDITAMENT.

See "Corporeal Hereditaments"; "Incorporeal Hereditament."

The term "hereditament" includes anything capable of being inherited, be it corporeal, incorporeal, real, personal, or mixed. McNabb v. Pond (N. Y.) 4 Bradf. Sur. 1, 10 (citing 3 Kent, Comm. 401; Co. Litt. 6a); Owens v. Lewis, 46 Ind. 488, 508, 15 Am. Rep. 295; Oskaloosa Water Co. v. Board of Equalization, 51 N. W. 18, 19, 84 Iowa, 407, 15 L. R. A. 296; Ex parte Leland (S. C.) 1 Nott & McC. 460, 462; Whitlock v. Greacen, 21 Atl. 944, 48 N. J. Eq. (3 Dick.) 359; Canfield v. Ford (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 336, 338; Canal Com'rs v. People (N. Y.) 5 Wend. 423, 453 (citing 4 Com. Dig. 413); City of New York v. Mable, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 151, 159, 64 Am. Dec. 538.

The word "hereditaments" is more extensive in its signification than "land" or "tenement," and signifies anything capable of being inherited, and as applied to realty is divided into corporeal and incorporeal. Nellis v. Munson, 15 N. H. 739, 740, 108 N. Y. 453.

A hereditament includes whatever may be inherited, and extends to a movable, such as an heirloom, and even to the condition of a bond which may descend to a man from his ancestors. Mitchell v. Warner, 5 Conn. 497, 509, 518.

In its ordinary acceptation it is applied to houses and other buildings; yet in its proper legal sense it signifies everything that may be holden. It not only includes land, but rents and other interests. Musgrave v. Sherwood (N. Y.) 23 Hun, 669, 674, 679, note.

A term for years in lands is not in law a tenement or a hereditament. City of New York v. Mable, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 151, 159, 64 Am. Dec. 538.

The terms "tenements" and "hereditaments" seem to be comprehensive enough to include the estate conveyed in a deed by which the owner granted and conveyed to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, forever, all the mines, ores, minerals, and metals lying and being in or upon the lands of the grantor, describing them, with the right to work and carry away said mines, ores, minerals, and metals. The estate in such mines is an estate of inheritance. Canfield v. Ford (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 336, 338.

The word "hereditaments" in Laws 1876, c. 415, authorizing certain corporations formed for the purpose of supplying pure and wholesome water to villages to acquire title by eminent domain to lands, tenements, and hereditaments, includes the right of a mill owner to use the waters of the stream as a propelling power for his mill, as such a right is an incorporeal hereditament, and therefore such water right may be taken on the payment of compensation therefor. Stanford Water Co. v. Stanley (N. Y.) 39 Hun, 424, 429.

The right of drainage, being an easement which is inheritable, is a hereditament. Nellis v. Munson, 15 N. E. 739, 740, 108 N. Y. 453.

In construing a charter where the title to the soil of the shore of a river was in dispute, the court said: "The term 'hereditament,' therefore, as well as the words 'commodities,' 'privileges,' and 'franchises,' was never intended to convey the soil, but something appurtenant thereto; for the thing conveyed by this term is that which was belonging to or in any way appertaining to the land granted." Inhabitants of Town of East Haven v. Hemingway, 7 Conn. 186, 200.

HEREDITARY.

Under Comp. Laws N. M. 1884, § 2750, p. 1306, limiting the meaning of the words "bargained and sold" in conveyances of hereditary real estate, the term "hereditary real estate" means real estate of inheritance. Douglass v. Lewis, 9 Sup. Ct. 634, 635, 131 U. S. 75, 33 L. Ed. 53, 9 Pac. 377, 379, 3 N. M. 345.

HEREDITARY DISEASES.

"Hereditary," as used in an answer in an application for a life insurance policy, that the applicant's parents and other relatives have not been affected with consumption, scrofula, insanity, etc., or other hereditary diseases, is to be construed as applying to all the designated diseases, and to be, in effect, a statement that the parents and other designated persons were not affected with hereditary diseases of the classes named, or other hereditary diseases. Gridley v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 2, 8.

HEREDITARY SUCCESSION.

Hereditary succession or descent "is the title whereby a man on the death of his ancestor acquires his estate by a right of representation as his heir at law." In re Donahue's Estate, 36 Cal. 329, 332. Descent or "hereditary succession" is the title whereby a person on the death of his ancestor acquires his estate as his heir at law. Barclay v. Cameron, 25 Tex. 232, 241.

HEREIN.

"Herein," as used in legal phraseology, is a locative verb, and its meaning is to be determined by the context. It may refer to the section, the chapter, or the entire enactment in which it is used; and this rule is applicable to the construction of a document as well as of the statute. Thus, in a will which in the first clause devised certain lands to certain beneficiaries, and in the second clause devised other lands to them and directed on the death of either before testator dies all property of whatever nature 'herein' bequeathed to them should revert and vest in the survivor, etc., the word 'herein' was used in reference to the entire will, and a power of sale given in the second clause applies to all the property." In re Pearson's Estate, 33 Pac. 451, 453, 98 Cal. 603.

"Herein directed," as used in a will establishing a trust for "all moneys herein directed" to be paid to his son till he was 25 years old, means money both hereinbefore and hereinafter directed. Iasigi v. Iasigi, 36 N. E. 579, 581, 161 Mass. 75.

The authority to herein determine the cause is jurisdiction to try and decide all of the cases involved in the controversy. Quarl v. Abbett, 1 N. E. 476, 480, 102 Ind. 233, 52 Am. Rep. 662.

As relating to act.

Act Cong. March 2, 1867, c. 197 (14 Stat. 561), imposes the following duties: "On woolen clothes, woolen shawls, and all manufactures of wool of every description made wholly or in part of wool, not herein otherwise provided for, 50 cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, 35 per cent. ad valorem. On flannels, blankets, hats of wools, knit goods, balmorals, woolen and worsted yarns, and all manufactures of every description composed wholly or in part of worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, or other like animals, except such as are composed in part of wool," different duties. Held, that the words "not otherwise herein provided for" mean not otherwise provided for in the act of which they are a part, and hence knit stockings, composed in part of wool, were dutiable under the first clause. Miller v. Vie- tor, 8 Sup. Ct. 1225, 1227, 127 U. S. 572, 82 L. Ed. 201.

The tariff act of 1870, as amended by an act of 1871, providing a duty on all certain manufactures of hair and on "all other manufactures of hair not otherwise herein provided for," means not otherwise provided for in the act. Arthur's Ex'rs v. Butterfield, 8 Sup. Ct. 714, 717, 125 U. S. 70, 31 L. Ed. 643.

The expression "not herein otherwise provided for," as used in Act June 6, 1872 (17 Stat. 230), providing that on and after a certain date, in lieu of certain duties imposed on certain articles enumerated, there shall be levied on all leather not herein otherwise provided for a certain duty, means provided for by the act in which the words occur, and not by some previous act. Movius v. Arthur, 95 U. S. 144, 147, 24 L. Ed. 420 (citing Smythe v. Fiske, 90 U. S. [23 Wall.] 374, 23 L. Ed. 47).

The words "herein provided," as used in Act May 1, 1854, amending section 4 of Act March 14, 1853, in regard to the jurisdictions of justices of the peace in civil cases, which provides that under the restrictions and limitations herein provided justices of the peace shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the court of common pleas, etc., refer to the restrictions and limitations provided in the original act as it stands after all the amendments made thereto are introduced into their proper places therein. McKibben v. Lester, 9 Ohio St. 627, 628.

As relating to article, title, or chapter.

The phrase "herein provided for," as used in the Revised Statutes, generally, if not always, refers to the act, chapter, or title, but not to the section of the act in which it is found. May v. Simmons (U. S.) 4 Fed. 499, 501.

The word "herein" in a statute providing that when a vacancy occurs in any of the offices herein named the Governor shall order an election, etc., was construed, in view of the fact that there were no offices named in the particular section, to mean the offices named in the article in which the section was found. State v. Smiley, 54 Tenn. (7 Heisk.) 772, 775.

Code, § 3516, provides that "all proceedings prescribed for the circuit court, so far as the same are applicable and not hereafter changed, shall be pursued in justice courts." The powers of the court are "only as herein enumerated." Held, that "only as herein enumerated" refers only to the "title" of the code of which it forms a part, and not to the code as a whole. Fitzgerald v. Gim-mell, 20 N. W. 179, 180, 64 Iowa, 261.

As relating to other provisions.

Where the section of a revised statute was amended by an act which declared that such section shall be amended so as to read as follows: "Every person who shall hereafter be convicted * * * shall be punished as herein provided," the words "herein provided" must be construed as applying to the provisions for punishment contained in the act, and not to the one mentioned in the revised statute. Hartung v. People, 26 N. Y. 167, 172. Though, if the section as thus amended, kept its place in the title of the Revised Statutes to which it belongs according to the system of amendments made in that form, the reference would be to those statutes. Hartung v. People, 28 N. Y. 400, 404.

The provision in Code, § 162, that the time of every allegation of one from the state against whom there is cause of action shall not be taken as a part of the time herein limited for the commencement of such action, refers to the time described elsewhere in the Code, or in statutes amendatory thereto, within which such actions must be commenced. Williams v. Iron Belt Building & Loan Ass'n, 42 S. E. 607, 131 N. C. 267.

HEREINAFTER.

"Hereinafter," as used in a general denial of every allegation of the complaint not hereinafter specifically admitted, is to be construed as embracing "all that follows, and authorizes the plaintiffs to avail themselves of any admissions therein contained." Dugan v. Davey, 26 N. W. 887, 893, 4 Dak. 110.

"Hereinafter," as used in Amend. Code Proc. § 11, conferring on the Court of Appeals the exclusive jurisdiction to review on appeal every actual determination hereinafter made at a general term, which was the same as the original section, does not limit the effect of the amended portions or the newly introduced provisions to cases in which the judgments appealed from were rendered after the amendment took effect. When it was first enacted it was thought expedient to confine the review by the Court of Appeals to future judgments and orders, but the incorporation of amendments into a section which was originally thus limited does not prove that the new provisions are to be confined to determinations future in relation to the time the amendment took effect. Ely v. Holton, 15 N. Y. 595, 597.

"Hereinafter named," as used in a will to describe executors as hereinafter named, refers to those finally named by operative words. Appeal of Shey, 46 Atl. 832, 73 Conn. 122 (citing Colt v. Colt, 33 Conn. 270, 280).

Construed as hereinbefore.

The charter of a railroad company requires the owner to make application for an assessment of its value as hereinafter directed, etc., and no directions follow. Ample directions are given in previous sections.

Held, that the use of the word "hereinafter" will be held to be a mistake, and will be construed to mean "hereinbefore." Waring v. Cheraw & D. R. Co., 16 S. C. 416, 425.

The word "hereinafter" in a deed of marriage settlement, which, after declaring the uses, trusts, and limitations of the settlement, contains a clause empowering the trustee to sell, etc., the proceeds to be held subject to the same uses, etc., as hereinafter set forth, should be read as "hereinbefore" when it is not followed by any specifications or uses. Crelghton v. Pringle, 3 S. C. (3 Rich.) 77, 79-84.

HEREINBEFORE.

"Hereinbefore," as used in the residuary clause of a will bequeathing "to the persons, societies, and corporations to whom I have hereinbefore made bequests," etc., should be construed to mean "as it now exists." The word should be regarded as one of identity and description, and should not be considered in the construction of the will to give the residuary estate to those only who had unpaid or unrevoked specific bequests at the testator's death. The word includes all the legatees before mentioned in the will. Wetmore v. Parker, 52 N. Y. 450, 564.

Gen. Laws, p. 605, § 14, after certain sections which provide for the fees of those persons who are generally required to travel in performing public duties, provides that every officer or person whose fees are prescribed in this chapter, who shall be required to travel in order to execute or perform any public duty in addition to the fees "hereinbefore" prescribed, shall be entitled to mileage at the rate of ten cents per mile. The word "hereinbefore" confines the grant of mileage to those officers whose fees are prescribed in the prescribing sections. It is a word of limitation, and such words, when of unequivocal meaning, and clearly expressed, will prevail to limit what goes before, to which such words refer. Taylor v. Umatilla County, 6 Or. 401, 404.

"Hereinbefore set forth," as used in a claim for an improvement in packing for steam joints stating it to be for a packing composed of strands of asbestos, with a saturated central core, as "hereinbefore set forth" are words of limitation, and refer back to the descriptive specification for qualification of such general statement by what is therein specifically described. H. W. Johns Mfg. Co. v. Robertson (U. S.) 60 Fed. 900, 905 (citing Edison Electric Light Co. v. Westinghouse [U. S.] 55 Fed. 498; Van Marter v. Miller [U. S.] 28 Fed. Cas. 1035; Snow v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 121 U. S. 617, 7 Sup. Ct. 1343, 30 L. Ed. 1004).

A clause of a will devising and bequeathing certain property to testator's daughter as long as she remains a widow, but directing that in case of her marriage the property shall pass to the son of said daughter, but that in case the daughter outlives her son all the bequests and gifts "hereinbefore granted" to her shall revert to the daughter, will be limited to the preceding gifts or devises created by the particular clause of the will, when such appears from the entire will to have been the intention of the testator. Wood v. Conrey, 62 Md. 542, 546.

HERETOFORE.

See "As Heretofore."

"Heretofore," as used in an allegation in the declaration in an action of trespass de bonis asportatis that "the defendant heretofore did seize," etc., simply denotes time past, in distinction from time present or time future, and hence is insufficient as an allegation of the time when the acts were done, since such allegation should specifically allege such time. Andrews v. Thayer, 40 Conn. 156, 157.

The use of the word "heretofore" in a lease of a pier with a covenant that the lease should not affect any pending suit or demand which the lessors had against the lessee for the use heretofore of the pier by the lessee, was construed as indicating that it was not intended to reserve the right to damages suffered thereafter. Dumois v. City of New York, 76 N. Y. Supp. 161, 163, 37 Misc. Rep. 614.

Wag. St. Mo. 595, § 35; Rev. Code 1855, p. 731, § 46—providing that "the records heretofore made by the recorder of the proper county, by copying from any deed of conveyance," etc., "shall, from and after the passage of this act, impart notice of the contents of such instruments," etc., means that the act was intended to apply exclusively and solely to prior conveyances. Bishop v. Schneider, 46 Mo. 472, 481, 2 Am. Rep. 533.

The restrictive clause in the residuary bequest to one of property not "heretofore disposed of" should be construed as though the testator had said that "all of my estate which shall not pass by the preceding bequests in my will to the legatees therein named, I give to the residuary legatee," for "heretofore," has relation to the several preceding paragraphs in the will, and "disposed of" means an effectual transfer or disposition by the will, which could not be until the death of the testator. In re Crane (Conn.) 2 Root, 487, 488.

Day excluded.

"Heretofore," as used in a bond describing the matters submitted to arbitration as all debts, dues, and demands heretofore subsisting between the parties, does not include a note payable in specific articles at a remote day, given by one of the parties to the other on the same day as the execution of the bond, as by intendment of law it would be construed that such note was given after execution of the bond. Bixby v. Whitney, 5 Me. (5 Greenl.) 192, 195.

As hereinbefore.

In a will devising all testator's real estate to a certain beneficiary, and bequeathing other property to other beneficiaries to equalize what "he has heretofore" given the first beneficiary, "heretofore" should be construed to mean "hereinbefore." Allison v. Chaney, 63 Mo. 279, 283.

Remote time excluded.

Laws 1883, c. 435, creates an exception to the general power vested in the dock department under Laws 1875, c. 249, by providing that it shall not be lawful to interfere with the free public use of any pier in the East river which has heretofore been used for the loading of sailing vessels regularly employed in foreign commerce, etc. Held, that the word "heretofore" should be taken in its usual and ordinary sense and signification as meaning "heretofore," "down to this time," and does not convey the idea of comprehending any remote time; and hence the exception does not include a pier which, before 1864, was much used by this class of sailing vessels, but which since 1870 has only occasionally been used by them, and not at all in the fourth and fifth years preceding the commencement of an action to remove sheds therefrom. People v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., 22 N. E. 1026, 1028, 117 N. Y. 150.

Comp. Laws 1857, § 5384, amending a certain act providing that every action on a judgment or decree heretofore rendered or hereafter to be rendered in a court of record shall be brought within 10 years after the entry of the judgment or decree, and not afterwards, will not include a judgment rendered before the passage of the original act 22 years prior. Parsons v. Wayne County Circuit Judge, 37 Mich. 287, 289.

The words "heretofore contracted," in a treaty, referring to debts, meant entered into at any period of time before the date of the treaty, without regard to the length or distance of time. These words are descriptive of the particular debts that might be recovered, and relate back to the time such debts were contracted. The aim of the contract was plainly to designate the particular debts that might be recovered. A debt entered into during the war would not have been recoverable unless under this description of a debt contracted at any time before the treaty. Ware v. Hylton, 3 U. S. (3 Dall.) 199, 242, 244, 1 L. Ed. 586.

Statute rendered retrospective.

The use of "heretofore" in a statute which expressly declares that it shall apply to proceedings heretofore had, will be construed to give the statute a retrospective effect, it being used in contrast with the word "hereafter." People v. Crennan (N. Y.) 36 N. E. 187, 189.

As to right of trial by jury.

The word "heretofore" is defined to mean, in times before the present, "formerly." As used in a constitutional provision that the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate, the word "heretofore" evidently related to the past. Such provision as to the right of trial by jury refers to the right as it existed at common law, and not as it was enjoyed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, or of a prior Constitution. State v. Hamey, 67 S. W. 620, 625, 168 Mo. 167, 57 L. R. A. 846.

Heretofore used, as the language is used in Const. art. 1, § 2, providing that the trial by jury in all cases in which it has been "heretofore used" shall remain inviolate forever means "in use at the time of the adoption of the constitution." People v. Kennedy, (N. Y.) 2 Parker Cr. R. 312, 317.

"Heretofore," as used in the Bill of Rights, art. 20, providing that in all controversies concerning property and all suits between two or more persons, except in cases in which it has been heretofore otherwise used and practiced, the parties have a right to a trial by jury, means before the year 1784. State v. Saunders, 25 Atl. 588, 66 N. H. 39, 18 L. R. A. 646.

The word "heretofore," as used in the Constitution in the provision guarantying the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed, relates to the past and to the common law of England. George v. People, 167 Ill. 447, 47 N. E. 741; Brewster v. People, 55 N. E. 640, 641, 183 Ill. 143. Hence Rev. St. 1845, p. 182, § 168 (Starr & C. Ann. St. c. 38, § 504), conferring on the jury on trial for felony the right to fix the term of imprisonment, did not become a part of the Criminal Code because of such provision of the Constitution as in force when the Constitution was adopted. George v. People, 47 N. E. 741, 743, 167 Ill. 447.

Inasmuch as justices have had jurisdiction of a class of cases known as "trespass" or "trover" for a limited amount since the organization of the government, an increase of their jurisdiction is not violative of the constitutional provision that trial by jury in all cases in which it has been heretofore used shall remain inviolate. Crouse v. Walrath (N. Y.) 41 How. Prac. 86, 88.

Subject-matter of statute related to.

In Nix, Dig. 829, which forbids the pulling down or removal of any dwelling house, market house, or other public building heretofore erected, and which may encroach upon any highway, "heretofore" refers to the time of the laying out of the road, and not to the time of the passage of the act. Pan-coast v. Troth, 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 377, 382.

In Comp. Laws 1857, § 3445, providing that a suit pending in a court the judge in which has heretofore been consulted or employed as counsel in the subject-matter to be litigated in such suit shall be transferred to another circuit, "heretofore" refers to the time of the application for transfer, and not to the time of the passage of the act. People v. Judge of Saginaw Circuit Court, 26 Mich. 342, 344.

"Heretofore," as used in Act 1794, providing that when any person shall shut up or otherwise prevent the use of any road heretofore accustomed to be used, though not laid out agreeable to the directions of this or the before-recited act, refers to the time of opening the road, and not to the time of the passage of the act, because at that time no road could by any possibility have been laid out agreeable to the directions of the act. Perrine v. Farr, 22 N. J. Law (3 Zab.) 356, 365.

In Laws 1875, c. 249, as amended by Laws 1883, c. 435, and in the consolidation act (Laws 1882, c. 410, § 773, as amended by Laws 1889, c. 509), providing that any pier of the city of New York, which has "heretofore been used" for the loading of vessels engaged in foreign commerce shall be used as a dumping ground, does not mean any pier which was used as a dumping ground prior to the amendment. Hill v. City of New York, 18 N. Y. Supp. 399, 402, 63 Hun, 633.

Taking effect of statute related to.

Act 1882, relating to taxation for highway purposes, authorizes the establishment of borough commissions by townships or parts of townships, at their option, which shall control and regulate highways, including assessments and disbursements therefor. Section 10 provides that the taxes which shall be hereafter assessed and collected, etc., for rents or for the improvement or repair of the roads, etc., shall not be applied to the roads without the boundaries of the borough from which the taxes were collected, but that the assessor and collector of the township shall hereafter assess and collect upon and from the taxable inhabitants of the borough, etc., the road tax which shall have been ordered to be raised at the previous annual township election, in the same manner as the same has been heretofore assessed, levied, and collected. Held, that the words "hereafter" and "heretofore," as used in such section, did not refer to the date of the enactment of the statute, but to the time when the act became effective by the adoption of its terms in the several townships or parts of townships that elect to establish borough commissions. Commissioners of Matawan v. Horner, 5 Atl. 807, 810, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 441.

Rev. St. § 1210d, as amended by Laws 1882, c. 50, provides that every action or proceeding for the recovery of lands heretofore sold or which may hereafter be sold for the nonpayment of taxes heretofore levied shall be commenced within nine months after the recording of the tax deed, and not thereafter, provided that in the case of tax deeds issued prior to the 25th day of March, 1878, the action, if not then barred, must be brought within nine months from that day and not thereafter. Held, that though the word "heretofore," where it occurs in any statute, is construed ordinarily to mean any time previous to the day such statute takes effect, and the word "hereafter" to mean the time after the statute containing the word takes effect, to so construe these words in the law of 1882 would be inconsistent with the manifest intent of the Legislature in enacting it. The words "heretofore" and "hereafter" relate rather to a time prior to the taking effect of section 1210d, and not to the time prior to the taking effect of the act of 1882. It would be stupid and absurd to provide in a law which took effect in 1882 that an action to recover lands sold for taxes where the tax deed was issued prior to March 25, 1878, must be brought within nine months from that day, and not thereafter. For the nine-months limitation would have expired more than three months before the new law went into operation. Gilkey v. Cook, 18 N. W. 639, 641, 60 Wis. 133.

"Heretofore," as used in Act March 14, 1877, § 2, amending section 561 of the Code, providing that appeals in all cases heretofore tried must be taken within one year from the time this act takes effect, has reference to the time the act took effect. Evansville & C. R. Co. v. Barbee, 59 Ind. 592, 593.

The term "heretofore," when used in a statute, has relation to the time when the same takes effect. Code Iowa 1897, § 54; Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 9.

Whenever the term "heretofore" occurs in any statute, it shall be construed to mean any time previous to the day when such statute shall take effect. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 4155; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4670; Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1720, c. 131, § 1, subd. 17; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 4971.

HERIOT.

A "heriot" goes with the reversion, as well as rent, and the grantee of the reversion shall have it. Jacob's Law Dict. The beast thus becomes attached to the freehold. So the reservation of the best beast of the tenant in possession for the time being rests on the old feudal law in relation to herlots. Adams v. Morse, 51 Me. 497, 501.

HERITAGE.

The term "heritage" was used in the Norman law to designate real estate. Dowdel v. Hamm (Pa.) 2 Watts, 61, 65.

HERPES ZOSTER CAPITAS.

To the intelligence of the ordinary layman, herpes zoster capitis is a disease with a high-sounding name, but there is no evidence in the record as to what it is; and a reference to the standard dictionaries discloses the fact that herpes is a cutaneous affection which appears in several forms, and which is known among the initiated as "shingles"; that the use of the word "capitis" locates the disease upon the scalp, while the Greek word "zoster," meaning a belt or girdle, would seem to locate it in the region of the waist. In the evidence the ailment is sometimes called "herpes zoster capitis" and sometimes "herpes capitis," as if there were no distinction. It is therefore difficult to discover from the evidence what was the real ailment. Tooker v. Security Trust Co., 26 N. Y. App. Div. 872, 377, 49 N. Y. Supp. 814, 817.

HERRING.

See "Pickled Herring."

HIDE.

The idea of hiding and harboring a negro, within the meaning of an indictment charging that defendant did conceal, harbor, hide, and employ a negro, is included within the meaning of the word "conceal," and therefore a verdict that defendant concealed the negro is sufficient to show that he did hide and harbor him. Cook v. State, 26 Ga. 593-603.

"Hiding and concealing" may be construed as an act, and the statement that the defendant in attachment is hiding and concealing certain goods may be construed as a statement of the fact, but it is too general a statement thereof in an attachment suit based upon the concealment of property by defendant to comply with the statute requiring the plaintiff to state the material facts upon which the attachment is founded. Sandheger v. Hosey, 26 W. Va. 221, 224.

HIDES.

The word "hide" is defined by Webster to be the "skin of an animal, either raw or dressed, more generally applied to the un-dressed skins of the larger domestic animals, as oxen, horses," etc. Expert evidence is not admissible to show that the word "hides" was used in a contract for the sale of hides with a more restricted meaning than the word "skins," when it is admitted that the articles delivered under the contract were skins, and no custom or usage has been pleaded in the complaint. Healy v. Brandon, 21 N. Y. Supp. 390, 395, 66 Hun, 515.

"Hides and skins," as used in Tariff Act July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 42) Schedule H, prescribing a certain rate of duty on "raw hides and skins" of all kinds, whether dried, salted, or pickled, are a class of articles well known in the trade, and used extensively by manufacturers of leather, and cannot be construed to include Buenos Ayres sheep skins imported with the wool on, and dried, but not dressed, usually invoiced as sheep skins, and known in commerce by that name. Coggill v. Lawrence (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 6, 7.

HIDES OF CATTLE.

Hides of East India buffalo, a domesticated animal, are assessable as hides of cattle, under paragraph 437 of the tariff act of July, 1897. Rosbach v. United States (U. S.) 116 Fed. 781.

HIGH.

High is a relative term. A thing is said to be high when compared to other structures. A structure is said to be high according to the uses to which it is to be put. As used with relation to a bridge over a railroad track, the bridge is high or low according to the height of cars to pass under it. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Tucker's Adm'r (Ky.) 65 S. W. 453, 454.

High, in one of its significations, is used to denote that which is common, open, and public. Thus every road or way or navigable river which is used freely by the public is a highway. United States v. Rodgers, 14 Sup. Ct. 109, 113, 150 U. S. 249, 37 L. Ed. 1071.

In Barton v. McKelway, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 165, which was an action on a contract to deliver a number of trees of not less than one foot high, it was held that it might be shown by the universal usage and custom of dealers in that article that the length was measured from the top of the ripe wood, rejecting the green immature top. Dalton v. Daniels (N. Y.) 2 Hilt. 472, 475.

HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS.

"High crimes and misdemeanors are such immoral and unlawful acts as are nearly allied and equal in guilt to felony, yet, owing to some technical circumstance, did not fall within the definition of felony." State v. Knapp, 6 Conn. 415, 417, 16 Am. Dec. 68 (quoting 1 Russ. Crimes, 61).

HIGH DILIGENCE.

High or great diligence is that with which prudent persons take care of their own concerns. It differs from common or ordinary diligence, which is that which men in general exert with respect to their own concerns, or slight diligence, which is that with which persons of less than common diligence, or, indeed, of any prudence at all, take care of their own concerns. Litchfield v. White, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 438, 442, 57 Am. Dec. 534.

HIGH-LIVED.

"High-lived," when used in reference to a horse, does not necessarily imply that it was vicious and dangerous for persons accustomed to handling horses. It is a term frequently applied to horses which are just the opposite. When a horse is high-spirited it does not necessarily follow that he has vicious propensities, and hence its use in the information given by a foreman to an employé, who was to use the horse, is not sufficient to warn him of the vicious and dangerous habits of the horse. Willson v. Sioux Consol. Min. Co., 52 Pac. 626, 627, 16 Utah, 392.

HIGH RIGHT.

"High right," as used in an instruction that a mere assault not directed at life or chastity, or other high right, cannot excuse a homicide, includes "the right of a person to enjoy his physical organization and all the powers thereof, and an assault aimed to produce a serious bodily injury must be regarded as directed at a high right." People v. Olson, 11 Pac. 577, 578, 4 Utah, 413.

HIGH SCHOOL.

As common school, see "Common School."

As included in term "college," see "College."

"High school" may be defined as a school where the higher branches of a common-school education are taught. Whitlock v. State, 47 N. W. 284, 286, 30 Neb. 815.

A testator bequeathed a certain sum to the trustees of the high school in D., or their successors in office, to be applied by said trustees to the advancement of education in said high school. Held, that the words "high school" meant public school in which higher branches of learning are taught than in the common schools. The meaning of the words is well settled in the laws and usages of the commonwealth. Attorney General v. Butler, 123 Mass. 304, 306.

A high school is a school "which is designed for scholars who have passed through the primary grades, and are supposed to be able to read, write, and spell correctly, and to be familiar with other branches which need not be noticed. Many, if not most, of the high schools of this state, are in fact preparatory schools for the university, and the course of study determined with regard to that object." State v. School Dist. No. 1, 48 N. W. 393, 394, 31 Neb. 552.

A high school is a school of higher grade than an elementary school, in which instruction and training are given in approved courses in the history of the United States and other countries, composition, rhetoric, English and American literature, algebra and geometry, natural science, political or mental science, ancient or modern foreign languages, or both, commercial and industrial branches, or such of the above-named branches as the length of its curriculum may make possible, and such other branches of higher grade than those to be taught in the elementary schools, and such advanced studies and advanced reviews of the common branches as the board of education may direct. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4007-2.

HIGH SEAS.

The term "high seas," in the ordinary acceptance thereof, means the seas outside of low-water mark on the coast. United States v. Seagrist (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1002, 1003. "The term 'high seas' includes waters on the seacoast without the boundaries of low-water mark." Ross v. McIntyre, 11 Sup. Ct. 897, 902, 140 U. S. 453, 35 L. Ed. 581; Ex parte Byers (U. S.) 32 Fed. 404, 405.

"Mr. Justice Blackstone in his Commentaries (1 Comm. 110), uses the words 'high sea' and 'main sea' as synonymous, and adds that the main sea begins at the low-water mark.' But though this may be one sense of the terms to distinguish the divided empire which the admiralty possesses between high-water and low-water mark when it is full sea from that which the common law possesses when it is ebb sea, yet the more common sense is to express the open uninclosed ocean, or that part of the sea which is without the fauces terræ on the seacoast, in contradistinction to that which is surrounded or inclosed between narrow headlands or promontories. Both Lord Hale and Lord Coke constantly limit the high seas to those waters of the ocean which are without the boundary of any county at the common law, and narrow arms of the sea are deemed to be within the boundary of some county of the realm; but the waters of the ocean upon the open seacoast are admitted on all sides to be without the limits of any county, and are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the admiralty up to high-water mark, when the tide is full, and are deemed by the crown writers, generally, as the high sea or main sea." As used in 4 Stat. 121, making it criminal to make an assault with a dangerous weapon on the high seas, it is in contradistinction to arms of the sea, and bays, creeks, etc., within the narrow headlands of the coast, and comprehends only the open ocean, which washes the seacoast, or is not included within the body of any county in any particular state. Therefore where an arm of the sea is so narrow that a person standing on one shore can reasonably discern and distinctly see by the naked eye what is going on on the opposite shore, the bodies of water are within the body of the county. United States v. Grush (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 48, 50. See, also, Johnson v. Twenty-One Bales, etc. (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 855, 861; Waring v. Clarke, 46 U. S. (5 How.) 441, 452, 12 L. Ed. 226.

The term "high seas" does not indicate any separate and distinct body of water, but only the open waters of the sea or ocean, as distinguished from ports and havens, and waters within narrow headlands on the coast. This distinction was observed by Latin writers between the ports and havens of the Mediterranean and its open waters, the latter being termed the high seas. The Æneid, lib. 1. United States v. Rodgers, 14 Sup. Ct. 106, 110, 150 U. S. 249, 37 L. Ed. 1071.

Bay, inlets, rivers, etc.

The term "high sea" cannot be construed to include any portion of an inlet which is well surrounded by islands and can only be entered by coming in near some of those islands or by way of certain straits. The Kodiak (U. S.) 53 Fed. 126, 128.

1 Stat. 113, authorizing the punishment of piracy committed on the high seas, means "any waters on the seacoast which are without the boundaries of low-water mark, although such waters may be in a roadstead or bay within the jurisdictional limits of a foreign government; and such is the meaning attached to the phrase by the common law and supported by the authority of the admiralty perhaps to a more enlarged extent." United States v. Ross (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 899, 900.

"High seas," as used in Act April 30, 1790, providing for the punishment of manslaughter committed on the high seas, should not be construed to include a river half a mile wide, 35 miles above its mouth, and in the interior of a country. United States v. Willberger, 18 U. S. (5 Wheat.) 76, 94, 5 L. Ed. 37.

"High seas mean that portion of the sea which washes the open coast, and do not include the combined salt and fresh waters which at high tide flood the banks of an adjacent bay." Morgan v. Nagodish, 3 South. 636, 637, 40 La. Ann. 246.

The term "high seas," as used in the act of Congress giving the United States jurisdiction of defenses on the high seas, means the open ocean, as distinguished from a river, haven, basin, or bay. Emory v. Collins (Del.) 1 Har. 325, 326.

A basin or haven is not a part of the high seas. United States v. Morel (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1310, 1311.

Great lakes.

"High," in one of its significations, is used to denote that which is common, open, and public. Thus every road or way or navigable river which is used freely by the public is a highway. So a large body of navigable water other than a river, which is of an extent beyond the measurement of one's unaided vision, and is open and unconfined, and not under the exclusive control of any one nation or people, but is the free highway of all adjoining nations or people, must fall under the definition of "high seas." United States v. Rodgers, 14 Sup. Ct. 109, 113, 150 U. S. 249, 37 L. Ed. 1071; The North Star (U. S.) 62 Fed. 71, 75, 10 C. C. A. 262; The Robert Holland (U. S.) 59 Fed. 200, 202; contra, see Ex parte Byers (U. S.) 32 Fed. 404, 405.

Within the meaning of the United States Constitution, which gives to Congress the power to define and punish felonies committed on the high seas, the high seas are the uninclosed waters of the ocean outside the projecting capes, and not the Great Lakes. Miller's Case (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 300.

But as used in Act March 3, 1885, providing that certain revised rules should be followed in the navigation upon the "high seas," and that all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with such rules are thereby repealed, except as to the navigation of such vessels within the harbors, lakes, and inland waters of the United States, does not have the same meaning. The North Star (U. S.) 62 Fed. 71, 75, 10 C. C. A. 262.

Harbor.

Within Act April 30, 1790, c. 9, § 16, prohibiting larceny on the high seas, the high seas does not include the waters of havens where the tide ebbs and flows, unless those waters are without low-water mark, and hence larceny committed on board an American ship in an inclosed dock in a foreign port is not committed on the high seas within the meaning of the statute. United States v. Hamilton (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 93.

The high sea or main sea properly begins at low-water mark. What is the high sea has nothing to do with the bounds of counties, but is ascertained by low-water mark on the seacoast, and by parity of reason it should be the same in ports and havens. De Lovio v. Bolt (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 418, 428.

As high-water mark.

The term includes all the waters of the ocean which are not included within any bays, etc., below the line of low-water mark; and when the tide flows it also includes the waters to high-water mark. The Abby (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 2627; United States v. Grush (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 48, 50.

Long Island Sound.

The term includes all those parts of the main ocean which are not within the fauces terræ—the mouth or chops of a channel. It includes all indentations in the mainland in which the headlands at the entrance of the same are so far apart that a person with the naked eye cannot see from one side what is doing on the other. Long Island Sound, except where so narrow as to be seen across, is a part of the high seas. Manley v. People, 7 N. Y. 295, 300.

As main sea or sea.

"In other matters than crimes connected with admiralty jurisdiction it may be important at times to discriminate between the sea and the high sea, but I apprehend that in crimes the seas or the high seas or the ocean means much the same." United States v. New Bedford Bridge (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 91, 120.

The term "high sea" is the same as the ocean or main sea. It means that part of the sea which lies without the body of the county, and is distinguished from the term "sea," which includes arms or branches of the sea which may lie within the body of the county. De Lovio v. Bolt (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 418, 428.

Within three-mile limit.

The term "high seas" is used to designate the seas outside low-water mark, and includes such portions of the sea as are outside such point, though lying within the three-mile line. United States v. Smith (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1166, 1167.

HIGH-WATER LINE.

A person acquiring title to land abutting on a navigable stream takes title only to the high-water line, and that line is limited by the outflow of the medium high tides between the spring and neap tides. New Jersey Zinc & Iron Co. v. Morris Canal & Banking Co., 15 Atl. 227, 228, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 398, 1 L. R. A. 133.

HIGH-WATER MARK.

See "Usual High-Water Mark."

A deed conveying a strip of land by accepted boundaries, one of which was "high-water mark" on a certain day, should be construed to mean that the line thus given was a fixed and permanent one, the line of high water at the date of the deed, and which does not follow the changes of the high-water mark; so that where the land is submerged and lost by encroachment of the waters of the bay the loss falls not on the adjoining owners, but on those who own the land submerged. Nixon v. Walter, 3 Atl. 385, 387, 41 N. J. Eq. (14 Stew.) 103.

The upland boundary of tide and shore lands is the line of ordinary high-water mark. Washougal & L. Transp. Co. v. Dalles, P. & A. Nav. Co., 68 Pac. 74, 75, 77, 27 Wash. 490.

"High-water mark," within the meaning of a deed fixing the boundary of the conveyed premises at the high-water mark of a pond, was construed to fix the permanent boundary at the line of high-water mark existing at the time of the execution of the conveyance, and therefore it was held that the grantee could not claim accretions or land left dry in consequence of the water receding, although the gradual and imperceptible result of natural causes. Cook v. McClure, 58 N. Y. 437, 444, 17 Am. Rep. 270.

In a deed describing land as beginning at a stake on the west bank of the river running north eleven rods to a stake, thence to a stake and stones, thence south nine rods to a stake and stones on the bank of the same river, thence running on the west bank of said river to high-water mark, 16 rods, to the first-mentioned bounds, the limitations throughout being by the bank of the river, the words "to high-water mark" have no other rational meaning in such connection than as indicating the front line of the bank itself. Dunlap v. Stetson (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 75, 81.

Of mill pond.

The high-water mark of a mill pond is the highest point to which the dam will raise the water in the ordinary state of the stream. Brady v. Blackinton, 113 Mass. 238, 245.

Of rivers.

High-water mark in a river or stream is the point to which the water usually rises in an ordinary season of high water. Johnson v. Knott, 10 Pac. 418, 420, 13 Or. 308.

In the case of fresh-water rivers and lakes in which there is no ebb and flow of the tide, but which are subject to irregular and occasional changes of height without fixed quantity or time, except that they are periodical, recurring with the wet or dry seasons of the year, high-water mark, as a line, between a riparian owner and the public, is to be determined by examining the bed and banks, and ascertaining where the presence and action of the water are so common and usual and so long continued in all ordinary years as to mark on the soil of the bed a character distinct from that of the banks in respect to vegetation, as well as respects the nature of the soil itself. High-water mark is co-ordinate with the limit of the bed of the water; and that only is to be considered the bed which the water occupies sufficiently long and continuously to wrest it from vegetation and destroy its value for agricultural purposes. Carpenter v. Board of Com'rs of Hennepin Co., 58 N. W. 295, 297, 56 Minn. 513; State v. District Court of Hennepin Co., 86 N. W. 455, 457, 83 Minn. 464; Paine Lumber Co. v. United States (U. S.) 55 Fed. 854, 864; Bennett v. National Starch Mfg. Co., 72 N. W. 507, 508, 103 Iowa, 207; Houghton v. Chicago, D. & M. R. Co., 47 Iowa, 370, 372; St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Ramsey, 13 S. W. 931, 933, 53 Ark. 314, 8 L. R. A. 559, 22 Am. St. Rep. 195; Dow v. Electric Co., 45 Atl. 350, 351, 69 N. H. 498, 76 Am. St. Rep. 189.

High-water mark does not mean the height reached by unusual floods, for these usually soon disappear. Neither does it mean the line ordinarily reached by the great annual rises of the river, which cover in places lands that are valuable for agricultural purposes, nor yet does it mean meadow land adjacent to the river, which, when the water leaves it, is adapted to and can be used for grazing or pasturing purposes. The line, then, which fixes the high-water mark is that which separates what properly belongs to the river bed from that which belongs to the rightful owners. Soil which is submerged so long or so frequently, in ordinary seasons, that vegetation will not grow on it, may be regarded as a part of the bed of the river which overflows it. Welch v. Browning, 87 N. W. 430, 431, 115 Iowa, 690.

The term "high-water mark," as used in a deed describing land as extending to a certain river to high-water mark, although sometimes used, is inappropriate when applied to a fresh-water stream where the tide does not flow and ebb, but it should be construed as meaning the line on the river bank reached by the water when the river is ordinarily full and the water ordinarily high. Not the highest point touched by the water in a freshet, nor when the water is the lowest in seasons of drought, but the highest limit reached when the river is unaffected by freshets, and contains its natural and usual flow—the highest limit at the ordinary state of the river. The high-water mark does not mean the top of the bank many feet distant from the bed of the river in its ordinary state, and only reached by the water on rare occasions of extreme freshet. Morrison v. First Nat. Bank of Skowhegan, 33 Atl. 782, 783, 88 Me. 155. See, also, Hamilton v. Pittcock, 27 Atl. 1079, 1080, 158 Pa. 457; Dow v. Electric Co., 45 Atl. 350, 351, 69 N. H. 498, 76 Am. St. Rep. 189.

High-water mark is to be determined not from human records, but from the record which the river makes for itself, and the true line is that which the river impressed upon the soil as the limit of its dominion. Houghton v. Chicago, D. & M. R. Co., 47 Iowa, 370, 373.

In tide waters.

High-water mark is the line reached by the tide at its highest flow. Mobile Transp. Co. v. City of Mobile, 30 South. 645, 648, 128 Ala. 335, 64 L. R. A. 333, 86 Am. St. Rep. 143.

"High-water mark," as used in reference to tide waters, is the margin of the sea at high tide. Storer v. Freeman, 6 Mass. 435, 437, 4 Am. Dec. 155.

"High-water mark," as used in reference to the sea or a river in which the tide ebbs and flows, should be construed to mean the line reached by the periodical flow of the tide, and not the line marked by the advance of waters caused by winds and storms, freshets or floods. Howard v. Ingersoll, 54 U. S. (8 How.) 381, 423, 14 L. Ed. 189.

HIGHER.

The use of the word "higher" in a bequest of $1,500 currency per year if gold was at par, and directing that 10 per cent. should be added to the gold price, payable in currency, if the gold should go higher than 10 per cent., was construed to mean above par. In re Stutzer (N. Y.) 26 Hun, 481, 484.

"Higher," as used in an instruction that, if the jury entertain a reasonable doubt as to which of the grades of crime, murder in the first degree, or murder in the second degree, or manslaughter, the defendant may be guilty of, they will give defendant the benefit of a doubt, and acquit him of a higher offense, means grammatically higher of one of two things, so that the instruction was not erroneous in telling the jury to acquit the defendant of only the highest of the three degrees, rather than the higher of any two degrees. People v. Newcomer, 50 Pac. 405, 408, 118 Cal. 263.

HIGHER OFFENSE.

Under Cr. Laws Code 1887 it is provided that, if a verdict be set aside, and a new trial granted the accused, he shall not be tried for any higher offense than that of which he was convicted on the last trial.

the question arose as to what was meant by "higher offense," what was to be the line of demarcation between offenses so as to determine the offense or offenses of which the accused may be tried when a new trial was ordered. It was said all offenses are divided by law into two classes: felonies and misdemeanors. Between them there is no trouble in applying the statute. As between the various felonies themselves, as a general rule, it is to be determined by the maximum of the penalty affixed to the offense. The obvious intent of the statute is that the accused person shall not on a new trial be subject to the risk of greater punishment than that which the offense of which he was convicted on his last trial was punishable. Benton v. Commonwealth, 21 S. E. 495, 497, 91 Va. 782.

HIGHEST BIDDER.

The highest bidder in a trustee's sale of property to be sold to the highest bidder must be understood to mean the "person who makes the highest bid in good faith. The trustee is not bound to accept every bid. He is necessarily clothed with a prudent and sound discretion, and the court will always sustain him in refusing bids which would manifestly defeat and frustrate the very object and purpose of the sale." Gray v. Veirs, 83 Md. 18, 22.

"Highest bidder," as used with reference to the sale of real estate under a judicial order of sale, means the highest bona fide bidder, and, unless there be at a sale more than one such bidder, the sale cannot be made to the highest bidder, because there is only one, with whom there can be no comparison. The word "highest" is used in order that there should be no sale unless there should be a real competition. Fairfax v. Hopkins (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 955, 956.

In St. 1844, c. 123, § 16, relating to tax sales, and authorizing a collector to sell to the highest bidder so much of the real estate as may be necessary to pay the tax then due, the highest bidder is the one who will pay the tax for the least quantity of the land. Lovejoy v. Lunt, 48 Me. 377, 378.

Laws La. 1888, Act No. 135, requiring that a sale of a street railway franchise should be made to the highest bidder, means the highest bidder in money, so that a sale is invalid where the specifications call for and the adjudication is made to the highest bidder in square yards of gravel pavement. Hart v. Buckner (U. S.) 54 Fed. 925; Buckner v. Hart (U. S.) 52 Fed. 835, 837.

The person who offers to pay the amount due on any parcel of lands or the smallest portion of the same shall be construed the highest bidder. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 3894.

As best or most responsible bidder.

The Pennsylvania statute requiring a sheriff at a sheriff's sale to sell the property to the highest bidder, etc., means not merely to the highest bidder, but to the best bidder; and hence, if the highest bidder was unable to pay, the sheriff was authorized to make an offer to the next highest. Zantzinger v. Pole (Pa.) 1 Dallas, 419, 1 L. Ed. 204.

The term "highest bidder" in Code Civ. Proc. § 1678, requiring property judicially sold at an auction sale to be sold to the highest bidder, means the highest responsible bidder, one ready as well as able to carry out the terms of the sale. The term "highest bidder" necessarily carries with it the idea of financial ability of an amount sufficient to successfully carry on the undertaking in which the party has offered to engage; and therefore a judicial sale will not be set aside at the application of one claiming to have made a higher bid, unless it is shown that he was in a position to carry out his contract. Irving Savings Institute v. Robinson, 71 N. Y. Supp. 193, 194, 35 Misc. Rep. 449.

HIGHEST DEGREE OF CARE AND DILIGENCE.

In holding that the words "highest degree of care and diligence" were properly used in instructions to characterize the care which a street railway company owed its passengers, the courts say that the "highest degree of care and diligence" is an expression to measure the care and diligence which a prudent man would exert in that business under all the circumstances. Heucke v. Milwaukee City Ry. Co., 84 N. W. 243, 245, 69 Wis. 401.

HIGHEST OFFICE.

The term "highest office" in Acts 1895, p. 248, § 9, requiring remonstrances against granting liquor licenses in any township or ward in any city to be signed by a majority of the voters casting votes in said township or city ward for candidates for the highest office at the last election preceding the filing of such remonstrance, means, in a popular and political sense, the most prominent official upon the election ballot at the last preceding election, and, as regards city elections, means the office of mayor, and, in case a mayor is not elected, the office of councilman. Massey v. Dunlap, 44 N. E. 641, 643, 146 Ind. 350.

HIGHWAY.

See "Common Highway"; "Defective Highway"; "Necessary Highway."
See, also, "Road"; "Street."

A highway is defined by Webster as a public road, a way open to all passengers; and such is substantially the definition given in the other standard dictionaries. Such also is the natural signification of the word when used in ordinary speech. State v. Paine Lumber Co., 54 N. W. 503, 84 Wis. 205.

"A highway, as defined by Kent in his commentaries, is every thoroughfare which is used by the public, whether it be a carriageway, a horseway, a footway, or a navigable river." Arkansas River Packet Co. v. Sorrels, 8 S. W. 683, 684, 50 Ark. 466. See, also, Morgan v. Reading, 11 Miss. (3 Smedes & M.) 366, 406.

The word "highway" embraces every kind of public ways common to all citizens, whether a footway, horseway, cartway, or a way by water. Heyward v. Chisolm (S. C.) 11 Rich. Law, 253, 263.

A highway is a passage open to all citizens of the state to go and return, pass and repass, at their pleasure. Morse v. Sweenie, 15 Ill. App. 486, 492; Bailey v. Commonwealth, 78 Va. 19, 21; Starr v. Camden & A. R. Co., 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 592, 597; State v. Stroud (Tenn.) 52 S. W. 697, 698; Carli v. Stillwater St. Ry. & Tr. Co., 10 N. W. 205, 28 Minn. 373, 41 Am. Rep. 290; Walamet Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch (U. S.) 19 Fed. 347, 355; In re Opinion of Justices, 33 Atl. 1076, 1099, 66 N. H. 629; People v. Jackson, 7 Mich. 432, 446, 74 Am. Dec. 729.

A highway is a public way, open and free to any one who has occasion to pass along it on foot or with any kind of a vehicle. In every highway the king and his subjects may pass and repass at pleasure. Lanfer v. Bridgeport Traction Co., 37 Atl. 379, 381, 68 Conn. 475, 37 L. R. A. 533 (citing 3 Bac. Abr. 494; Reg. v. Saintiff, 6 Mod. 255; 4 Vin. Abr. tit. "Chimin Common"; 1 Swift, Dig. p. 106; 3 Kent, Comm. 432; Ang. Highw. §§ 1, 2; Harding v. Inhabitants of Medway, 51 Mass. [10 Metc.] 469; State v. Harden, 11 S. C. 360, 368; State v. Stroud (Tenn.) 52 S. W. 697, 698.

A highway is a public road leading to a market town or some place of general resort, and is commonly traveled by all kinds of people. State v. Mobley (S. C.) 1 McMul. 43, 44.

In England a highway was the via or road over which the public passed on foot, on horseback, and on wheels. Boyden v. Achenbach, 79 N. C. 539, 541.

"A highway is a public road, which every citizen of the state has a right to use for the purpose of travel thereon. They are of many kinds, varying with the state of civilization and the wealth of the country through which they are constructed, and according to the extent of the traffic to be carried on on them." Shelby County Com'rs v. Castetter, 33 N. E. 986, 987, 7 Ind. App. 309.

A highway is defined as a public road or passage, a way open to all passengers by either land or water. The approved legal definition of highway is a passage through the country for the use of the people. It is a generic name for all kinds of public ways, and includes city streets. Northwestern Tel. Exch. Co. v. City of Minneapolis, 86 N. W. 69, 71, 81 Minn. 140, 53 L. R. A. 17; Abbott v. City of Duluth (U. S.) 104 Fed. 833, 837.

The term "highway" is a generic term for all kinds of public ways, including county and township roads, streets and alleys, turnpikes and plank roads, railroads and tramways, bridges and ferries, canals and navigable rivers. In short, every public thoroughfare is a highway. Southern Kansas Ry. Co. v. Oklahoma City, 69 Pac. 1050, 1054, 12 Okl. 82; Union Pac. R. v. Colfax County Com'rs, 4 Neb. 450, 456; Shelby County Com'rs v. Castetter, 33 N. E. 986, 987, 7 Ind. App. 309.

The word "highway" is derived from the Saxon, and means a right of use for passengers. It may be private or public. Highways are public roads which every citizen has a right to use. Wild v. Deig, 43 Ind. 455, 458, 13 Am. Rep. 399 (quoting Ang. Highways, §§ 1-3); Westfield Gas & Milling Co. v. Abernathy, 35 N. E. 399, 400, 8 Ind. App. 73.

A highway is a public road or street over which all citizens may go at will on foot or horseback or in carts or carriages; thoroughfares over which people travel from one part of the country to another. State v. Cowan, 29 N. C. 239, 248.

A highway is a public way leading from town to town or place to place, in contradistinction to private ways for the use of the inhabitants of a particular town. Commonwealth v. Inhabitants of Newbury, 19 Mass. (2 Pick.) 51, 56; Commonwealth v. Inhabitants of Charlestown, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 180, 188, 11 Am. Dec. 161; Harding v. Inhabitants of Medway, 51 Mass. (10 Metc.) 465, 469; Inhabitants of Waterford v. Oxford County Com'rs, 59 Me. 450, 452. But though it is thus specifically applied, yet, when used in a popular sense, it includes all traveled ways whether country or town. Harding v. Inhabitants of Medway, 51 Mass. (10 Metc.) 465, 469.

A public highway, as distinguished from a private road, is one which is open to the travel of the public. It is the right to travel upon it by all the world, and not the exercise of the right, which makes it a public highway. In re City of New York, 31 N. E. 1043, 1044, 135 N. Y. 253, 31 Am. St. Rep. 825.

"Highway," as used in Act April 16, 1846 (Rev. St. p. 515), which directs the overseers of the highways of a town to work the highways within the limits of the town, and makes provision for defraying the charges of maintaining the highways, is synonymous with "lawful public road." Vantilburgh v. Shann, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 740, 744.

A highway is a passage, road, or street which every citizen has a right to use, and is, therefore, necessarily public; and the phrase a "public highway" is a tautological expression. Jenkins v. Chicago & A. R. Co., 27 Mo. App. 578, 583 (citing Walton v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 67 Mo. 56, 57).

A highway, in its ordinary conception, is a strip of land bounded by approximately parallel boundaries for the purpose of direct travel. It does not include the idea of bays or excrescences on either side of it, not within the direct course of travel, and not adapted thereto, such as a triangle between a traveled highway and the shore of a lake lying near the highway. Town of Randall v. Rovelstad, 81 N. W. 819, 825, 105 Wis. 410.

"'Highway' is the genus of all public ways, whether cart, horse, or foot ways. Reg. v. Saintiff, 6 Mod. 255, Colt, C. J., 4 Vin. 502. And whether a road shall be deemed a highway from mere user depends on the nature of the user. It is doubted in some of the books whether a road can be a highway unless it be a thoroughfare. Wood-year v. Hadden, 5 Taunt. 125; Wood v. Veal, 5 B. & Ald. 454; Rex v. Great Dover St. Trustees, 5 Adol. & El. 698. The judges have been divided in opinion, but there is now perhaps a leaning to the opinion that it may be. British Museum Trustees v. Finnis, 5 Car. & P. 460."

A highway mentioned in a deed as a boundary must be understood to mean the highway as it practically exists, the apparent and traveled highway, and not the highway as it exists of record merely. Falls Village Water Co. v. Tibbetts, 31 Conn. 165, 167.

An Alabama statute prohibits gaming at any tavern, inn, etc., or any public house or highway, or any other public place, etc. Held, that the term "highway," as used in the statute, means a public road; that is, a road dedicated to and kept up by the public, as contradistinguished from private ways or neighborhood roads which are not so kept up. Mills v. State, 20 Ala. 86, 88.

A highway or road is an open way or public passage. It is ground appropriated for forming a communication between one city or town and another. Hutson v. City of New York, 7 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Sandf.) 289, 312.

The term "public highway" includes all kinds of thoroughfares in which the public has a right of way or passage. It clearly includes graded and ungraded or finished and unfinished streets. Parsons v. City and County of San Francisco, 23 Cal. 462, 464.

The word "highway," as used in an act relating to municipal liens, means the whole or any part of any public street, public road, public lane, public alley, or other public highway. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, vol. 4, col. 1269, § 55.

In all counties of this state all roads, streets, alleys, lanes, courts, places, trails, and bridges laid out or erected as such by the public, or dedicated or abandoned to the public, or made such in actions for the partition of real property, are public highways. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 1114; Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 2618.

When used as boundary.

It is well settled that a grant of land in a state bounded by a highway or river carries the fee by implication to the center of the highway or river, subject to the right of passage of the public. Mariner v. Schulte, 13 Wis. 692, 706; Healeg v. Babbitt, 14 R. I. 533, 538; Hoboken Land & Imp. Co. v. Kerrigan, 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 13, 16; Morrow v. Willard, 30 Vt. 118, 120. But where the grantor owns the entire highway, the north line of which is the boundary of his land, a conveyance of the land as bounded by the highway passes the fee in the entire highway. Healey v. Babbitt, 14 R. I. 533, 538.

"Whether a grant of land bounded by a street, highway, or running stream extends to the center of such street, highway, or stream, or is limited to the exterior line or margin of the same, depends upon the intent of the parties to the grant, as manifested by its terms; so that the question as to the true boundary is in all cases only the interpretation of the deed or grant. Learned judges have contended, and in some of the states it has been substantially held, that in such cases the question of boundary is rather to be determined by reasons of public policy than intent, determined by the ordinary rules of construction; although in no instance is it claimed that a grantor may not restrict his grant so as to exclude the soil of the street, highway, or stream. The most that can be claimed by any one is that nothing short of the intention expressed in ipsissimis verbis to exclude the soil in such cases would exclude it. The rule, however, in this state, is well settled that no particular words or form of expression is necessary to restrict the grant to the exterior line of the street or margin of the stream and exclude the soil of each, but, while the presumption is in every case that the grantor does not intend to retain the fee of the soil within the line of the street or under the water, such presumption may be overcome by the use of any terms in describing the premises granted which clearly indicate an intent not to convey the soil of the street or stream. White's Bank of Buffalo v. Nichols, 64 N. Y. 65, 70.

Bridges.

A public bridge is a part of a highway. Cascade County v. City of Great Falls, 46 Pac. 437, 438, 18 Mont. 537; Union Pac. R. R. v. Colfax County Com'rs, 4 Neb. 342; State v. Street, 23 South. 807, 808, 117 Ala. 203; People v. Buffalo County Com'rs, 4 Neb. 150, 158; Bank of Idaho v. Malheur County, 45 Pac. 781, 782, 30 Or. 420, 35 L. R. A. 141. The word "highway," as used in Rev. St. c. 49, § 10, includes all bridges thereon. State v. Canterbury, 28 N. H. 195, 225. The word "highway" includes a public bridge, within the meaning of a statute relative to the building of highways. Dubuque County v. Dubuque & Pac. R. Co. (Iowa) 4 G. Greene, 1, 14, 15.

As a general proposition, bridges are treated as portions of the highways which cross them, and are to be maintained by the same persons to whom the duty of repairing the highway is committed. Rapho & W. H. Tps. v. Moore, 68 Pa. (18 P. F. Smith) 404, 406, 8 Am. Rep. 202; Dodge County Com'rs v. Chandler, 96 U. S. 205, 208, 24 L. Ed. 625; State v. Wood County, 72 Wis. 629, 637, 40 N. W. 381; Washer v. Bullitt County, 110 U. S. 558, 564, 4 Sup. Ct. 249, 28 L. Ed. 249; Commonwealth v. Montgomery County Com'rs (Pa.) 4 Montg. Co. Law Rep. 41, 42.

If a bridge spans a stream at the crossing of a highway, and within the limits of the highway, it is to be regarded as a part of the highway; and a legislative charter for the erection of such a bridge imposes no new servitude on the land of the riparian owners, and entitles them to no new compensation. Jones v. Keith, 37 Tex. 394, 400, 14 Am. Rep. 382.

A bridge, by the concurrent testimony of all past time, in every possible shape and form, is but the ordinary road carried across the river. Mahnken v. Board of Chosen Freeholders, 41 Atl. 921, 923, 62 N. J. Law, 404 (citing Proprietors of Bridges v. Hoboken Land & Imp. Co., 13 N. J. Eq. 518).

A bridge which is constantly traveled by pedestrians and used by families and others, and crossed by 25 or 30 people daily, is a public highway. McDonald v. City of Ashland, 78 Wis. 251, 47 N. W. 434, 78 Wis. 251.

Bridges are but streets or highways over water; and the fee of all such portions of the Chicago river as are crossed by bridges within the city of Chicago is in the corporation, subject to the public easement for navigation. Chicago v. McGinn, 51 Ill. 266, 272, 2 Am. Rep. 295.

A public bridge is a common highway. A private bridge is similar in its nature to a private right of way, and is subject to most of its incidents. The character of the bridge depends more upon the use that is made of it than upon the means by which it is erected. If individuals, for the right to take toll, will make a public highway, the mode of remuneration authorized will not deprive it of the character stamped upon it by the purpose to which it is applied. McPheeters v. Merimac Bridge Co., 28 Mo. 465, 467.

Bridges are usually constructed across water courses or deep depressions across the roadway as a means of safe and convenient passage, and while, in one sense, they are a part of the road, they differ from the road, strictly so called, and are generally much more expensive to construct and maintain, and often require a greater outlay than can be provided for from the road and bridge tax. It is evident that the General Assembly regarded them as a distinct and expensive work on the road, and as being apart in their character and cost from the road itself, in Hurd's Rev. St. 1899, p. 1472, § 20, providing that commissioners desiring to expend "on any bridge or other distinct and expensive work on the road" a greater sum of money than is available, may petition for the issuance of bonds. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. People, 65 N. E. 715, 716, 200 Ill. 365.

Under the charter of the New Haven and Northampton Company, requiring it to restore highways crossed by its railroad to their former condition of usefulness, and to construct and use that part of its railroad within the corporate limits of New Haven in such manner and subject to such rules and regulations as the common council should prescribe, it was the duty of such company to construct a bridge over its railroad at a street crossing, when directed by the city council, including the approach to such bridge, and the company was liable for damages to adjoining property caused by the construction of the approach to the bridge, though such approach was in fact constructed by the city. Burritt v. City of New Haven, 42 Conn. 174, 202.

A bridge over a stream crossing a street is a part of the street. It is as much so as the cover placed over a drain or sewer crossing a street. Persons travel over it as they do over other portions of the street, subject, it may be, to any delay that may be occasioned in opening and closing a draw. It is under the control of the city, and kept in repair and attended under the city authorities, and we have no doubt that it is as much their duty to light the bridge as any other portion of the street. City of Chicago v. Powers, 42 Ill. 169, 172, 89 Am. Dec. 418.

Public bridges, within the limits of the cities of the state, located on the streets and public highways of the cities, constitute a part of such streets and highways, and such cities, where they take charge of the same, are liable to persons suffering injury without fault for the neglect to keep them in repair. City of Goshen v. Myers, 119 Ind. 196, 21 N. E. 657, 658 (citing Lowrey v. City of Delphi, 55 Ind. 250).

According to the common use of language there is a sense in which a bridge may be spoken of as a highway, but the word "highway" does not import a bridge, and in any case where there is an occasion to notice any of the conditions which exist between highways generally and bridges it is indispensable that the difference should be marked by the use of the terms appropriate to each. By ordinary rules of language the words "highway" and "bridge" are not equivalent or convertible, and if a party is to be charged with the neglect to build or repair a bridge it must be by the term "bridge," which alone describes such a structure. State v. Canterbury, 28 N. H. (8 Fost.) 195, 231.

The word "highway," as used in Gross' St. 1868, §§ 86-88, relating to the duty of highway commissioners with respect to highways laid out upon the line between any two towns, does not include a bridge on the line between two towns. Union Drainage Dist. Com'rs v. Highway Com'rs, 87 Ill. App. 93, 98.

"Highway" is a broader term than "street." All streets are highways, but not all highways are streets; and, being a broader term, it should be held to include streets. So that under a statute providing that the word "highway," when used in a Code, includes public bridges, the term "highway" will include a bridge on a city street. Sachs v. City of Sioux City, 80 N. W. 336, 337, 109 Iowa, 224.

The word "highway" includes bridges thereon. V. S. 1894, 24; Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 64, c. 2, § 26; Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 2; Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 3861; Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 70; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2498; Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1901, § 240, subd. 3; Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 59, c. 1, § 6, subd. 6; Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 88, c. 8, § 5, subd. 4; Code Iowa 1897, § 48, subd. 5; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 255, subd. 5; Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1720, c. 163, § 1; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 4971.

As a common.

See "Common"; "Public Common."

Common and equal right to use.

A highway is a way which is common to all people without distinction, and which they may travel over on foot or horseback, or in carriages. Burlington, K. & S. W. R. Co. v. Johnson, 16 Pac. 125, 128, 38 Kan. 142.

The term "highway" is a generic name for all kinds of public ways; ways common to all the people in the state having occasion to pass over it. To constitute a highway, it must be one to which all the people of the state have a common and equal right to travel, and in which they have a common, and at least general, interest to keep unobstructed. Talbot v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (Va.) 31 Grat. 685, 692.

A highway is a public way for the use of the public in general for passage and traffic, without distinction. Bogue v. Bennett, 60 N. E. 143, 145, 156 Ind. 478, 83 Am. St. Rep. 200 (citing Starr v. Camden & A. R. Co., 24 N. J. Law, 592).

Control and repair by public.

A public highway is one either established by the public authorities in proceedings regularly brought for that purpose, or one generally used by the public, over which the public authorities have exercised control for the period of 20 years, or one dedicated to the public by the owner of the soil with the sanction of the authorities, and for the maintenance and reparation of which they are responsible. State v. Purify, 86 N. C. 681, 682; State v. McDaniel, 53 N. C. 284, 285; Boyden v. Achenbach, 79 N. C. 539; Stewart v. Frink, 94 N. C. 487, 488, 55 Am. Rep. 619.

To constitute a road a public highway, however originating, it must be a public charge, and must of necessity have an overseer and hands to work it, bridges erected when needed, and kept in repair at the public expense; and hence the law, in order to avoid an intolerable burden being thrown on the public, will not permit every citizen of his own head and according to his own ideas of necessity to establish a highway by mere act of private dedication. Kennedy v. Williams, 87 N. C. 6, 8.

A highway is commonly understood to be a turnpike road, gravel road, or plank road, or the common thoroughfare established and maintained by public authority for travel by the public generally. Its establishment is by the dedication of the land to the use of the public as a highway, and its acceptance and use by the public for that purpose. Riley v. Buchanan, 76 S. W. 527, 528, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 863, 63 L. R. A. 642.

A highway is what the name signifies, a way for public travel; that is, a public road. Highways are under the control and superintendence of the proper public authorities. The use of the highways is regulated by the criminal law and such statutes as the Legislature may have enacted for that purpose. People v. Meyer, 56 N. Y. Supp. 1097, 1099, 26 Misc. Rep. 117.

Highways and streets are for the public use. They are not alone for the people of the municipality in which they are located, and such ways cannot be considered in any sense the easement or property of the town; but the municipality in which a public way is located has been vested by the Legislature with the supervision and control of such ways for the public use, and is charged with the responsibility of keeping them in repair. State v. Boardman, 44 Atl. 118, 120, 93 Me. 73.

As county purpose.

See "County Purpose."

County way or road.

The word "highway" may be held equivalent to the words "county way," "county road," or "common road." Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 70; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2498; Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1901, § 240, subd. 3; Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 59, c. 1, § 6, subd. 3; Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 88, c. 8, § 5, subd. 4; Code Iowa 1897, § 48, subd. 5; Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 7342, subd. 5; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 255, subd. 5; Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1720, c. 131, § 1, subd. 16; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 4971.

As created by user or dedication.

A highway is a thoroughfare used by the public, or, in the language of the English books, a way common to all the king's subjects. Where a street car company purchases a strip of land and lays its tracks in the center thereof, and throws the strip open for the public, a driveway being provided on either side, the entire strip becomes a public highway, though it is not formally dedicated, and therefore the company is liable for an injury to a passenger in a stage coach which gets on the track, though the negligence causing the action is not wanton, willful, or intentional. Liekens v. Staten Island Midland R. Co., 72 N. Y. Supp. 162, 164, 64 App. Div. 327.

A highway established by user merely is not necessarily limited to the traveled path; that is, that part actually used so as to have been worn by feet or wheel. If the traveled track of a highway, where a person was at the time of an injury, had been traveled in the same place for 15 years before the accident, and such track, though not the traveled track of the former highway, was within the limits of the former highway as fenced out, and had been within the limits of such highway as thus fenced out for 5 years and more before the commencement of said 15 years, there would be a public highway there. Coffin v. Town of Plymouth, 49 N. H. 173, 175.

"The early statute, defining what are highways by user, declares (Laws 1817, c. 43, § 3) that when any roads have been used as public highways for 20 years or more, the same shall be taken and deemed as public highways." The user which creates the easement must be that which the ordinary highway is subject to. The location of a lamp post, the passing of a resolution regulating the repair of a wharf, or the declaration by the common council that certain land is a street, does not, after the lapse of 20 years, imply a grant to the city, where the owner has uninterruptedly possessed and controlled the land, and there has been no travel over it as a highway. In Speir v. Town of Utrecht, 24 N. E. 692, 694, 121 N. Y. 420, the court says the user must be like that of highways generally. The road must not only be traveled upon, but it must be kept in repair or taken in charge and adopted by the public authorities. City of Buffalo v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 74 N. Y. Supp. 343, 352, 68 App. Div. 488.

A road used as a public highway for 20 years or more, but which had never been petitioned for or laid out or located as a public highway by any judicial proceeding, and had never been ascertained, described, and entered of record as a highway, is a highway within a provision authorizing the board of commissioners to change the location of a highway. Houlton v. Carpenter, 64 N. E. 939, 940, 29 Ind. App. 643.

The word "highway" is equivalent to the words "public highway," as a highway is not a highway unless it is public. Where the railroad company has invited the public to use a crossing as a part of a public highway, such crossing is as to it in all respects the same as a strictly legal highway, and proof of such use was competent under an allegation that it was a highway. Coulter v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 67 N. W. 1046, 1050, 5 N. D. 568.

As used in Rev. St. §§ 1294, 1296, providing that every "highway which shall have been abandoned for five years shall revert to the owners of the adjoining land," the word "highway" will be construed to include only roads laid out by the authority of the United States, the state, or any county, town, city, or village, and does not include the highways dedicated to the public by a private owner. Paine Lumber Co. v. City of Oshkosh, 61 N. W. 1108, 1111, 89 Wis. 449.

"Highway," as used in Act Va. Nov. 27, 1789, § 1, p. 46, providing that the benefit of clergy shall be taken away from persons committing robbery in or near a highway, means something more than a common way. It should be construed as a road on which a man has a right to travel, and the obstruction of which may be prosecuted as a nuisance. It cannot be a road opened only by private agreement. United States v. King (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 786, 787.

Cul-de-sac or pent road.

The term "highway" may properly be applied to a mere cul-de-sac. People v. Van Alstyne (N. Y.) 3 Keyes, 35, 37; Saunders v. Townsend (N. Y.) 26 Hun, 308, 309. Contra, see People v. Jackson, 7 Mich. 432, 446, 74 Am. Dec. 729.

A "street," as the term is used in the law of streets and highways, includes a mere cul-de-sac; that is, a street open at one end only. True, in Holdane v. Cold Spring Trustees (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 103, two of the three judges held that such a street could not be a highway. They based their decisions upon what they supposed to be the common law. It has been laid down by Lord Kenyon in Rugby Charity v. Merryweather, 11 East, 376, that a mere cul-de-sac might be a highway; that otherwise such places would be traps to catch trespassers. And in Bateman v. Bluck, 14 Eng. Law & Eq. 69, the question was fully considered, and the court held that it was no objection to a highway that it was a mere cul-de-sac, and not a thoroughfare; and in People v. Kingman, 24 N. Y. 559, the Court of Appeals very pointedly condemned the decision in Holdane v. Cold Spring Trustees (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 103, and held that upon principle as well as authority it is no objection to the highway or public street that it is a cul-de-sac; that public ways with an outlet at one end may, and often do, exist. Bartlett v. City of Bangor, 67 Me. 460, 467.

The term "highway," in Rev. St. §§ 3178, 3179, relieving owners of land from the duty of maintaining fences on the sides of highways, does not include pent roads. Carpenter v. Cook, 30 Atl. 998, 999, 67 Vt. 102; French v. Holt, 53 Vt. 364; Wolcott v. Whitcomb, 40 Vt. 40, 41; Bridgman v. Town of Hardwick, 81 Atl. 33, 34, 67 Vt. 132. Contra, see Town of Whillingham v. Bowen, 22 Vt. 317.

As an easement.

A public highway is a perpetual easement and a freehold estate. Chaplin v. Commissioners, 126 Ill. 264, 18 N. E. 765; Village of Crete v. Hewes, 168 Ill. 330, 48 N. E. 36; Taylor v. Pierce, 50 N. E. 1109, 1110, 174 Ill. 9.

A highway is nothing but an easement comprehending merely the right of all the individuals in the community to pass and repass, with the incidental right in the public to do all the acts necessary to keep it in repair. This easement does not comprehend any interest in the soil, nor give the public the legal possession of it. Adams v. Rivers (N. Y.) 11 Barb. 390, 399; Kelsey v. King

(N. Y.) 33 How. Prac. 39, 44; Peck v. Smith, 1 Conn. 103, 132, 6 Am. Dec. 216; In re Road from Fitzwater St. to Shippen St. (Pa.) 4 Serg. & R. 106; Starr v. Camden & A. R. Co., 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 592, 597; Smith v. City of San Suis Obispo, 30 Pac. 591, 593, 95 Cal. 463; Newton v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 44 Atl. 813, 815, 72 Conn. 420; Lynch v. Town of Rutland, 29 Atl. 1015, 1016, 66 Vt. 570.

Every landowner whose land abuts on a highway is supposed to be the owner of the soil to the center of the highway in fee, subject to the easement of the public travel, and may do in the highway on his side of the center line anything which the owner in fee of land may do, if he does not interfere with that easement. Newton v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 44 Atl. 813, 815, 72 Conn. 420.

The right of freehold is not affected by establishing a highway, but the freehold continues in the original owner of the land in the same manner it was before the highway was established subject to the easement. Peck v. Smith, 1 Conn. 103, 132, 6 Am. Dec. 216.

Highways are regarded as easements in the land over which they are laid out; hence the owner of the land is not divested of his title, but it is merely made subject to the easement. When a highway is laid out the public acquires no more than a right of way with the powers and privileges incident to that right, such as digging the soil, cutting timber and other materials within the space of the road in a reasonable manner for the purpose of making and repairing the road and its bridges. Jackson v. Hathaway (N. Y.) 15 Johns. 447, 452, 8 Am. Dec. 263 (cited and approved in Whitbeck v. Cook [N. Y.] 15 Johns. 483, 490, 8 Am. Dec. 272).

A grant of a highway, without any other words indicating an intent to enlarge the import of the word, conveys only an easement. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. v. Chandler, 91 Mass. (9 Allen) 159, 165.

A highway taken by the power of eminent domain is merely a public way, the fee remaining in the landowner. The grass is a part of the land, and, with the soil and rocks, remains the property of the landowner, subject to the public right of way, and although a traveler, making a reasonable use of the way as a way, is not liable for grass snatchingly taken, as he is not for mud or dust accidentally carried off by his horse, he commits a tort by grazing his horse on another's land on which he has only a right of way. But mere stopping is not necessarily a tort. Varney v. Manchester, 58 N. H. 430, 432, 40 Am. Rep. 592.

A public highway is a way in which the public are entitled to a right of passage.

The title to the soil, stone, etc., in such a way continues in the owners of the lands over which the way passes. The land is merely dedicated to the public for particular purposes. Chambers v. Furry (Pa.) 1 Yeates 167, 169.

Ferry.

See "Ferry."

Ferry boat.

A highway is a passage that is open to all the public. Thus, public rivers, considered as highways, need not necessarily be thoroughfares; but the term would not include a ferry boat operated by a county. Chick v. Newberry County, 3 S. E. 787, 789, 27 S. C. 419.

As highway properly laid out.

Act Md. 1795, c. 44, § 2, requiring the location of public highways to be recorded among the records of the territory of Columbia, should be construed to include only those roads which have been so recorded, such recording being a condition precedent to the constitution of the road as a public highway. United States v. Emery (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 1014.

The North Carolina statute prohibiting the obstruction of a public highway includes a road laid off by commissioners under an order of a township board of trustees, which has appointed an overseer for the road. State v. Davis, 68 N. C. 297, 299.

"Highway," as used in Gen. St. c. 43, § 1, which authorizes the county commissioners to lay out a highway from place to place within the same town, as well as from town to town, means a way originally laid out by the county commissioners. Inhabitants of Blackstone v. Worcester County Com'rs, 108 Mass. 68.

Impassable or unopened road.

The term "highway," within the meaning of Rev. St. § 1326, prescribing a penalty for obstructing a highway, does not include a platted street designated and dedicated to the public use, but which has not been opened for actual public use. City of Racine v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 65 N. W. 857, 858, 92 Wis. 118; State v. Paine Lumber Co., 54 N. W. 503, 504, 84 Wis. 205.

The word "highway" imports a practicable passage. It is a contradiction in terms to speak of an impassable public highway. We might as well speak of an uninhabitable dwelling house or an invisible illumination. Armstrong v. City of St. Louis, 3 Mo. App. 151, 157.

As improved part of way.

Code, § 466, which provides for the improvement of highways within cities and towns, and that an assessment may be made upon the lots fronting on such highway, means simply the improved part of the highway. Morgan v. Des Moines & St. L. Ry. Co., 21 N. W. 96, 98, 64 Iowa, 589, 52 Am. Rep. 462.

As an incumbrance.

See "Incumbrance (On Title)."

As land.

See "Land."

Landings and levies.

The term "highway" in the constitutional prohibition relative to roads, highways, streets, or alleys cannot be held to embrace landings and levees, or include a river and its banks. Duffy v. City of New Orleans, 21 South. 179, 182, 49 La. Ann. 114.

A wharf, simply as such, and not being part of a street, is not a public highway. State v. Cowan, 29 N. C. 239, 248.

Lane.

Nature of use.

In Cater v. Northwestern Telephone Exch. Co., 63 N. W. 111, 60 Minn. 539, 28 L. R. A. 310, 51 Am. St. Rep. 543, the adaptability of the public easement in highways to the requirements of improvement an invention was well expressed by Judge Mitchell as follows: "If there is any one fact established in the history of society and of the law itself, it is that the mode of exercising this easement is expansive, developing and growing as civilization advances. In the most primitive state of society the conception of a highway was merely a footpath; in a slightly more advanced state it included the idea of a way for pack animals; and next a way for vehicles drawn by animals; constituting respectively the iter, the actus, and the via of the Romans. And thus the methods of using public highways expanded with the growth of civilization until to-day our urban highways are devoted to a variety of uses not known in former times, and never dreamed of by the owners of the soil when the public easement was acquired. Hence it has become settled law that the public easement is not limited to the particular methods of use in vogue when the easement was acquired, but includes all new and improved methods, the utility and general convenience of which may afterward be discovered and developed in aid of the general purpose for which highways are designed." A statute authorizing the construction of bicycle sidepaths on highways is not invalid, and is a proper highway use. Ryar v. Preston, 69 N. Y. Supp. 100, 102, 69 App. Div. 97.

The easement of a highway embraces all travel not prohibited by law on foot, in carriages, omnibuses, stages, sleighs, or other vehicles, as the wants and habits of the public demand. The right of the public in a highway consists in the privilege of passage and such privileges as are annexed as incidents by usage or custom, as the right to make sewers and drains and lay gas and water pipes. It can hardly be questioned that the primary and fundamental purpose of a public highway, street, or alley is to accommodate the public travel, to afford citizens and strangers an opportunity to pass and repass on foot or in vehicles with such movable property as they may have occasion to transport, and every man has a right to use on the road a conveyance of his own at will, subject to such proper regulations as may be prescribed by authority. The easement for public travel is not to be limited to the particular modes of travel in use at the time the easement was acquired, but extends to and includes all such new and improved methods of travel, the utility and general convenience of which may be afterwards discovered or developed, as are in aid of the identical use for which the street was acquired. The construction and operation of an ordinary railroad in a public street is a new use of the street, and an additional burden on the soil. Carli v. Stillwater St. Ry. & Transfer Co., 10 N. W. 205, 28 Minn. 373, 41 Am. Rep. 290.

"A public highway, while primarily intended for the accommodation of travelers employing the ordinary means of locomotion, such as vehicles drawn by animals, is nevertheless, in another and broader sense, a public convenience. It is appropriated for that purpose, and, when thus taken or dedicated, nothing remains in the original proprietor but the naked fee; for, as has been well said, lands thus appropriated are acquired for the purpose of providing a means of free passage common to all the people, and consequently may be rightfully used in any way that will subserve that purpose. By the taking the public acquires a right of free passage over every part of the land, not only by the means in use when the lands were taken, but by such other means as the improvements of the age and new wants arising out of an increase of population or an enlargement of business may render necessary. It is perfectly consistent with the purposes for which streets are acquired that the public authorities should adapt them, in their uses, to the conveniences and improvements of the age." A street may be used for the laying of an underground telephone conduit without entitling abutting owners to damages, though their fee extends to the center of the street. Castle v. Bell Telephone Co., 63 N. Y. Supp. 482, 484, 49 App. Div. 437.

Neighborhood road.

A neighborhood road, although a public way, is not a public highway, and hence the obstruction of the same is not ground for a prosecution for obstructing a highway. State v. Harden, 11 S. C. 360, 368, 369.

Part of highway.

Within Rev. St. § 1204, as amended by Laws 1882, c. 253, providing that any highway which shall be entirely abandoned as a route of travel, and on which no highway tax has been expended for five years, shall be considered legally discontinued. The term "highway" does not mean that any part of a highway, however small, that has not been traveled or worked for five years, shall be considered legally discontinued. It is a highway eo nomine, as a generic term, to which the statute relates; at least enough of any public road or thoroughfare to be called in ordinary parlance a highway, or as is meant by the statute when it provides for laying out a highway; and hence the statute does not apply where, to avoid a hill, which was at the crossing of two roads, the road had been made around the foot of the hill, and that part going over the hill had not been worked. Maire v. Kruse, 55 N. W. 389, 390, 85 Wis. 302, 26 L. R. A. 449.

The term "highway" in a statute providing that any highway abandoned as a route of travel, and on which no highway tax had been expended for five years, shall be considered discontinued, was construed to include a country road more than half a mile in length connecting two other highways. Herrick v. Town of Geneva, 65 N. W. 1024, 1025, 92 Wis. 114.

Gen. Laws, c. 71, § 1, provides that "highways in a town" may be discontinued by vote of the town. Held, that "highways in a town," within the meaning of the statute, includes one wholly within the town, though it is part of a continuous thoroughfare extending to other towns. Drew v. Cotton, 42 Atl. 239, 240, 68 N. H. 22.

Plank road.

See "Plank Roads."

Private way.

The term "highway" includes not only public roads, but also private roads. Sherman v. Buick, 32 Cal. 241, 242, 252, 91 Am. Dec. 577.

"Public highway," as used in Wagner's St. p. 520, § 5, providing that a railway company shall not be liable for killing animals in a crossing of any public highway, includes a private road, for a private road is a highway. The phrase "public highway" is a tautological expression. A highway is a passage, road, or street which every citizen has a right to use, and is therefore necessarily public; private roads being so termed by the statute to distinguish them from public roads, which are maintained by public expense. Walton v. St. Louis, L. M. & S. Ry. Co., 67 Mo. 56, 57.

As public place or work.

See "Public Place"; "Public Works."

Public square.

The term "highway" is properly applied to so much of a public square as is around and about the courthouse, and devoted to the purpose of a highway. Parts of it may, and not infrequently are, devoted to the use of pedestrians, while other parts are used for and devoted to the purpose of passing and repassing and going to and from with carriages, wagons, carts, horses, etc. The purpose is to enable all persons and people going to and from the courthouse to have a convenient public way and means to do so. This is a material part of the purpose of what is commonly and not inaptly called the "public square" of the county. It belongs to the county, and the courthouse is erected on it, and so much as is used for the moving about of people constitutes and is a highway recognized, allowed, and protected by the law. It belongs to the public, and they use it of right until public authority shall abolish it, though there be no overseer of it, for an overseer is not essential to the existence of a highway. State v. Eastman, 13 S. E. 1019, 1020, 109 N. O. 785.

Railroad.

A railroad is a public highway, not in the sense of public wagon roads upon which every one may transact his own business with his own means of conveyance, but only in the sense of being compelled to accept of each and all and take and carry away to the extent of their ability. Toledo, P. & W. Ry. Co. v. Pence, 68 Ill. 524, 529; Clark v. Chicago & A. R. Co., 29 S. W. 1013, 1016, 127 Mo. 197.

A railroad is a public highway affording facilities for easy and rapid travel to the public, and aiding or developing the resources of a country, and making the markets for its production easy of access. Gibson v. Mason, 5 Nev. 283, 307.

A railroad is a public way for the public benefit, and the right of a corporation to exact a uniform, reasonable, and stipulated toll from those who pass over it does not make its main use a private one. The public have an interest in such a railroad when it belongs to a corporation as clearly as they would if it were free, or as if the tolls were payable to the state, because travel and transportation are cheapened by it to a degree far exceeding all the tolls and charges of every kind; and this advantage the public has over and above those of rapidity, comfort, convenience, increase of trade, opening of markets, and other means of rewarding labor or promoting wealth. The purpose of constructing a railroad is public in its nature, for a donation to which taxes may be levied. Davidson v. Ramsey County Com'rs, 18 Minn. 482, 488 (Gil. 432, 436).

A railroad is for some purposes and in a certain sense a highway; not, however, in the sense that a street or road is a public highway. It is quasi public in character. The right of eminent domain may be invoked in aid of its construction; and when fully equipped and in operation it becomes a common carrier, and is liable alike to all persons for the transportation of themselves and their property, and as a common carrier it may be controlled and governed by the state, and, within well-defined limits, by the United States. A street or road is a public highway in a much broader sense than a railroad. It is laid out and opened by the public authorities for the general use of the public, built and kept in repair at public expense, and all persons have the right of free access thereto with the right to travel thereon. To obstruct it is made a criminal offense. By necessity, one who owns property abutting on or locates his buildings adjacent to a street or road enjoys not alone the right of access thereto with the right to travel thereon, but, in addition thereto, the light, air, and view which come to his property over the same. To deprive him of such right would be to destroy the thing itself out of which the right grows. Therefore, of necessity, the right exists. A railroad company, when invested with the fee title, except in the discharge of its duties as a common carrier, is the owner of and entitled to the exclusive use, possession, and control of its right of way, the same as a private person, and holds and owns its property disencumbered of any right therein of its abutting or adjoining neighbors as fully and completely as does the individual owner of property. The public do not have the right of access to its right of way except at designated places, and abutting owners do not hold adjacent to its right of way with a view of access thereto and the enjoyment of light, air, and view therefrom. Kotz v. Illinois Cent. Ry. Co., 59 N. E. 240, 241, 188 Ill. 518.

A railroad is not a public highway in the sense that it belongs to the people, so as to preclude a party from acquiring title to land owned by a railway company by adverse possession, since such company holds and uses its property for the benefit of its stockholders, and not for the public. Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Stickley, 58 N. E. 192, 193, 155 Ind. 312.

"A railroad is a public highway for the public benefit, and the right of the corporation to exact a uniform, reasonable, stipulated toll from those who pass over it does not make its main use a private one. The public has an interest in such a road when it belongs to a corporation as clearly as they would have if it were free, or as if the tolls were payable to the state, because travel and transportation are cheapened by it to a degree far exceeding all the tolls and charges of every kind; and this advantage the public has over and above those of rapidity, comfort, and convenience, increase of trade, opening of markets, and other means of regarding labor and promoting wealth." Thus the assessment of a local tax to aid in the construction of a railroad is a legitimate exercise of a taxing power, as the road is a public benefit. Sharpless v. City of Philadelphia, 21 Pa. (9 Harris) 147, 164, 169, 59 Am. Dec. 759.

Under the provisions of section 4, art. 11, of the Constitution, a railroad constructed and operated in the state is a public highway. McLucas v. St. Joseph & G. I. R. Co. (Neb.) 93 N. W. 928.

A highway does not include a railroad in the fullest sense of the term, though the public has an interest in it, and the right to use it, and although there is a necessity that the company should keep the road in a condition to enable it to perform its duty to the public. It is not a common public highway on which all citizens are free to pass, since it is the subject of private property. A railroad is not a highway in the sense that it is exempt from execution as such. State v. Rieves, 27 N. C. 297, 310.

Rev. St. U. S. § 2477 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1567], declares that the right of way for the construction of highways over public lands not reserved for public uses is hereby granted. Held, that the term "highway," as used in the section, did not, either in its ordinary or strict sense, include railroads. And while it was true in a certain sense that a railroad was a public highway, to be constructed and operated according to law and subject to public control, it can only be used in a particular manner, and is not open to common use for foot passengers, horse passengers, animals, and carriages, as an ordinary highway may be used. In the usual acceptance of the term, a highway is one which is common to all people without distinction, and which they may travel over on foot, horseback, or in carriages. Burlington, K. & S. W. R. Co. v. Johnson, 16 Pac. 125, 128, 38 Kan. 142. Contra, see Flint & P. M. Ry. Co. v. Gordon, 2 N. W. 648, 653, 41 Mich. 420; Tennessee & C. R. Co. v. Taylor, 14 South. 379, 102 Ala. 224.

"Public highway," as used in legislative declarations to the effect that particular railroads shall be public highways, means that such road shall be open to the use of the public for their own vehicles. As used in Act Cong. May 5, 1864, 13 Stat. 64, granting land to the state of Minnesota to aid in the construction of a certain railroad, and providing that the said railroad shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the government of the United States free from all toll or other charge for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States, only means that the government shall have the right to use the road, and not that it shall have the right to require its transportation to be performed by the railroad company. Lake Superior & M. R. R. Co. v. United States, 93 U. S. 442, 451, 23 L. Ed. 965.

"Public highway," as used in Act March 22, 1871, providing that whenever any public highway of any company shall have been out of repair for five years it shall be deemed abandoned, does not seem to apply to railroads. It is true that railroads are public highways belonging to corporations, but at the time of the passage of the act they constituted by far the most important class of such highways, and it is not to be supposed that the Legislature intended to include them under this general name after mentioning in the act by name turnpikes and canals. Pittsburgh, V. & C. Ry. Co. v. Pittsburgh, C. & S. L. R. Co., 28 Atl. 155, 157, 159 Pa. 331.

"A railroad is a public highway (Const. Tex. art. 10, § 2; Beekman v. Saratoga & S. R. Co. [N. Y.] 3 Paige, 45, 74, 22 Am. Dec. 679; Ang. Highw. § 370), and especially is this true so far as acquisition of the right of way is concerned, for upon no other theory could the right of eminent domain be conferred upon a railroad corporation." Texas & N. O. Ry. Co. v. Sutor, 56 Tex. 496, 499.

A railroad is not a public highway within Code 1876, § 4203, prohibiting the use of abusive, insulting, or vulgar language on the public highway near the dwelling house or curtilage of another, in the presence of the family or any member of the family of the owner. Comer v. State, 62 Ala. 320.

A railroad is not a public highway within Rev. Code, c. 34, § 2, punishing with death robbery in or near a public highway. State v. Johnson, 61 N. C. 140, 143.

A railroad is not a highway within Rev. Code, § 3622, prohibiting the betting at a game of cards played in a highway. Napier v. State, 50 Ala. 168, 170.

A railroad is not a highway within 1 Rev. St. 341, § 5, subd. 11, which declares that the electors of each town shall have power at their annual town meeting to make rules and regulations for ascertaining the sufficiency of all fences of such town, for determining the time and manner in which cattle, horses, or sheep shall be permitted to go at large on highways. Tonawanda R. Co. v. Munger (N. Y.) 5 Denio, 255, 268, 49 Am. Dec. 239.

Railroad platform.

The platform of a railway company at its station or stopping place is in no sense a public highway. There is no dedication to public use as such. It is a structure erected expressly for the accommodation of passengers arriving and departing in the train. Being uninclosed, persons are allowed the privilege of walking over it for other purposes, but they have no legal right to do so. The servants of the company, after requesting them to leave, can remove them by whatever force may be necessary. Gillis v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 59 Pa. (9 P. F. Smith) 129, 141, 98 Am. Dec. 317.

Road synonymous.

See "Road."

Sidewalk as part of.

A sidewalk is as much a part of the highway as the traveled wagon road is. People v. Meyer, 56 N. Y. Supp. 1097, 1099, 26 Misc. Rep. 117. See, also, Marini v. Graham, 7 Pac. 442, 443, 67 Cal. 130; Bonnet v. City & County of San Francisco, 65 Cal. 230, 231, 3 Pac. 815; Ex parte Taylor, 87 Cal. 91, 94, 25 Pac. 258; Martinovich v. Wooley, 60 Pac. 760, 128 Cal. 141; City of Frankfort v. Coleman, 49 N. E. 474, 475, 19 Ind. App. 368, 65 Am. St. Rep. 412; Board of Public Works of City of Denver v. Hayden, 56 Pac. 201, 204, 13 Colo. App. 36; Challiss v. Parker, 11 Kan. 384, 391.

Street or town way.

A street in a city is a highway. Laufer v. Bridgeport Traction Co., 37 Atl. 379, 381, 68 Conn. 475; In re Road from Fitzwater St. to Shippen St. in Moyamensing Tp. (Pa.) 4 Serg. & R. 106; Lehigh Val. R. Co. v. Dover & R. R. Co., 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 526; White v. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co., 122 Ind. 317, 326, 23 N. E. 782, 784, 7 L. R. A. 257; Laufer v. Bridgeport Traction Co., 37 Atl. 379, 381, 68 Conn. 475.

The word "highway" may or may not include a street. A public highway is a thoroughfare for public use, including country roads; while a street is a public highway of a city, town, or village. State v. Moriarty, 74 Ind. 103, 104.

A street is a road or public way in a city, town, or village. As the way is common, free to all the people, it is a highway, and it is proper to affirm that all streets are highways, though not all highways are streets. "Streets" is a generic term, and includes all urban ways which can be and are generally used for ordinary purposes of travel. Sachs v. Sioux City, 109 Iowa, 224, 228, 80 N. W. 336.

A street is a highway. Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, defines a street as a public thoroughfare or highway in a city or village. The grant of a street or highway over one's land is but the grant of an incorporeal hereditament. By its very terms it signifies that the party to whom the grant is made acquires an easement on the land, and nothing more. Cox v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co., 48 Ind. 178, 182.

A street is a highway, but all highways are not streets. As distinguished from the word "highway," which means a public thoroughfare over and on which all the citizens of the land have a right to pass and re-pass at pleasure, it means a public highway of a city, town, or village merely. State v. Moriarty, 74 Ind. 103, 104.

The meaning of the term "street" is not sufficiently broad to include all highways, though all streets are embraced within the generic term "highways." Duval County Com'rs v. City of Jacksonville, 18 South. 339, 344, 36 Fla. 196, 29 L. R. A. 416; Gray v. Dallas Terminal Ry. & Union Depot Co., 36 S. W. 352, 357, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 158.

That the Legislature, in enacting laws governing highways, intended to include streets in towns and cities, is to be determined from the sense of the statute itself, and not from a general definition of the term "highway." It will not be presumed that the Legislature, in employing the general term "highways," meant to include the streets of a municipal corporation. There is no such presumption. See Elliott on Roads & Streets, p. 16. Kerney v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co., 86 Mo. App. 573, 578.

"The word 'highway' in popular language means a public way, and includes a town way." Cleaves v. Jordan, 34 Me. 9, 12.

A highway is a passage or road through the country, or some part of it, for the use of the people. It is a generic name for all kinds of public ways. "Public road" and "highways" are usually understood to mean the same thing, and include all ways which of right are common to the whole public, and therefore differ from private roads or byways. They therefore include streets, avenues, lanes, and alleys in cities and villages, unless there is something in the subject-matter of the enactment showing that it is inapplicable to those urban highways. The terms "public roads" and "highways" in Laws Minn. 1860, c. 12, § 1, which grants to any telegraph company incorporated under the laws of the state full power and right to use public roads and highways in this state, includes streets, avenues, and alleys in cities and villages. Abbott v. City of Duluth (U. S.) 104 Fed. 833, 837. So, also, under statutes giving telephone companies a right to erect poles and wires in highways. Northwestern Tel. Exch. Co. v. City of Minneapolis.

lis, 86 N. W. 69, 71, 81 Minn. 140, 53 L. R. A. 175; State v. City of Sheboygan, 86 N. W. 657, 659, 111 Wis. 23; Chamberlain v. Iowa Tel. Co., 93 N. W. 596, 597, 119 Iowa, 619.

The term "highway," as used in Rev. St. c. 1, § 6, cl. 6, providing that a highway may include a county bridge, county road, or county way, cannot be construed to ever mean a town way. Wells v. York County Com'rs, 11 Atl. 417, 418, 79 Me. 522.

The word "street" imports a highway (Rap. Law Dict. p. 1226), and in the absence of proof to the contrary it will be assumed that the term "street" in the return of the public road by surveyors designating a street as the place of beginning or ending of a city road, is a public highway. Lord v. Gifford, 50 Atl. 903, 904, 67 N. J. Law, 193.

Rev. St. 1843, p. 332, § 54, providing that every highway which shall not be opened and worked within six years from the time of its being laid out shall cease to be a highway, does not apply to streets. Common Council of Indianapolis v. Croas, 7 Ind. 9, 12.

In 2 Rev. St. (7th Ed.) p. 1249, providing that all highways that have ceased to be traveled or used as highways for six years shall cease to be a highway for any purpose, the term "highway" applies to a street in a village incorporated under the general act for the incorporation of villages. Excelsior Brick Co. v. Village of Haverstraw, 36 N. E. 819, 820, 142 N. Y. 146.

"In our system of public ways the distinction between highways, technically so called, and town or private ways, consists in the fact that the former are laid out and may be altered or discontinued by the authorities having jurisdiction throughout the county, such as the county court, the court of general sessions, and in modern times the county commissioner; while the latter are laid out and may be altered or discontinued by the selectmen, with the approval of the town. In other respects they are like as equal parts of the system of public ways." Butchers' Slaughtering & Melting Ass'n v. City of Boston, 30 N. E. 94, 139 Mass. 290 (citing Denham v. Bristol County Com'rs, 108 Mass. 202; Flagg v. Flagg, 82 Mass. [16 Gray] 175; Valentine v. City of Boston, 39 Mass. [22 Pick.] 75, 33 Am. Dec. 711).

The term "highways" in St. 1896, c. 417, providing a board of survey for the town of R. to lay out and establish highways, includes all ways which the public interest requires to be laid out, relocated, altered, or widened by the town authorities, and includes an avenue in the town. Janvrin v. Poole, 63 N. E. 1066, 181 Mass. 463.

"Highway," as used in St. 1834, c. 184, prohibiting allowing cattle to go at large in a highway without a keeper, is synonymous with a town way, so that an indictment charging that cattle had been taken up in a town way, they not being under the care of a keeper, was a sufficient charge under the act. Commonwealth v. Hubbard, 41 Mass. (24 Pick.) 98, 101.

"Highway," as used in St. 1786, c. 81, § 7, which provides that the party injured may recover double damages for an injury received through a defect in any highway, includes both town ways and county roads, although it is sometimes used in the Statutes as designating only a county road. Jones v. Inhabitants of Andover, 23 Mass. (6 Pick.) 59, 61. The term includes both town ways and public footways, and, as used in Pub. St. c. 112, § 125, which provides that a highway or town way may be laid across a railroad previously constructed, when the county commissioners think that the public convenience and necessity so require, means a public way, the original jurisdiction to lay out which is in the county commissioners. Boston & A. R. Co. v. City of Boston, 2 N. E. 943, 140 Mass. 87.

"Streets," as used in St. 1803, c. 11, annexing Southern Boston to Boston, and providing that the selectmen of Boston were authorized to lay out such streets and lanes in Southern Boston as, in their judgment, would be for the common benefit of the proprietors of the land and of the town of Boston, etc., should be construed as synonymous with "public ways" or "highways." Commonwealth v. City of Boston, 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 442, 445.

The words "street" and "highway" have the same meaning, respectively, in the constitutional provision requiring a railroad to obtain the consent in writing of the owners of one-half in value of the property bounded on that portion of the street or highway upon which it is proposed to construct or operate the railroad, that the former has in innumerable laws relating to cities and incorporated villages, and that the latter has in the laws of this state known as the "Highway Acts." Hilton v. Thirty-Fourth St. R. Co., 1 How. Prac. (N. S.) 453, 456.

The word "highway," in a statute requiring railroads to erect sign boards at highway crossings, means a public road in the country, and not a street in a town or city. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. State, 51 Miss. 137, 140.

The term "highway," as used in Code 1892, § 3555, requiring every railroad company to make easy grades over a highway which its road crosses, and to keep such crossing in good order, applies to city streets as well as roads in the country. Hamline v. Southern Ry. Co., 25 South. 205, 206, 76 Miss. 410.

Under Code, § 3551, subjecting a railroad company to fine for obstructing travel on a highway for more than five minutes, or of a street longer than shall be prescribed by the ordinances of the city, town, or village, the railroad cannot be fined for the obstruction of a street in a town having no ordinance on the subject, the term "highway" relating only to roads in the country. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. State, 14 South. 459, 71 Miss. 253.

A statute prohibiting the obstruction of a highway applies equally to the obstruction of a street, although towns and cities may have been given exclusive control of the streets. Bybee v. State, 94 Ind. 443, 48 Am. Rep. 175; City of Indianapolis v. Higgins, 40 N. E. 671, 673, 141 Ind. 1.

The word "highway," as used in Rev. St. Ill. c. 114, §§ 77, 78, relating to railroads and warehouses, and providing that railroad corporations shall not obstruct public highways by trains or cars except to receive or discharge passengers or to take fuel and water, and in no case longer than ten minutes, and prescribing a forfeiture for a violation of the provision, includes all kinds of public ways, and embraces a street. The fact that the statutes confer power upon the municipal authorities to regulate the use of the streets of a city and to prevent and remove obstructions to the same, does not render inapplicable the general statute relating to obstructions of highways. Ohio, I. & W. Ry. Co. v. People, 39 Ill. App. 473, 474, 475.

Where authority was granted to a city to lay out and extend roads and highways over and across the right of way of a railroad, streets are included; since a street is a road or public way in a city, town, or village. Southern Kansas Ry. Co. v. Oklahoma City, 69 Pac. 1050, 1054, 12 Okl. 82.

Rev. St. 1889, c. 114, § 68, providing that railroad companies must furnish their locomotives with bells, which must be sounded 80 rods from where the railroad crosses "any public highway," is not limited to the common public roads in the county, but is broad enough to include streets and roads in incorporated cities and towns. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Davis, 22 N. E. 850, 851, 130 Ill. 146.

Rev. St. 1881, § 1964, providing for the punishment of any one placing a wrongful obstruction in a public highway, should be construed to include a public street in a city. Bybee v. State, 94 Ind. 443, 446, 48 Am. Rep. 175.

The expression "public highway," as used in City Charter of Lewiston, § 7, giving the city council exclusive power and authority to lay out any new street or public highway, is synonymous with "street," and means public way or street, and nothing else. Dorman v. City Council of Lewiston, 17 Atl. 316, 317, 81 Me. 411.

The term "highway" may include a county bridge, county road, or county way; but in the statute it never means a town way. Wells v. York County Com'rs, 11 Atl. 417, 418, 79 Me. 522.

The term "highway" is frequently used in a very broad sense. The sea is said to be the great public highway of nations. The canals and all public rivers and the Great Lakes are certainly highways. So are all the railroads. The term, in its ordinary and popular sense, refers to the country roads under the management and control of the local authorities of the several towns or counties of the state. It does not include streets or avenues in cities, as expressly held in Re Woolsey, 95 N. Y. 135, though it cannot be denied that such streets or avenues are highways in the broad sense. In Const. art. 3, § 18, prohibiting the passage of private or local bills for the purpose of "laying out, opening, altering, working, or discontinuing roads, highways, or alleys," the term is used in its ordinary and popular sense, comprehending only the ordinary roads and highways under the care of local authorities. In re Burns, 49 N. E. 246, 247, 155 N. Y. 23.

The term "highway," as used in the chapter relating to street railway companies, includes and covers the term "street." Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 3861.

Turnpike.

See, also, "Turnpike."

A turnpike road laid out and constructed under the authority of the charter of a turnpike company is a public highway. Pittsburgh, M. & Y. R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 104 Pa. 583, 586; Northern Cent. Ry. Co. v. Commonwealth, 90 Pa. 300, 302; Rodgers v. Bradshaw (N. Y.) 20 Johns. 735, 742; Fox v. Union Turnpike Co., 69 N. Y. Supp. 551, 553, 59 App. Div. 363; Dodge County Com'rs v. Chandler, 96 U. S. 205, 208, 24 L. Ed. 625.

A public highway or road is a highway or road open and public for the passage of every person without any toll or other imposition. Bradshaw v. Rodgers (N. Y.) 20 Johns. 103, 105.

"A road or canal constructed by the public or a corporation is a public highway for the public benefit. If the public have a right to passage thereon by paying a reasonable stipulated uniform toll, its exaction does not make its use private." Bonaparte v. Camden & A. R. Co. (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 821, 829.

Public highways include turnpikes, railroads, and bridges used as thoroughfares, and the charge of a toll over them in no way affects their character as public highways. They are public because of the right of the public to use them. Dodge County Com'rs v. Chandler, 96 U. S. 205, 208, 24 L. Ed. 625.

Plank roads constructed by individuals or corporations under the general law or by special charter are public highways, the material difference between them and other public highways being in the manner and mode of construction and repairing, and the fact that the traveling public pay a toll for their use; travelers having as much right to the use of one as the other on paying the specified tolls. Craig v. People, 47 Ill. 487, 493.

A turnpike road is a public highway established by public authority, and is to be regarded as a public easement. The only difference between this and the common highway is that, instead of being made at the public expense in the first instance, it is authorized and laid out by the public authority, and made at the expense of individuals in the first instance, and the cost of construction and maintenance is reimbursed by a toll levied by public authority for that purpose. Commonwealth v. Wilkinson, 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 175, 26 Am. Dec. 654. It is also said in Murray v. Berkshire County Com'rs, 53 Mass. (12 Metc.) 455, 458, that a turnpike road is a public highway, which all people have a right to use, and which no one has a right to obstruct, not even the corporation that built it, except so far as it is expressly authorized to do so in order to secure the tolls granted by law. State v. Maine, 27 Conn. 641, 648, 71 Am. Dec. 89.

A turnpike road is a public highway, and abatement will lie as for a public nuisance against any person placing obstructions thereon. The only difference between a turnpike road and a common highway is that, instead of being made at the public expense in the first instance, it is authorized and laid out by public authority, and made at the expense of individuals, and the cost of construction and maintenance is reimbursed by a toll levied by public authority for the purpose. Every traveler has the same right to use it on paying the toll established by law, as he would have to use any other public highway. Northern Cent. Ry. Co. v. Commonwealth, 90 Pa. 300, 302.

The expression "public highway," as used in Rev. St. 1881, § 4274, providing for the drainage of wet and overflowed lands at the expense of those benefited by the work, if it benefits a public highway should be construed in its ordinary sense, and includes the gravel road of a turnpike company. Neff v. Reed, 98 Ind. 341, 346.

Rev. St. c. 19, § 22, which requires field drivers to take up and impound cattle going at large in the public highways, includes a turnpike. Pickard v. Howe, 53 Mass. (12 Metc.) 198, 208.

Viaduct or wharf.

See "Viaduct"; "Wharf."

Waterway.

The term "highway" includes a navigable river. Wallamet Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch (U. S.) 19 Fed. 347, 355; Kean v. Stetson, 22 Mass. (5 Pick.) 492, 495.

"Public highway" includes a navigable river. State v. Wabash Paper Co., 51 N. E. 949, 951, 21 Ind. App. 167.

A navigable river is of common right a public highway. Commonwealth v. Coombs, 2 Mass. 489, 492; Farmers' Co-operative Mfg. Co. v. Albemarle & R. R. Co., 23 S. E. 43, 44, 117 N. C. 579, 29 L. R. A. 700, 53 Am. St. Rep. 606; Attorney General v. Stevens, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt.) 369, 382, 22 Am. Dec. 520; State v. Narrows Island Club, 5 S. E. 411, 413, 100 N. C. 477, 6 Am. St. Rep. 618. So that an owner of land bordering on such a stream has a right to free access thereto, of which he cannot be deprived without compensation. Shirley v. Bishop, 8 Pac. 82, 83, 67 Cal. 543.

A stream which, in its natural condition, is capable of being used for immediate purpose of navigation, must be regarded as a public highway. Thunder Bay River Booming Co. v. Speechly, 31 Mich. 336, 18 Am. Rep. 184.

A river within the limits of a city, though a highway for the passage of vessels engaged in foreign or interstate commerce and domestic traffic, is not a highway in the sense that the streets and alleys of a city are, so as to charge the city with the duty of keeping it safe for navigation by removing obstructions therein. Faust v. City of Cleveland (U. S.) 121 Fed. 810, 811, 58 C. C. A. 194.

Rev. St. c. 176, § 16, providing that if the life of any person crossing a highway with reasonable care shall be lost by reason of the negligence of common carriers by means of railroads, steamboats, or by the unfitness or negligence of their servants or agents, said common carriers, proprietor, or proprietors shall be liable in damages for the same, is not restricted to a highway on land, but applies also to navigable waters, the same being a public highway. Chase v. American Steamboat Co., 10 R. I. 79, 85.

The term "highway," as ordinarily used and understood, does not include streams of water or water highways, though the high seas are often spoken of as "the highways of nations," and the Great Lakes, public rivers, and canals are treated as public water highways; the term, as ordinarily used and understood, especially when used in connection with the conveyance of land, referring to the roads open through the country upon land for the travel of persons with their animals and vehicles. Therefore, where a patent reserved for highways a certain number of acres, it did not authorize an approprition by the state of a small stream as a highway for the purpose of floating logs and for other purposes. De Camp v. Dix, 54 N. E. 63, 64, 159 N. Y. 436.

The word "highway" is defined as a public highway or road; a way or passage open to all; a way over which the public at large have a right of passage. Streams which have been used for navigation or for floating logs or other purposes have for many years been known as highways. In the ordinance of 1787 the following language is found: "The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence shall be common highways and forever free." In Scott v. Wilison, 3 N. H. 321, it was held the river Muskegon is a common highway. In 3 Kent, Comm. p. 557, subd. 3, it is said: "Every thoroughfare which is used by the public, and is, in the language of the English books, common to all the king's subjects, is a highway, whether it be a carriageway, a horseway, a footway, or a navigable river." The law with respect to public highways and to fresh water rivers is the same. So that an act making a stream known as "Roaring Brook" a public highway is not valid under the Constitution forbidding any local act for laying out or opening highways. In re Burns, 44 N. Y. Supp. 930, 934, 16 App. Div. 507 (reversed in 49 N. E. 246, 247, 155 N. Y. 23).

The term "highway" is sufficiently broad to include canals. Lehigh Val. R. Co. v. Dover & R. R. Co., 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 528, 531; Bonaparte v. Camden & A. R. Co. (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 821, 829.

A canal is a "public highway," and is not the less so because of the tolls charged, or by reason of its being subject to the regulations of the company operating it. Barnett v. Johnson, 15 N. J. Eq. (2 McCart.) 481, 485.

The term "public highway" in statutes concerning eminent domain has a limited import. Although a navigable river or canal is, in some sense, a public highway, yet an easement assumed under the name of highway would not enable the public to convert a street into a canal. Perkins v. Colebrook, 68 Conn. 113, 125, 35 Atl. 772.

Lake Michigan is not a "highway" in the sense that it is open and uninclosed, and not under the exclusive control of any one nation or people, but is the free highway of adjoining nations or people. This lake lies wholly within the territory of, and, as respects foreign nations, is under the exclusive dominion of, the government of the United States. If we may indulge the expression, it is not "no man's land." It is not by nature free to the commerce of the world. It is so free solely by the grace of the government. Bigelow v. Nickerson (U. S.) 70 Fed. 113, 117, 17 C. O. A. 1, 30 L. R. A. 336.

From the earliest history of the state, the commissioners of water passages or cuts have been treated under the general description of "commissioners of roads," for by legislative use highways may include water passages or cuts, and the term "highways" has been disused in modern legislation, and "roads" substituted. Commissioners of New Town Cut v. Seabrook (S. C.) 3 Strob. 380, 384.

HIGHWAY BY WATER.

The term "highways by water" has been given to that class of navigable streams, fresh as well as salt, which are of common or public use for the carriage of boats and lighters, without regard to whether the streams flow or reflow. Enfield Toll Bridge Co. v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co., 17 Conn. 40, 59, 42 Am. Dec. 716.

HIGHWAY COMMISSIONER.

As an officer, see "Officer."

HIGHWAY EASEMENT.

Whether it be travel or transportation of persons and property or the transmission of intelligence, and whether accomplished by old methods or new ones, all such functions are included within the public "highway easement," and imposed no additional servitude on the land. Cater v. Northwestern Tel. Exch. Co., 63 N. W. 111, 113, 60 Minn. 539, 28 L. R. A. 310, 51 Am. St. Rep. 543.

HIGHWAY ROBBERY.

Robbery being the forcibly and feloniously taking from the person of another of goods or money to any value by violence or putting him in fear, to make it highway robbery it is only necessary further to charge and prove that it was committed on or near a highway. State v. Brown, 18 S. E. 51, 52, 113 N. C. 645.

HIGHWAY SURVEYOR.

Highway surveyors are not agents of a town. They are public officers, whose duties are prescribed by law. Their authority is not derived from the town, but from the statute. They are not under the control of the town. Their powers cannot be enlarged or abridged by any action of the town, and what they do or omit to do in the proper exercise of their authority is done or omitted because the law enjoins and prescribes their duties independent entirely of municipal control or authority. Eaton v. Burke, 66 N. H. 306, 310, 22 Atl. 452, 454 (citing Hardy v. Town of Keene, 52 N. H. 370, 377).

HIGHWAY TAX.

As city tax, see "City Tax."

Taxes assessed by a city for roads and bridges are highway taxes, and governed by the statutory provisions applicable thereto. Stone v. Bean, 81 Mass. (15 Gray) 42, 44.

HIM.

The use of the word "him" in a contract of partition, in which it is stipulated that one of the parties shall have the privilege of a road through the land of the other, so as to enable "him" to take the nearest and best road to D., though construed in connection with the word "privilege," does not show that the agreement only creates a mere personal privilege limited to the original party, instead of an easement. Per Dillon, J., in Karmuller v. Krotz, 18 Iowa, 352, 357.

In Comp. St. Mont. 1887, c. 25, § 697, providing that in every case the liability of a corporation to a servant or employé acting under the orders of his superior shall be the same in case of injury sustained by default or wrongful act of his superior, or to an employé not appointed or controlled by him, as if such servant or employé were a passenger, the word "him" refers to the employé's superior, so that the liability of the company for the negligence of superior servants is extended for the benefit of two classes of employés, viz., those injured by default or wrongful act of a superior employé under whose orders they were acting, and injured by the default or wrongful act of a superior servant who did not appoint and who had no control over them. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Mase (U. S.) 63 Fed. 114, 116, 11 C. C. A. 63.

Construed them.

The use of the word "him" for "them" in a petition by a partnership for a lien on logs for supplies used in cutting, hauling, and driving them, does not vitiate the petition, but should be regarded as a mere clerical error. Garland v. Hickey, 43 N. W. 832, 75 Wis. 178.

The word "him" in Act 1869-70, c. 225, § 35, which, in the case of a defaulting sheriff, authorizes a summary judgment on motion against him without other notice than is given by the delinquency of the officer, is to be construed to mean "them," in order to authorize the judgment to be taken against both the sheriff and his sureties. Jenkins v. Howell, 65 N. C. 61, 62.

HIMSELF.

"Himself," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the mailing of obscene letters, and providing that the act shall not authorize any person to open any letter or sealed matter not addressed to himself, includes a person in a fictitious character, and therefore a witness receiving such a letter is not prohibited from testifying in a prosecution for violation of a statute by reason of the letter having been received and opened by him under a fictitious name. Andrews v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 798, 799, 162 U. S. 420, 40 L. Ed. 1023.

HINDER.

"Hinder," as used in Gen. St. Conn. c. 71, art. 6, § 5, providing that, if a surety obstruct or hinder his being sued, the time of such obstruction shall not be computed as part of the time of limitation, imports resistance and obstruction of rights, and unless acts complained of by a creditor are in point of fact such as would hinder and prevent him bringing suit notwithstanding his desire to do so, they cannot be properly said to obstruct or hinder him in the meaning of the statute. Reid v. Hamilton, 18 S. W. 770, 771, 92 Ky. 619.

"Hinder," as used in 2 Stanton's Rev. St. p. 401, c. 97, § 15, declaring that, if any surety shall abscond, conceal himself, or by removal from the state hinder his being sued, the time of such hindrance shall not be computed as part of the time of limitation, means to interpose obstacles or impediments. Walker v. Sayer, 68 Ky. (5 Bush) 579, 582.

"Hinder," as used in Act Cong. Feb. 12, 1793, § 4, providing that any person who shall knowingly and willingly obstruct or hinder one claiming the services of a fugitive from labor in seizing or arresting such fugitive, means an act of interference tending to impair the right of recapture. It does not apply to one who is merely passive in the attempt of the owner or agent to reclaim and arrest an alleged fugitive from labor; nor does it apply to a mere inquiry, made in good faith, by what authority an arrest is sought to be made; nor does it apply to the act of insisting that the alleged fugitive shall have a fair trial on the question whether he or she owes labor and services to the claimant. To obstruct or hinder does not require a resort to violence. Any act done with the intention of defeating the arrest, and which tends to that result, is an obstructing or hindering within the statute. The withdrawal or removal of the person of an alleged fugitive by the order or direction of another, so as to prevent an arrest, is a hindrance and obstruction within the meaning of the statute. Driskell v. Parish (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 1095, 1098.

Resisting a person deputized by a justice to serve process is not "hindering an officer," within the meaning of that phrase as used in the act for the punishment of inferior crimes, since the statute giving the justice authority to so deputize does not empower the justice to make a sheriff, deputy, or constable. State v. McOmber, 6 Vt. 215

Actual contact.

"Hindered and obstructed," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 32, § 78, authorizing a person who is hindered and obstructed in driving logs by the logs of another to drive such obstructing logs to a point where they will no longer be an obstacle, does not mean that the logs hindered and obstructed must come into actual contact with the logs hindering and obstructing, but such hindrance and obstruction exists if the hindering and obstructing logs are so situated that the logs hindered and obstructed cannot be driven until the hindering and obstructing logs are out of the way. Anderson v. Maloy, 19 N. W. 387, 32 Minn. 76.

Delay and defraud synonymous.

The word "hinder," as used in a statute declaring that every conveyance or assignment of any estate or interest in lands, goods, or things in action made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, is substantially synonymous with the terms "delay" and "defraud" as there used. Burdick v. Post (N. Y.) 12 Barb. 168, 186.

Any act done by a debtor with intention to hinder and delay his creditor, and which has that effect, is a fraud on the creditor within the meaning of the attachment law. The terms "hinder" and "delay" are regarded as synonymous with the expression "to defraud." Armstrong v. Ames & Frost Co., 43 S. W. 302, 305, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 46.

Delay is defined as meaning to detain, keep back or retard, so that it is synonymous with hinder; and an affidavit that a mortgage was made without any design to delay or defraud the creditors of the mortgagor is sufficient without the use of the word "hinder," as provided by statute. Petrovitzky v. Brigham, 47 Pac. 666, 667, 14 Utah, 472.

As used in statutes relating to conveyances of a debtor to hinder and delay his creditors, delay is said by Mr. Burroughs in his work on Assignments, § 355, to have "an obvious reference to time, and hindrance to the interposition of obstacles in the way of a creditor, but to a certain extent the one involves and includes the other. In point of fact, and as actually applied by the courts, they are always taken together." Torlina v. Trorlicht, 21 Pac. 68, 69, 5 N. M. 148.

The words "hinder," "delay," and "defraud," as used in a statute declaring that conveyances made with the intent to "hinder, delay or defraud" creditors shall be void, are not synonymous. "A conveyance may be made with intent to hinder or delay, without an intent to defraud. Either intent is sufficient." Crow v. Beardsley, 68 Mo. 435, 439; Edgell v. Smith, 40 S. E. 402, 404, 50

W. Va. 349. Hence an instruction declaring a conveyance good unless made with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud, is erroneous. Crow v. Beardsley, 68 Mo. 435, 439.

A conveyance made by an embarrassed debtor with a view, which was known to the purchaser, to secure the property from attachment, is void, though honestly made, the debtor intending that all creditors should be paid in full. The debtor's property is, in theory of law, subject to immediate process issued at the instance of his creditors, and the debtor will not be permitted to hinder or delay them by any device which leaves it, or the avails of it, subject to his control and disposition; and it makes no difference that the debtor intends to apply the avails of it to the payment of his debts. Edgell v. Smith, 40 S. E. 402, 404, 50 W. Va. 349.

Obstruct and prevent synonymous.

The words "obstruct," "hinder," and "prevent" are synonymous as used in the fugitive slave law. United States v. Williams (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 631, 633.

Omission to act.

"Hindered," as used in a pleading in an action on a contract for the erection of a city hall, wherein the plaintiff alleged that he was hindered from performing the same by the delay of the defendant to select the site for the building, means an unreasonable omission of the city to select a site, as well as if the city had expressly refused to select a site, or had done any other affirmative act to interrupt the performance of the agreement. Blanchard v. Inhabitants of Blackstone, 102 Mass. 843, 847.

HINDER AND DELAY.

"Hindering and delaying," as used in Gen. St. § 1526, declaring that conveyances and assignments made with intent to hinder and delay or defer creditors shall be void, means a hindering and delaying which is intended to be produced by the assignor in making the assignment through motives of covin and malice, or for the assignor's own benefit and advantage. Burr v. Clement, 9 Pac. 633, 638, 9 Colo. 1.

The delay contemplated by a statute providing that a conveyance with intent to hinder and delay creditors shall be fraudulent has in it an element of fraud, and, if the delay be found in any case to be free from such element, then it is not of that character which, under the statute, vitiates conveyances. Ellis v. Valentine, 65 Tex. 532, 547.

"Hinder and delay," as used in a statute relating to conveyances to hinder and delay creditors, is to do something which is an attempt to defraud, rather than a successful fraud; to put some obstacle in the path or interpose some time unjustifiably before the creditor can realize on the debtor's property. Burnham v. Brennan, 42 N. Y. Super. Ct. (10 Jones & S.) 49, 63.

A conveyance to hinder and delay creditors is a conveyance by the debtor or his voluntary assignee, which delays creditors in the exercise of their right to have the debtor's property converted into money for their own benefit, or which necessarily tends in that direction, without the creditor's consent, and which puts the property out of which the creditor has a right to seek satisfaction for his debt beyond the reach of ordinary process. Meyer & Sons Co. v. Black, 16 Pac. 620, 4 N. M. (Johns.) 190.

Assignment reserving use of property.

A general assignment for the benefit of all the grantor's creditors, in which he undertakes to stipulate with them for the use of his property for four years, thereby delaying them for that length of time in the collection of their debts, is an assignment to hinder and delay creditors, and cannot be sustained. Young v. Hall, 74 Tenn. (6 Lea) 175, 178.

Mortgage requiring sale at retail.

A mortgage given by an insolvent to a preferred creditor, by which the creditor is required to dispose of a stock of goods covered by the mortgage in due course of trade and at customary retail prices, is one to hinder and delay creditors, in that the surplus left after paying the creditor is placed beyond the reach of other creditors for an indefinite time. Gallagher v. Goldfrank, 12 S. W. 964, 965, 75 Tex. 562. See, also, Gregg v. Cleveland, 17 S. W. 777, 778, 82 Tex. 187.

Preferential payment.

No creditor without a lien has the right to have the debt due him paid out of any particular property of the debtor. All creditors have the same right to have their debts paid out of the property of the debtor, unless by a contract with the debtor, or by legal process, one or more acquire a right to be paid out of the proceeds of some particular property, or to have some particular thing, by way of sale, in satisfaction of his or their debt. Every payment of a debt by a person unable to pay all his debts, whether the payment be made in money or property, tends, in a popular sense, to hinder or delay, or it may be even to defeat, other creditors in the collection of their debts; the extent of the effect depending on the amount of indebtedness and the value of the debtor's property. But it has never been held that a payment, either with money or property, by an insolvent debtor, in the absence of a law declaring preferences invalid, was within the meaning of the law to hinder, delay, or defraud other creditors. Ellis v. Valentine, 65 Tex. 532, 547.

"Hinder and delay," as used in a statute relating to assignments by debtors, are to be taken in their legal or technical and not their literal sense. A conveyance preferring creditors will not fail because a reasonable delay is taken to sell and apply. The debtor may thus interpose obstacles in the way of others; that is, hinder them as well as delay them. The statute only refers to an improper or illegal hindrance or delay. Hefner v. Metcalf, 38 Tenn. (1 Head) 577, 579.

HINDRANCE.

Where defendant sold iron ore by a contract stipulating that it was not liable in damages if delivery was prevented or obstructed by strikes, hindrances, accidents, or delays at the mine, he was not excused by mere difficulty in procuring labor if it could have been obtained by a reasonable effort or prices not prohibitive. The condition with which the word "hindrance" is connected—combinations, strikes, turnouts, etc.—imports the same thing. Thomas Iron Co. v. Jackson Iron Co., 91 N. W. 137, 138, 131 Mich. 130.

HINGE.

A "hinge" is defined to be an artificial movable joint—a device for joining two pieces together in such manner that one may turn upon the other. Cent. Dict. A device in a waffle iron, operating to hold the two halves together when rotated, and in such manner as that one half may, when desired, be turned upon the other, is a hinge. Griswold v. Wagner (U. S.) 68 Fed. 494, 497, 15 C. C. A. 525.

HIPPED ROOF.

See "Peaked Roof."

HIRE.

See "Carriage Hire"; "Contract of Hiring."

Hire is a reward or compensation paid for the possession or use of personality. Learned-Letcher Lumber Co. v. Fowler, 19 South. 396, 398, 109 Ala. 169; Biedsoe v. Nixon, 69 N. C. 89, 91, 12 Am. Rep. 642.

"Hire" signifies a reward or recompense for the use of a thing, and is so used in an indictment charging that persons were permitted to play and bet on the result of games. "the hire of said billiard table." Carr v. State, 50 Ind. 178, 180.

The word "hiring" implies a request and a contract for a compensation, and has but this one meaning when used in the ordinary affairs and business of life. McCluskey v. Cromwell, 11 N. Y. (1 Kern.) 593, 599.

The terms "hiring" and "letting" are used to designate the lending of property other than money for a compensation. Kinny v. Hynds (Wyo.) 49 Pac. 403, 404.

Hiring is a species of bailment, and one of its distinguishing characteristics is that it is never gratuitous. Learned-Letcher Lumber Co. v. Fowler, 19 South. 396, 398, 109 Ala. 169.

Hiring is a contract by which one gives to another the temporary possession and use of property other than money for reward, and the latter agrees to return the same to the former at a future time. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 852; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4069; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1422; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1925; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2600.

Hiring is a contract by which one person grants to another the enjoyment of a thing, or the use of the labor and industry either of himself or his servant, during a certain time, for a stipulated compensation, or where one contracts for the labor or services of another about a thing bailed to him for a specified purpose. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 2903.

A person is hired or salaried by the corporation of which he is a stockholder where he subscribes for one share of stock, and agrees to devote his entire time to the management of the corporation's affairs, within the French extradition treaty, authorizing extradition for embezzlement by any person, hired or salaried, to the detriment of their employers, etc. In re Balensl (U. S.) 120 Fed. 864.

Borrow distinguished.

Contracts of hiring are divided by Sir William Jones into two kinds: First, where the hirer gains a temporary use of a thing; and, second, where something is to be done to the thing delivered. He gives another bailment as commodatum, or loan for use without pay. This is borrowing, which is always a mere gratuitous loan. Blackstone gives the distinction between hiring and borrowing thus: Hiring and borrowing are contracts by which a qualified property may be transferred to the hirer or borrower, in which there is only this difference: that hiring is always for a price, a stipend, or additional recompense; borrowing is merely gratuitous. Neel v. State, 26 S. W. 726, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 408 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. p. 453).

Commission.

Acts 1854, c. 23, exempting from attachment the wages or hire of a laborer or other employee, includes a consideration of 5 per cent. on the entire amount of the cost of a building, for which a contractor agrees to erect, superintend, and otherwise direct the erection of the building. Moore v. Heaney, 14 Md. 558, 562.

Division of profits.

A contract that one shall provide a shop, loom, and tackle, and another shall perform the labor of weaving, and each shall receive one-half of the profits, constitutes a partnership, and not a hiring, within the statute, such as will charge the township with the maintenance of the laborer as a pauper when he becomes chargeable. Gregg Tp. v. Half Moon Tp. (Pa.) 2 Watts, 842, 843.

Employment on salary.

Employment distinguished, see "Employment."

7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 75, enacting that if any person not a freeman of the company of watermen and lightermen of the Thames, or an apprentice to a freeman or freeman's widow, shall act as a waterman or lighterman, or work or navigate any wherry, lighter, or other craft from or to any place within the limits of the act, for hire or gain, he shall forfeit not exceeding £10, would include one who was paid by the owner of a barge for its navigation, not for the particular job, but by a fixed weekly salary. Reg. v. Tibble, 4 El. & Bl. 888, 900.

As engage in service.

To hire is to engage in service for a stipulated reward, as to hire a servant for a year, or laborers by the day or month; to engage a man for temporary service for wages. McCluskey v. Cromwell, 11 N. Y. (1 Kern.) 593, 605.

As lease.

Where the charter of a corporation organized for the transportation of passengers in railroad cars constructed and to be owned by such company authorized it to lease or hire its cars, or any of them, and other personal property, to railroad companies, the terms "lease" and "hire" are equivalent words, but, as the duties of such corporation are of a public nature, a lease of its entire property to another corporation, engaged in the same business, for the term of 99 years, including a contract that such lessor will not engage in such business during the term of the lease, is a violation of its duty to the public and ultra vires. Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co., 11 Sup. Ct. 478, 484, 139 U. S. 24, 35 L. Ed. 55.

A lease for one year, with the privilege of another year if the tenant wants it, is a hiring for more than one year, and void, under the statute of frauds, if not in writing.

Hess v. Martin, 73 N. Y. Supp. 946, 36 Misc. Rep. 541.

Public officers.

The word "hire," as used in Laws 1897, c. 415, § 3, declaring that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all classes of employes, and that the word "employé" means a mechanic or laboring man who works for another for hire, does not relate to public officers or others holding positions under the city, who are included in the classified lists of the civil service law, such as the uniformed members of the fire department, who are appointed to position after rigid examination and from competitive lists. People v. Sturgis, 79 N. Y. Supp. 969, 970, 78 App. Div. 460.

Unenforceable contract.

"Hire," as used in Elliott's Supp. § 1396 (Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 6325; Horner's Rev. St. 1896, § 4768), providing that whoever hires any person to vote or refrain from voting any ticket or for any candidate for office at any election, etc., shall become liable to the person hired in a certain sum, is not limited in its application to enforceable contracts, but is used in its plainest and broadest sense; and, where a voter is hired to go away from the polls and refrain from voting at the time he goes there for that purpose, the offense denounced by the statute is complete, though the voter subsequently returns and casts his vote. Thompson v. State, 44 N. E. 763, 765, 16 Ind. App. 84.

HIRED PERSONS.

A firm operating a steam wood factory, taking contracts for all kinds of light wood-work, under which an assignor furnished rough planks to be sawed and worked up according to their directions, and to be paid therefor a certain sum per thousand feet at the rate of a certain sum per month, are not "hired persons," within the ordinary sense of these words, but were manufacturers and doing business for themselves. Lang v. Simmons, 25 N. W. 650, 652, 64 Wis. 525.

HIRER.

As used in Rev. Civ. St. art. 2899, providing that a proprietor, owner, charterer or hirer of a railroad shall be liable for the death of any person, caused by their negligence or that of their servants or agents, should not be construed to include a receiver of a railroad. By "hirer" we understand to be meant one who by contract acquires the right to use a thing belonging to another, while a receiver is an officer of the court that appoints him, and at all times he is an agency of the court, subject to its orders, and having no personal interest in the property in his hands, resulting from the existence of the receivership. Turner v. Cross, 18 S. W. 578, 579, 83 Tex. 218, 15 L. R. A. 262, 263; Houston & T. C. Ry. Co. v. Roberts (Tex.) 19 S. W. 512; Yoakum v. Selph, 19 S. W. 145, 83 Tex. 607; Bonner v. Thomas (Tex.) 20 S. W. 722.

HIS.

"His," as used in a demise from A. to B., "his executors and administrators," for the term of his natural life, and the lease containing a covenant by A. for quiet enjoyment of the premises by B., "his executors," etc., during the natural life of A., refers to A., the grantor, and not to B., as his name was the last antecedent. Pritchard v. Dodd, 5 Barn. & Adol. 689, 691.

A deed was made "between W. and N., his wife, of the first part, and J. H. and E., his wife, of the second part," and "grants, bargains, and sells to the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns," the lands, etc., in controversy. Held, that the term "party" embraces both grantees, and is used for that purpose with strict grammatical accuracy, and the word "his" is as definite in its reference to only one of them. More formally expressed, this grant would read, "To the said J. H. and E., his wife, and to the heirs and assigns of the said J. H." Hardenbergh v. Hardenbergh, 10 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 42, 48, 18 Am. Dec. 371.

Defendant and one H. entered into a contract whereby the latter was to sell to defendant "all the sound grapes he might raise for a period of ten years on the vines he now has growing on his place," at a certain price per ton, to be delivered in boxes. The vineyard was purchased by plaintiff, the contract was assigned to him, and a crop of grapes in boxes was tendered to defendant. Held, that the personal pronouns "he" and "his" were used merely as equivalents of the proper name, and merely to save repetition of such name. They do not import a desire for the personal services or attention of the owner, as contradistinguished from his assignee, and hence the contract was assignable. Larue v. Groezinger, 24 Pac. 42, 43, 44, 84 Cal. 281, 18 Am. St. Rep. 179.

A contract for the purchase of hemp of a person, "of his own raising," means that the hemp was to be raised by the seller, or under his personal superintendence and direction, and could not be raised by his administrator. Larue v. Groezinger, 24 Pac. 42, 43, 84 Cal. 281 (citing Shultz v. Johnson's Adm'r, 44 Ky. [5 B. Mon.] 497).

Ownership implied.

"His house," as used in Rev. St. c. 47, § 2, providing that if any person shall sell any spirituous liquor, to be used in or about his house or other buildings, without being duly licensed, he shall forfeit, etc., when construed with reference to the subject-matter, seems to designate the place where he sells or carries on the business of selling liquor. Commonwealth v. Hadley, 52 Mass. (11 Metc.) 66, 72.

A declaration in an action in trespass for killing cattle, etc., in which the plaintiff declared that the cattle were his, conveys a clear idea of property in the plaintiff. As used in such connection, the word should be construed to mean that the property belonged to, and was owned by, the plaintiff. Heath v. Conway, 4 Ky. (1 Bibb) 398, 399.

A statement in a fire insurance policy describing the insured's buildings as "his buildings" is not equivalent to a warranty on the part of the assured that he is the owner of the same; and it does not constitute a misrepresentation of the fact, when his only interest in the buildings is as tenant for a year. Mascott v. First Nat. Fire Ins. Co., 37 Atl. 255, 256, 69 Vt. 116; Niblo v. North America Ins. Co., 3 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Sandf.) 551.

An applicant for insurance described the property in a written application as his house, and it was so described in the policy. The legal title to the property was in another party, with whom the insured had, at the time of the application, made a parol contract for its purchase, for a price agreed upon, which the insured had agreed absolutely to pay, and a part of which he had paid; and the insured had entered into possession as purchaser, and had made valuable improvements on the property. Held, that there was no misdescription of the plaintiff's interest, or misrepresentation regarding it, in calling it his. An individual may properly regard property as his, and so denominate it, when he has a right to it, and the power by law to enforce and protect that right. Hough v. City Fire Ins. Co., 29 Conn. 10, 19, 76 Am. Dec. 581.

"His" or "their," as used by parties seeking insurance, representing that the building or property to be insured is his or their property, is not to be construed as a representation that they have an absolute property interest in the thing insured. If the insured has an insurable interest, although the interest may be qualified or defeasible, or even an equitable interest, it is a sufficient compliance with this representation. Fowle v. Springfield Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 122 Mass. 191, 194, 23 Am. Rep. 308.

Where a fire policy described the property as his—referring to a certain person—the interest was absolute, and aptly described by the possessive "his." Martin v. State Ins. Co., 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 485, 490, 43 Am. Rep. 397.

The expression "his property," as used in a complaint in an action on a fire insurance policy, in an averment that "this plaintiff says that after the loss and injury to his property insured," etc., cannot be otherwise construed than as showing that the property, when injured or damaged by the fire, belonged to the plaintiff. Insurance Co. of North America of Philadelphia v. Hegewald (Ind.) 66 N. E. 902, 905.

A license authorizing a person to use an invention at his own establishment does not authorize him to use it at an establishment owned by himself and others. Providence Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 788, 799, 19 L. Ed. 566.

The use of the word "his" in an affidavit in support of a mechanic's lien that certain materials were furnished the defendant for furnishing, equipping, and repairing his mill, is a word which may imply ownership, or mere possession or occupancy, or some other relation to the person, and therefore its use in the affidavit is not a sufficient allegation that defendant was the owner of the property in question. Rugg v. Hoover, 10 N. W. 473, 475, 28 Minn. 404.

Under Mansf. Dig. § 1907, excepting from the penalty for carrying concealed weapons, one carrying them "on his own premises," premises in the possession of a lessee whose term has expired are not the lessor's, and such lessor may be convicted under such section for carrying concealed weapons on such premises. Jones v. State, 55 Ark. 186, 17 S. W. 719.

As her.

The use of the pronoun "his" in a note, mortgage, and certificate of sale can have little, if any, greater effect than to raise a suspicion that the person referred to was a male, and not a female, and is not sufficient to create any substantial conflict in the evidence. Bernlaud v. Beecher, 11 Pac. 802, 804, 71 Cal. 38.

"His," as used in a suit against several persons, charging that "defendant did keep in his possession," etc., refers to each of the defendants, notwithstanding one of them was a woman. State v. Prater, 37 S. E. 933, 934, 59 S. C. 271.

When the word "he" or "his" occurs in the title relating to education, referring to either the members of the city board of directors, county superintendents of common schools, city superintendents, directors, clerks, state board of education, or other school officers, it shall be understood to mean also she or her. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 2462.

As their.

In Acts 1717, c. 13, providing that no negro or mulatto person, free negro, or mulatto born of a white woman, during his time of servitude by law, shall be admitted and received as good and valid evidence in law, etc., "his" should be construed to mean "their." "The argument drawn from the circumstance that the personal pronoun is used in the singular number is not considered of much weight, because the words 'free negro' and 'mulatto' are joined by the conjunction disjunctive 'or,' and in such case the idiom of the English language admits the use of the singular pronoun, as applicable to each member of the sentence so joined. In such a sentence the word 'his' may have the same force and effect as the word 'their.'" United States v. Mullany (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 20, 21.

His attendants.

Act Colo. approved April 19, 1889, provides that a person under sentence of death for a capital crime shall be kept in solitary confinement, and no person be allowed access to him, except his attendants, counsel, physician, spiritual adviser, and members of his family. Held, that the words "his attendants" evidently meant the officers of the prison and subordinates, who must necessarily furnish him with his food, clothing, etc. In re Medly, 10 Sup. Ct. 384, 387, 134 U. S. 160, 33 L. Ed. 835.

His case.

Under Sup. Ct. Rule No. 39, requiring that the defendant make affidavit that he has stated the case, an affidavit stating that the defendant had stated "his case in this cause" means no more than that the defendant had stated the facts on his side of the cause, or, in other words, his defense, and is not equivalent to "the case," as required by the above rule. Ellis v. Jones (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 296, 297.

His commercial paper.

Where a note was indorsed by an accommodation indorser, which note did not originate in the business of the indorser, and was not indorsed in the course of or in connection with his business, such paper is not his commercial paper, within Bankr. Act 1867, § 39, providing that any person, "being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner, who has stopped or suspended, and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within fourteen days, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy." In re Clemens (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 1011, 1012.

His constituents.

Where a deed of the president of a corporation contained words of conveyance to the grantee of all the estate of the party of the first part and of his constituents, the words "his constituents" mean the corporation. Villas v. Reynolds, 6 Wis. 214, 227.

His contract.

Laws 1882, c. 410, relative to mechanics' liens, provides that an independent contractor or shall have 60 days after the completion of his contract for the filing of a lien. Held, that the words "his contract" were equivalent to the expressions "his promise," "his claim," "the contract on his part." Fay v. Muhlker, 20 N. Y. Supp. 671, 674, 1 Misc. Rep. 321.

His lands.

Where a proprietor granted the right to overflow his lands by a dam, the words "his lands," as so used, did not include a public highway existing on the land at the time of the grant, so as to authorize the grantee to destroy the highway by the exercise of the right so conveyed. Inhabitants of Monmouth v. Gardiner, 85 Me. 247, 253.

His office.

See "In His Office."

His own use.

The use of the words "his own use" in a deed conveying land, but saving and reserving to the grantor, for his own use, the coal contained in said land, does not operate to only reserve a right to take coal during the life of the grantor, but is a reservation of the full dominion and proprietorship over the coal. Whitaker v. Brown, 46 Pa. (10 Wright) 197-199.

His property.

Practice Act, § 131, declares that any person owing debts to the defendant, and having in his possession credits or other personal property belonging to the defendant, may be required to attend before the court or judge, or a referee appointed by the court, and be examined respecting the same, and that the defendant may also be required to attend for the purpose of giving information respecting his property, and be examined on oath. Held, that the words "his property," as there used, should not be construed as restricted to credits or other personal property, to discover which a third party may be examined, but should be taken in its enlarged and comprehensive sense, to include any property belonging to the defendant subject to execution. Bivins v. Harris, 8 Nev. 153, 156.

His town.

Rev. St. c. 48, § 8, providing that any lunatic supported as a town pauper may be committed to the hospital by the overseers of his town, means the town where he is supported, whether it be that of his settlement or not, because towns are bound to support all paupers, sane or insane, who are in distress and in need of immediate relief therein, whether they have a legal settlement in such towns or not. Inhabitants of Cummington v. Inhabitants of Wareham, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 585, 587.

His township.

The words "his township," in Burns' Rev. St. 1901, § 2588, providing that the owner of sheep killed by dogs shall report to the trustees of his township the damage sustained, means the township in which the damage is done. Wayne Tp. v. Jeffery, 64 N. E. 933, 934, 29 Ind. App. 574.

His wife.

A testator directed all his property to be sold, and vested the proceeds, after payment of debts, in his executors, as trustees; directing them to divide it into two equal parts. One part or moiety he ordered to be placed at interest, the interest to be paid to his daughter, E., during life, and, if she should die without leaving a child or children living, then the interest to be paid annually to the support and maintenance of his nephew, T., and R., "his wife," and their children. The other moiety or part was directed to be paid, in the discretion of his executors, to the support of his nephew, T., and his family. Held, that from that the fact that R. was distinctly named in the first bequest as one of the objects of the testator's bounty, and from the entire difference in the language used by testator in that and the bequest of the other moiety, the words "his wife" should be construed to mean that R., the wife of T., should have a personal and individual interest in this bequest, and not simply an interest in it as the wife of T., or a member of the family. The words "his wife" should be construed as mere words of description, and not as meaning that R. must necessarily be the wife of T., and take in that capacity if at all. Bullock v. Zillee, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt.) 489, 492.

HISTORICAL.

"Historical" means containing history or the relation of facts. Carpenter v. Historical Society (N. Y.) 2 Dem. Sur. 574, 576.

HITHERTO.

"Hitherto," as used in an answer by trustees that "they have hitherto increased the annuities given to the complainant," qualifies and limits what otherwise might appear either general or uncertain, and restrains the increase of the annuity to that period of time then elapsed, and prevents its reaching the future. Mason v. Jones (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 461, 479.

HOARDING.

"Hoarding," as defined by Webster, is "a fence inclosing a house and materials while builders are at work"; but where plaintiff alleged that defendant wrongfully erected a hoarding near the plaintiff's windows, preventing the light and air from entering, the word did not necessarily mean a construction erected for mere temporary purposes. Metropolitan Ass'n v. Petch, 5 C. B. (N. S.) 504, 509.

HOBBIT.

A term generally used in Wales to express a quantity made up of four Welch pecks, each peck weighing forty-two pounds, and consequently a hobbit consisted of 168 pounds. A sale of wheat by a hobbit was a sale by weight, and not by measure, though six pecks made a sack, and the custom on the delivery of wheat was to deliver it to the purchaser in sacks, but there was no distinct hobbit measure. Hughes v. Humphreys, 28 Eng. L. & E. 131, 132.

HOCUSSED.

A declaration for libel stating that on a certain night a gentleman was hocussed and robbed in a public house kept by the plaintiff would not support the innuendo, "meaning thereby that a person had been feloniously drugged and robbed in the said public house, and thereby intending to cause it to be believed that the said public house of the plaintiff was the resort of, and frequented by, felons, thieves, and depraved and bad characters." Broome v. Gosden, 1 C. B. 728, 730.

HOG.

See "Pork Hogs."

Pen. Code, art. 679, makes it an offense to kill, etc., any horse, mule, cattle, swine, or other domesticated animal, etc. Held, that the term "swine" includes and is synonymous with the word "hog," and hence an information under the statute alleging the killing of a hog was sufficient as a description of the animal. Rivers v. State, 10 Tex. App. 177, 179.

The word "hog," as used in a statute prohibiting cattle and hog stealing, being a general term, was intended to comprehend all the different species of the hog kind, the stealing of which was larceny at common law. State v. McLain (S. C.) 2 Brev. 443, 444.

As beast.

See "Beast."

As cattle.

See "Cattle."

As dressed hogs.

The term in common parlance is applied not unfrequently to the dead as well as the living, and, as used in a contract for the delivery of 25 head of fat hogs, to be delivered at a certain day, at $4 net per 100 pounds, is construed to mean dressed hogs. Whitson v. Culbertson, 7 Ind. 195, 196.

Pigs and shoats.

A pig four or five months old is properly termed a hog. Lavender v. State, 60 Ala. 60, 61.

Under an indictment charging defendant with stealing a hog, testimony that the animal taken was a Berkshire pig was properly admitted, and was not a variance. Washington v. State, 58 Ala. 355.

"Hog," as used in an indictment charging the stealing of a hog, should be construed to include a shoat, for the term "hog" is used as a generic term including all animals of that character, irrespective of their ages. For animals of this description, "swine" is the original generic term. State v. Godet, 29 N. C. 210, 211.

Sows.

Under Act 1861 (12 St. at Large, 903), making it a misdemeanor for any person to lawfully, etc., shoot, etc., any horse, mule, hog, sheep, etc., or other personal property of another, "hog" should be construed to include all the swine family, including both sexes, and hence an indictment charging the shooting of one sow, etc., is good. Shubrick v. State, 2 S. C. (2 Rich.) 21, 22.

HOLD.

See, also, "Held."

See "Adverse Holding."

The phrase "to hold" is defined by Webster to stop; to confine; to restrain from escape; to keep fast; to retain. And it is said that to hold rarely or never signifies the first act of seizing or falling on, but the act of retaining the thing when seized or confined. Griffin's Case (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 7, 24.

The use of the verb "holds" in Pol. Code, § 936, providing, when the title of the incumbent of the office is contested in court, no warrant for his salary can be drawn until the proceedings are finally determined, provided that this shall not apply to one who holds the certificate of election or commission of office, indicates that something tangible is meant to be held—that some paper, some evidence of title to office, must be in the possession of the incumbent of the office—and does not embrace a judgment in his favor rendered in quo warranto proceedings.

Bledsoe v. Colgan, 70 Pac. 924, 138 Cal. 34.

Actual possession required.

Gantt's Dig. § 399, providing that an officer shall execute an order of attachment on personal property capable of manual delivery by taking it into his custody and holding subject to order of the court, means that the property shall be taken into the actual and real custody of the officer, and that he must obtain control over it, and take it out of the control and power of the debtor, and that the officer must continue in the actual possession of it himself, or an agent appointed by him for that purpose, and that, if it is necessary to remove the property, it must be removed, and the debtor divested of his possession and control; and the fact that the removal of the property would be attended with some inconvenience is not an excuse for the failure to retain actual possession of it, and an ideal or constructive possession of the property is not sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute. Adler v. Roth (U. S.) 5 Fed. 895, 897.

In Act 1804, amendatory of Act 1789, declaring that, when any person holding real or personal estate shall die intestate, such estate shall be considered as altogether of the same nature and upon the same footing, the word "holding" embraces any tenure involving title. Ownership, in law or equity, is the sole test of descent. Legal seisin is a tenure or holding, and there is no authority to exclude from the meaning of the word that tenure, and limit it to a tenure by legal seisin. Actual seisin is not contemplated by the term "holding," in the statute. Thompson v. Sanford, 13 Ga. 238, 241.

The actual holding, which was absolutely essential to a common-law lien on personal property, does not exist in the case of statutory liens, but the holding which constitutes the latter class of liens is one in contemplation of law only. Willingham v. Rushing, 31 S. E. 130, 132, 105 Ga. 72.

Code 1873, § 1747, providing that the treasurer of a school district shall hold the moneys belonging to the district, ought not to be construed as exacting the physical retention of the money. All intended is that the officer retain control and keep it subject to the payment of orders when properly signed. That is precisely what is done when money is deposited in a bank. It cannot again be regained in kind, nor is this essential. Its equivalent answers every purpose, and this is returned on demand. Hunt v. Hopley, 95 N. W. 205, 206, 120 Iowa, 695.

Alienation precluded.

"Hold and enjoy," as used in an antenuptial settlement that the real and personal property should be held and enjoyed after the marriage, during their joint lives, as if the articles had not been made, and that, if the wife survived, she should have all the real and personal estate of which the husband should die seised, does not prevent the husband, during the marriage, from making a gift of personalty, if it is perfected by delivery during his life. Withers v. Weaver, 10 Pa. (10 Barr) 391-393.

"Hold," as used in an agreement providing that a certain person was to take, own, and hold a certain number of shares of corporate stock, is not to be given any different meaning than that to be inferred from the context, the word being employed in such cases to vest an interest in real estate or personal property, and hence will not be construed so as to create a restraint upon the stockholder from disposing of his stock. Burden v. Burden, 54 N. E. 17, 20, 159 N. Y. 287.

A will creating a trust to hold property and its rents and income does not create a trust to sell and dispose of the proceeds, or to receive rents and profits, and pay them or apply them to the use of any person. Carpenter v. Cook, 64 Pac. 997, 999, 132 Cal. 621, 84 Am. St. Rep. 118.

Authority to sell implied.

A corporation created by a special act of the Legislature, and "capable of receiving, holding, and managing" a certain donation "as a corporation for that purpose only," is thereby impliedly vested with authority not only to receive and hold such donation, but to sue for and collect the money. White Schoolhouse v. Post, 31 Conn. 240, 257.

Detain equivalent.

In replevin, an allegation in the complaint that defendant unlawfully holds the property is equal to an allegation that it is unlawfully detained, within the meaning of Rev. St. Ind. 1881, § 1547. Gould v. O'Neal, 1 Ind. App. 144, 145, 27 N. E. 307.

Exclusive control authorized.

"Hold," as used in a will which provides that testator's wife should hold, use, occupy, and enjoy his entire estate, both real and personal, as he had done before, during her natural life, means that she should have exclusive control, direction, and superintendence of the property. Rountree v. Dixon, 11 S. E. 158, 159, 105 N. C. 350.

Code, § 1860, relating to public schools, and providing that the several boards of supervisors shall hold and manage the securities given to the school fund, does not mean that they should have manual possession of the fund, but is to be construed in the sense that the board shall have power and dominion over the fund for the purpose of managing it. Madison County v. Tullis, 27 N. W. 487, 489, 69 Iowa, 720.

As have.

In Const. 1846, art. 14, § 10, declaring that certain officers shall hold their office until the expiration of the term for which they are elected, "hold" is to be construed to mean "have." Osgood v. City of New York, 4 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Sandf.) 378.

As a legal holding.

Laws 1896, c. 821, providing that no honorably discharged Union veteran "holding a position" shall be discharged, except for incompetency or misconduct shown, after a hearing upon notice, does not apply to one holding a position by a mere de facto title, or an appointment or employment which was for any reason illegal; and hence the incumbent of an office, to which he was appointed without the civil service examination required by law, is not protected by such statutes from summary removal. People v. Board of Health, 47 N. E. 785, 153 N. Y. 513.

Ownership implied.

"Hold," as used in Acts 1891, c. 36, § 4, providing that when mineral water, oil, gas, or coal privileges or interests are held by a party or parties, or any company or association, exclusive of the surface, the same shall be assessed separately to such party or parties, company or association, at its cash or market value at the time of such revaluation, does not contemplate the holding of a lessee who pays a royalty for the coal mined and removed to the landowner, the title remaining in the lessor; but it does contemplate a case in which another party has become the owner of the mineral or coal, and holds it as such. United States Coal, Iron & Mfg. Co. v. Randolph County Court, 18 S. E. 566, 568, 38 W. Va. 201.

A charter of a bank provided that the bank should be capable of purchasing and holding real estate for its use, but that the real estate which it should be lawful for the corporation to hold should be only such as was required for its accommodation in relation to the convenient transaction of its business, or such as might have been bona fide mortgaged to it by way of security, or conveyed to it in satisfaction of its debts, etc. Held, that the disability to hold land should be construed to imply a disability to become the grantee and vendor of real estate, since the corporation cannot deal in real estate, receiving and conveying the title in its corporate capacity, without in every instance holding that estate, and hence the bank had no right to purchase lands for the purpose of selling them again. Bank of Michigan v. Niles (Mich.) 1 Doug. 401, 407, 41 Am. Dec. 575.

"Holding," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 329, § 1, providing that all persons holding lands, etc., may have partition, etc., is equivalent and synonymous to "owning or have title to lands," and is not used in the sense of requiring actual occupancy. Godfrey v. Godfrey, 17 Ind. 6, 9, 79 Am. Dec. 448.

A charter of a railroad company, providing that it shall not, in its corporate capacity, "hold, purchase, or deal in any land," other than lands on which such railroads shall run, or which may be actually necessary for the construction or maintenance thereof, and of warehouses, machine shops, etc., means the purchasing, holding, or dealing in real estate directly, and in a manner unconnected with the lawful and proper management and control of its affairs and business, and not to prevent its acquiring an interest therein, incidentally, whenever, in the proper exercise of its powers, it becomes necessary for it to do so in order to protect its legal rights. It does not prohibit the taking of a mortgage to secure a debt due the corporation. Blunt v. Walker, 11 Wis. 334, 347, 78 Am. Dec. 709.

To "hold" means to retain; to keep. When used in relation to land, it embraces the idea of actual possession. When used in the habendum clause of a deed, it includes the twofold idea of actual possession of the thing, and being invested with the legal title. Stansbury v. Hubner, 20 Atl. 904, 136 Pa. 499.

In the syllabus of Grant v. Jones, 39 Ohio St. 506, it is said: "Credits owned by a nonresident of this state are not taxable here unless they are held within the state by a guardian, trustee, or agent of the owner, by whom they must be returned for taxation." Referring to the definition of the word "hold," it is found that, as given by Anderson in his Law Dictionary, it means possess by lawful title, as hold a note or bond, hold lands or property; to have and to hold described premises; hold office; hold a fund or lien, a policy of insurance, a share, stakes, stock, etc., whence, also, freehold or leasehold. In Witsell v. City of Charleston, 7 S. C. 99, it was decided that, as a technical term, "hold" embraces two ideas—that of actual possession of some subject of dominion or property, and that of being vested with legal title or right to hold or claim such possession. It was recognized, however, that the interpretation of the word might be so controlled by the context as to require that it be construed to signify to have in possession or under control, merely. In Godfrey v. Godfrey, 17 Ind. 9, the Supreme Court referred to the statute of that state on the subject of partition, which provided that all persons holding land, etc., might have partition. The court said: "We do not construe the word 'holding,' thus used, as requiring actual occupancy, but as equivalent to owning or having title to lands." The word is not to be construed in the popular sense of only having possession and control for certain specified purposes, as in the case of an agent acting for his principal. Hence debts owned by a nonresident of the state of Ohio, evidenced by notes and mortgages upon real estate within the state, are not held within the state, so as to be taxable there, although the notes and mortgages are in the hands of a resident agent, who made the loans, and collects and remits principal and interest as they become due. Jack v. Walker (U. S.) 19 Fed. 138, 140.

"Holding," as used in Code Proc. § 235, providing that the execution of an attachment on any debts, or other property incapable of manual delivery to the sheriff, shall be made by leaving a certified copy of the warrant of attachment with the debtor, or "individual holding such property," would not include an attorney who had conducted a suit and obtained a judgment for his client, so as to authorize a levy on the judgment by serving the attorney; he not being the person holding the judgment. in re Flandrow, 34 N. Y. 1, 4.

The clerk of court, in whose office a judgment is recorded and docketed, is not a person holding property, within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 66, § 305, requiring service of execution on persons holding property. Such language has no application where the property levied on is a judgment or debt. Wheaton v. Spooner, 54 N. W. 372, 373, 52 Minn. 417.

Ownership of shares of stock.

The word "hold," in a statute providing that shares of stock held or owned by a married woman may be transferred by her without the signature of her husband, and that all dividends payable upon shares held by a married woman may be paid to her in the same manner as if she were unmarried, means holding the stock by certificate in her own name, with a proper transfer upon the books. State v. Leete, 16 Nev. 242-249.

Passive trust created.

The word "hold" was formerly a technical word employed in the tenendum clause of a deed, but now has no technical meaning when used in such instruments. The word means to derive title to; to retain in one's keeping; to be in possession of; to occupy; to maintain authority over; and a trust to hold property is not a passive trust. Ure v. Ure, 56 N. E. 1087, 185 Ill. 218.

Personalty.

"To hold and invest," as used in a will giving and bequeathing all the property of whatsoever kind to executors "to hold and invest," are applicable to personalty, and the use of these terms in respect to both realty and personalty indicates that it was all to be converted. Cook v. Cook (N. J.) 47 Atl. 732, 733.

Purchase distinguished.

The term "purchase and hold," in Act March 17, 1787, enabling the Bank of North America to have, hold, purchase, receive, possess, enjoy, and retain lands, rents, etc., and also to sell, grant, or convey the same lands, and providing that such lands and tenements which the said corporation was thereby able to purchase and hold should only extend to such lots of ground and convenient buildings, etc., which they might find necessary for carrying on the business of the said bank, etc., and all such lands and tenements which might be bona fide mortgaged to them as securities for their debts, cannot be construed as precluding a bank from purchasing absolutely lands in a distant county, which it does not occupy. "The restriction is that the bank shall not purchase or hold. Purchasing and holding are very different things, and the consequences of each are very different. If the words had been that the bank should neither purchase nor hold, then it could neither have done one nor the other." Leazure v. Hillegas (Pa.) 7 Serg. & R. 313, 319.

As reserve or retain.

A deed reciting that "I [the grantor] hold a life interest in the land conveyed," and that it is fairly understood that such land is to be the grantee's share of the estate of his father (the grantor), and further reciting only a nominal consideration, should be construed to reserve a life interest in such land. Hurst v. Hurst, 7 W. Va. 289, 298.

In an agreement for the lease of land for a proper rent authorizing the lessor to hold so many bushels of wheat per acre as security as certain plowing, "hold" means to hold back; withhold; retain. Lloyd v. Powers, 22 N. W. 492, 493, 4 Dak. 62.

HOLD AND OCCUPY.

The use of the words "hold and occupy," in a lease, which recites that the lessee shall hold and occupy the premises for a term of years, amounts to a general covenant for a quiet enjoyment during the term. Ellis v. Welch, 6 Mass. 246-250, 4 Am. Dec. 122.

HOLD COURT.

When a judge holds court, he directs, controls, and governs it as the chief officer, and this is the extent of the meaning of the word "preside." The presiding judge of a court consisting of several members, or of a court of which he is the sole judge, as of a court of oyer and terminer, with its grand and petit juries, its attending sheriffs, clerks, and other officers, does this, and nothing else, under the name of "holding" or "presiding" in the court. Smith v. People, 47 N. Y. 330, 334.

"To hold court," as used in Const. art. 8, § 12, authorizing a judge in one judicial district to hold court for the judge of another district, does not include the act of issuing an injunction in chambers during an adjournment of a term of court, being held by the judge of another district. Wallace v. Helena Electric R. Co., 25 Pac. 278, 10 Mont. 24.

HOLD OVER.

See "Willful Holding Over."

"To hold over," when applied to an officer, implies that the office has a fixed term, which has expired, and the incumbent is holding into the succeeding term. Where there is no fixed term, there can be no holding over. State v. Simon, 26 Pac. 170, 174, 20 Or. 365.

"Holding over," as the term is used in the law of landlord and tenant, is defined to be the act of keeping possession of the premises. Where a tenant on the expiration of his term surrenders possession for any interval of time, his resuming possession under an agreement with the agent of the landlord, though the agent has no authority to grant such permission, does not constitute a holding over. Frost v. Akron Iron Co., 37 N. Y. Supp. 374, 377, 1 App. Div. 449.

The holding over constitutes merely an enlargement of the term, and the lease is applied thereto with the same force as though it had been re-executed. In Webber v. Shearman, 3 Hill, 547, it was said: "Holding over after the expiration of a sealed lease is a continuation of the same tenancy, and an enlargement of the same term." Baylies v. Ingram, 82 N. Y. Supp. 891, 893, 84 App. Div. 360 (citing People v. Paulding, 22 Hun, 91).

"Hold-overs" is a term applied to police inspectors in the city of Chicago, who held their office by virtue of appointment prior to the date when the civil service act, as applied to the police force, went into operation. Ptacek v. People, 62 N. E. 530, 532, 194 Ill. 125.

HOLD UP.

"Holding up," when used in relation to an attack on a train, is distinctly and universally understood to mean the forcible detention of a train, with intent to commit a robbery or some other felony, and its use in an instruction could not possibly have been misunderstood by the jury. Territory v. McGinnis, 61 Pac. 208, 212, 10 N. M. 269.

Where, by threats and the use of deadly weapons, money is taken from a cash drawer from and in the presence of the proprietor, the offense is one commonly called a "hold up." Leo v. State, 89 N. W. 303, 63 Neb. 723.

HOLDEN.

St. 1826, c. 430, providing that the managers of the Sullivan Bridge Lottery "shall be holden to account for" all the tickets in every class in said lottery, and all prizes not claimed with one year, means not merely to render an account of, but to be responsible for. It stands in opposition to the right of appropriation to one's own use and benefit. In common cases of principal and agent, the expression would as well be satisfied by an honest return of that part of the principal's goods which the agent could not sell as by a payment of the proceeds in case he had sold them. Such is the common understanding of the language thus used. Thomas v. Mahan, 4 Me. (4 Greenl.) 442, 448.

The statute authorizing a tenant in real actions to claim for the value of the improvements made on land "holden by such person by virtue of the possession and improvement" means a holding adverse to the legal title. Treat v. Strickland, 23 Me. (10 Shep.) 234, 238.

HOLDER.

See "Bona Fide Holder"; "Lawful Holder"; "Property Holder."

As defined by the law dictionaries, the word "holder" means one who is legally in possession of a negotiable instrument. Webster gives it also the legal meaning of one who holds land, etc., under another; a tenant. But its popular meaning is one who holds; and as used in St. 1895, p. 53, requiring sheep owners who are not the owners and holders of one acre of land for each two sheep to procure a license, it means one who is in possession, actual or constructive, of land. One whose title vested in him the right to immediate possession, and who could at any time, without hindrance, take actual possession, would doubtless be deemed the holder of the land, although not then in actual possession. A lessee of land for a fixed term would be a holder. State v. Wheeler, 44 Pac. 430, 433, 23 Nev. 143.

In Act Feb. 25, 1875, § 3, relating to the registration of county bonds, and providing that a fee shall be paid to the auditor by the holder thereof, the term "holder" means the person presenting the bonds for registration, whether a corporation or natural person. State v. Wallichs, 20 N. W. 27, 28, 16 Neb. 110.

The term "holder," as used in the negotiable instrument law, means the payee or indorsee of a bill or note, who is in possession of it, or the bearer thereof. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 653, c. 73, § 207; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 4592; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1060; Code Supp. Va. 1898, § 2841a; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3178.

Agent.

The holder of commercial paper is a person having possession of the paper and making demand, whether in his own right or as agent for another, and includes a notary or a bank holding the same for collection. Bowling v. Harrison, 47 U. S. (6 How.) 248, 258, 12 L. Ed. 425.

The term "owner or holder," within the meaning of a statute requiring notice of application for a public road to be served on the owner or holder of the land over which the road is to run, includes an overseer on the premises. "The words 'owner or holder' were not used as meaning the tenant only, or the person holding under a lease, but reasonably extend to any person occupying or in possession, placed there by the owner, who may be expected to take care of his interests in this, as in other matters connected with the land." In re Kimmey (Del.) 5 Har. 18.

Bearer synonymous.

"Holder" is a word of similar import to "bearer," and by either of these words a note may be made negotiable by delivery. Putman v. Crymes (S. C.) 1 McMul. 9; 36 Am. Dec. 250.

The term "holder," when used with reference to negotiable paper, is properly applied to the person having possession of the paper and making the demand, whether in his own right, or as an agent for another. "Holder" is a word of the same import as "bearer," and is applied to any one in actual or constructive possession of the bill, and entitled at law to recover or receive its contents from the parties to it. Crocker-Woolworth Nat. Bank v. Nevada Bank, 73 Pac. 456, 462, 130 Cal. 564, 63 L. R. A. 245, 96 Am. St. Rep. 169.

Non-resident administrator.

In General Incorporation Act, art. 184, § 39, providing that every "holder of stock" in any company, as executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee, should represent the shares of stock in his hands at the meetings of the company, and vote accordingly as a stockholder, the quoted phrase should be construed to include an administrator taking title under a grant of letters of probate at the testator's domicile, in a foreign state. In re Cape May & D. B. N. Co., 13 Atl. 191, 193, 51 N. J. Law (22 Vroom) 78.

Owner synonymous.

The word "holder," in Act Pa. May 4, 1852, § 2 (P. L. 576), providing that every five shares of stock in an academy of music should entitle the holder thereof to a free ticket of admission, means owner. Kuhn v. American Academy of Music (Pa.) 15 Wkly. Notes Cas. 251, 255.

The word "holder," in a policy of insurance providing that the same may be converted into cash, "at the option of the holder, at any time after the expiration of 15 years from the date herein," etc., means the person to whom the policy is by its terms payable—the owner thereof. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Healey, 33 N. Y. Supp. 911, 921, 86 Hun, 524.

The word "holder," as used in a provision of a life policy providing that it is payable to the wife of insured, or, in the event of her prior death, to the children of insured, and that it may be converted into cash at the option of the holder, means those who in law are the owners of the policy, and entitled to the rights and benefits which may accrue under it; in other words, all the beneficiaries—not only the wife, but the children, of the insured. And therefore the option to convert the policy into cash cannot be exercised by the wife alone, but only by the wife and children jointly. Entwistle v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 51 Atl. 759, 202 Pa. 141.

An averment that the president and directors of a bank were the holders and owners of a bill of exchange is equivalent to alleging that the bill was property of the bank. Walker v. Bank of Alabama (Ala.) 4 Stew. & P. 215, 219.

Drawer and payee.

The holder of a bill is he who is in the possession of the bill and is legally entitled to the benefit of it; and therefore the drawer as well as any other party may become the holder. Rice v. Hogan, 38 Ky. (8 Dana) 135.

The word "holder," as used in a mortgage conferring a power of sale upon the holder of a note which it was used to secure at the time of the execution of the mortgage, meant the payee, so that its use did not render the mortgage indefinite as to the person who was to execute the power of sale. Ray v. Home & Foreign Investment & Agency Co., 26 S. E. 56, 57, 98 Ga. 122.

Trustee for creditors.

If a chattel mortgage be made and delivered to a trustee for creditors, the trustee is the holder, within the statute requiring the holder to make an affidavit in order to make it valid as against creditors. Bonnet v. Hope Mfg. Co., 28 Atl. 601, 603, 51 N. J. Eq. (6 Dick.) 615.

HOLDER FOR VALUE.

Where value has at any time been given for the instrument, the holder is deemed a holder for value, in respect to all parties who became such prior to that time. Negotiable Instruments Law, § 26 (Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1043).

It is well settled that a pledgee or mortgagee of property is a holder for value. Levy v. Rudolph (Ky.) 56 S. W. 988, 990.

HOLDER IN DUE COURSE.

A holder in due course, under Negotiable Instrument Law, § 98, holds the instrument free from any defect of the title of prior parties. Sutherland v. Mead, 80 N. Y. Supp. 504, 508, 80 App. Div. 103.

HOLDER OF POWER.

The "holder of a power," as used in the chapter relating to powers, is the person in whom a power is vested, whether by grant, devise, or reservation. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4101.

HOLDING OFFICE.

A statute declaring that an alien who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States is ineligible to hold office should be construed to mean merely the holding of the office, and not the election thereto, so that, in case the disability is removed before the commencement of the term of office for which an alien has been elected, he will be entitled to enter upon and hold such office. The disqualification relates to the holding of the office, and not to the election thereto. State v. Murray, 28 Wis. 96, 100, 9 Am. Rep. 489.

"Holding an office," as used in the Constitution, disqualifying persons holding any lucrative office under the United States from holding an office under the state, cannot be construed to include one appointed to the office of Surveyor General, but who did not take the oath of office and notify the proper department at Washington of his acceptance of the commission until after the date of his election as State Comptroller. To constitute the holding of an office, within the meaning of the Constitution, there must be the concurrence of two wills—that of the appointing power and that of the person appointed. The mere tender of a commission does not produce that result. So far as regards the act of the appointing power, the appointment is complete when the commission is duly issued by the President. But Congress having required the giving of bond and the taking of an oath by the person appointed to the office of Surveyor General before he can possess such office, these acts are required to be done before he can be said to be holding the office. People v. Whitman, 10 Cal. 38, 43.

Continuance in office.

Continuing to perform the duties of an office is holding office, so that a surveyor who had resigned, but whose successor had not been appointed, and who, under the Constitution, was required to continue to perform the duties of his office until his successor was qualified, was holding office, within the provisions of Pen. Code, art. 123, imposing a fine on any county officer concerned in the purchase of any right or title in public land. Keen v. Featherston, 69 S. W. 983, 984, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 568.

HOLDING OUT.

By "holding out a woman to be the wife of another" is meant that the purported husband by language and conduct leads the world to believe that the parties are living and associating themselves together as husband and wife. United States v. Snow, 9 Pac. 697, 705, 4 Utah, 313.

HOLIDAY.

See "Legal Holidays."

At the common law a holiday was not, as in the case of Sunday, dies non juridicus, and holidays have only the sanctity attached to them by statute. State v. Lewis, 72 Pac. 121, 123, 31 Wash. 515.

"Holiday," as used in Laws 1862, c. 248, which declares the 25th day of December to be a legal holiday, imports that it shall be dies non juridicus, and that no authority exists on that day to do any official acts, though no express prohibition is contained in the act. A prohibition is implied in the term "holiday." Lampe v. Manning, 38 Wis. 673, 674; In re Worthington (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 643.

Where the day on which a cause was tried and judgment rendered was a legal holiday, it was dies non juridicus, and the court had no authority to hear the cause and render judgment on that day, even though there was no express statutory prohibition. Lampe v. Manning, 38 Wis. 673, 674.

"Holiday," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall include Christmas, the Fourth of July, the Twenty-Second of February, and any day appointed by the President of the United States or the Congress of the United States as a holiday or as a day of public fasting or thanksgiving. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3419.

Christmas.

As legal holiday, see "Legal Holidays."

Fourth of July.

The term at the common law does not include the Fourth of July. Rogers v. Brooks, 30 Ark. 612, 613, 629.

Memorial day.

Rev. St. 1881, § 2098 (Rev. St. 1894, § 2194), forbidding the sale of liquors as a beverage on a legal holiday, applies only to general legal holidays, made so for all purposes by statute, and does not apply to the 30th of May, because of a statute declaring that it shall be a legal holiday in relation to commercial paper, and for no other purpose. State v. Atkinson, 39 N. E. 51, 52, 139 Ind. 426.

Sunday.

"Holiday," as used in Supp. Rev. 361, enacting that certain days shall be legal holidays, cannot be construed as indicating an intent to assimilate the status of the days so named to that of Sunday. "Holiday," in its present conventional meaning, is scarcely applicable to Sunday. When the statute declares certain days to be legal holidays, it does not permit a reference to the legal status of Sunday to discover its meaning. Glenn v. Eddy, 17 Atl. 145, 51 N. J. Law (22 Vroom) 255, 14 Am. St. Rep. 684. (Quoted in Spalding v. Bernhard, 44 N. W. 643, 644, 76 Wis. 368, 7 L. R. A. 423, 20 Am. St. Rep. 75.)

HOLLOW WARES.

"Hollow wares," as used in Act Cong. March 3, 1883, c. 121, 22 Stat. 488 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2247], imposing certain duties on hollow wares, meant vessels of hollow ware made of cast iron. Strausky v. Erhardt (U. S.) 52 Fed. 808, 809.

HOLOGRAPHIC WILL.

A holographic will is one that is entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator himself. It is subject to no other form, and may be made in or out of the state, and need not be witnessed. Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2506; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3647; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1277; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1724; In re Soher's Estate, 21 Pac. 8, 9, 78 Cal. 477; Scott v. Harkness, 59 Pac. 556, 557, 2 Idaho. 736; Harrison v. Weatherby, 54 N. E. 237, 240, 180 Ill. 418. It may be informally drawn, and may consist of one or more papers. No particular words are necessary to show a testamentary intent. It must appear only that the maker intended by it to dispose of property after his death. Mitchell v. Donohue, 34 Pac. 614, 615, 100 Cal. 202, 38 Am. St. Rep. 279.

The only difference between a holographic will and an attested will is in the form of the execution. In re Soher's Estate, 21 Pac. 8, 9, 78 Cal. 477.

A will written and signed by the hand of deceased, but bearing no date and not witnessed, is not a holographic will. In re Martin's Estate, 58 Cal. 532.

In the case of a holographic will, no acknowledgment by the testator, attestation of witness, or any other mode of publication, other than that it be wholly written and subscribed by the testator, is necessary to make it valid. Porter v. Ford, 82 Ky. 191, 195 (quoting Bouvier, Law Dict.).

A letter written by testator, directing a change in his will, was held valid as a holographic will or codicil. Barney v. Hays, 29 Pac. 282, 284, 11 Mont. 571, 28 Am. St. Rep. 495.

A will partly written by the testator and partly written by another or printed, or if it be partly dated or signed by him and partly by another, is not a holographic will. Estate of Billings, 1 Pac. 701, 64 Cal. 427.

Where portions of the paper were printed in the form of a stationer's blank, and the vacant spaces were filled in the handwriting of deceased, the instrument was not a holographic will. In re Rand's Estate, 61 Cal. 471.

HOME.

The word "home" suggests relations differing in breadth and strength, though not in kind, when applied, on the one hand, to a farmer who has resided since his birth, and expects to reside until his death, on the same spot, and, on the other hand, to the clergyman, whose home may change in two years, or to the railroad laborer, whose home may change in two months. Langhammer v. Munter, 31 Atl. 300, 301, 80 Md. 518, 27 L. R. A. 330 (citing Paine, Elect. 46; Chase v. Miller, 41 Pa. [5 Wright] 403; Story, Conf. Laws).

A person's home may be in his own house or his hired lodgings. School Dist. No. 2 in Brentwood v. Pollard, 55 N. H. 505.

A pauper, while supported as such, has no home or dwelling place, within the meaning of Gen. St. p. 132, providing that upon the division of any town, or the annexation of a part of one town to another town, every person having a legal settlement therein, but being absent at the time of such division or annexation, and not having acquired a settlement elsewhere, shall have his legal settlement in that town wherein his last dwelling place or home shall happen to fall. Town of Wilmington v. Town of Somerset, 35 Vt. 232.

"The place where one keeps his effects, his chest, etc., is said to be his home." Town of Barton v. Town of Irasburgh, 33 Vt. 159, 162.

A will bequeathing a "home and maintenance" to a daughter during the time she remains unmarried—the section of the will following such bequest providing that the remainder of the testator's property, both real and personal, of which he might die possessed, after the payment of debts and legacies and the decease of his wife, shall go to certain other children—means a home and maintenance on the premises where testator lived at the time of his death. Parker v. Parker, 126 Mass. 433, 436.

It is said in Town of Berlin v. Town of Worcester, 50 Vt. 23, in a case involving the settlement of a pauper, that the idea of a right to be and remain at a particular place is inseparable from the conception of home or domicile. Jericho v. City of Burlington, 29 Atl. 801, 802, 66 Vt. 529.

The existence of a home is a question depending upon fact and intention, and the term may be applicable to a particular spot or to a whole country. A person who wanders from country to country, with no intention of remaining fixedly anywhere, acquires no new home. On the other hand, one who confines his wanderings to a particular country or locality, but declines to fix himself upon some particular spot, can very properly be said to have a home in that country or locality. Home, domicile, or residence may therefore include a spot or a wide area. Each of these words may be applied either to a house, a precinct, a ward, a county, or a state. Langhammer v. Munter, 31 Atl. 300, 301, 80 Md. 518, 27 L. R. A. 330.

Domicile distinguished.

There is no substantial difference between the meaning of the words "home" and "domicile." King v. King, 56 S. W. 534, 535, 155 Mo. 406.

Home is that place or country at which a person either resides with the intention of residence, or in which, having so resided, or with regard to which, he retains either residence or intention of residence. The word is not synonymous with "domicile," yet home is the fundamental idea of domicile. The law takes the conception of home, and, molding it by means of certain rules to suit its own requirements, calls it "domicile." Dean v. Cannon, 16 S. E. 444, 446, 37 W. Va. 123.

"Home" means some permanent abode or residence, where the person residing intends to remain, "and is not synonymous with 'domicile,' as used in international law, but has a more restricted meaning." Inhabitants of Jefferson v. Inhabitants of Washington, 19 Me. 293.

"'Home' and 'domicile' may, and generally do, mean the same thing, but a home may be relinquished and abandoned, while the domicile of the party, upon which many civil rights and duties depend, may, in legal contemplation, remain." Thus the home, within the meaning of a statute providing that a pauper shall be deemed to have a settlement in the town where he dwells and has his home, may be lost by his leaving the town where he has his home, without intending to return, though he fails to establish a home in any other place; and this is so without regard to whether he loses his domicile or not. Inhabitants of Exeter v. Inhabitants of Brighton, 15 Me. (3 Shep.) 58, 60.

As home port.

"Home," as used in the United States Revised Statutes, which declare that every master and commander of any vessel belonging in whole or in part to any citizen of the United States, who, without justifiable cause, forces an officer or mariner of such vessel on shore in order to leave him behind in any foreign port, or refuses to bring home again all such officers and mariners of such vessel whom he carried out with him, shall be punished, etc., means the home port of the ship for the voyage. It does not refer to the private, domestic abode of any seaman, native or foreign. In re Ah Tie (U. S.) 13 Fed. 291, 293 (citing United States v. Coffin [U. S.] 25 Fed. Cas. 485, 486).

As household.

A testator directed his property to be kept together, and his family supported out of it, under the government of his wife, and that no expenses should be charged to his children while they remained at home, and that his sons should, in the final division of his estate, account for expenses they might incur after leaving home to acquire professions, and that an equal division should be made when his youngest child attained full age. Held, that by "home," as used in the will, the testator meant the household of which he was the head while living, and the government whereof he committed to his wife upon his death, so that a daughter who left her stepmother and went to live with her sister was not at home, within the meaning of the term as used in the will. Manuling v. Woff, 22 N. C. 11, 12.

Life estate implied.

In a will giving a wife a life estate in testator's property if she remained unmarried, and providing that the wife shall have the privilege of a home there, in case she desires it, during her natural life, such last clause does not show that the testator did not understand that he had already given her a life estate in the same property, since he may have desired to provide a home for her in case of her remarriage, when her estate as life tenant would terminate. Clough v. Clough, 52 Atl. 449, 451, 71 N. H. 412.

As location of corporation by charter.

The term "residence or home," when used with reference to a corporation, means the place where it is located by or under the authority of its charter. It has no power to change its home or residence or its citizenship. Ex parte Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 369-376, 24 L. Ed. 853.

Maintenance and support included.

The use of the word "home" in a will devising all of testator's property to certain beneficiaries, but directing that it is his wish and desire that his daughters shall have a home in his house while they live single, is not broad enough in itself to show an intention to require the daughters to be maintained, also, but is confined to its natural signification as a place of permanent residence. Appeal of Kennedy, *81 Pa. (32 P. F. Smith) 163-165; Nelson v. Nelson, 19 Ohio, 282, 284.

The word "home," as used in a deed whereby a father conveyed land to his two sons, and provided that his unmarried daughters should have a home on said land as long as they remained unmarried, does not include the right of an unmarried daughter to support and maintenance from the land. Shuttleworth v. Shuttleworth, 34 W. Va. 17, 25, 11 S. E. 714.

A testatrix devised a farm to one in fee, and then directed that another should have a home during her natural life on such farm. It was held that the devise of a home was not confined to a mere room and shelter in a house on the farm, but extended to the board and maintenance of the devisee. The word "home," not only in its true etymology, but in its ordinary acceptation, means something more genial than a mere privilege to perambulate a dreary room. The common sense as well as the common charity of the world revolts at the idea that a word everywhere hallowed, even among barbarians, as typical of something sacred and beneficent, should be dwarfed into the chilly proportions of a room fireless, bedless, and foodless. Such is not, and never was, its meaning, unless the whole world have up to the present time, with persistent ignorance, misused it. The testatrix intended to provide for the comfort, and not the annoyance, of the devisee; and, when she used the word "home," she understood it as importing what everybody else had been accustomed to understand as its meaning. Willett v. Carroll, 13 Md. 459, 468.

Within the meaning of a will devising a house to a son, and requiring him to furnish a daughter a home in the house in case she remains single and desires to have a home, the question arose as to whether the word "home" meant merely a place for shelter, and, if so, in what part of the house it was to be located, or whether it included the right of the daughter to occupy the entire house as a member of the family, and to be supported at his table. It was held that as the value of the property was stated to be $3,500, subject to a charge of $1,000, and the daughter at that time was about 29 years of age, it was evident that support at the table as a member of the family could not have been intended; that the charge would have been greater than the amount of the devise, and the provision for a home for the daughter was intended to afford her such reasonable accommodations as she might desire to enjoy there in connection with, but not as a member of, the son's family. Clough v. Clough, 52 Atl. 449, 451, 71 N. H. 412.

"The word 'home,' when made the subject of a devise, is ambiguous, and may mean merely the use of sufficient room, or it may include a support." The term in a will in which testator gave his sister a home at his house as long as she should live, and directed his executors to attend to this, was construed to include necessary food and fuel. Denfield v. Smith, 30 N. E. 1018, 1019, 156 Mass. 265.

The word "home," in a will devising testator's real estate to his sons, and directing that, as long as a daughter should remain single, his house should be her home, free of expense, as to paying any rent or privilege in said house, was used to mean such a home as children have in the house of their parents, with whom they live. The word "home" could have been present to his mind in no other sense, and in this sense it includes maintenance and support; she rendering such service as a child, under the same circumstances, would be expected to render in the family of her parents. Lyon v. Lyon, 65 N. Y. 339, 340.

Personal presence required.

To constitute a residence or home, which, if continued for five years without interruption, will establish a legal settlement, it is requisite that there should be at the commencement actual personal presence, accompanied with the intention to make that residence a home. The act and the intention must concur. When such a home is once established, it continues until it is intentionally changed or abandoned. Inhabitants of West Gardiner v. Inhabitants of Farmingdale, 36 Me. 252, 254.

As place of abode.

The word "home," in the return of a sheriff reciting the service of the notice on a member of defendant's family, and that defendant was not at home, is synonymous with the phrase "place of abode," in Code 1887, § 3207, providing that notices may be served on a member of defendant's family at his usual place of abode in his absence. Fowler v. Mosher, 7 S. E. 542, 543, 85 Va. 421.

A statute providing that a man shall be taxed in the place where his home is, does not mean the principal place of abode of a man and his family, when such place is only a temporary abode. Thayer v. City of Boston, 124 Mass. 132, 147, 26 Am. Rep. 650.

Within the meaning of a contract, one of the provisions of which was that one of the contracting parties should make his home in a certain place, "home" means the place where a person abides, not for any fixed period, but with the intention of remaining until some event not yet in view shall make it desirable or necessary to give it up. Welch v. Whelpley, 28 N. W. 744, 745, 62 Mich. 15, 4 Am. St. Rep. 810.

As residence.

A testator made a bequest to his executors upon a trust to hold, manage, and receive the income thereof until an act of incorporation could be obtained, for the "Smith Memorial Home." The object of the bequest was stated to be for the founding of a home for aged, respectable, indigent women, who had been residents of the city of New London. Held that the word "home" should be construed in its ordinary meaning, as a dwelling house or residence for the persons made the object of the bequest. The word "home" sufficiently expresses the idea of a house for the permanent residence of the beneficiaries. Colt v. Comstock, 51 Conn. 352, 382, 50 Am. Rep. 29.

The word "home," as used in the pauper law, is synonymous with the words "residence or dwelling place." Town of North Yarmouth v. Town of West Gardiner, 58 Me. 207, 210, 4 Am. Rep. 279.

The word "home," as used in the Constitution, creating two classes of electors—the first class including every male citizen who has had his residence and home in the state for a year—is synonymous with "residence," and was used simply by way of emphasis, and not to add a further qualification, which is shown by the fact that, in describing electors of the second class, the word "residence" alone was used; there being no conceivable reason for any discrimination between the two classes of voters. State v. Aldrich, 14 R. I. 174.

In Act 1841, which defined the word "residence" as a place in which the person's habitation is fixed, without any present intention of removing therefrom, and to which, whenever he is absent, he has the intention of returning, and providing that a person shall not be considered or held to have lost his residence who shall leave his home and go into another state or county with the intent of returning, "home" is a convertible term with the word "residence," and to reside in a particular place means to have one's home there. Lehman v. McBride, 15 Ohio St. 573-601.

The home of a person is where the person turns for social life; where his family, if he has one, usually dwells, and to which his mind turns when away; and where he has the present purpose of returning and remaining. It is not the place where a man happens to be temporarily residing, even though it be with his family, for a man may, for convenience sake, have a temporary residence and quasi home, which is not his home and residence proper; and, unless he has abandoned the latter for the former, with the intention of remaining permanently from it, the newly chosen residence is not his domicile. Tyler v. Murray, 57 Md. 418-441.

The home is the place where men permanently reside, and to which they intend to return when away from it. Fry's Election Case, 71 Pa. 302, 307, 10 Am. Rep. 698.

The home of a person is the place where he and his family habitually dwell, which they may leave for temporary purposes, and to which they return when the occasion for absence no longer exists. Thomas v. Warner, 34 Atl. 830, 831, 83 Md. 14.

Settlement distinguished.

"Home" is synonymous with "residence" or "dwelling place," and means some permanent abode or residence, with intention to remain, and has a different meaning from the word "settlement," as used in the pauper laws. Inhabitants of Warren v. Inhabitants of Thomaston, 43 Me. 406, 418, 69 Am. Dec. 69.

In the pauper laws there is a marked distinction between the place of residence or home and the place of legal settlement. The latter cannot be changed without acquiring a new one. The former may be abandoned without evidence that another residence has been secured. Inhabitants of Phillips v. Inhabitants of Kingfield, 19 Me. 375, 381, 38 Am. Dec. 760.

As the whole house.

The home is not confined to the particular bedroom in which the master of the house sleeps, for it may include his rooms for guests, and apartments he never enters. So, too, it may properly embrace a schoolroom, for he may teach in his parlor, where many physicians and dentists practice their professions. It is difficult, therefore, to understand how the particular use of a portion of a dwelling makes it any the less part of the household. In re Hoope's Estate (Pa.) 1 Brewst. 462-464, 6 Phila. 364, 365.

HOME COMPANY.

The term "home company," as used in a chapter relating to home life and accident insurance companies, designates those life, accident, or life and accident insurance companies incorporated and formed in this state. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3096a.

HOME FACTOR.

A factor is called a "home factor" when he resides in the same state or country with his principal. Ruffner v. Hewitt, 7 W. Va. 585, 604, 605.

HOME-MADE BEER.

In a prosecution for the sale of liquors sold as pop beer or home-made beer, claimed by the prosecution to be intoxicating, the court says, "We discover no error in the charge that whether the liquor sold by defendant under the name of 'pop beer' or 'home-made beer' was intoxicating was to be determined as a matter of fact by the jury, and that they were not to be governed by the name which it was called." State v. Kibling, 22 Atl. 613, 616, 63 Vt. 636.

HOME MISSIONS.

A testator devised a portion of his estate to the Home and Foreign Missions of the Baptist Church, and it was contended that this bequest was too indefinite to be valid; but it was held that at the time of the execution of the will, and for many years before that time, there existed a distinct and well-defined branch of endeavor, known among Baptists as "Home Missions." This included in its area of church work the whole of the United States in its territories. Another branch equally well known and established was called "Foreign Missions." This included all foreign parts outside of the United States. Irrespective of their acceptance among Baptists, "home missions" and "foreign missions" are understood, in common parlance, in all churches, to have substantially the same meaning, and hence such bequest was valid. Bruere v. Cook, 52 Atl. 1001, 1004, 63 N. J. Eq. 624.

HOME OFFICE.

The term "home office" of a company, as used in a chapter relating to home, life, and accident insurance companies, means its principal office within the state or country in which it is incorporated or formed. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3096a.

HOME PLACE.

A devise of "my home place, where I now live," cannot be construed to include a group of tenement houses, although located on the same lot, as determined by unity of purchase and unbroken ownership. The testator lived upon the original lot, upon which all these dwellings were placed; and, if the conditions absolutely forbade its being regarded as separated into different lots, it would be necessary to consider it his home place, as distinguished from other lots. McKeough's Estate v. McKeough, 37 Atl. 275, 276, 69 Vt. 34, 41.

HOME PLANTATION.

A devise of testator's "home plantation" would not pass lots which had formerly been a part of the plantation, but which were subsequently laid off into town lots and occupied for town purposes. It would include only the plantation outside the limits of the town. Hampton v. Cowles, 20 N. C. 140, 142.

HOME PORT.

It is difficult to formulate a precise rule by which the home port of a vessel belonging to persons residing in different states may be determined in every case, but it is well settled that a vessel cannot have more than one home port, or be a domestic vessel in more than one state. A fortiori, she may, if owned by residents of different states, be a foreign vessel in the port of a state wherein certain of her owners reside. Prima facie the home port is the place of enrollment where or nearest to which the owner, or, if more than one owner, the managing owner, resides. The Ellen Holgate (U. S.) 30 Fed. 125, 126.

The home port is the port at or nearest to which an owner, if there be but one, or, if more than one, the husband or acting and managing owner, of a ship or vessel, usually resides. White's Bank v. Smith, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 646, 651, 19 L. Ed. 211.

Within the meaning of the rule of the maritime law which provides that one furnishing supplies to vessels in a home port has no lien, the home port includes any port in the state in which the owner resides, and is not limited to the port where the vessel is enrolled. The Albany (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 288, 290; The Rapid Transfer (U. S.) 11 Fed. 322, 330; O. H. Burke Mfg. Co. v. The A. Saltzman, 42 Mo. App. 85.

"Home port," as contradistinguished from "foreign port," within the meaning of the rule of law that for repairs done or supplies furnished to a maritime vessel in a foreign port the law will, if there be no special contract, imply a lien on the vessel, means not necessarily the vessel's chartered home, or the place of the owner's domicile, but any place or port where the owner should happen to be with his vessel. When the owner is present, the reason for the implied lien ceases, and the contract is inferred to be with the owner himself, on his ordinary responsibility, without a view to the vessel as the fund from which compensation is to be derived. Case v. Woolley, 36 Ky. (6 Dana) 27, 32 Am. Dec. 54; The St. Jago de Cuba, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 409, 417, 6 L. Ed. 122.

HOME RANCH.

The term "home ranch," as used in herding, generally embraces the house, stable, and corrals, and necessary outbuildings used by a herder for branding the cattle, rounding them up, etc. Holcomb v. Keliher, 59 N. W. 227, 228, 5 S. D. 438.

The usual meaning of the words "home ranch," as used in the range country, is that it is the headquarters of the range. It is the place from which the riders start upon their rounds to round up and brand the stock, and to which they return when through. For the time being, it is their home. But this does not necessarily make it the home of the cattle, in reference to taxation. If gathered and herded and cared for regularly there each year, it would doubtless become such. State v. Shaw, 29 Pac. 321, 323, 21 Nev. 222.

HOME RULE.

As descriptive of a policy, "home rule" is a significant and appropriate term; but, as descriptive of a right, it is indefinite, for it is coextensive with the right of local regulation or control, and its extent must always be tested by the Constitution. An act that incorporated into one school district lands previously divided between several districts was not invalid, as depriving the territory of local self-government, in that the act named definite terms for the officers of the municipality, and fixed definitely the site of the central school building, and did not allow the resident taxpayers and voters any voice in the matter, and fixed definitely what should be done with the territory of the old districts, and appointed a board of school inspectors, depriving the local taxpayers and voters of all voice in the matter. Attorney General v. Lowrey, 92 N. W. 289, 290, 131 Mich. 639.

HOME STATION.

The term "home station," as used in herding, generally embraces the house, stable, and corrals, and necessary outbuildings used by a herder for branding the cattle, rounding them up, etc. Holcomb v. Keliher, 59 N. W. 227, 228, 5 S. D. 438.

HOMEOPATHIC.

Whenever the term "homeopathic" is applied to a physician or a member of a medical school in any law of the state, the term shall be construed to mean that said physician or member of a medical school shall be a graduate of a homeopathic medical college, or a member of the homeopathic state medical society, or a member of the homeopathic county medical society in the state. Gen. St. N. J. 1895, p. 2083, § 16.

HOMEOPATHIC SPECIFIC.

A homeopathic specific is a remedy pertaining to homeopathy which exerts a special action in the prevention or cure of a disease. "The name can no more be appropriated, and is no more the property of Humphreys, than any other practitioner of the homeopathic system of therapeutics." Humphrey's Specific Medicine Co. v. Wenz (U. S.) 14 Fed. 250, 253.

HOMESTALL.

"Homestall," in the ancient law, designates the mansion house. Dickison v. Mayer, 58 Tenn. (11 Heisk.) 515, 521 (citing 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 670).

HOMESTEAD.

See "Business Homestead"; "Family Homestead"; "Pony Homestead"; "Probate Homestead"; "Urban Residence Homestead."

Estate of, see "Estate of Homestead."

"A homestead is the place of the house. Coke says, "'stethe' or 'sted' betokeneth properly a bank of a river, and many times a place." Co. Litt. 4b. 'Homestead,' then, means nothing more than home place." Woodman v. Lane, 7 N. H. 241, 244; Barney v. Leeds, 51 N. H. 253, 265 (citing Austin v. Stanley, 46 N. H. 52).

A "homestead" means the home place—the place where the home is—and such is its legal acceptance at the present day. It is the home, the house, and the adjoining land where the head of the family dwells—the home farm. Oliver v. Snowden, 18 Fla. 823, 825, 43 Am. Rep. 338.

"The word 'homestead' seems to be an abbreviation of 'homesteading' or 'home buildings,' and by its force includes no more than the actual buildings and so much land immediately contiguous thereto as is necessary to make a home." Lord v. Simonson (N. J.) 42 Atl. 741, 742 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.; Webst. Dict.).

The term "homestead" includes dwelling houses in which families reside, with the usual and customary appurtenances, including different buildings of every kind necessary or convenient for family use, and lands for the purpose thereof. If situated in the country, it may include a garden or farm. If situated in town, it may include one or more lots, or one or more blocks. In either case it is limited by extent, merely. In re Allen (Cal.) 16 Pac. 319.

"Homestead" is defined to be a person's dwelling place, with that part of his land and property which is about and contiguous to it. Linn County Bank v. Hopkins, 28 Pac. 606, 47 Kan. 580, 27 Am. St. Rep. 309; Anderson v. Sessions, 51 S. W. 874, 875, 93 Tex. 279, 77 Am. St. Rep. 873.

The word "stead" originally meant place or spot. This meaning is now obsolete, except as preserved in compound words. Webster defines "homestead" as the home place. It is a house occupied by its owner as a dwelling, with the outbuildings and land used in connection with it. It is that part of a man's premises where he lives and has his home. Except as modified by limitations of value and questions of intent, the legal use of the term is the same as the popular use. McKeough's Estate v. McKeough, 37 Atl. 275, 276, 69 Vt. 34. 41.

The term "homestead" is defined to mean the place of the house, a mansion house with adjoining land (Worcester Dict.); a mansion house; a person's dwelling; the place with the inclosure or ground immediately contiguous; an abode; a home (Imperial Dict.). As said in a well-considered case, it is the home; the house; the adjoining land where the head of the family dwells; the home farm. It does not extend to other tenements, lots, and farms that are not occupied personally by the owner and his family—houses in which they do not dwell, and rooms in which they do not live. Jaffrey v. McGough, 7 South. 333, 334, 88 Ala. 648 (quoting Hoitt v. Webb, 36 N. H. 158).

A homestead is a right additional to and independent of the ordinary right of ownership. It is an additional tenure by which the owner holds the property. Speyrer v. Miller, 32 South. 524, 526, 108 La. 204, 61 L. R. A. 781.

A homestead is an artificial estate in land, devised to protect the possession of the owner against the claims of creditors while the land is occupied as a home. It should not be construed to protect a person in possession against the claims of the legal owner of the land. Buckingham v. Buckingham, 45 N. W. 504, 505, 81 Mich. 89.

A "homestead," in law, means the home place, or place of the home, and is designed as a shelter of the homestead roof, and not as a mere investment in real estate, or the rents and profits derived therefrom. Lyon v. Harden, 29 South. 777, 778, 129 Ala. 643; Norris v. Kidd, 28 Ark. 435, 493; McGuire v. Van Pelt, 55 Ala. 344, 355; Dickman v. Birkhauser, 16 Neb. 686, 688, 21 N. W. 396.

The leading and fundamental idea connected with a homestead is unquestionably associated with that of a place of residence for the family, where the independence and security of a home may be enjoyed without danger of its loss or harassment and disturbance by reason of the improvidence or misfortune of the head or any other member of the family. It is a secure asylum of which the family cannot be deprived by creditors. Within this sanctuary, however urgent may be their demands, they cannot intrude. Iken v. Olenick, 42 Tex. 195, 198.

The word homestead in the Constitution, exempting the homestead from execution, means the place of residence of the claimant and his family; that is, the home place of the debtor and his family. Oliver v. Snowden, 18 Fla. 823, 825, 43 Am. Rep. 338.

In California a homestead consists of the dwelling house in which the claimant resides, and the land on which the same is situated, selected as provided in Civ. Code, § 1237. Grange v. Gough (Cal.) 4 Pac. 1177, 1178; Skinner v. Hall, 10 Pac. 406, 407, 69 Cal. 195; Ham v. Santa Rosa Bank, 62 Cal. 125, 134, 45 Am. Rep. 654.

The homestead consists of the dwelling house in which the claimant resides, and the land on which the same is situated, selected as provided for in the chapter relating to homesteads and exemptions. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 5214; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1670.

In a bequest to each of testator's servants at his homestead, or at the stable connected therewith, the word "homestead" was used in the sense of dwelling house, and not of home place, so that the bequests were intended for domestics or household servants, and not for one who worked out of doors on the home place, though he occasionally did work in the house. Frazer v. Weld, 59 N. E. 118, 177 Mass. 513.

"The word 'homestead' has both a popular and legal signification. In its popular sense, it signifies the place of the home; the residence of the family. It represents the dwelling house at which the family resides, with the usual and customary appurtenances, including the outbuildings of every kind necessary or convenient for family use, and lands used for the purpose thereof." Keyes v. Cyrus, 34 Pac. 722, 723, 100 Cal. 322, 38 Am. St. Rep. 296 (citing Gregg v. Bostwick, 33 Cal. 220, 227, 91 Am. Dec. 637).

"Homestead," as used before it acquired a technical meaning by statute, in a will devising the testator's homestead to his widow, etc., should be construed to embrace all the land which was appurtenant to, and which was used and considered by the testator as making up, the farm which he cultivated and on which he resided. "At that time the word 'homestead' was used in its general or popular sense, and it is in this sense that it is to be construed. At the time of the testator's death, he lived on a farm in the country, and consequently he used the term in a sense applicable to an agricultural or country residence. Farms are of various sizes, composed of one or more tracts. The word 'homestead' is indeterminate, and imports no specific quantity of land, but was employed, I apprehend, by the testator, in its then common acceptance, to include all the land that was appurtenant to—used and considered by him as making up—the farm which he cultivated, and on which he resided." Hopkins v. Grimes, 14 Iowa, 73, 77.

"Homestead," as used in a will directing executors to sell testator's homestead and invest the proceeds in other property, was construed to include the house and all the ground where testator lived, and was not limited to the amount of lands constituting a statutory homestead. Ford v. Ford, 33 N. W. 188, 196, 70 Wis. 19, 5 Am. St. Rep. 117.

A testator, being the owner of 630 acres of land, forming one connected body of land, on which he resided, and which he cultivated and carried on as one common farm, besides some disconnected tracts, devised to his wife "my homestead, to have and to hold during her life, to occupy and use the same, or dispose of it at her will and pleasure, and use and control the proceeds thereof, in lieu of her dower in my real estate," etc. Held, that the word "homestead" was not used in the statutory sense as known in the homestead exemption law, but was used in the nontechnical, ordinary acceptance of the word; meaning the place on which he lived. Testator meant by the use of the word to embrace the entire farm on which he resided, being 630 acres. Kennedy v. Kennedy, 105 Ill. 350, 353.

"Homestead," as used in a will "bequeathing to my sister J. and to W. the homestead and buildings thereon, to have and to hold equally, on the lower side of the road," should be construed to designate the boundaries of the land, not to indicate the quality of the estate given. Fearing v. Swift, 97 Mass. 413, 415.

In Comp. Laws, § 10,711, providing that, where lands on which improvements are made are held and occupied as a homestead, the mechanic's lien provided for in the act shall attach to the lands and improvements, if the improvements be made in pursuance of a written contract signed by both husband and wife, the word "homestead" is used in its constitutional sense, and the excess over the $1,500 exemption provided for in the Constitution is subject to mechanics' liens, though the contract for the improvements is not signed by the wife. McAlister v. Des Rochers (Mich.) 93 N. W. 887, 888.

The term "homestead," as used in Gen. Laws 1875, c. 40, § 2, giving a surviving husband or wife a right to enjoy the homestead for life, was not used as a convenient designation of a certain portion of the estate, in which the survivor was to take a freehold, but eo nomine as created and defined in the homestead exemption act. Eaton v. Robins, 29 Minn. 327, 328, 13 N. W. 143.

The homestead has been called a determinable fee, but as we have seen that no new estate has been conferred upon the owner, and no limitation upon his old estate imposed, it is obvious that it would be more correct to say that there is conferred upon him a determinable exemption from the payment of his debts, in respect to the particular property allotted to him. Jones v. Britton, 102 N. C. 166, 182, 9 S. E. 554, 558, 4 L. R. A. 178 (citing Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Green, 78 N. C. 247).

Actual occupancy, residence, and possession.

A "homestead" means a place of residence, and implies occupancy and possession as such. Moore v. Smead, 62 N. W. 426, 429, 89 Wis. 558; Voelz v. Voelz, 60 N. W. 707, 708, 88 Wis. 461; Bouscher v. Smith, 35 N. W. 681, 683, 73 Iowa, 610; Upman v. Second Ward Bank, 15 Wis. 449; Voelz v. Voelz, 60 N. W. 707, 708, 88 Wis. 461; Arnold v. Jones, 77 Tenn. (9 Lea) 545, 548.

"Homestead" means the seat or mansion, and embraces the idea of actual occupancy. Turner v. Turner, 18 South. 210, 107 Ala. 465, 54 Am. St. Rep. 110.

Visible occupancy of the premises as the head of a family, under a recorded title, fixes the character of the property as a homestead. Beckmann v. Meyer, 75 Mo. 333, 335.

The word "homestead" itself means a place of residence, which, again, implies occupancy, possession. Therefore it is held that, even in the absence of a statute requiring that a homestead shall be occupied as such, occupation and use for residence purposes are essential to the establishment of a homestead. Upman v. Second Ward Bank, 15 Wis. 449, 453.

The word "homestead," in ordinary use, has a popular and well-understood meaning, which may be sufficiently accurately defined as the place of residence of the family. That is the prominent idea connected with the use of the word; a dwelling house being inseparably associated with the meaning of the word, in which the family of the owner resides, and, connected therewith, a greater or less quantity of land. The homestead is the land, with the dwelling house thereon and its appurtenances, owned and occupied by a resident of the state. Actual residence on the premises is necessary to create a homestead. Tillotson v. Millard, 7 Minn. 513, 518 (Gil. 419), 82 Am. Dec. 112.

A homestead is the dwelling place at which the family reside, with the usual and necessary appurtenances, including everything necessary and convenient for family use, and the lands used for the purpose thereof. The "homestead" means the home place. The place where the home is, and such is its legal acceptance. A homestead necessarily includes the idea of residence. The use is a test by which to determine whether particular premises are or are not the homestead of the owner. Unless the premises are used as a homestead, no right or benefit of homestead exists therein. Morris v. Brown, 48 Pac. 750, 751, 5 Kan. App. 102.

A homestead consists of the dwelling house in which the claimant resides, and the land on which the same is situated, selected as provided in Civ. Code, § 1237. To constitute a valid homestead, the claimant must actually reside on the premises when his declaration is filed. Skinner v. Hall, 10 Pac. 406, 407, 69 Cal. 195.

Actual occupancy, as distinguished from mere possession, is the prominent idea associated with the word "homestead." But the term "actual occupancy" is not to be understood as requiring constant personal presence, so as to make a man's residence his prison, or that a temporary absence, enforced by some casualty, or for the purposes of business or pleasure, would constitute a removal, ceasing to occupy, or an abandonment. Clark v. Dewey, 73 N. W. 639, 640, 71 Minn. 108.

The word "homestead" is used in the law as meaning the place of a debtor's residence or dwelling, which is thereby exempted from forced sale on execution. In its popular meaning, the word means the family home or seat, and it seems that, in either sense, one may have a homestead without being in possession. Byrne v. Hinds, 16 Minn. 521, 524 (Gil. 469).

As designation of amount of land.

The term "homestead" means land of the extent and value specified by the homestead laws, which the head of a family may use and hold as a homestead exempt from execution and attachment. There is no distinction between the homestead estate and the fee in the land, and statutes relative to exemptions of homesteads cannot be construed to mean that the homesteads cannot be subjected to the payment of debts, but that the fee can be. So it is held that the word as used in Sess. Acts 1875, p. 60, § 1 (Rev. St. 1879, § 2693), providing that on the death of a husband, leaving a widow and minor children, his homestead shall continue exempt from his debts, etc., means the land of the extent and value specified, which the head of a family might use and hold as a homestead exempt from execution or attachment, and does not mean merely a homestead estate, as distinguished from the fee, but under the statute the fee is exempt. Keene v. Wyatt, 63 S. W. 116, 120, 160 Mo. 1.

The homestead created by Const. 1885, art. 10, § 1, exempting a homestead of half an acre in a city or town, expressly provides that the exemption shall not extend to more improvements or buildings than the residence and business house of the owner. Smith v. Guckenheimer, 27 South. 900, 903, 42 Fla. 1.

Under the statute, a homestead consists of a dwelling house, outbuildings, and the land used in connection therewith, not exceeding $500 in value, used or kept as a homestead. Thorp v. Wilbur, 44 Atl. 339, 340, 71 Vt. 266.

"Homestead," as used in the Constitution, means the dwelling house where the family resides, and the test of whether or not it is a homestead is use and quantity. Bebb v. Crowe, 18 Pac. 223, 39 Kan. 342.

Building alone.

There can be no homestead right in a building alone, apart from the land on which it stands. Some estate in the land is essential. Myrick v. Bill, 17 N. W. 268, 271, 3 Dak. 284.

Dower distinguished.

Dower and homestead rights are different in character. Dower is a life estate that after assignment may be sold and conveyed as other estates. The homestead is not such a right as can be used in any manner other than as provided by the constitution. The grant of a homestead was intended to be in addition to the right of dower. Horton v. Hilliard, 24 S. W. 242, 243, 58 Ark. 298.

Dwelling house necessary.

The homestead must embrace the house used as a home by the owner thereof, and, if he has two or more houses thus used by him at different places and times, he may select that which he will retain as a homestead. Code 1873, § 1994. The selection of a house not used as a home as a homestead is therefore void. Knorr v. Lohr, 78 N. W. 904, 905, 108 Iowa, 181.

The homestead must include the dwelling, and, where the homestead is situated partly on land owned by the husband and partly on that owned by the wife, the homestead must consist of part of the two tracts, and the husband cannot claim the whole of his land as the homestead. Henderson v. Rainbow, 41 N. W. 29, 76 Iowa, 320.

"Homestead is the place of a home or house; that part of a man's landed estate which is about and contiguous to his dwelling house. A homestead necessarily includes the idea of a house or mansion house. The dwelling may be a splendid mansion, a cabin, or a tent. If there be either, it is under the protection of the law, but there must be a home residence before it and the land on which it is situated can be claimed to be a homestead." Williams v. Dorris, 31 Ark. 466.

A homestead is defined by the statutes to consist of a dwelling house, outbuildings, and the land used in connection therewith, not exceeding $500 in value, and used or kept by such housekeeper or head of a family as a homestead. It necessarily implies a house owned and used or kept by the housekeeper as a dwelling place or home for himself and family, with a prescribed quantity of land, on which the house is situated. It requires that the home or abode or residence of the family shall be upon the land. One, therefore, cannot have a homestead in mere land, nor in land with no buildings but a barn on it. Rice v. Rudd, 57 Vt. 6, 10.

As dwelling and adjoining land.

"Homestead," as used in Rev. St. 1849, c. 102, § 51, exempting the homestead of a debtor from sale on execution, means "the land, not exceeding the prescribed amount, upon which the dwelling house, residence, habitation, or abode of the owner and his family are situated, without regard to the precise manner or style of the building thereon, and is restricted only by the amount of the land mentioned in the act, and not by the value or use thereof, if it be used for a dwelling house." Phelps v. Rooney, 9 Wis. 70, 83, 76 Am. Dec. 244.

"Homestead," as used in Homestead Act, § 1 (Gould's Dig. c. 68, § 29), providing that a homestead, to a certain extent, should be exempt from sale or execution, means the place of a home or house; that part of a man's landed property which is about and contiguous to his dwelling house, called anciently a "homestall" or "homestale." The homestead must be the home, the place of residence, of the party claiming it as exempt. Tumlinson v. Swinney, 22 Ark. 400, 403, 76 Am. Dec. 432.

"Homestead" is defined to be the place of the house; the mansion house, with adjoining land. Worcester Dict.; Bouv. Law Dict. It has received judicial interpretation in many respects. A man's homestead must be his place of residence; the place where he lives. Philleo v. Smalley, 23 Tex. 502. In the case of Franklin v. Coffee, 18 Tex. 413, 70 Am. Dec. 292, Chief Justice Wheeler, in describing what is not a homestead, says: "In this case there was no house or home upon the land. He had made no preparation and done no acts which would evince a fixed intention and purpose to select and appropriate the place as a home." What is meant by a "homestead of the family," in the country, and its approximate locality, is determinable by obvious facts, as a determinate object, and not by the variable intention privately entertained or openly declared by the husband; he and his wife residing on the land, in their home, at the time. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. v. Pace, 56 S. W. 377, 397, 23 Tex. Cr. App. 222 (quoting Houston & G. N. Ry. Co. v. Winter, 44 Tex. 609, 614).

"Homestead," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 68, § 8, exempting a homestead from forced sale, should be construed in its ordinary and popular sense—to designate a dwelling place used and occupied as a home for its owner and his family, if he have one. A homestead is the place made such by the choice, residence, use, and occupancy of the owner as a home, including, as its necessary incidents, the dwelling place and its appurtenances, and the land thereto belonging. But these are not, like the homestead itself, the primary objects of the exemption. They are not covered by it, because constituent parts of the homestead. They are necessarily included within it as such parts. Ferguson v. Kumler, 6 N. W. 618, 619, 27 Minn. 156.

Dwelling house in course of erection.

In holding that the term "homestead," in Rev. Laws, § 1894, exempting from forced sale the homestead, consisting of a dwelling house, outbuildings, and the land used in connection therewith, included land on which a house was being constructed, the court says in Rice v. Rudd, 57 Vt. 6, that "to constitute a homestead, within the protection of the exemption law, there must be a dwelling house upon the land owned by the housekeeper, or one in process of erection, and actually used or set apart and kept for a home and abiding place for the family." Woodbury v. Warren, 31 Atl. 295, 296, 67 Vt. 251, 48 Am. St. Rep. 815.

As an estate.

A homestead is not an estate, but only an exemption. It is a quality annexed to land, whereby an estate is exempt from sale under execution for debt, and is not a personal trust. Thomas v. Fulford, 23 S. E. 635, 117 N. C. 667.

Though the homestead right is not technically an estate in land, but only an inchoate right thereto, we think, after the death of the husband, the widow may be properly regarded as having such an interest in the property in which her right of homestead exists. Andover v. Merrimack County, 37 N. H. 434.

The right of homestead before the same is set out and assigned is not such an estate in land—such a subsisting legal right or interest—as will bar a right of entry, but only an inchoate right personal to the parties in whom it exists. Tidd v. Quinn, 52 N. H. 341.

In Couch v. Capitol Building & Loan Ass'n (Tenn.) 64 S. W. 340, 343, a homestead is said to be a property right, but in no correct legal sense a separate property right of the wife when the husband is living. It may be, in a sense, a joint property right of the husband and wife while both are living, and, being so, can be alienated only by their joint consent.

The homestead interest is not an estate in land. It has been sometimes spoken of, in loose and inaccurate speech, as an estate, but only to characterize it as a right secured by law. It is an exemption of land under stated conditions. If the conditions do not exist, or, having once existed, are at an end, the exemption ceases. Ellinger v. Thomas, 67 Pac. 529, 530, 64 Kan. 180.

Some have likened the character of a homestead, as an interest in land, to a joint tenancy. Others have treated it as a life estate, though this seems to be only in states where the homestead is not abandoned prior to the acquirement of another, or is designated as an estate. The interest is purely statutory, nothing like it being known at common law, and may not be alienated save by the joint instrument of husband and wife. In Chase v. Abbott, 20 Iowa, 157, the court said: "This right of the wife in the homestead is of a higher character, and more in the nature of a vested interest or title than is a dower right in the other real estate of the husband. It is of such a vested character as clothes her with a right to redeem from a tax sale." It is something more than a mere exemption to the owner, and more closely resembles the life estate than any other; differing therefrom in the manner of acquiring an alienation, and possessing some of the characteristics of a joint tenancy. Sayers v. Childers, 84 N. W. 938, 939, 112 Iowa, 677.

A homestead right, while perhaps not a new estate lying in grant or transferable by a conveyance, partook of the interest or right in a home, indeterminate in its duration, which might continue during the life of the owner and his wife, and perhaps the minority of the children. In its inception, a homestead is a parcel of land on which the family resides, and which is to them a home. It is constituted by the two acts of selection and residence in compliance with the terms of the law conferring it. Gallagher v. Smiley, 44 N. W. 187, 188, 28 Neb. 189, 26 Am. St. Rep. 319.

As the exemption right.

Within the statute exempting a homestead, and providing that the husband and wife shall be deemed to hold such homestead as joint tenants, the word "homestead" may be defined as meaning not only the real estate occupied as the home, but also the right to have it exempted from levy and forced sale, and the right of survivorship which adheres to joint tenancy would attach to the right to have the homestead exempted from sale. Roberts v. Greer, 40 Pac. 3, 7, 22 Nev. 318, 58 Am. St. Rep. 755.

Intent as governing.

Actual occupancy and use of the property as a homestead, or a present intention to so use it, coupled with some act indicating such intention, will constitute the property a homestead. Wilkerson v. Jones (Tex.) 40 S. W. 1046, 1047.

Present intention of occupancy as a homestead, with present action to carry the intention into effect, constitutes a homestead in law. Mills v. Hobbs, 42 N. W. 1084, 1085, 76 Mich. 122.

A homestead may be created by intention prior to actual occupancy, when it appears that the owner is entitled to the exemption as the head of a family, and that this intention has been manifested by such acts as amount to reasonably sufficient notice of that intention; the purpose of the law being to require such open evidence of this intention as will prevent the use of this right as a shield for fraud. Wolf v. Butler, 28 S. W. 51, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 468. In Cameron v. Gebhard, 85 Tex. Civ. 610, 22 S. W. 1033, 34 Am. St. Rep. 832, it is said: "The intention thus to appropriate the property should not only be found in the mind of the party, but should be evidenced by some unmistakable acts showing an intention to carry out such design, or some sufficient reason should be given why this intention was not demonstrated by such acts." In the same case this general rule is announced: "From the decisions it is apparent that intention is almost the only thing that may not be dispensed with in some state of case, and it follows that this intention in good faith to occupy is the prime factor in securing the exemption. Preparation . . . is but the corroborating witness to the declaration of intention, the safeguard against fraud, and an assurance of the bona fides of the declared intention of the party." Justice Brown, in the same opinion, says further: "But the placing upon the premises of unhewn logs, for the purpose of erecting thereon the humblest cabin, with a bona fide intention to occupy as soon as the cabin can be built, secures the right." Foley v. Holtkamp (Tex.) 66 S. W. 981, 982.

Land never actually occupied.

The term "homestead," in legal parlance, possesses the quality of inalienability for the debts of the judgment debtor, if he be the head of a family, and at the same time conveys the idea of a home place. The meaning of the word "homestead," as used in Comp. Laws 1880, § 3429, subd. 11, providing that, if the debtor be the head of a family, there shall be a further exemption of the homestead, consisting of lands, together with the appurtenances and improvements thereon, not exceeding in value a certain sum, evidently includes, not only the land whereon the family of a judgment debtor resides, but also any of his land of the limited value which he may have selected or may select for a home, although it may never have been actually occupied as the owner's place of residence. The idea of a family residence seems to pervade the entire statute, so that the judgment debtor cannot claim land removed from and in no way connected with the place where he resides. The real purpose of the statute was the preservation of the family home. Gammett v. Storrs, 49 Pac. 642, 643, 15 Utah, 336.

As used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1465, providing that if no homestead has been selected, designated, and recorded during the lifetime of the deceased, the court must select, designate, set apart, and cause to be recorded a homestead for the use of the surviving husband or wife and the minor children out of the common property, or, if there be no common property, then out of the real estate belonging to the deceased, does not require that the property set apart be actually occupied at the time when the order is made, but it must be property which could have been selected as a homestead during the continuance of the marriage. In re Estate of Noah, 15 Pac. 290, 291, 73 Cal. 590, 2 Am. St. Rep. 834.

Land which a householder merely intends to occupy as a homestead, but which is in fact never so occupied by him, cannot be exempted as a homestead. Levy v. Rubarts, 17 Ky. Law Rep. 1370, 34 S. W. 1078.

Terminated by lease.

Homestead does not include leased property. Holitt v. Webb, 36 N. H. 158, 165, 166.

If the owner of a homestead transfers his possession to a tenant, disabling him for a term from returning and assuming possession at pleasure, and acquires a home elsewhere, the right of homestead ceases. Boyle v. Shulman, 59 Ala. 566, 569.

A homestead necessarily includes the idea of a residence, the place where the owner lives. Thus the question whether the property is a homestead does not depend upon its situation, external appearance, or internal arrangement, but upon the fact that it is really and truly occupied as a home for the family; and under this theory it is held that a house rented out by a debtor is not exempt as a homestead, though erected on the same lot on which the owner's residence is located, and though the value of both houses together does not exceed the statutory limit. Garrison v. Penn (Ky.) 66 S. W. 14, 15.

Life estate implied.

In a will providing that certain lands shall be divided equally between the heirs of two sons, so as to give each one the homestead he now occupies, the word "homestead" will not be construed in its technical sense, but in the sense of a home for life, thus implying a gift of a life estate in such premises. Arrants v. Crumley (Tenn.) 48 S. W. 342, 343.

More than one house.

When selected, as provided by Code, § 1237, the homestead would include the whole of the lot which was so selected, even though a second house was subsequently erected on the same provided it did not increase the value of the entire property beyond the amount allowed to be exempted as a homestead. Lubbock v. McMann, 22 Pac 1145, 1147, 82 Cal 224, 16 Am St Rep 108.

Within the meaning of Code, § 1237, a homestead includes only the land actually used and appropriated as the home of a family. Hence it would not include the whole of a lot on which there were two houses, separated by a fence, one of which only was occupied by the claimant; the other having been rented for several years. It is the principal use to which property is put, and not the quantity, which furnishes the test in determining the question whether or not property is subject to exemption as a homestead. Maloney v. Hefer, 17 Pac. 539, 540, 75 Cal. 422, 7 Am. St. Rep. 180.

Noncontiguous land.

A homestead consists of a dwelling house in which the claimant resides and the land on which the same is situated. It may consist of two or more separate parcels in some instances, but these parts or parcels must be so near together that they can be occupied and used for the purpose of a homestead. In re Armstrong's Estate, 22 Pac. 79, 80, 80 Cal. 71.

"Homestead," as used in Const. 1874, art. 9, § 384, providing that a homestead, outside of a city, town, or village, owned and occupied as a residence, should consist of not exceeding 160 acres of land, with the improvements thereon, cannot be construed to include land a mile away from that on which the dwelling is situated, though used in connection with the homestead for supplying wood to the owner's house. McCrosky v. Walker, 18 S. W. 169, 55 Ark. 303.

"Homestead," as used in the Constitution and in Act 1866, exempting the homestead from forced sale, consisting of a quantity of land, together with the dwelling house thereon and its appurtenances, not exceeding a certain sum, should be construed in its ordinary or popular sense; or, in other words, its legal sense is also its popular sense. It represents the dwelling house at which the family resides, with the usual and customary appurtenances, including outbuildings of every kind necessary or convenient for family use, and lands used for the purposes thereof. If situated in the country, it may include a garden or farm; if situated in a city or town, it may include one or more lots or one or more blocks. In either case it is unlimited by extent merely, and need not be in a compact body; on the contrary, it may be intersected by highways, streets, or alleys. Neither is it circumscribed by fences merely. In respect to quantity, by itself considered, it is unlimited, whether in town or country. In short, the only tests are use and value. The former is both abstract and statutory; the latter, statutory only. What ever is used, being either necessary or convenient as a place of residence for the family as contradistinguished from a place of business, constitutes the homestead, subject to the statutory limit as to value. If, however, it is also used as a place of business by the family, which frequently happens, it may not therefore cease to be a homestead, if it would be necessary or convenient for the family use, independent of the business. If what is actually used as a homestead is of greater value than $5,000, the excess is not homestead under the statute, though so in fact. The homestead for which the statute provides is not one in name merely, but one in fact. Gregg v. Bostwick, 33 Cal. 220, 227, 91 Am. Dec. 637.

The Constitution protects to the family in a city, town, or village a homestead consisting of a "lot or lots," etc., provided that the same shall be used for the purpose of a home or as a place to exercise the calling or business of the head of a family. Under this provision the place of the home of the family, as well as the place of the business of the head of the family, although not on contiguous lots, is protected from forced sale so long as used for the purposes contemplated by the Constitution. Shryock v. Latimer, 57 Tex. 674, 677 (citing Miller v. Menke, 56 Tex. 539).

A homestead in a city, town, or village may consist of one or more lots, but there is nothing in the Constitution or laws that forces the homestead character or quality upon a lot or lots adjoining the one on which the residence is situated. Whether such lot or lots are a part of the homestead is a question of fact. Andrews v. Hagadon, 54 Tex. 571, 575.

Under Const. 1876, art. 16, § 51, providing that the homestead in a city shall consist of a lot or lots, not exceeding $5,000 in value, provided the same was used for purposes of a home, a lot used by the owner for raising garden vegetables and fruits for the exclusive use of his family is part of the homestead, though located in a different part of the city from the owner's residence lot. Anderson v. Sessions, 51 S. W. 874, 875, 93 Tex. 279, 77 Am. St. Rep. 873.

A small piece of land on which hay is cut for a cow, kept at the house where a man lives, may be regarded as a part of his homestead, though the land is separate from the house, and a mile distant, providing that the house and the land together do not exceed $500 in value, and the land is used in connection with the house to furnish necessary feed for the cow. Buxton v. Dearborn, 46 N. H. 43, 44.

The chief characteristic or attribute of a homestead is what the word itself implies. It is land where is situate the dwelling of the family. In this connection the court observes: "We do not ordinarily give the name 'homestead' to several distinct and separate tracts of land, although the dwelling house may be situated on one of them, and they may be owned and cultivated by the same person. We do not speak of a homestead in this sense. We rather mean land upon which the dwelling is situated and the adjoining premises, in a reasonably compact form." So it is held that, under a statute giving a homestead exemption of 40 acres of land, the homestead cannot consist of two or more disconnected tracts, containing in the aggregate but 40 acres, although the ownership of one of them may be convenient for the procurement of articles, such as fuel and timber, essential to the enjoyment of the other, upon which the dwelling is situated. It is said, however, that the homestead may consist of two or more adjoining lots, which must constitute but one tract or body in a compact form, and the fact that the tract claimed as a homestead is divided into separate lots by a stream of water, a highway, or a railroad track will not defeat the claim of the owner to hold it as such, if it forms but one body, subject to the easement. Bunker v. Locke, 15 Wis. 635, 638.

The homestead is the home place; the place where the home is; the house and adjoining lands where the head of the family dwells; the land where is situated the dwelling of the owner and his family. If the homestead or place of residence of the debtor and his family is in a town or city, the claim of exemption of rural lands cannot be allowed. It is only the place of the home of the debtor and the family that can be exempt from sales for debts. Oliver v. Snowden, 18 Fla. 823, 834, 43 Am. Rep. 338. Thus the head of a family residing in the state was not entitled to claim as part of his homestead a detached tract of land separated from the homestead by other parcels of land neither owned nor occupied by the owner of the homestead, though such other tract was used and cultivated as a part of the homestead, and both together did not exceed the constitutional limits as to quantity. Brandies v. Perry, 22 South. 268, 270, 39 Fla. 172, 63 Am. St. Rep. 164.

Outbuildings and contiguous land.

The homestead not only includes the dwelling house, but also embraces everything connected therewith which may be used and is used for the more perfect enjoyment of the home, such as outhouses for servants or stock, or property, gardens, yards, or lands to the extent allowed by the statute. Ashton v. Ingle, 20 Kan. 670, 671, 27 Am. Rep. 197.

The word "homestead," as used in Gen. St. Minn. p. 499 (exemption statute), means the place of residence or dwelling of its owner. Hence it is held that a person residing upon one parcel of land and owning a second parcel, upon which he has never dwelt and which corners upon the first, but does not otherwise adjoin it, cannot hold such second parcel exempt as a homestead. Kresin v. Mau, 15 Minn. 116, 118 (Gil. 87, 88).

A homestead is a place of a home; the house and that part of the man's landed property which is about or contiguous to his dwelling house. Tumlinson v. Swinney, 22 Ark. 400, 76 Am. Dec. 432. Two tracts, which corner, and on one of which the owner has his home, may be claimed as a homestead, where together they do not exceed the statutory area and value, and the owner has no other land. Clements v. Crawford County Bank, 40 S. W. 132, 133, 64 Ark. 7, 62 Am. St. Rep. 149.

"Homestead," in its ordinary significance, conveys the idea of the place of residence or dwelling of its owner, and in that sense it seems to have been used in the act of 1858. But it includes, not only the ground upon which the dwelling house rests, but more; and how much more it may include for the purposes of exemption the statute defines by providing that, where the property lies within the limits of an incorporated city, a "homestead consisting of a quantity of land not exceeding in amount one lot" shall not be subject to levy, and the owner has the right of selection, so that, provided he confines himself to a compact quantity not exceeding in amount one lot, he can exercise an option as to the shape of the land which he desires to claim as his homestead. As to the balance beyond what was required for the site of his house, the owner seems to have been left free to allow it to remain uninclosed, unimproved, vacant, and idle, or to devote it to any use which he might choose. Kelly v. Baker, 10 Minn. 154, 156 (Gil. 124, 125).

Thus, where a man purchased 120 acres of land and built a house upon it, and from such time continuously he and his wife made their home thereon, such tract was his homestead, though he afterwards purchased other adjoining tracts, which he inclosed, cultivated, and used for pasture in one body. Western Mortg. & Inv. Co. v. Burford (U. S.) 67 Fed. 860, 867.

Placer claim.

Whatever is used, being either necessary or convenient, as a place of residence for the family, as contradistinguished from a place of business, constitutes the homestead, subject, however, to the statutory limit as to value. If, however, it is also used as a place of business by the family, which frequently happens, it may not therefore cease to be a homestead, if it be necessary or convenient for family use, independent of the business. Mineral lands of the United States, which have been located and used chiefly as a placer mining claim, though also used by the owner as a residence for himself and family, and to some extent for pasturing stock and raising vegetables, may be selected as a homestead; the court remarking, in answer to the objection that a homestead is intended to make a permanent home for the claimants, and that a placer mining claim is taken up for the purpose of washing it away, and thus in some limited time destroying the home, if located upon it, that it is not necessary that a homestead should be a permanent home. It may be sold and abandoned by the claimants. It only remains their home so long as they choose to make it so. Gaylord v. Place, 33 Pac. 484, 486, 98 Cal. 472.

Partial use for business.

A "homestead" being a place of the family, the place where the home is, it would seem unreasonable that premises should be regarded as a homestead unless devoted principally to such residence and home. It would seem unreasonable, for example, that a gas factory should be impressed with the character of the homestead, because the owner resided with his family in the upper story of the building, or that a storeroom should become exempt because the owner occupied the basement in the same way. Where a building was intended for a dwelling house, as well as a hotel, it being the intention of the owner in its construction to make it his residence, and was occupied by him and his family as such residence before it was ever used as a hotel, and the nature and extent of the business did not interfere with its general character as a dwelling house, the keeping of boarders and the accommodation of lodgers and travelers not being inconsistent with the main purpose of taking the land and the erection of the building thereon, it constituted a homestead. Ackley v. Chamberlain, 16 Cal. 181, 183, 76 Am. Dec. 516; Gregg v. Bostwick, 33 Cal. 220, 227, 91 Am. Dec. 637.

A man's homestead must be his place of residence or place where he lives; the place where he usually sleeps and eats, where he surrounds himself with the ordinary insignia of home, and where he may enjoy its immunities. It is not sufficient that the owner of a house uses one of the rooms for ordinary business, as keeping a grocery, sleeps in one of the other rooms, and takes his meals habitually at another place. Philleo v. Smalley, 23 Tex. 498, 502; Western Mortg. & Inv. Co. v. Burford (U. S.) 67 Fed. 860, 867.

Defendant purchased one-third of a town lot, on which was a three-story building, and conducted therein the business of a retail merchant. Subsequently he purchased the other two-thirds of the lot, erected a dwelling house thereon, and used it for residence purposes; the two parts of the lot being separated by a fence. Held, that the one-third used for business purposes was a part of the homestead, if it was used as an appurtenance and convenience of the dwelling house; the court quoting from Galvus v. Cannon, 42 Ark. 504, where it is said: "It is a strange and irrational idea, sometimes advanced, that a man ought to lose his homestead as soon as he attempts to make any part of it helpful in family expenses." Berry v. Melr, 66 S. W. 439, 440, 70 Ark. 129.

Where, upon a lot on which is erected the dwelling of the owner, which is occupied and used by him as a homestead, there is erected a storehouse, which is used for the selling of merchandise, but said lot, together with the dwelling and storehouse, does not exceed the statutory value of a homestead, and the store is used only secondary to the occupation of the lot as a homestead, the erection of said storehouse does not prevent the owner from claiming said lot as a homestead exemption. Marx v. Threet, 30 South. 831, 832, 131 Ala. 340.

Residence of family.

A "homestead" does not exist until actual residence on the premises by the family of a married man. His residence thereon before the residence of his family does not create a homestead. Cary v. Tice, 6 Cal. 625, 630.

In Hoitt v. Webb, 36 N. H. 166, homestead is defined as "the home; the house and attached land where the head of the family dwells." Blackstone defines it as "the fixed residence of the head of the family, with the lands and buildings surrounding the main house." The obvious intent of the homestead act is to secure to every householder or head of a family a home, where the family may be sheltered and live beyond the result of those financial misfortunes which even the most prudent and sagacious cannot always avoid. Thus the word itself indicates that there must be a family. McCanna v. Anderson, 71 N. W. 769, 770, 6 N. D. 482.

The owner of land, on which he lives with his family, does not lose his homestead therein by the fact that his wife has obtained a divorce from him, and has been awarded the custody of the children, where he continues to live on the land, and is not expressly relieved by the decree of divorce from the duty of supporting his children. Biffle v. Pullman, 21 S. W. 450, 451, 114 Mo. 50.

A homestead is the land upon which is situated the dwelling house, residence, or abode of the owner, and where such owner resides with his family. The chief characteristic or attribute of homestead is what the word itself implies: that it is the land where is situated the dwelling of the owner and family. Under a statute exempting a debtor's homestead from execution, it is only the actual home which is exempt, so that a person cannot have two homes at the same time, and such a removal as gains a new home is an abandonment of the old. Jarvais v. Moe, 38 Wis. 440, 444, 446.

The homestead means the home place, the place where the house is. It is the home or house and the adjoining land where the head of the family dwells. It does not extend to other tenements, lots, or farms that are not occupied personally by the owner and his family; nor does it necessarily include all those parcels of land which may adjoin the tract on which the house stands. Hoitt v. Webb, 36 N. H. 158, 165, 166 (citing Woodman v. Lane, 7 N. H. 241, 245).

A homestead necessarily includes the idea of residence. An office, used only as a law office by a single man, is not within the meaning of the law in any just sense of the term "homestead," though a law office may be connected with and used as a part of a dwelling house, and thus by its use be brought within the homestead exemption. Stanley v. Greenwood, 24 Tex. 224, 225, 76 Am. Dec. 106.

A homestead may be described as a mansion house, with adjoining land, the place of residence, the place where a man lives. Under the Texas homestead law it is provided that the homestead shall consist of not more than 200 acres of land, which may be in one or more portions, with improvements thereon. Watkins v. Little (U. S.) 80 Fed. 321, 330, 25 C. C. A. 438.

Temporary absence.

The homestead is the legal home and dwelling place of a person, though he may be temporarily personally absent. Donaldson v. Lamprey, 29 Minn. 18, 21, 11 N. W. 119.

The homestead right is not lost by a temporary removal, with an intention to return and make the premises a home again, accompanied with an actual keeping for that purpose. Keyes v. Bump's Adm'r, 59 Vt. 391, 395, 9 Atl. 598. To retain the home there, and return to it, would not be an abandonment of the home, or a relinquishment of the homestead right. Austin v. Stanley, 46 N. H. 51, 52.

A homestead is characterized by actual occupation as a dwelling place, as a home. A temporary absence from it, the character of a homestead having been impressed by a prior occupation, with an intention to return and occupy it as a homestead, does not operate as a waiver or forfeiture of it. A man can no more have two homes than he can have two domiciles at the same time. During his absence temporarily, occupation may remain with his servants or agents. Boyle v. Shulman, 59 Ala. 566, 569.

HOMESTEAD ENTRY.

As color of title, see "Color of Title."

A homestead entry is the initial step taken in the land office toward acquiring ownership under the homestead law, and precedes the performance on the part of a homestead claimant of the conditions of residence upon and improvement of land which constitute the real consideration for the transfer of the title, and which are conditions precedent to the vesting of title in the homestead settler. McCune v. Essig (U. S.) 118 Fed. 273, 277.

The expression "homestead entry" has an accepted and well-recognized signification in the acts of Congress, in the decision of the courts, and in common parlance. It is an entry under the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers upon the public domain," approved May 20, 1862 (12 Stat. 392, c. 75), and the various amendments and additions thereto. Rev. St. p. 419, c. 5 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1386]. Hartman v. Warren, 76 Fed. 157, 161, 22 C. C. A. 30.

Under the homestead law three things are needed to be done in order to constitute an entry on public land: First, the applicant must make affidavit setting forth the facts which entitle him to make such entry; second, he must make a formal application; and, third, he must make payment of the money required. When these three requisites are complied with, and the certificate of entry is executed and delivered to him, the entry is made; the land is entered. If either one of these three integral parts of an entry is defective—that is, if the affidavit is insufficient in its showing, or if the application itself is informal, or if the payment is not made in actual cash—the register and receiver are justified in rejecting the application. Hastings & D. R. Co. v. Whitney, 10 Sup. Ct. 112, 114, 132 U. S. 357, 33 L. Ed. 363. But the word "entry," as used in an indictment for making false, feigned, illegal, and fictitious entries under the homestead laws of the United States, cannot be limited to its technical meaning, but will be understood in its popular use, and in such use it is common to speak of an entry of and under the homestead law, meaning thereby not merely a preliminary application, but the proceedings as a whole—the complete transfer of title. Dealy v. United States, 14 Sup. Ct. 680, 682, 152 U. S. 539, 38 L. Ed. 545.

It is common to speak of an entry of land under the homestead law, meaning thereby, not a mere preliminary application, but the proceedings as a whole, a complete transfer of title; and it is so used in an indictment under Rev. St. § 5440 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3676], charging a conspiracy to defraud the United States of title to land, said land being land of the United States, "upon an entry." Dealy v. United States, 152 U. S. 539, 544, 14 Sup. Ct. 680, 682, 38 L. Ed. 545.

HOMESTEAD ENTRYMAN.

See "Owner."

In an action relating to public lands, it was contended that under Act Cong. June 3, 1896, relating to the confirmation of homestead entries prematurely commuted, and providing that whenever it shall be made to appear that there was at least six months' actual residence in good faith by the homestead entryman prior to such confirmation, etc., a six months' residence was required after the entry; the argument being that residence by an entryman can only exist after entry, as before that a claimant is not an entryman. It was held, however, that the word "entryman" may quite as naturally have been used merely to describe such person as was entitled to the benefit under the act, and that to be entitled to confirmation thereunder one must have been a homestead entryman; that the requirement was simply that there should have been six months' actual residence by the person who at the time of the confirmation was the homestead entryman. McCord v. Hill, 87 N. W. 481, 483, 111 Wis. 499.

HOMESTEAD ESTATE.

The term "homestead estate," as used in the chapter relating to homesteads, is construed to mean the right to the possession, use, control, income, and rents of the real property held or occupied by such decedent as a homestead at death. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3627.

HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION.

The homestead exemption as it now exists is not only a privilege conferred, but under the Constitution it is an absolute right. It was intended to secure against creditors a home, and to a certain extent the means of support to every family in the state. Eagle v. Smylie, 85 N. W. 1111, 1113, 120 Mich. 612, 86 Am. St. Rep. 562 (citing Riggs v. Sterling, 60 Mich. 643, 27 N. W. 705, 1 Am. St. Rep. 554).

The homestead exemption, under laws allowing the widow and children to remain in possession of the homestead until final distribution of the estate, is not strictly an estate or property passing to those who are under the law entitled to enjoy it, but rather a protection to them in its enjoyment against the demand of creditors. As the creditors could not enforce their demands out of the property constituting the homestead during the life of the debtor, so neither they nor the creditors of any member of the surviving family can enforce them after his death, so long as there is a widow or child remaining in possession and occupying it as a homestead. The homestead right under such statute does not attach in favor of the widow or children unless the estate is insolvent and in debt, or is below the homestead allowance in value; and if it is not it goes to the heirs at once under the law of succession, subject to the widow's right of dower. Knudsen v. Hannberg, 30 Pac. 749, 751, 8 Utah, 203.

HOMESTEAD FARM.

The word "homestead" seems to be an abbreviation of homesteading or home buildings, and by its force includes no more than the actual buildings and so much land immediately contiguous thereto as is necessary to make a home. Bouv. Law Dict.; Webst. Dict. Where used to express more land than this, it is usual to add "farm," and say "homestead farm." Lord v. Simonson (N. J.) 42 Atl. 741, 742.

The words "homestead farm" have not acquired a definite signification in the law. They may have a broader signification than homestead. It does not necessarily consist of a dwelling house and land actually contiguous to it. The land may be detached, and yet be so intimately connected with the dwelling as in effect to constitute a part of it. Taylor v. Mixer, 28 Mass. (11 Pick.) 341, 347.

"Homestead farm," as used in a mortgage describing the mortgaged premises as the "homestead farm" of the mortgagor, will not be construed to include the entire home place of the mortgagor, when the words "homestead farm" are restricted by an additional description showing that certain lands were all that were intended to be included therein. Woodman v. Lane, 7 N. H. 241, 244.

HOMESTEAD FILING.

A homestead filing is a certificate which on its face does not purport to give title, but is an instrument given to designate the person who has claim, or who is granted the right, to the use and occupancy of a tract of public land. The government merely parts with the possession of the land, and not the title. It does not convey color of title, and was not so intended. Woodruff v. Wallace, 41 Pac. 357, 363, 3 Okl. 355.

HOMESTEAD LAW.

The homestead law was called by the Supreme Court of California "a beneficent provision for the protection and maintenance of the wife and children against the neglect and improvidence of the father and husband." Hughes v. Hodges, 102 N. C. 236, 241, 9 S. E. 437, 438.

Homestead laws are enacted as a matter of public policy, in the interest of humanity, that, though a citizen may be overtaken by reverse of fortune, he and those of his household shall not be homeless, without shelter, raiment, and food. The state is concerned that the citizens shall not be divested of means of support and reduced to pauperism. The policy of the law is that families shall not be deprived of shelter and reasonable comforts. Richardson v. Woodward (U. S.) 104 Fed. 873, 875, 44 C. C. A. 235.

HOMESTEAD RIGHT.

The right of homestead is a quality annexed to land whereby an estate is exempt from sale under execution for a debt. Littlejohn v. Egerton, 77 N. C. 379, 384.

The homestead right is a purely personal one, which the owner may at any time waive or renounce. Gilbert v. Provident Life & Trust Co., 95 N. W. 488, 489, 1 Neb. (Unof.) 282 (citing Rector v. Rotton, 3 Neb. 171).

The homestead right is merely an inchoate right, which is not assignable until the homestead is set out and assigned in specific property. It then becomes a vested estate. Lake v. Page, 1 Atl. 113, 114, 63 N. H. 318.

The homestead right of a husband in the estate of his wife is an intangible, inchoate, and conditional interest, and nothing more than expectancy, and does not come within statutory or common-law definition of a freehold. Hamilton v. Village of Detroit, 88 N. W. 419, 421, 85 Minn. 83.

A homestead right is such a freehold estate as will avail the tenant in defense to a right of entry. Swan v. Stephens, 99 Mass. 7, 10.

The homestead right, created by the Illinois statutes in favor of the wife, is the right to live upon, occupy, and enjoy the premises as a home, and is paramount to any title or interest a husband can transfer to a purchaser. Brooks v. Hotchkiss, 4 Ill. App. (4 Bradw.) 175, 177.

The homestead right of a widow is no more than a conditional life estate, a mere right of occupancy. In Norris v. Moulton, 34 N. H. 392, 397, it is described as "a right to use and occupy for life." Cross v. Weare, 62 N. H. 125, 126.

The homestead right is not a fee-simple right, but a right of occupancy for life. It exists in equitable estates, as well as legal estates; but in the former the right is subject to liens acquired before the homestead was established. Fauver v. Fleenor, 81 Tenn. (13 Lea) 622, 625.

The homestead right is an inchoate one, not assignable until the homestead is set out and assigned in specific property, when it becomes a vested estate. It is said to bear analogy to the right of dower, which may be released in the lifetime of the husband, but cannot be set out or assigned before his death. A debtor is not entitled to the homestead exemption in property which he and his wife, subsequent to an attachment, but prior to the execution, have conveyed by deed in common form, with release of dower and homestead, and moved off the premises. Beland v. Goss, 44 Atl. 387, 68 N. H. 257.

The homestead right of the wife in the homestead occupied by herself and husband is a special and particular interest in real estate created by statute. Under the laws of Nebraska the wife succeeds to an estate for life in the homestead of her deceased husband, and she has a freehold estate therein; but this interest does not constitute her an owner of real property within the provisions of the statute limiting the qualifications of voters of a school district to persons who have resided in the district 40 days and who own real property in the district. McLain v. Maricle, 83 N. W. 85, 86, 60 Neb. 353.

The homestead right is the right to hold and use the land free from execution for debt. In other words, the homestead is the land itself, the homestead right is the right of the owner to hold the land exempt from execution, while the homestead exemption is a quality attached to the land by virtue of said right. The homestead right may exist as a pure abstraction, but there can be neither homestead nor exemption without the land. Joyner v. Sugg, 42 S. E. 828, 829, 131 N. C. 324.

HOMESTEAD SCRIP.

See "Soldier's Additional Homestead Scrip."

HOMICIDAL MANIA.

"Homicidal mania" is a term sometimes used to designate moral insanity. Commonwealth v. Mosler, 4 Pa. (4 Barr) 264, 266.

"We are obliged by the force of authority to say to you that there is such a disease known to the law as 'homicidal insanity.' What it is, or in what it consists, no lawyer or judge has ever yet been able to explain with precision. Physicians, especially those having charge of the insane, gradually, it would seem, come to the conclusion that all wicked men are mad, and many of the judges have so far fallen into the same error as to render it possible for any man to escape the penalty which the law affixes to crime. We do not intend to be understood as expressing the opinion that in some instances human beings are not afflicted with a homicidal mania, but we do intend to say that a defense consisting exclusively of this species of insanity has frequently been made the means by which a notorious offender has escaped punishment. What, then, is that form of disease, denominated 'homicidal mania,' which will excuse one for having committed a murder? Chief Justice Gibson calls it 'that unseen ligament pressing on the mind, and drawing it to consequences which it sees, but cannot avoid, and placing it under a coercion which, while its results are clearly perceived, is incapable of resistance'—an irresistible inclination to kill." Commonwealth v. Sayre (Pa.) 5 Wkly. Notes Cas. 424, 425.

HOMICIDE.

See "Excusable Homicide"; "Felonious Homicide"; "Fleeing Homicide"; "Justifiable Homicide"; "Negligent Homicide."

Homicide is the killing of a human being. Sanders v. State, 38 S. E. 841, 842, 113 Ga. 267. See, also, Code, § 4319; Daly v. Stoddard, 66 Ga. 145, 146.

Homicide is the killing of any reasonable creature. State v. Reed, 9 N. C. 454, 455.

Every killing by one man of another is homicide. State v. Peo (Del.) 33 Atl. 257, 258, 9 Houst. 488.

Homicide is the killing of one human being by the act, procurement, or omission of another. Pen. Code, § 179; People v. Hill, 3 N. Y. Supp. 564, 565, 49 Hun. 432; People v. Webster, 68 Hun. 11, 22 N. Y. Supp. 634; People v. Connors, 35 N. Y. Supp. 472, 475, 13 Misc. Rep. 582. The human being whose life is destroyed, of course, must be living; but as a child lives in its mother's womb, and as the destruction of its life while thus living may be held homicide, it is provided by statute that "the person upon whom the homicide is alleged to have been committed must be in existence by actual birth." This evidently means a complete expulsion of the child from the body of the mother alive. Being thus expelled and living, it is then, and not till then, a subject of homicide. Wallace v. State, 10 Tex. App. 255, 270.

Homicide is the destruction of the life of one human being, either by himself, or by the act, procurement, or culpable omission of another. People v. Vanderpool, 1 Mich. N. P. 264, 269.

Homicide, of course, is murder, and it includes all degrees of murder. Murder cannot exist without homicide, because its definition is "the killing of one human being by another." People v. Connors, 35 N. Y. Supp. 472, 475, 13 Misc. Rep. 582.

And. Law Dict. defines the word "homicide" as a generic term, embracing every mode by which the life of one man is taken by the act of another. Where a killing was admitted, an instruction that certain statements of defendant might be considered as strong proof against him in determining whether he committed homicide was harmless; the word "homicide" not necessarily importing a crime. Siberry v. State (Ind.) 47 N. E. 458, 461.

Every homicide at common law is prima facie murder, and the reduction of it to a less offense, after the slaying is proved, generally devolves on the prisoner. State v. Anderson (S. C.) 1 Hill, 327, 339.

Homicide is the mere killing of some person by another and does not of itself constitute murder. It may be murder, or manslaughter, or excusable or justifiable homicide, according to the circumstances. It is not, therefore, the act which constitutes the offense or determines its character, but the quo animo, the disposition or state of mind, with which the act is done. Maher v. People, 10 Mich. 212, 217, 81 Am. Dec. 781.

Grades.

At common law but two grades of felonious homicide existed, murder and manslaughter. Commonwealth v. Sayres (Pa.) 12 Phila. 553, 555.

Homicide is the killing of any human creature, and is of three kinds, justifiable, excusable, and felonious. State v. Lodge (Del.) 33 Atl. 312, 314, 9 Houst. 542; State v. Miller (Del.) 32 Atl. 137, 138, 9 Houst. 564; State v. Jones (Del.) 47 Atl. 1006, 2 Pennewill, 573; Stout v. State, 90 Ind. 1, 10.

Homicide is either murder, manslaughter, excusable homicide, or justifiable homicide. The killing of a human being, unless it is excusable or justifiable, is either murder or manslaughter. Pen. Code, §§ 179, 180, 183, 184, 188; People v. Hill, 3 N. Y. Supp. 564, 565, 49 Hun. 432; People v. Connors, 35 N. Y. Supp. 472, 475, 13 Misc. Rep. 582.

Code Ga. § 4319, defines homicide as being of three kinds, murder, manslaughter, and justifiable homicide. Daly v. Stoddard, 66 Ga. 145, 146.

"Homicide, of which murder is the highest and most criminal species, is of various degrees, according to circumstances. The term in its largest sense is generic, embracing every mode by which the life of one man is taken by the act of another. Homicide may be lawful or unlawful. It is lawful when done in lawful war upon an enemy in battle. It is lawful when done by an officer in the execution of justice upon a criminal pursuant to a proper warrant. It may also be justifiable, and of course lawful, in necessary self-defense." Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295, 303, 52 Am. Dec. 711.

In State v. Smith, 77 N. C. 488, it is said homicide is murder, unless it be attended with extenuating circumstances, which must appear to the satisfaction of the jury; and if the jury are left in doubt on this point it is still murder. State v. Jones, 3 S. E. 507, 510, 98 N. C. 651.

HOMICIDE BY MISADVENTURE.

"Homicide by misadventure" is the accidental killing of another where the slayer is doing a lawful act, unaccompanied by any criminally careless or reckless conduct. State v. Miller (Del.) 32 Atl. 137, 138, 9 Houst. 564; State v. Lodge (Del.) 33 Atl. 312, 314, 9 Houst. 542.

When instructing the jury in a prosecution for murder, the court said that, if the killing was unlawful, it was for the jury to inquire whether the act was intentional or unintentional. If it was unintentional, if the defendant had no purpose in firing his pistol, but it was discharged by him accidentally, and at the time of its discharge the prisoner was engaged in no unlawful act, and if it was not negligently discharged, then the act of killing was a homicide by misadventure, and no crime. United States v. Meagher (U. S.) 37 Fed. 875, 879.

HOMICIDE BY NEGLIGENCE.

"Homicide by negligence," of the second degree, is that which occurs in the performance of an unlawful act. Pen. Code, art. 578. To constitute this offense there must have been an apparent danger of causing the death of the person killed. Article 586. To bring the offense within the definition of homicide by negligence of the first or second degree, there must be no apparent intention to kill, and the homicide must be in consequence of the act done or attempted to be done. Articles 584, 585. Where a husband was shown to have been in a quarrel with a neighbor in the former's dooryard, and was waving a pistol without any apparent intention to shoot, and his wife was shot on coming to the door and urging him to come in, in a prosecution for such killing, an instruction as to homicide by negligence should have been given. Howard v. State, 8 S. W. 929, 930, 25 Tex. App. 686.

HOMICIDE IN SELF-DEFENSE.

Homicide in self-defense is homicide committed in the defense of one's own life or that of his family, relatives, or dependents, within those relations where the law permits the defense of others as of one's self. Pond v. People, 8 Mich. 150, 175.

"Homicide in self-defense" occurs where one is assaulted upon sudden affray, and in defense of his person, where certain and immediate suffering would be the consequence of waiting for the assistance of the law and there is no other probable means of escape, he kills his assailant. State v. Miller (Del.) 32 Atl. 137, 138, 9 Houst. 564.

HOMOEOPATHIC.

See "Homeopathic."

HOMOLOGATION.

"To homologate is to say the like." Viales' Syndics v. Gardenier (La.) 9 Mart. (O. S.) 324, 325.

Homologation is a confirmation, an approval. To homologate is to say the like—"similiter dicere." An order for homologation has never been held as an interlocutory order which is effective without the signature of the court, and hence one not so signed does not constitute an homologation. Hecker v. Brown, 29 South. 232, 234, 104 La. 524.

HOMOPOLAR MACHINE.

A unipolar or homopolar electrical machine is one in which currents are generated continuously in the windings in one direction. It is a machine in which the lines of force are cut in one direction only, as distinguished from alternating current machines, in which the lines of force are cut in alternating opposite directions, and which require the use of commutators to straighten out the current. General Electric Co. v. Winsted Gas Co. (U. S.) 110 Fed. 963.

HONEST.

Defendant, in a prosecution for embezzlement, who had been indicted for a similar crime before, testified as a witness in his own behalf. The prosecuting attorney in his argument to the jury said that honest men were not indicted for embezzlement. Held, that the word "honest," as so used, would impress the jury with the idea, not that the party was unworthy of belief as a witness, but that he was a dishonest person in business transactions. State v. Fourchy, 25 South. 109, 114, 51 La. Ann. 228.

"Honest," as used in an instruction charging that the recent possession of stolen property is evidence which the jury is authorized to consider in determining the guilt of the accused, unless "such possession be accounted for in some honest, satisfactory way," refers to the account—that is, the explanation—of the possession and not to the character of the possession, or the way in which it was acquired; the word being used in the sense of "truthful." The words "honest" and "satisfactory," being used together, both refer to the account or explanation given of the possession. Davidson v. State, 30 S. E. 946, 104 Ga. 761.

HONEST ACCOUNT.

Where, in a prosecution for larceny, the defendant requested an instruction that, if the defendant gave an "honest account" of how he came into possession of a steer which he was charged with stealing, the burden was on the state to show that such account was false, such instruction cannot be construed as meaning that the state would only be required to prove that the defendant's account of his possession was false, since an honest account is a true account, and hence the instruction would have required the state to prove that defendant had not stolen the steer, if he had stated that he did steal it, which is not the law. People v. Beulina, 22 Pac. 396, 397, 81 Cal. 135.

HONEST BELIEF.

"Honest belief," as used in an instruction making the right of plaintiff to cross the tracks of a railway company to depend on his honest belief that it was safe to do so, means such a belief as had a reasonable basis. Redding v. Central R. Co., 54 Atl. 431, 432, 68 N. J. Law, 641.

While the phrase "honest belief" may be found in legal opinions which undertake to define privileged communications, the phrase, without addition or qualification, is not sufficient as a definition of the law of justification for what would otherwise be regarded as slanderous words. A man may inflict an injury upon another without intending any injury, and still be liable for his unjustifiable act, and defendant, in order to clear himself from the imputation of carelessness, should show, not only that he was acting in an honest belief that the story communicated by him was true, but that there were reasonable grounds to induce such belief. Toothaker v. Conant, 40 Atl. 331, 91 Me. 438.

HONEST CLAIM.

"Honest claim," as used in the statement that the compromise of a disputed claim is a good consideration for a compromise, if the claim is an honest one, means "a claim which the claimant does not know is unsubstantial, or such that he does not know facts which show that his claim is a bad one." Miles v. New Zealand Alford Estate Co., 32 Ch. Div. 266, 283.

HONESTY.

"Honesty," as used in an offer by defendant, in a prosecution for carnal knowledge of a girl under age of consent, to prove his reputation for morality, virtue, and honesty of living, means chastity. The word "honesty," from the Latin "honestus," is essentially a word that takes its meaning from its context. Primarily it means suitable, becoming, or decent; meanings that obviously lend themselves to divers contexts. In moneyed transactions it means financial integrity; in affairs of state it means loyalty; in matters of friendship it means steadfastness; and so on. This is an accepted signification. In Webster's Dictionary it is said to mean chastity, modesty. State v. Snover, 43 Atl. 1059, 63 N. J. Law, 382.

"According to the best lexicographers of our language, at least in this country, the words 'truth,' 'veracity,' and 'honesty' are almost synonymous, very nearly the same definitions being given to each of the words. Truth is so nearly allied to honesty and moral soundness, it seems to us, that where a witness has testified in chief that the reputation of a person for truth and veracity is good, it is competent to ask him on cross-examination if he has not heard of a certain matter which would seriously affect the reputation of the party for honesty and moral soundness, as being necessarily inconsistent and at variance with the reputation he has given the party." Wachstetter v. State, 99 Ind. 290, 297, 50 Am. Rep. 94.

HONOR.

See "Office of Honor."

"Honored" means when the bills were paid, and not when they were accepted. Lucas v. Groning, 7 Taunt. 164, 168.

Writing the word "honored" on a bill is a sufficient acceptance. Peterson v. Hubbard, 28 Mich. 197, 199.

In an action on a bill as to which the drawee had written that the bill would meet with due "honor" from him, the court said: "It would have been much better doctrine if it had been originally determined that nothing else should amount to an acceptance than a written acceptance on the bill itself, but it is now too late to revert to that; it having been determined by many cases that an acceptance may be by parol. What is an acceptance but an engagement to pay the bill when due? This, then, is stronger than a parol acceptance, because it is a written engagement"—and held that such promise to honor the bill was an acceptance. Clarke v. Cock, 4 East, 57, 72.

HONORABLE DISCHARGE.

"Honorable discharge," as used in Act March 14, 1895 (P. L. 1895, p. 317), prohibiting the removal of an honorably discharged Union soldier from a position under the government of any city of the state, except for good cause shown and after a hearing upon written charges preferred against the incumbent, cannot be construed to apply to a soldier of the War of the Rebellion who deserted from his regiment, but who afterwards received his discharge under an order of the war department which authorizes such discharge to be issued to him upon his furnishing a substitute. Francis v. City of Newark, 33 Atl. 853, 855, 58 N. J. Law, 522.

HONORABLY BOUND.

The use of the words "honorably bound," in a written proposition from a creditor to a debtor, requesting the execution and delivery to him of a deed of the mortgaged property and the title papers, and to surrender possession, which states that "I shall consider myself honorably bound, if anything can be made out of the property, to give A. the benefit of it," does not show that the creditor does not intend to bind himself legally to do as he agrees. Lake v. Freer, 11 Ill. App. (11 Bradw.) 576, 580.

HONORARIUM.

"Honorarium" is a voluntary donation in consideration of services which admit of no compensation in money; in particular to advocates at law, deemed to practice for honor and influence, and not for fees. It is a lawyer's or counselor's fee. The term is applied mostly to English barristers, advocates, etc., being seldom applied in this country. McDonald v. Napier, 14 Ga. 89, 105; Mooney v. Lloyd (Pa.) 5 Serg. & R. 412, 415.

HONORARY.

The word "honorary," in a resolution of a board of health that the office of engineer to such board shall be "honorary," means without profit, fee, or reward, and in consideration of the honor conferred by holding a position of responsibility and trust. If a recompense was to be received or a payment made, either by salary or otherwise, the office would not be "honorary" alone, but one of emolument also. Haswell v. City of New York, 81 N. Y. 255, 258.

HOOK.

The common and ordinary meaning of the word "hook" is not "steal," nor does its connection with the words "You hooked my geese" give it that signification, so as to make the words actionable per se, as imputing a criminal charge. Hays v. Mitchell (Ind.) 7 Blackf. 117.

HOOP IRON.

The words "all hoop iron," as used in the act of June 30, 1864, subsequently incorporated in section 2504, Rev. St., include not only hoop iron in strips of from 30 to 60 feet in length as it comes from the rolls, in which form it is usually bought and sold, but also all lengths of hoop iron not changed by manufacture into a new and distinct article. Kennedy v. Hartranft (U. S.) 9 Fed. 18, 19.

HOP.

The words "hop cars," when used in reference to the practice of a newsboy to hop street cars while on the street while in motion, for the purpose of selling his papers, means to jump on and off the cars. Such a newsboy is not a passenger. Raming v. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co., 57 S. W. 268, 269, 157 Mo. 477.

HOP ALE.

See "American Hop Ale."

As intoxicating liquors, see "Intoxicating Liquor."

HOP BEER.

Whether the term "hop beer" designates an intoxicating liquor is a question for the jury, in a prosecution for the sale of hop beer. State v. McCafferty, 63 Me. 223, 224.

HOP TEA.

"Hop tea," and "hop tea tonic," as sold in Kansas, are imitations of lager beer, made from malted grain, hops, and water, slightly fermented, and contain a very slight percentage of alcohol. City of Lincoln Center v. Linker, 53 Pac. 787, 788, 7 Kan. App. 282.

HOPE.

The word "hope," as used in a will, in a clause stating that the testator hopes a legatee will make a certain disposition of the fund bequeathed, is a word of intention, which the court will carry into effect, as if the testator had used an absolute word of devise in trust, and the court will direct the donee or first taker to hold as a trustee for those whom the donor intended to benefit. Cockrill v. Armstrong, 31 Ark. 580, 589 (citing 1 Perry, Trusts, c. 4, § 112).

The word "hope," as used in a will wherein testator makes a devise and thereafter expresses a hope as to the disposition of the property or fund, is a precatory word, sufficient to create a trust in the property devised. Curd v. Field, 45 S. W. 92, 103 Ky. 293; Major v. Herndon, 78 Ky. 123, 129; Bohon v. Barrett's Ex'r, 2 Ky. Law Rep. 371, 374.

HOPPER.

A "hopper" is a mechanical device, which, in the progress of the arts, was resorted to, to take the place of the hands, for the purpose of feeding or conducting a substance from one position to another. Carter Mach. Co. v. Hanes, 78 Fed. 346, 348, 24 C. C. A. 128.

HORIZONTAL REDUCTION.

A horizontal reduction is a uniform reduction made by a carrier in transportation charges. Steenerson v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 60 Minn. 461, 472, 62 N. W. 826.

HORN CHAIN.

"A horn chain need not necessarily be made wholly from horn, but may be true to its name, though made partly of hoof, as a contract to furnish gold watches or mahogany furniture would not be construed as to require the whole watch to be gold, or the whole piece of furniture to be mahogany."

Swett v. Shumway, 102 Mass. 365, 368, 3 Am. Rep. 471.

HORS DE SON FEE.

"Hors de son fee" was a plea in use when Norman French was the only language used in the courts of England. It means, literally translated, "out of his fee." In England, at common law, the property of a tenant could never be taken after the disruption of the relation of landlord and tenant, and a removal from the demised premises. In such a case the tenant set up "hors de son fee," which was to say, "I am no longer your tenant, and am, with my goods, out of your land." Mather v. Wood, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 3, 4.

HORSE.

See "Farm Horse"; "Work Horse."

The word "horse," as used in the statutes of 1850, 1851, and 1866, defining the manner of estraying stock, is used in a quasi generic sense to include every description of the male, in contradistinction to the female or mare, whether stallion or gelding. Owens v. State, 38 Tex. 555, 557.

The word "horse" includes animals of both sexes and of all ages. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 5203.

The word "horse," as used in a provision of the Code punishing the felonious taking or stealing of any horse, mule, or ass, includes animals of both sexes and all ages, embraced under such terms. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 6553.

If a person agrees to sell a "horse," there is no ambiguity in the expression, though it is uncertain whether the horse is of one sex or the other. Ashworth v. Mounsey, L. R. 9 Exch. 175, 187.

As beast, cattle, or domestic animal.

See "Beast"; "Cattle"; "Domestic Animal."

As chattel or merchandise.

See "Chattel"; "Merchandise."

Colt.

The term "horse," as distinguished from "colt," means a horse old enough to be worked. Mallory v. Berry, 16 Kan. 293, 295.

"Horse" is the generic name of the equine species. It includes a colt, and therefore an indictment charging that defendant branded a colt with the intent to defraud, etc., is sufficient to show that the branded animal was a horse. Pullen v. State, 11 Tex. App. 89, 91.

There is a general tendency of the courts to hold that, where a statute exempts "horses," young animals of the species and description, that by time and subsequent growth would become such in a popular sense, are within the meaning and import of these terms as used in the statute. Berg v. Baldwin, 18 N. W. 821, 822, 31 Minn. 541.

The term "horses," in a statute exempting two horses from execution, includes a colt, if the owner does not own other horses. Kennedy v. Bradbury, 55 Me. 107, 92 Am. Dec. 572.

Filly.

"Horse," as used in Pasch. Dig. art. 2409, providing for the punishment of any person who steals "any horse, gelding, mare, colt, ass, or mule," cannot be construed in its generic sense, so as to include a filly. Lunsford v. State, 1 Tex. App. 448, 450, 28 Am. Rep. 414.

Gelding.

Under a statute exempting to each family two horses, geldings are exempt. Allison v. Brookshire, 38 Tex. 199, 201.

The term "horse" includes a gelding, and therefore an indictment for selling a horse may be sustained by evidence of the theft of a gelding. State v. Donnegan, 34 Mo. 67; Baldwin v. People, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 304; People v. Butler, 2 Utah, 504, 507; Hooker v. State, 4 Ohio (4 Ham.) 348, 350.

"Horse," as used in Pen. Code, art. 765, which declares that, if any person shall steal "any horse, gelding, mare, colt," etc., he shall be punished, etc., does not include a gelding. Hence an indictment charging the stealing of a horse is not sustained by proof of stealing a gelding. Jordt v. State, 31 Tex. 571, 572, 98 Am. Dec. 550; Banks v. State, 28 Tex. 644; Persons v. State, 3 Tex. App. 240, 242; Johnson v. State, 16 Tex. App. 402, 409; Vallesco v. State, 9 Tex. App. 76, 77; Brisco v. State, 4 Tex. App. 219, 221, 30 Am. Rep. 162.

In an affidavit for continuance in a prosecution for the theft of a gelding, in which it was alleged that defendant expected to prove by certain witnesses that he purchased the horse, for which he is charged of theft, from a certain person who had authority to sell such horse, "horse" should be construed in its generic sense, so as to include a gelding. Trevino v. State, 1 Tex. App. 72, 73.

Webster defines "horse" in two senses: (1) Generically, as the family simply, including all variations of age, sex, and conditions; (2) specially, as indicating the male, in distinction from the female. The term has a third sense, a popular sense, as denoting a castrated male, in distinction from a stallion. In statutes employing the word "horse" as one of the subjects of larceny, it means the unaltered male animal; and hence proof, under an indictment charging the theft of a gelding, which described the animal simply as a horse or colt, constituted a fatal variance. State v. McDonald, 24 Pac. 628, 629, 10 Mont. 21, 24 Am. St. Rep. 25.

In common parlance the terms "horse" and "gelding" are often used interchangeably, so that, under an indictment charging the theft of a gelding, the refusal of an instruction that, if the proof showed the theft of a horse, the jury must acquit, was not error. State v. Ingram, 15 Kan. 14, 19.

The term "horse," in an indictment charging the stealing of a horse in violation of a statute making it criminal to steal any "horse, mare, or gelding," does not include the term "gelding," and therefore proof of the stealing of a gelding will not sustain the conviction. Where, in a statute, a general word is used, and afterwards more special terms, defining an offense, an indictment charging the offense must charge the most special terms, and if the general word is used, though it would embrace the special term, it is bad. Thus, if the descriptive term "horse" alone had been used in the statute, evidence that a gelding had been stolen would have been admissible; but, as the Legislature have thought proper to particularize and define other objects, the conclusion is obvious, from the reasoning employed, that in an indictment under the statute it is necessary to be equally specific. State v. Plunket (Ala.) 2 Stew. 11, 12; State v. Buckles, 26 Kan. 237, 241.

Jack.

The term "horse," in a statute exempting horses from execution, includes a jack-ass. Robinson v. Robertson, 2 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. §§ 253, 254.

In popular acceptance, a jack is not a horse. One who goes to a liveryman and engages a horse to ride would not expect to have a jack brought out for his use, nor would one who advertised the sale of jacks expect that prospective horse buyers would attend. Horses and jacks are different animals, and the word "horse," as used in a shipping contract, in a clause limiting the measure of recovery for each "horse, mule," etc., does not include a jack; the word not being used in a general sense, so as to include all quadrupeds of a similar description. Richardson v. Chicago & A. Ry. Co., 50 S. W. 782, 785, 149 Mo. 311.

Mare.

The term "horse," in a statute making it criminal to willfully kill or destroy any horses, etc., includes a mare, as the term "horse" is nomen generalissimum. State v. Dunnavant (S. C.) 3 Brev. 9, 10, 5 Am. Dec. 530.

"Horse," as used in an Indiana statute providing that any person who "shall suffer his horse, mare, or gelding to be run in what is commonly called a horse race shall be fined," etc., means a stallion; and hence an indictment under the statute, charging that the defendant suffered his mare to be run, etc., is not supported by evidence that the animal run was a "horse." Thrasher v. State (Ind.) 6 Blackf. 460.

"Horse," as used in Comp. Laws, § 2108, making it grand larceny to steal a horse, mare, or gelding, includes both mare and gelding, and under an indictment for stealing two horses a conviction for stealing a gelding and a mare will be sustained. People v. Butler, 2 Utah, 504, 507.

"Horse," as used in a statute relating to the stealing of any horse, is used in its generic sense, and includes a mare. State v. Gooch (Ark.) 29 S. W. 640, 60 Ark. 218 (citing 1 Tayl. Ev. § 290; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 620; Rex v. Aldridge, 4 Cox, Cr. Cas. 143; People v. Monteith, 73 Cal. 7, 14 Pac. 373).

Code, § 4328, declares horse stealing shall be denominated simple larceny, and the term "horse" shall include a mule and ass, and each animal of both sexes, without regard to the alterations which may be made by artificial means. Held, that the word "horse," as used in the statute, excludes mares, if used in an indictment, since Code, § 4249, requires an indictment to designate the nature, character, and sex of the animal, and give some other description by which its identity shall be ascertained. Taylor v. State, 44 Ga. 263, 264.

Horse is used at common law in its generic sense, as including all animals of the horse species, whether male or female; hence an indictment charging the stealing of a horse is sustained by proof of the stealing of a mare. People v. Pico, 62 Cal. 50, 52; Baldwin v. People, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 304; Davis v. State, 4 S. W. 590, 23 Tex. App. 210.

"Horse," as used in Pen. Code, art. 746, providing for the punishment of any person stealing a horse, should be construed in its generic sense, and embraces all animals of the horse species. A mare falls within the designation of horse. Collins v. State, 16 Tex. App. 274, 281.

"Horses," as used in P. L. 80, c. 7, providing that if any person shall in the nighttime maliciously, unlawfully, and willingly kill or destroy any horses, sheep, or other cattle, he shall be guilty of a felony, includes mares as nomen generalissimum. State v. Dunnavant (S. C.) 3 Brev. 9, 10, 5 Am. Dec. 530.

The term "horse," in a bill of sale of one gray horse, one black horse, and one gray mare, does not include a black or bay mare. Miller v. Hahn, 84 N. C. 226, 229.

The word "horse" is a generic term, and includes a mare, and hence the substitution of the word "mare" for "horse" in an amended complaint in an action against a railroad company for killing a horse is not the substitution of a new cause of action. South & N. A. R. Co. v. Bees, 2 South. 752, 753, 82 Ala. 340.

"Horse" is a generic term, and includes ordinarily the different species of the animal, however diversified by age, sex, or artificial means; and hence a finding that two horses were released from a chattel mortgage is a sufficient finding that two mares were released. Troxler v. Buckner, 58 Pac. 691, 692, 126 Cal. 288.

Acts 1870, p. 121, exempts to every family from forced sale, among other things, two horses, etc. Held, that the word "horses" should be construed to include geldings, mares, or mules; all being used for the same purpose. The object of the Legislature in passing the exemption law was manifestly to secure to each family a sure means of support, and the exemption of two horses was evidently intended to protect family animals used to cultivate the soil, and it would not be a liberal construction of the legislative intent to say that the use of the word "horses" in that connection excluded geldings, mares, or mules, since all are used for the purpose. Allison v. Brookshire, 38 Tex. 199, 201.

A mare is none the less a "horse" because spelled "mair" in an indictment for horse stealing. State v. Myers, 85 Tenn. (1 Pickle) 203, 5 S. W. 377.

Mule or ass.

Horses include mules. Davis v. Collier, 13 Ga. 485, 491.

"Horses," as used in a statute requiring a railroad company to erect and maintain fences sufficient to prevent cattle, horses, sheep, and hogs from getting on such railroad, includes mules and asses. "Horses and asses are both defined by lexicographers as 'quadrupeds of the genus equus.'" Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Brubaker, 47 Ill. 462, 463.

The word "horse" is sometimes used as a generic name, including all animals of the horse kind. As used in Acts 1833, c. 10, prohibiting the running of a horse race along a public road, it should be construed to include mules. Goldsmith v. State, 38 Tenn. (1 Head) 154, 156 (citing Bouv. Law Dict. 590).

The term "mares, horses, or geldings," in Act March 15, 1821, providing for the payment of reward to any person who shall pursue and apprehend any person who shall have stolen any mare, horse, or gelding, etc., does not include a mule. Commonwealth v. Davidson, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 172.

Under a statute exempting two horses for each family, mules are exempt, as they are used for the same purposes. Allison v. Brookshire, 38 Tex. 199.

Code, § 530, exempting from execution or attachment, if the debtor at the time is actually engaged in the business of agriculture, one "pair of horses," should be construed to include a team of mules. State v. Cunningham, 6 Neb. 90, 92.

"Horse," as used in a statute exempting from execution a horse used by the head of a family, means any animal of the genus "equus" of "horse," and hence includes an ass. Richardson v. Duncan, 49 Tenn. (2 Heisk.) 220, 222.

Pony.

Though a pony is defined by Webster to be a small horse, the terms "horse" and "pony" are not, in common usage and acceptance, synonymous or convertible terms; but, on the contrary, the term "pony" is used to distinguish from horses in general a peculiar breed having well-known and strongly marked characteristics. Thus a description in a chattel mortgage of one pair of clay-bank horses is not sufficient to describe a yellow pony with some white about him. Golden v. Cockrill, 1 Kan. 259, 266, 81 Am. Dec. 510.

Stallion.

"Horse," as used in Penal Codes, imposing a penalty for stealing any horse, mare, colt, mule, or ass is not used in its comprehensive and general sense but is synonymous with "stallion." Banks v. State, 28 Tex. 644, 648; State v. Plunket (Ala.) 2 Stew. 11, 12; Thrasher v. State (Ind.) 6 Blackf. 460; Turley v. State, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 323, 324; State v. Buckles, 26 Kan. 237, 241.

"Horses," as used in Practice Act, § 219, subd. 3, exempting from execution the farm utensils of the judgment debtor, also two oxen, or two horses, or two mules, and food for them for one month, means horses suitable and intended for the ordinary work conducted on a farm. The purpose of the act was to secure to the judgment debtor the means to prosecute his vocation and earn a support for himself and family. "In securing to a farmer two horses, the Legislature intended by this exemption to enable him to prosecute his business of farming in the ordinary sense of that term, and the horses which are reserved to him must be such as are suitable and intended for that use, and hence a stallion is not exempt." Robert v. Adams, 38 Cal. 383, 99 Am. Dec. 413.

Acts 1833, c. 80, § 1, exempting one farm horse from execution, may include a stud horse, for he may be used for farming purposes. Tipton v. Pickens, 81 Tenn. (1 Swan) 25, 26.

Gen. St. § 3243, par. 3, exempting from execution "two oxen, or two horses, or two mules, and their harness, two cows, and one cart or wagon," does not apply to stallions kept solely for breeding purposes and not used as work horses; the statute only intending such animals as would be useful in assisting the debtor to gain a livelihood by farming, etc., as ordinarily conducted. Krieg v. Fellows, 30 Pac. 994, 995, 21 Nev. 307.

Saddle, bridle, etc.

As used in Hart. Dig. art. 1270, declaring that one horse shall be reserved of every citizen of this republic, free and independent of a writ of fieri facias or other execution, includes the saddle, bridle, martingale, and everything absolutely essential to the beneficial enjoyment of the horse; and it would seem that by fair construction the statute must include, not only the subject itself, but everything absolutely essential to its beneficial enjoyment. Cobbs v. Coleman, 14 Tex. 594, 597.

HORSE BEAST.

A description of an animal maliciously wounded as a "horse beast" in the indictment, is sufficient to include any animal of the horse kind, as distinguished from animal of the cow kind, or any other kind of a beast, within the purview of the act punishing malicious mischief. State v. Pearce, 7 Tenn. (Peck) 66, 68.

HORSE POWER.

The term "horse power," as used in a warranty that an engine was a "thirty horse power engine," means one possessing a certain mechanical force defined by the number 30 horse power, a horse power being a definite amount of mechanical force, and one that is capable of furnishing that amount of power, without being strained or injured in its parts as a machine. Harrington v. Smith, 138 Mass. 92, 96.

HORSE RACING.

As a game, see "Game."
As lottery, see "Lottery."

HORSE RAILROAD.

A city ordinance authorized a railroad chartered to construct a road between such city and another town to lay "horse railroad" tracks within said city; and in construing this ordinance, the court said: "The words 'horse railroad track' * * * must be taken as descriptive of the railroad to be constructed, and not of the motive power to be used. Railways in the streets of cities, laid to conform with the grade of the streets, and properly known as 'street surface railroads,' by common usage had been designated as 'horse railroads,' from the fact that they were for a long time operated exclusively by horses being attached" to the cars. "Horse railroads" and "street surface railroads" have come to be convertible terms. Paterson Ry. Co. v. Grundy, 28 Atl. 788, 791, 51 N. J. Eq. (6 Dick.) 213.

New Orleans City Charter (Acts 1882, pp. 14, 21, No. 20), § 8, providing that the common council should have power to authorize the use of the streets for "horse and steam railroads," cannot be construed as limiting the power with reference to railroads propelled by other motive powers; the terms "horse" and "steam" being mentioned merely because, according to the then existing state of the art, horses and steam were the only means for the propelling of street cars in use, but not being designed as limitations. Buckner v. Hart (U. S.) 52 Fed. 835, 836.

In 1867 a corporation was given by its charter the exclusive horse railway franchise of Omaha for 50 years. Later another company, under a city ordinance consented to by the people in 1884, and authorizing it to do so, undertook to lay a cable tramway on streets occupied by plaintiff, who sought to enjoin defendant, complaining that, as at the date of its grant horse railways were the only street railways known, the term "horse railway" should be regarded as covering all varieties of street railways. Held, that under the rule that all grants and franchises belonging to the public should be construed against the grantees, and for the stronger reason that grants giving monopolies should be so construed, it cannot be held that the term "horse railway" included all forms of street railway connection. Omaha Horse Ry. Co. v. Cable Tramway Co. (U. S.) 30 Fed. 324, 327.

HORSE SPECIES.

"Horse species," as used in an indictment charging the theft of an animal of the horse species and as commonly understood—that is, as defined by the standard lexicographers and as taught in our common schools—includes a stallion, a gelding, a mare, a filly, a colt; in short, a horse, and nothing more nor less. In zoology the horse is a species of the genus "equus," which genus consists of six distinct, though nearly allied, species. The word "species" means a sort, a kind, a class, subordinate to a genus; while the word "genus" signifies a class embracing many species. The expression "an animal of the horse species" would not include any animal belonging to a distinct species, though of the same genus. Smythe v. State, 17 Tex. App. 244, 251.

HORSES.

"Horses," as used by miners, means the formation of a number of seams, and the decomposition of the material included between the seams, of unaffected wall rock. Consolidated Wyoming Gold Min. Co. v. Champion Min. Co. (U. S.) 63 Fed. 540, 544.

HORSESHOE CALK.

A horseshoe calk is a mere bit of iron or steel, not intended for display, but for an obscure use, and adapted to be applied to the shoe of a horse for use in snow, ice, and mud. Rowe v. Blodgett & Clapp Co. (U. S.) 103 Fed. 873, 874.

HORSESHOE DISTRICT.

The phrase "horseshoe district" is as well known in New Jersey as a synonym for unfair political methods as is the word "gerrymander" throughout the United States. Morris v. Wrightson, 28 Atl. 56, 63, 56 N. J. Law, 126, 22 L. R. A. 548.

HOSIERY.

The term "hosiery," as used in the tariff act of 1832, was a word of more general signification than "stockings," which was the word used in the act of 1816, and which was dropped in the act of 1828, when the word "hosiery" was introduced. It signifies a class or description of goods. Hall v. Hoyt (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 226, 227.

HOSPES.

The word "hospes," among the Romans, was a term to designate the owner of a mansion having on either side of it apartments for the entertainment of strangers. It was also used to designate the guest received by him. Cromwell v. Stephens (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 15, 17.

HOSPITAL.

See "Permanent Hospital."

As charity, see "Charity"; "Public Charity."

The primary meaning of the word "hospital" was an inn where guests were entertained for compensation. Now the word is more commonly applied to a building founded from charity, where the sick and disabled may be treated solely at their own expense, or at the expense of a corporation which receives only indigent patients, and is sometimes known as an "almshouse," and in either case it becomes a charitable institution. In re Curtiss, 7 N. Y. Supp. 207, 208, 1 Con. Sur. 471.

"Hospitals," as used in Hill's Code Wash. § 1022, exempting all hospitals for the care of sick from taxation, will not be held to include the land upon which the hospitals are situated, but the buildings alone. Thurston County v. Sisters of Charity of House of Providence, 44 Pac. 252, 253, 14 Wash. 204.

Pesthouse.

"Hospitals," as used in an ordinance providing for the establishment of hospitals, includes pesthouses. Clayton v. City of Henderson, 44 S. W. 667, 668, 103 Ky. 228.

State prison.

In Act March 21, 1895 (Laws 1895, c. 54), providing that any person who shall become a pauper or public charge while at any hospital shall be chargeable for support to the county in which he resided before entering such institution, "hospital" cannot be construed to include the state prison. New Hampshire Asylum for Insane v. Belknap County, 44 Atl. 928, 69 N. H. 174.

HOSPITIUM.

Among the Romans, on either side of the spacious mansions of the wealthy patricians, were small apartments, known as the "hospitium," or place for the entertainment of strangers. Cromwell v. Stephens (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 15, 17.

HOST.

"To host" was to put up at an inn. Cromwell v. Stephens (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 15, 20.

HOSTEL.

"Hostel" was a word applied to signify large houses in France, built upon a scale sufficiently extensive to enable their owners to discharge the duties of hospitality. Cromwell v. Stephens (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 15, 17.

HOSTILE POSSESSION.

"Hostile possession," when applied to the possession of an occupant of real estate holding adversely, is not to be construed as meaning ill will, or that he is in any sense an enemy of the person holding the legal title, but means an occupant who holds and is in possession as owner, and therefore against all other claimants of the land. Ballard v. Hansen, 51 N. W. 295, 297, 33 Neb. 861; Hofline v. Ewing, 84 N. W. 93, 94, 60 Neb. 729; Griffin v. Mulley, 31 Atl. 664, 167 Pa. 339.

HOSTLER.

"Hostler" was the title of the officer in a monastery charged with the entertainment of guests. It was also the Norman word for innkeeper, and was in use until about the time of Elizabeth. When the keeping of horses at livery became a distinct occupation, it was the term for the keeper of a livery stable, and afterwards of the groom who had charge of the stables of an inn. Cromwell v. Stephens (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 15, 20.

At a roundhouse a "hostler" is a man whose duty it is to care for locomotives at the roundhouse and to run them in and out of it. Chicago & W. I. R. Co. v. Massig, 50 Ill. App. 666, 667.

In railroad parlance a "hostler" is he who receives engines from the regular engineers as they come from the road, and takes charge of them in the shops or roundhouse, and has them cleaned and ready for departure on the road again when they are wanted. Chicago & St. L. R. Co. v. Ashling, 34 Ill. App. 99, 105.

A railway employé, whose duty it is to move engines when sent to the roundhouse and to take an engine to the cinder or ash pit preparatory to cleaning it, is called a "hostler." Grannis v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co., 46 N. W. 1067, 81 Iowa, 444.

HOTCHPOT.

By "hotchpot" is meant that each child is to inherit at the death of the parent an equal proportion of the estate. McLure v. Steele (S. C.) 14 Rich. Eq. 105, 116. But that part of the estate which has been advanced must be estimated at what it is worth at the death. McCaw v. Blewit (S. C.) 2 McCord, Eq. 90, 104.

"By the English statute of distributions (St. 22 & 23 Car. II, c. 12) the division by hotchpot prevails only by virtue of the express reservation of York and London. As a common-law proceeding it was only known in England in partition between sisters, coparceners, one of whom had received gifts of estates in frank-marriage. In such case, if land descends from the same ancestor to her and her sisters in fee simple, she shall have no share in them, unless she will agree to divide lands so given in frank-marriage with the rest of the lands descending. Law v. Smith, 2 R. I. 244, 249 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 189; Co. Litt. §§ 266-273).

Hotchpot is the blending and mixing of property belonging to different persons in order to divide it equally. It does not mean that property or money advanced by a parent shall, on the distribution of the estate of the parent in kind or specie, be thrown in with the property which has descended, but that it is to be estimated and charged against the party according to its value at the time the advancement was made. Ray v. Loper, 65 Mo. 470, 472 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 190).

"Hotchpot," as used in a statute requiring advancements to be "brought into hotchpot" with the whole real and personal estate descended, and that such party returning such advancements as aforesaid shall thereupon be entitled to his proper portion, etc., does not mean "that the party should relinquish his interest in that particular property, but it is intended to be brought in for the purpose of being taken into consideration in making a distribution of the entire estate, in order to ascertain whether it amounts to his full share of the estate. His title of the property is derived from the gift, and cannot be affected by the distribution, and consequently its value must be estimated at the time when the gift was made." Jackson v. Jackson, 28 Miss. (6 Cushm.) 674, 680, 64 Am. Dec. 114.

It appears to have been settled in England, soon after the passage of St. 22 & 23 Car. II, that the child who had been advanced was not required to bring his advancement into hotchpot, except in the case of a total intestacy. The rule established by 1 Rev. St. p. 754, §§ 23-26, relating to title to real property by descent, is that, if any child of an intestate shall have had advancements, the amount thereof shall be estimated in the division and distribution of the real and personal estate of the intestate. Within the meaning of this law and rule a man who dies leaving a will is not an intestate, although by his will he bequeaths only his personal estate, leaving his real estate undisposed of. Thompson v. Carmichael (N. Y.) 3 Sandf. Ch. 120, 127, 129.

HOTEL

See "Family Hotel"; "Regular Hotels."
Hotel keeping, as business, see "Business."

A hotel is a place where the proprietor makes it his business to furnish food or lodging, or both, to travelers. Bunn v. Johnson, 77 Mo. App. 596, 599.

A hotel is a house for entertaining travelers; an inn or public house of the better class. Fruchey v. Eagleson, 43 N. E. 146, 147, 15 Ind. App. 88; City of St. Louis v. Siegrist, 46 Mo. 493, 595; People v. Jones (N. Y.) 54 Barb. 311, 316; Bonner v. Welborn, 7 Ga. 296, 334, 337.

A hotel is a place for the general entertainment of all travelers and strangers who apply, paying suitable compensation. Comer v. State, 10 S. W. 106, 107, 26 Tex. App. 509.

A hotel is a place where every well-behaved stranger or traveler, who is willing to pay reasonable rates for accommodation, is entitled to receive food, drink, and lodging. In re Application for License (Pa.) 19 Wkly.

Notes Cas. 359, 360; In re Beaver County Licenses (Pa.) 3 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 64, 66.

The words "regular hotels and eating houses," in Rev. St. § 8092, providing that all places where intoxicating liquors are sold shall be closed on Sunday, but that the term "place," in reference to regular hotels and eating houses, shall be construed to mean a room or part of the room where such liquors are usually exposed to sale, designate places the principal, and not the subordinate, business of which is the carrying on of a hotel or eating house. Lederer v. State (Ohio) 3 O. C. D. 303, 304.

A hotel is none the less a hotel from the fact that it was not immediately on a highway, or that the grounds on which it stood were inclosed and the gates closed at night. Its location, and the extent of the ground surrounding it, and the manner in which those grounds were improved and reserved for the exclusive use and enjoyment of those who patronized it, doubtless made it more attractive to those who chose to make a transient resort of it, but did not convert it into a mere boarding house. A hotel is none the less one because in some respects it may be conducted differently or have more attractions than other public hotels, so long as it is held out to the public as a place for the entertainment of all transient persons who may have occasion to patronize it. Modes of entertainment alter with the fashion of the age, and to preserve a clear definition is not easy. "It is not wayfarers or travelers from a distance that at the present day give character to an inn; the point being rather that people resort to the house habitually, no matter whence coming or where going, for transient lodging and entertainment." Fay v. Pacific Imp. Co., 26 Pac. 1099, 1100, 93 Cal. 253 (citing Schouler, Bailm. p. 249).

An inn or hotel is a house where all who conduct themselves properly and who are able and ready to pay for their entertainment are received, if there is accommodation for them, or who, without any stipulated engagement as to the duration of their stay or as to the rate of compensation, are, while there, supplied at a reasonable charge with their meals, their lodging, and such services and attention as are necessarily incident to the use of the house as a temporary abode. Cromwell v. Stephens (N. Y.) 3 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 26. This is the same definition applied to the term "hotel" by the liquor tax law. In re Brewster, 80 N. Y. Supp. 666, 667, 39 Misc. Rep. 689.

A building containing ten rooms, separated by thin partitions, two of which rooms were well furnished, while five contained single beds and mattresses only, the remainder being unfurnished, was not a "hotel," within Laws 1896, c. 112, § 31, subd. 2, regulating the liquor traffic and defining a hotel as a place in which there are at least ten bedrooms for the accommodation of guests. In re Place, 50 N. Y. Supp. 640, 645, 27 App. Div. 561.

Where the occupants of a building fitted up one side of a room with several stalls, where oysters, cooked and raw, pies, cheese, etc., were served to persons who might call for the same, mostly to teamsters and others who were stopping in the village for a short time, the building is used for "hotel purposes," within the restriction of a deed prohibiting the use for such purposes. Stevens v. Pillsbury, 57 Vt. 205, 210, 52 Am. Rep. 121.

The word "hotel," in France, has long ceased to be confined to its original signification, and has become a word of a more extensive meaning. It is the term for the mansion of a prince, nobleman, minister of state, or of a person of distinction of celebrity. Cromwell v. Stephens (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 15, 19.

Boarding house distinguished.

"Hotel," "tavern," and "inn," are properly applied to places kept for the entertainment of travelers and casual guests, as distinguished from a boarding house, which is kept principally for the residence of permanent boarders. Martin v. State Ins. Co., 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 485, 492, 43 Am. Rep. 397.

The word "hotel," "inn," or "tavern," implies a place for the entertainment of strangers and travelers. It does not mean a boarding house. To answer the requirements of the law relating to the granting of licenses for the sale of liquor, such places should be located with reference to their object; in the country on a regularly traveled public road, and not in a secluded spot, difficult of access, and in boroughs, towns, and villages in such convenient place, with reference to railroads or other roads and places of business, as will be most convenient to those desiring to patronize them. In re Liquor Licenses (Pa.) 4 Montg. Co. Rep'r, 77, 79.

European plan hotel.

The term "hotel," within the meaning of a statute in reference to the liability of the proprietor of a hotel for the loss of property of his guests, includes the class of hotels commonly known as "European." Bernstein v. Sweeny, 33 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Jones & S.) 271, 274.

A European plan hotel is a hotel in which rooms and lodging are furnished, without board. Vonderbank v. Schmidt, 10 South. 616, 617, 44 La. Ann. 264; 15 L. R. A. 462, 464, 32 Am. St. Rep. 336.

Inn synonyms.

See "Inn."

Lodging house.

The term "inn," "tavern," or "hotel," does not properly designate a mere lodging house, although the keeper thereof may send out and procure cooked food for his guests. A house which does not contain the means of preparing food for the table in the ordinary way has not the necessary accommodation to entertain travelers, and is not an inn within the meaning of Act 1857 in reference to the licensing of innkeepers. Kelly v. Excise Com'rs of New York (N. Y.) 54 How. Prac. 327, 331.

"Hotel," as used in a city ordinance fixing the rate at which hotels should be charged for the water furnished them by a water company, cannot be construed to include a large structure, eight stories in height, those above the basement being exclusively used as lodgings for single persons at a fixed rate per night; there being no arrangements for board or cooking for guests, nor any bar or restaurant belonging to or connected with the occupation of the building. Allison, one of the earliest of American lexicographers defines a hotel to be "an inn of a high grade; a respectable tavern." Webster calls it "a house for entertaining strangers or travelers," and says that it was formerly a house for genteel strangers or lodgers, but that the name is now given to any inn. Worcester's definition is: "A superior lodging house with the accommodations of an inn; a public house; a genteel inn; an inn." And in the last edition of Webster (1864) there is given an addition to the previous general definition: "An inn; a public house, especially one of some style or pretention." The word is of French origin, being derived from "hostel," and more remotely from the Latin word "hospes," a word having a double signification, as it was used by the Romans to denote a stranger who lodges at the house of another, as well as the master of a house who entertains travelers or guests. A hotel in this country is what in France was known as a "hotellerie," and in England as a "common inn," of that superior class usually found in cities and large towns. A common inn is defined by Bacon to be "a house for the entertainment of travelers and passengers, in which lodging and necessities are provided for them and their horses and attendants"; and an inn is a house where all who conduct themselves properly and who are able and ready to pay for their entertainment are received, if there is accommodation for them, and who, without any stipulated engagement as to the duration of their stay or as to the rate of compensation, are while there supplied at a reasonable charge with their meals, their lodging, and such services and attention as are necessarily incident to the use of the house as a temporary home. This is exactly what is understood in this country by a hotel. In one of the earliest adjudicated cases (Thompson v. Lacy, 3 Barn. & Ald. 283) Justice Bayley declares a hotel to be a house where a traveler is furnished with everything which he has occasion for while on his way, and in the same case it is said to be a house the owner of which holds out that he will receive all travelers and sojourners who are willing to pay a price adequate to the sort of accommodation provided, and who come in a situation in which they are fit to be received. A distinction was soon drawn between inns and lodging houses; it being held in numerous cases that a lodging house keeper must make a contract with every man that comes, while an innkeeper was required to furnish accommodation to any guest who should present himself. "The innkeeper," said Coleridge, J., in Rex v. Ivens, 7 Car. & P. 213, "is not to select his guests. He has no right to say to one, 'You shall come into my inn,' and to another, 'You shall not,' as every one coming and conducting himself in a proper manner has a right to be received; inn-keepers being a kind of public servants, having the privilege of entertaining travelers, and of supplying them with what they want." In Carpenter v. Taylor (N. Y.) 1 Hilt. 193, 195, it was held that a restaurant, to which a person resorts for the temporary purpose of obtaining a meal, is not an inn. On the contrary, as the customs of society changed and the modes of living were altered, the law as established under different circumstances must yield and be accommodated to such changes. Mere eating houses cannot now be considered as inns. They are wanting in some of the requisites necessary to constitute them inns, as no lodging places are provided for travelers; and, though the person may carry on in another part of his premises the business of an innkeeper, it does not follow that the liability for that part of the premises is to be extended to the whole. Cromwell v. Stephens (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 15, 17, 23, 3 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 26, 36.

HOTEL BILL.

A contract guarantying the payment of a hotel bill includes a bill for board and lodging, but not for billiards, cigars, and liquors. Patterson v. Gage, 16 Pac. 560, 561, 11 Colo. 50.

HOTEL GARNI.

A "hotel garni" was an establishment common in Paris, in which furnished apartments were let by the day, week, or month. Cromwell v. Stephens (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 15, 20.

HOTEL KEEPER.

As a merchant, see "Merchant."

The keeper of a private lodging house, who also furnishes her guests with provisions at a profit, is subject to the bankrupt laws as a "hotel keeper," though the provisions were set apart as the separate property of each guest. Smith v. Scott, 9 Bing. 14.

A hotel keeper is a person who receives and entertains as guests those who choose to visit his house, and it would not include one who merely keeps a restaurant where meals are furnished. People v. Jones (N. Y.) 54 Barb. 311, 316.

HOTELLERIES.

"Hotelleries" is a name which has been in use in France several centuries, and is still in use to some extent as a common term for inns of the better class. Cromwell v. Stephens (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 15, 19.

HOTTEST.

While it cannot be said that the word "hottest," as used in its ordinary sense, is vulgar per se, yet in its colloquial or vernacular meaning, as applied to a woman, it is obviously different. The word "hot," as defined in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, means, among other things, "lustful, lewd, lecherous." As used in the song "Dora Dean," "She's the hottest thing you ever seen," it is used in its superlative sense, and is applied to a female. It is difficult to escape the conclusion that the word "hottest," as used in the song, has an immoral signification. Broder v. Zeno Mauvais Music Co. (U. S.) 88 Fed. 74, 79.

"The word 'house' clearly means a building in the ordinary sense of the word, and such building or house is not necessarily the habitation of man or beast." Ford v. State, 14 N. E. 241, 244, 112 Ind. 373.

A building divided into floors and apartments, with four walls, a roof, a door, and chimneys, would be considered, in ordinary parlance between man and man, as a "house." The word "house" does not necessarily mean a dwelling house. Daniel v. Coulsting, 7 Man. & G. 125.

The term "house," as used in an indictment for arson, imports a dwelling house. Commonwealth v. Elliston, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 216, 20 S. W. 214.

Within the meaning of Code, § 4608, which declares that every person who shall willfully or maliciously burn or set fire to any house, barn, stable, or other valuable building, etc., shall be imprisoned, etc., "house" is not limited in its meaning to dwelling house, or other house within the curtilage, but is used in a far more general sense as meaning any erection of value which might fall within the general description of a "house." Hence it would include a barrel house attached to a cooperage establishment. Pike v. State, 76 Tenn. (8 Lea) 577, 578.

The word "house," as used in an indictment charging that defendant "a certain building, to wit, a house, of one C., did set fire to and burn," does not include a dwelling house. Commonwealth v. Smith, 151 Mass. 491, 24 N. E. 677.

A building erected, not for habitation, but for workmen to take their meals and dry their clothes in, which has four walls, a roof, a door, but no window, but in which a person slept with the knowledge, but without the permission, of the owner, is not a "house," the setting fire to which is a felony, within St. 1 Vict. c. 89, § 3. A cottage, however mean or wretched, used as the habitation of man, is a house, within the meaning of the statute. Reg. v. England, 1 Car. & K. 533, 535.

A "house," as used in the definition of arson, is any building, edifice, or structure inclosed with walls and covered, whatever may be the materials used for building. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 757; Killman v. State, 2 Tex. App. 222, 225, 28 Am. Rep. 432; Smith v. State, 5 S. W. 219, 220, 23 Tex. App. 357, 59 Am. Rep. 773.

The word "house," in a statute declaring that the offense of burglary may be committed in any dwelling house or in any other house or building, is to be construed to mean a house, without regard to its inhabitancy. State v. Dan, 4 Pac. 336, 18 Nev. 345.

"House," as used in St. 1858, p. 206, declaring the crime of burglary to be the breaking into any house, room, apartment, or tenement, etc., means any structure which has walls on all sides, and is covered by a roof, regardless of the fact whether it is at the time, or ever has been, inhabited by members of the human family. People v. Stickman, 34 Cal. 242, 245.

"House," as used in an indictment charging the felonious breaking "of the house of P.," means an edifice for the habitation of men; a dwelling house, or abode for the human species. It does not mean a wood-house, henhouse, ashhouse, hoghouse, corn-house, warehouse, etc. Thompson v. People (N. Y.) 3 Parker, Cr. R. 208, 214; Palmer v. State, 47 Tenn. (7 Cold.) 82, 86.

A "house," within the meaning of the chapter defining and punishing burglary, is any building or structure erected for public or private use, whether the property of the United States, of this state, or of any public or private corporation or association, or of any individual, and of whatever material it may be constructed. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 843.

The term "house" prima facie means a dwelling house. It means a house intended for human habitation, as used in St. 51 Geo. III, fixing a charge upon all houses, within a certain parish, to be paid by the occupiers of such houses. Surman v. Darley, 14 Mees. & W. 181, 183.

Gen. St. p. 267, § 137, forbidding the keeping of a disorderly house or a house where lewd and dissolute persons resort, does not mean a dwelling house only, but means any building kept by a person in which the disorderly conduct forbidden by the statute is permitted. State v. Powers, 36 Conn. 77, 79.

A warrant attached to a complaint directed the officer to enter the "house and premises mentioned in the above complaint," and the language of the complaint was, "the house and premises of D., of G., in the county of H." Held, the word "house" should be construed as meaning the dwelling house of D., and to refer to such house occupied by him as a dwelling, and not to one owned by him in addition to his dwelling, and hence the warrant was not defective for uncertainty. Wright v. Oressel, 3 N. E. 6, 7, 140 Mass. 147.

The word "house," as used in a complaint under the act for the suppression of intemperance, alleging that certain intoxicating liquors were kept in a certain house occupied and kept by a certain person on a certain lot, is not equivalent to "dwelling house," as used in the statute relating to proceedings when the liquors are kept in a dwelling house or a house in which a family resides. Sanders v. State, 2 Iowa (2 Clarke) 230, 277.

Apartment, office, or room.

"House," as used in Comp. Laws, § 1537, giving landlords a lien on the property of their tenants which remains in the house rented, includes a separate apartment in the building which is occupied by a tenant, and is not limited to a separate building. Wolcott v. Ashenfelter, 23 Pac. 780, 5 N. M. 442, 8 L. R. A. 691.

"House," ex vi termini, at least, embraces the land on which the building is erected. A house and apartments within it are not the same. "House" may include the subjacent land, but apartments within it may not. McMillan v. Solomon, 42 Ala. 356, 358, 94 Am. Dec. 654.

"House," as used in a statute prohibiting the keeping of a disorderly house, means any building or part of a building, or even a single room, used for disorderly purposes. The common law takes no notice of an offense of keeping a disorderly tenement, but part of a house used for such purposes constitutes a disorderly house within the statute. Commonwealth v. Bulman, 118 Mass. 456, 457, 19 Am. Rep. 469; State v. Garity, 46 N. H. 61, 32.

A house, within the meaning of the statute prohibiting the keeping of a house which the occupant permits to be used as a public resort for the playing of any unlawful game, includes a single room in a house which is used for such purpose, even though there is no evidence of the occupant paying rent. Commonwealth v. Hyde, Thatcher, Cr. Cas. 19, 22.

A violation of Code, art. 30, § 56, providing that no person shall keep any gaming table, or any house, vessel, or place for the purpose of gaming, is shown by an indictment that defendant kept a certain place, to wit, a certain room in his hotel, for gambling. Wheeler v. State, 42 Md. 563, 567.

In Weiss v. State, 16 Tex. App. 431, 432, it was held that "room" and "house," as used in an indictment for gaming, were not synonymous terms. Hodges v. State, 72 S. W. 179, 180, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 444.

"House," as used in Pen. Code 1895, art. 704, defining burglary as being the entry of a house by force, etc., includes a sheriff's office. Bigham v. State, 20 S. W. 577, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 244.

Pen. Code, art. 709, relating to the offense of breaking a house to commit a crime therein, and defining "house" to be any building or structure erected for public or private use, of whatever material it may be constructed, should be construed to include an office, room, or apartment in one corner of a hardware room, made of pickets four feet high, one inch square, and three inches apart, on top of which there was a plank, where the account books, money, etc., of a lumber company were kept, and where the business of such company was transacted by their agent or clerk, and used separately from any other portion of the hardware house for a particular business, in fact and commonly understood to be a room in such hardware house. Anderson v. State, 17 Tex. App. 305, 310.

In an ordinance declaring that any person offering for sale, etc., any goods, wares, or merchandise along or upon the public streets, alleys, or other public places of the town, or from house to house, shall be deemed a peddler, "house" will include an office, so that an offer of goods for sale from one office to another would constitute a person a peddler. Town of Spencer v. Whiting, 28 N. W. 13, 14, 68 Iowa, 678.

Boat.

A statute prohibited the keeping of any house of ill fame or any erection or building resorted to for the purposes of prostitution and lewdness. Held, that it was not necessary that an erection should have a fixed position, in order to be a "house," but the word included a houseboat moored in a river, constructed for the purpose of floating from point to point on the Mississippi and using it as a place of resort for prostitution and lewdness. State v. Mullen, 35 Iowa, 199.

The term "house," in the statute in reference to gambling houses, includes a boat equipped to carry on a gambling business. State v. Metcalf, 65 Mo. App. 681, 685.

In boundaries.

When a house is referred to in the field notes of a surveyor, it constitutes a monument, the same as a witness tree. Wise v. Burton, 14 Pac. 678, 681, 73 Cal. 166.

A deed describing the boundary line of the premises conveyed as commencing a certain number of feet east of the grantee's "house" cannot be construed to mean an imaginary plane extending perpendicularly from the extreme outer edge of the overhanging projection to the ground. The word "house" may have various meanings, dependent upon or made evident by the purpose of the parties and the subject-matter of the contract. When it is the subject-matter of a deed or other contract, it may be found to include other buildings not popularly known as houses, or a garden, an orchard, etc. (Marston v. Stickney, 58 N. H. 609); or a stable (Bridge v. Bridge, 146 Mass. 373, 377, 15 N. E. 899). It may even exclude the approaches of steps leading up to it (United States v. Mueller, 113 U. S. 153, 5 Sup. Ct. 380, 28 L. Ed. 946). Kendall v. Green, 42 Atl. 178, 179, 67 N. H. 557.

Building synonymous.

See "Building (In Criminal Law)."

Chicken house.

A stationary structure eight feet tall, covered with shingles and inclosed with wire, erected for the purpose of the safe-keeping of birds and fowls, is a "house" within the Georgia Code, defining the offense of "larceny from the house." Williams v. State, 32 S. E. 129, 105 Ga. 814, 70 Am. St. Rep. 82.

"House," as used in Pen. Code, § 178, providing that "larceny from the house is the breaking or entering any house with the intent to steal, or, after breaking or entering said house, stealing therefrom anything of value," includes a permanent building or fixture erected on a place for the safety of chickens, and called a "chicken house," and stealing chickens therefrom is larceny from the house. Gardner v. State, 31 S. E. 577, 578, 105 Ga. 662.

Whether a conviction upon an indictment for simple larceny can or cannot be sustained on evidence showing that the accused committed the offense of larceny from a house, such conviction may be sustained where the evidence warranted a finding that the structure from which the stolen goods were taken and carried away was a chicken coop and not a house. Willis v. State, 102 Ga. 572, 28 S. E. 917.

Cornercrib or oat bin.

A cornercrib, used solely for storing corn and feed, is a "house," within the statute relating to burglary. Barber v. State (Tex.) 69 S. W. 515, 516.

A crib in which corn and fodder are kept is undoubtedly such a structure as comes within the provisions of a statute punishing the burning of a house or building. Brown v. State, 52 Ala. 345, 347.

A portable box, 4 feet high on one side and 18 inches on the opposite side, 14 feet long, and 6 feet wide, used to hold oats, is not a "house," within the contemplation of the statute relating to burglary. Williamson v. State, 44 S. W. 1107, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 60, 73 Am. St. Rep. 901.

County jail.

1 Rev. Code, p. 587, c. 160, § 4, prohibiting the burning, either in the day or night, of any house or houses whatsoever other than those previously enumerated in the statute, should be construed to include the common jail and county prison of a county; they not being especially enumerated. Stevens v. Commonwealth (Va.) 4 Leigh, 683, 684.

Curtilage or land included.

A bequest of a house passes everything which was occupied by testator with it as proper and convenient for the occupation of the house, though the word "appurtenances" be not added. The distinction between "house" and "messuage" is too subtle to be relied upon, for whatever will pass by the one will equally pass by the other. Clements v. Collins, 2 Term R. 498, 502; Gibson v. Brockway, 8 N. H. 465, 470, 31 Am. Dec. 200; Board of Education of City of Topeka v. State, 67 Pac. 559, 561, 64 Kan. 6.

A devise of a house includes the city lot upon which the house stands. It would also pass the orchard, garden, and curtilage. Common Council of City of Richmond v. State, 5 Ind. 334, 337; Rogers v. Smith, 4 Pa. 93, 101; Bennet v. Bittle (Pa.) 4 Rawle, 339, 342 (citing 2 Ch. Cas. 27; Kielway, 57); Elliot v. Carter, 29 Mass. (12 Pick.) 436, 440; Brown v. Turner, 20 S. W. 660, 661, 113 Mo. 27; Fiske v. Wetmore, 10 Atl. 627, 628, 15 R. I. 354; Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 186, 196; Riddle v. Littlefield, 53 N. H. 503, 508, 16 Am. Rep. 388.

It is a general rule of construction that the grant of a house gives a freehold in the land under it as incident thereto and necessary to its enjoyment. Bacon v. Bowdoin, 39 Mass. (22 Pick.) 401; Id., 43 Mass. (2 Metc.) 591; Inhabitants of Cheshire v. Inhabitants of Shutesbury, 48 Mass. (7 Metc.) 566. And the same principle applies to a reservation or exception in a deed. Webster v. Potter, 105 Mass. 414, 415 (citing Esty v. Currier, 98 Mass. 500).

A house has been construed to mean both the structure and the land on which it stands. Cassiano v. Ursuline Academy, 64 Tex. 673, 675 (quoting Gerke v. Purcell, 25 Ohio St. 229; Mullen v. Erie County Com'rs, 85 Pa. 288, 27 Am. Rep. 650; Trinity Church v. City of Boston, 118 Mass. 164); McMillan v. Solomon, 42 Ala. 356, 358, 94 Am. Dec. 654.

"The common and ordinary acceptance of the word 'house' embraces every appurtenant and accessory to the main building; so in legal acceptance the sale of a house carries along with it whatever may be necessary to a full and complete enjoyment of the thing sold." As used in a fire policy on a house, the word was construed to include buildings accessory to the main building. Workman v. Insurance Co., 2 La. 507, 509, 22 Am. Dec. 141.

"House," as used in the common-law definition of arson, defining the crime as the malicious burning of the house of another, means the dwelling house and all outhouses which are a parcel thereof. State v. McGowan, 20 Conn. 245, 246, 52 Am. Dec. 336.

A reservation of the "house and garden" in the sale of a tract of land should be construed as carrying with it a reservation of the dooryard and the use of estovers. Baxter v. Brand, 36 Ky. (6 Dana) 296, 297.

The word "house" does not include any part of the garden, orchard, or curtilage, so as to prevent interference therewith by a railroad, under Rev. St. 1840, c. 81, § 5, providing that in locating railroads no corporation shall take any meeting house or dwelling house without the consent of the owners thereof. Wells v. Somerset & K. R. Co., 47 Me. 345, 347.

Different use of portion.

A building, the lower part of which is used as a cowhouse and stable, and the upper part consisting of a chamber used as a dwelling house, is a "house," within St. 2 Wm. IV. c. 45, § 27, giving the right of voting to the occupier of a house. Nunn v. Denton, 7 Mann. & G. 68, 68.

A building calculated to be used as a dwelling house, but some of the upper portions of which, not so occupied, are cut off to be used as workshops, is a "house," within the meaning of St. 2 Wm. IV. c. 45, § 27, giving the right of voting to the occupier of a house. Daniel v. Coulsting, 7 Mann. & G. 122, 123.

External ornaments as part of.

The owner of two adjoining houses contracted to sell one of them, describing it as "all that dwelling house now in the occupation of P." On the front of defendant's house, at the side which joined plaintiff's house, was a slight projection of 2 or 3 inches, 9 feet in width and in the middle of this projection was a doorway 3½ feet wide, on each side of which was a small pillar, supporting a small portico. Over the doorway was a window, and over this a slight pediment, which extended 3 inches beyond each side of the projection. On the inside the party wall dividing defendant's house from plaintiff's house, instead of being coincident with the projection, was about 2 feet 11 inches more to the south, and was in a direct line with the side of the doorway, so that from 2 to 3 feet of that which appeared from the outside to form a part of defendant's house from the inside formed a part of the wall of the front room of plaintiff's house. An action was brought for painting the pillar and the parts of the portico over it, and the pediment, all of which were to the north of the plaintiff's side of the middle of the party wall, and all of which plaintiff claimed as part of his house, while defendant claimed them as part of the "house in the occupation of P." Held, that the "house in the occupation of P." meant those parts which he used and enjoyed internally with the external walls that protect them, and the parts of the adjoining house the frontage walls of which protected plaintiff's house, did not cease to be his merely because their external ornaments apparently belonged to defendant's house. Fox v. Clarke, L. R. 7 Q. B. 748, 753. In the same case, on another appeal, the court held that "by the house now in the occupation of P." included that part which overlapped the front room of plaintiff; it having become a part of the house occupied by P. Fox v. Clarke, L. R. 9 Q. B. 565, 569.

Firm synonymous.

The word "house," in an instrument guarantying the house of J. De Rivera, signifies nothing more than the firm or partnership of J. De Rivera & Co. The word "house" is an equivalent expression for the word "firm." Burch v. De Rivera, 6 N. Y. Supp. 206, 207, 53 Hun, 367.

Freight car.

A freight car body, which has been detached from the wheels and placed upon permanent posts near a railway track at a station, and to which a platform has been attached, thus constituting a structure to be used as a freight warehouse, and which is used for this purpose only, is a "house," within Pen. Code, § 136, defining the offense of arson. Carter v. State, 32 S. E. 345, 346, 106 Ga. 372, 71 Am. St. Rep. 262.

Fruit stand.

A fruit stand, built somewhat in the shape of a piano box, about eight feet high, with shelves and counters, so that the proprietor could, in making sales, stand inside or outside of the structure as he desired, is a "house," within the meaning of that term as used in the statute relating to burglary. Willis v. State, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 168, 25 S. W. 1119.

Gin house.

The word "house," as used in Act March 22, 1875, c. 228, defining the malicious setting fire to any church, chapel, meeting house, or any house, stable, coach house, outhouse, warehouse, office, shop, etc., does not include a gin house. State v. Thorne, 81 N. C. 555, 559.

Inclosed park or arbor.

The term "house," as used in Gen. St. tit. 52, § 4, prohibiting the keeping open on Sunday of any shop, house, etc., for the sale of intoxicating liquors, will not include an inclosed park where such liquors are sold. State v. Barr, 39 Conn. 40, 44.

A liquor dealer's bond obligated him to keep an orderly "house or place of business." In an action for breach of the bond, it appeared that in the back of defendant's store there was a bar and in the rear of the store a door opened on an alley across which there was an arbor. Defendant had control of this arbor, which was arranged with tables at which persons drank beer purchased at the store. Held, that the words "house or place of business" included all places connected with and in which defendant transacted his business of retailing liquor, and therefore included the arbor, though the same was separate and apart from the store in which the liquors were kept. Whitcomb v. State, 21 S. W. 976, 977, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 301.

Livery stable.

A deed conveying property in a residence district, restricting the grantee to the erection of not "more than two houses thereon," means the erection of two dwelling houses of the general character and description adopted and used in that particular locality for private residences. It was contended that the word was to be construed in its ordinary and popular meaning as defined by Webster: "A building or shed intended or used as a habitation or shelter for animals of any kind; but, properly speaking, a building or edifice for the habitation of man"—and that a livery stable might be erected on the property, but the court confined the word to the erection of a dwelling house. Schenck v. Campbell (N. Y.) 11 Abb. Prac. 292, 294.

Material after destruction.

Pen. Code, art. 651, defines arson as being the willful burning of any house included within the meaning of article 652, and article 652 defines a "house" as any building or structure inclosed with walls and covered, whatever may be the material used for the building. Held that, since a building ceases to be a building or structure after it is torn down, the burning of the material of which it was formerly composed would not constitute the burning of a house, and was therefore not arson. Mulligan v. State, 25 Tex. App. 199, 7 S. W. 664, 8 Am. St. Rep. 435.

Outhouse.

The words "house or outhouse," as used in the statutes of Tennessee, making the burning of a house or outhouse of another arson, are not synonymous. Therefore an indictment charging defendant with burning a house or outhouse of another is defective, for it charges separate offenses. Whiteside v. State, 44 Tenn. (4 Cold.) 175, 183.

As a part of realty.

Houses, as a general rule, are part of the freehold, and pass or descend with the land. The prima facie intentment is that they are part of the realty, and, if there be no proof to take the case without the general rule, they are part and parcel of the land, and whoever owns the land owns the houses standing thereon; but this is not a conclusive presumption. It may be rebutted, and if a house is built by one person on the land of another, with the consent of the owner of the land, and with an agreement that the house shall belong to the builder, and may be removed or disposed of by him, the house does not become a part of the realty, but continues to be personal property. Harris v. Powers, 57 Ala. 139, 143. But where there was no reservation of the right to remove such house, the house becomes a part of the realty, and the one who built it has no right to remove it or dispose of the lumber of which the house was composed. Powers v. Harris, 68 Ala. 409, 410, 411.

Portable box.

A portable box, 4 feet high on one side, 18 inches on the opposite side, 14 feet long, and 6 feet wide, used to hold oats, is not a house within the contemplation of the statute defining burglary. Williamson v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 60, 44 S. W. 1107, 73 Am. St. Rep. 901.

As premises.

The words "house or place," in the statute requiring the complaint for a search warrant to be on oath that the goods are concealed in some house or place, is not equivalent to the term "premises," and therefore an affidavit stating that the stolen goods are on certain premises is not a compliance with the statute. Humes v. Taber, 1 R. I. 464, 470.

"House," as used in Act June 3, 1885, authorizing the boards of health in cities of the first class to regulate house drainage, should be construed in its most comprehensive meaning, which is given by Webster as "a building intended or used as a habitation or shelter for animals of any kind." Therefore, while it may be permissible for a pleader to use the word "building," instead of "house," yet he cannot substitute other words for it. The word "property" is improper in this connection. A meadow and a natural lake are properties, but they are not houses or buildings, within the meaning of the act. Commonwealth v. Lambrecht, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 323, 325.

Shop or store.

St. 2 Wm. IV, c. 45, § 27, giving a right to vote for members of Parliament to every male person of full age who occupies "any house, warehouse, counting house, shop, or other building," does not apply to a shop which was separated from the rest of the premises by a yard, and around which there was no complete curtilage or fence: the yard being approached by a passage at the side of the shop open to the street, which was the property of the occupant of the house and shop, but used by the tenant of the adjoining house in common with him. Powell v. Price, 4 C. B. 105, 114.

In a complaint alleging that one, not being a taverner, did keep a certain "house, store, and shop" for the purpose of selling wine and spirituous liquors to be drank thereat, does not charge the keeper of a house, and also a store, and also a shop, as three distinct and separate places for the purpose of selling wine and spirituous liquors, the keeping of each of which constitutes a distinct offense; the words "house, store, and shop" being used as synonymous, and as defining but one place. Rawson v. State, 19 Conn. 292, 297.

Smokehouse.

A building with walls, roof, and a door, used as a smokehouse, is a "house," within the meaning of the statute defining burglary. Albritton v. State (Tex.) 26 S. W. 398.

An indictment charging defendant with committing larceny from a smokehouse sufficiently charges that the larceny was committed from a house. A smokehouse would be a house if the adjective was not employed to denote it a smokehouse, and the adjective only renders the description of the house more definite. Irvin v. State, 37 Tex. 412, 413.

In Act May 17, 1805, § 2, which makes it a capital offense to break into the house of another for the purpose of committing a larceny or robbery therein, "house" means a house in which persons dwell or reside. It does not refer to nor include smokehouses. Palmer v. State, 47 Tenn. (7 Cold.) 82, 86.

Tenement.

The word "house" is held synonymous with "tenement" in an indictment for arson, under Sand. & H. Dig. § 4164, defining arson as "the wilful and malicious burning of the house * * * of another." The indictment only alleges that one object was burned, and that is described as one house and tenement, and we understand from this that the defendant was charged with burning a house. State v. Snellgrove, 71 S. W. 266, 267 (citing Commonwealth v. Bossidy, 112 Mass. 277).

A five-story tenement house, in which a man and his family occupied three adjoining rooms, was the "dwelling house" of such party, within the statute relating to arson. Levy v. People, 80 N. Y. 327, 332.

Tent.

A large tent of canvas, supported by poles let into the ground, the walls and roof being of canvas and the floor of plank, is a house, within the meaning of Pasch. Dig. art. 2027, providing punishment for the keeping of a disorderly house. Killman v. State, 2 Tex. App. 222, 224, 28 Am. Rep. 432.

The term "house," in the law of burglary, defined in Pen. Code 1895, art. 843, as including any building or structure erected for public or private use, of whatever material it may be constructed, includes a structure in which the builder resides, built by placing two forked poles upright in the ground, resting another upon them, over which a wagon sheet is stretched, and the ends fastened to boards nailed to the posts for sides. Favro v. State, 46 S. W. 932, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 452, 73 Am. St. Rep. 950.

"House," as used in Pasch. Dig. art. 2409, providing that, if any person shall steal property from a house in such manner as that the offense does not come within the definition of burglary, he shall be punished, etc., does not apply to a tent consisting of two forks driven in the ground, with a ridge pole, across which is stretched a piece of ducking, and which is closed at one end by another piece of cloth hung up, and is open at the other end. Callahan v. State, 41 Tex. 43, 44.

Theater.

"House," as used in St. 51 Geo. III, c. 150, charging a yearly sum upon the houses of the inhabitants of a certain place, means houses intended for human habitation, and does not include a theater. The term "house" prima facie means a dwelling house. Surman v. Darley, 14 Mees. & W. 181, 186.

Unfinished house.

A building intended for and constructed as a dwelling house, which had not been completed or inhabited, and in which the owner had deposited straw and agricultural implements, is not a house, within the meaning of St. 9 Geo. I, c. 22, § 7, so as to entitle the owner to maintain an action against the hundred for an injury sustained by him in consequence of malicious setting fire to the same. Elsmore v. Inhabitants of St. Briavells, 8 Barn. & C. 461.

Wagon.

A house is an abiding place, an abode, a place or means of lodgment. It need not necessarily be built of stone, brick, wood, iron, and glass, or any other material or combination thereof, nor is it determined by a fixed and definite size and shape; and hence a covered wagon is a house, within the meaning of the statute prohibiting the keeping of a house of ill fame. State v. Chauvet, 83 N. W. 717, 111 Iowa, 687, 51 L. R. A. 630, 82 Am. St. Rep. 539.

"In the ordinary and most common use of the word 'house,' it means an ordinary building for the use of a family, a dwelling house; but that is not the only definition of the word, either in common parlance or in the law. Both recognize such houses as packing houses, smokehouses, icehouses, banking houses, millhouses, etc., and, in general, business houses. In such cases the word 'house' is the equivalent of 'building.'" As used in Rev. St. 1881, § 5320, making it criminal for any person not licensed to sell liquor to be drank in his house, it means a building or inclosed structure, and does not include an uncovered wagon. Schilling v. State, 18 N. E. 682, 684, 116 Ind. 200.

HOUSE AND LOT.

In a deed the premises conveyed were described as a "house and lot" in a row of houses, and in giving the boundaries of the lot the side lines were stated to be "80 feet or a fraction more or less" in length. At the time of the conveyance the side lines of the lot were marked by fences, and a fence ran along the rear of the curtilages of the several houses in a row at a depth of about 65 feet from the front. Held, that the expression "house and lot," used in the above deed and as ordinarily used in reference to premises in a city, imports a house with a curtilage shut off from the neighboring grounds by some physical objects. Thus the deed bears upon its face an intimation that the land to be conveyed by it is inclosed within visible boundaries, and hence the fence will be considered as controlling the distance of feet as expressed in the deed. Smith v. Negbauer, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 305, 307.

A will devising "the house and lot in which I now reside" should be considered to mean only the lot which the testator, prior to the date of his will, had separated from his adjacent lands and inclosed by fences. The words are manifestly limited in their scope, and, read in their ordinary and natural sense, cannot be construed to comprehend anything more than what the testator used as a homestead. Besides it is of the first importance to note that he used the word "lot" in describing the quantity or extent, which is a form more generally used to describe a small parcel of land than a large parcel. The words "house and lot in which I reside," therefore, cannot be construed to include all the lots occupied by the testator. Inhabitants of Town of Phillipsburgh v. Bruch's Ex'r, 37 N. J. Eq. (10 Stew.) 482, 486.

HOUSE FOR RETAILING SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS.

"House," as used in Rev. Code, § 3620, prohibiting gaming, card playing, etc., at any tavern, inn, or "house where spirituous liquors are retailed," etc., does not include a private bedroom in the second story of a house, where spirituous liquors were retailed in a store room below. The object of the statute was, not only to suppress every practice of gaming, but to disconnect it from tipping shops and houses where ardent spirits are retailed. There must be a business connection between a room in which the gaming is carried on and the place where the spirits are sold to constitute guilt. Phillips v. State, 51 Ala. 20, 22.

The term "place or house where spirituous liquors are retailed," in a statute prohibiting the playing of cards at any house or place where spirituous liquors are retailed, includes a room in the second story of a two-story house, which is accessible only by means of a flight of stairs leading up to it on the outside, and which is used by one of the proprietors of the house as a sleeping apartment; the lower room being used by the proprietors for retailing spirituous liquors. "We are of the opinion that it comes both within the letter and spirit of the prohibition. The upper story not only constituted a part of the house, but was used by the proprietors as an appendage to the prosecution of their business. We think the obvious design of the statute would be defeated if parties could evade the law by playing in a room other than that in which the retailing is carried on, but which constitutes a part of the same house and is used by the same concern in the prosecution of their business." Johnson v. State, 19 Ala. 527.

It was held in Cole v. State, 9 Tex. 42, Pierce v. State, 12 Tex. 210, and Redditt v. State, 17 Tex. 610, that the words "house for retailing spirituous liquors," included the whole house from cellar to garret, regardless of approaches; but such holding was subsequently overruled. O'Brien v. State, 10 Tex. App. 544, 545. See, also, Watson v. State, 13 Tex. App. 160, 161; Robinson v. State (Tex.) 19 S. W. 894.

The term "house for retailing spirituous liquors," in a statute prohibiting card playing at such a house, includes a room in a building in the rear of a drinking saloon, where there is a partition containing a sliding window, through which the players in a rear room are supplied with liquors. Stebbins v. State, 2 S. W. 617, 22 Tex. App. 32.

The term "house where spirituous liquors are retailed," in a statute prohibiting card playing in any house where spirits are retailed, includes a counting room attached to and under the same roof with a storeroom in which spirituous liquors are retailed; the entire premises being under the control of one person. State v. Terry, 20 N. C. 325, 328.

The question whether the term "house for retailing spirituous liquors," within the meaning of the statute prohibiting card playing in such a place, includes a room attached to and constituting a part of the house, is a question for the jury. Cherry v. State, 30 Tex. 439, 440.

A conviction for playing cards at a house for retailing spirituous liquors cannot be sustained on evidence that the playing was done in the house which was in the same town lot with a drinking saloon, but in no wise connected with the saloon or controlled by its keeper, and not accessible to the public through the saloon. Harcrow v. State, 2 Tex. App. 511.

The term "house for retailing spirituous liquors," in a statute prohibiting card playing at such place, does not necessarily include all saloons, as the word does not necessarily mean a place for retailing liquors, and therefore evidence that card playing was at a saloon is not sufficient to show a violation of the statute. Springfield v. State (Tex.) 13 S. W. 752.

HOUSE CONNECTIONS.

The words "house connections," as used in Swan & S. St. p. 847, providing for the sewerage of cities of the first class, includes only such as are a part of the plan of sewerage provided for by the act, and the city authorities are not empowered to contract for a construction of house connections with a street sewer, unless the house connections are made a part of the plans and specifications for the sewerage. Cordeman v. City of Cincinnati, 23 Ohio St. 499.

HOUSE OF CORRECTION.

A "house of correction" as its name indicates, "is designed for the reformation of youthful criminals." Ex parte Moon Fook, 12 Pac. 803, 804, 72 Cal. 10.

HOUSE OF ENTERTAINMENT.

The expression "house of entertainment," as used in Act 1791, requiring a license for keeping a house of entertainment or tavern, is synonymous with the word "tavern" as there used. Bonner v. Welborn, 7 Ga. 296, 304.

In an indictment charging that certain gaming was carried on at a "house of entertainment," such expression means a tavern. Linkous v. Commonwealth (Va.) 9 Leigh, 608, 612.

The act of 1801, prohibiting gaming "in a house of public entertainment or a tavern," does not include a house where a person entertains strangers only occasionally, though he receives compensation for it. The owner thereof is not liable to punishment under the statute, since the act does not prohibit gaming in a private house. State v. Mathews, 19 N. C. 424, 426.

HOUSE OF ILL FAME.

A house of ill fame is defined to be "a house kept for the convenience and shelter of persons desiring unlawful sexual intercourse, and in which such intercourse is practiced." United States v. Snow, 9 Pac. 501, 510, 4 Utah, 280; Posnett v. Marble, 20 Atl. 813, 816, 62 Vt. 481, 11 L. R. A. 162, 22 Am. St. Rep. 126.

The term "house of ill fame," as used in a Michigan statute punishing any person keeping a house of ill fame, means a place of ill repute in the vicinity. People v. Pinkerton, 44 N. W. 180, 181, 79 Mich. 110.

To constitute a house one of ill fame, and sustain an indictment for keeping such a house, it is not necessary that it be kept for lucre and gain. Commonwealth v. Wood, 97 Mass. 225, 228.

Rev. St. 1881, § 2003, which declares that any female who frequents or lives in houses of ill fame should be deemed a prostitute, and on conviction thereof should be fined, etc., includes one house of ill fame; hence an indictment charging that the defendant lived in a house of ill fame is sufficient. State v. Nichols, 83 Ind. 228, 229, 43 Am. Rep. 66.

A building or place generally reputed in the neighborhood where the same is located to be a building or place where persons of opposite sex meet for the purpose of prostitution is a house of ill fame. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4364 —1.

The term "house of ill fame or assignation," as used in the Penal Code, includes all premises which by common fame or report are used for the purpose of prostitution or assignation. Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 718.

As bawdy house or brothel.

The term "house of ill fame" was said in State v. Boardman, 64 Me. 523, to be synonymous with "bawdy house." It is a species of disorderly house, and indictable as a nuisance. Henson v. State, 62 Md. 232, 234, 50 Am. Rep. 204.

As used in St. 1845, c. 20, p. 22, prohibiting any person from keeping a house of ill fame resorted to for the purpose of prostitution or lewdness, the term "house of ill fame" should be construed, in connection with the context, to mean a house which in fact is a brothel or bawdy house. The strict etymological sense of the words, standing alone, refers to reputation and general belief, but, being connected with the subsequent words, means more than the popular signification. It means a house actually a brothel or bawdy house. Cadwell v. State, 17 Conn. 467, 471; McAlister v. Clark, 33 Conn. 91, 92.

A house of ill fame is a nuisance at common law, for it holds out allurements to a miscellaneous and common bawdry, corrupting to the public morals. The words "ill fame" are used to give name and character to the house, and do not refer to its reputation. Both at common law and in common parlance the words "house of ill fame" mean a house resorted to for the purpose of prostitution. State v. Plant, 32 Atl. 237, 67 Vt. 454, 48 Am. St. Rep. 821.

The term "house of ill fame" is a mere synonym for bawdy house, having no reference to the fame or reputation of the place, but denoting the fact. State v. Smith, 12 N. W. 524, 29 Minn. 193.

HOUSE OF INDUSTRY.

Either of the terms "almshouse," "poor-house," "schoolhouse," or "house of industry," within the meaning of statutes exempting such houses from taxation, includes buildings owned by the Church Charity Foundation, and used for the care, maintenance, education, and support of aged and indigent persons and indigent orphan and half-orphan children, and other children left in a destitute and unprotected state or condition. Church Charity Foundation v. People (N. Y.) 6 Dem. Sur. 154, 157.

"House of industry," within the meaning of a statute exempting such houses from taxation, includes the Hebrew Benevolent and Orphan Asylum of the city of New York. Hebrew Benevolent and Orphan Asylum v. City of New York (N. Y.) 11 Hun, 116.

HOUSE OF LEGISLATURE.

The term "house," as used in Const. U. S. art. 4, § 8, providing that a majority of each house shall constitute a quorum to do business, means the entire number of which the Assembly or Senate may be composed. In re Executive Communication Nov. 9, 1868, 12 Fla. 653.

"Houses," as used in a statute relating to Senate and General Assembly of the state, and providing that the two "houses" shall meet separately, etc., must of necessity be construed to denote the members of such houses. Werts v. Rogers, 28 Atl. 726, 762, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 480, 23 L. R. A. 354.

As quorum.

Where a constitutional provision required that the Legislature should pass no act of incorporation unless with the assent of at least two-thirds of each house, the word "house" means members present and doing business, being a quorum. Zeiler v. Central Ry. Co., 35 Atl. 932, 935, 84 Md. 304, 34 L. R. A. 469; Southworth v. Palmyra & J. R. Co., 2 Mich. 287.

Const. art. 3, § 17, providing that a majority of each house of the Legislature shall constitute a quorum to do business, means any number of the members thereof sufficient to constitute a quorum, and does not mean all the members elected, and therefore an amendment ratified by two-thirds of a quorum is ratified by two-thirds of that house, within the meaning of the Constitution. State v. McBride, 4 Mo. 303, 308, 29 Am. Dec. 636.

"House," as used in Const. 1868, art. 42, requiring a vote of four-fifths of the house in which a bill is pending to dispense with the reading of a bill, means a quorum of the members elected. Frellsen v. Mahan, 21 La. Ann. 79, 103.

HOUSE OF PUBLIC WORSHIP.

See, also, "Public Worship."

"House of public worship," within the meaning of a statute exempting houses of public worship, etc., is to be construed as meaning the buildings in which public worship is held, and lots are exempt from taxation under the statute from the moment the construction of a church building thereon is commenced. Washington Heights M. E. Church v. City of New York (N. Y.) 20 Hun, 297.

Rev. St. c. 20, p. 103, exempting from taxation all houses of public worship, etc., should be limited to the buildings alone, and not to include the lot or ground upon which the houses of public worship stand. Lefevre v. City of Detroit, 2 Mich. 586, 589.

Under the Constitution, providing that houses used exclusively for public worship may by general laws be exempted from taxation, and the statute, providing that houses used exclusively for public worship and the grounds attached to such buildings, necessary to their proper occupancy, use, and enjoyment, shall be exempt, such exemption does not include a vacant lot purchased in contemplation of its being used for the future erection of a church. Matlack v. Jones, 13 Ohio Dec. (2 Disn.) 2, 4.

HOUSE OF RELIGIOUS WORSHIP.

"House of religious worship," within the meaning of the statute exempting such houses from taxation, does not include a church building, which, after the society owning it has erected a new church building, is stripped of its ornaments and fixtures, and is rented for a time, and then sold on condition that it shall never be used as a place of worship. Old South Soc. v. City of Boston, 127 Mass. 378, 379.

Rev. St. c. 7, § 5, exempting all "houses of religious worship" and the pews and furniture within the same from taxation, means such distinct tenements as are used for that purpose and for purposes connected with it, and does not include distinct tenements used for other purposes, though under the same roof. The story under a church and vestry let as stores, and of which the church takes the income, is not a house of religious worship. Proprietors of South Congregational Meeting House in Lowell v. City of Lowell, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 538, 540.

Land or parsonage included.

The term "house of religious worship," within the meaning of a statute exempting such houses from taxation, which has been construed in Trinity Church v. City of Boston, 118 Mass. 164, to include the land on which such house stands, does not include land owned by a religious corporation upon which no church edifice has been or is intended to be erected, and which is separated by a passageway from the portion of the estate on which the church of the corporation stands, and which is not necessary or incidental to the use of the church as a house of public worship. Boston Soc. of Redemptorist Fathers v. City of Boston, 129 Mass. 178, 180. In such statute the word "house" was not limited to the actual church edifice erected for religious worship, but included as well the lot of land purchased by the church for the purpose of building on such lot, being the only one held, and not more than sufficient for its reasonable requirements in that respect. Trinity Church v. City of Boston, 118 Mass. 164, 167.

"Houses of religious worship," within the meaning of the statute exempting houses of religious worship from taxation, and providing that portions of such houses appropriated for purposes other than religious worship shall be taxed, does not include a parsonage erected upon church grounds, together with the lands upon which it stands, although the house is occupied by the pastor free of rent. Third Congregational Soc. v. City of Springfield, 18 N. E. 68, 147 Mass. 396.

HOUSEBREAKING.

See, also, "Breaking (In Criminal Law)." As felony, see "Felony."

The offense of "housebreaking" is committed where there is an internal communication between the room or apartment broken into and the room or building into which the felonious entry is charged to have been made. Commonwealth v. Bruce, 79 Ky. 560, 561.

A warrant alleging that complaint had been made to the magistrate that the offense of breaking into the storehouse of one A. had been committed involves the averment of housebreaking, which in common parlance implies burglary, and hence the warrant sufficiently designates the crime of which the defendant is charged. Adams v. Coe, 26 South. 652, 653, 123 Ala. 664.

HOUSEHOLD.

A household is a family living together. May v. Smith, 48 Ala. 483, 488 (citing Allen v. Manasse, 4 Ala. 455; Sallee v. Waters, 17 Ala. 482); Woodward v. Murray (N. Y.) 18 Johns. 400, 402. But not necessarily wife and children. Fink v. Fraenkle, 14 N. Y. Supp. 140, 141, 20 Civ. Proc. R. 402.

"Household" means persons who dwell together as a family. Arthur v. Morgan, 5 Sup. Ct. 241, 243, 112 U. S. 495, 28 L. Ed. 825.

The term "household" includes all the dwellers in a house under the common control of one person. In re Lambson (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 1047, 1048.

"Household" is the definition of the Latin "familia." The approved definition of "household" is "a number of persons dwelling under the same roof and composing a family; and by extension all who are under one domestic head." And. Law Dict. p. 448, and authorities there cited. Ferbrache v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 81 Mo. App. 268, 271.

One's household is the place where one holds house, his home. The home is not confined to the particular bedroom in which the master of the house sleeps, but may include his rooms for guests and apartments which he never enters. Appeal of Hoopes, 60 Pa. 220, 222, 100 Am. Dec. 562; Estate of Hoopes (Pa.) 6 Phila. 364, 365.

Within the meaning of the Alabama statute which renders a wife's separate estate liable "for articles of comfort and support of the household," servants necessarily employed and residing in the family are a part of the household, and necessities supplied them can be charged on the wife's estate. Pippin v. Jones, 52 Ala. 161, 165.

HOUSEHOLD EFFECTS.

A will bequeathing testator's furniture and other household effects to his wife does not include coffee in a bag, wine in bottles, and brandy in a cask, laid in by the testator for the current use and consumption of himself and family. Foxall v. McKenney (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 645, 646.

HOUSEHOLD FURNITURE.

See, also, "Household Goods."

Rev. St. art. 2335, providing that household furniture shall be reserved to every family exempt from attachment or execution or from forced sale for the payment of debts, means pertaining or belonging to the house or family, such being its general definition. Alsop v. Jordan, 6 S. W. 831, 833, 69 Tex. 300, 5 Am. St. Rep. 53.

"Household furniture," as used in Gen. Laws, c. 224, § 2, exempting household furniture from execution and attachment, means furniture in actual use in the household or place of residence, or intended for such use. Bond v. Tucker, 18 Atl. 653, 65 N. H. 165.

When used in a bequest in a will of all the testator's "household furniture," the term embraces everything in the house which has usually been enjoyed therewith. Chase v. Stockett, 19 Atl. 761, 762, 72 Md. 235; Carnagy v. Woodcock (Va.) 2 Munf. 234, 239, 5 Am. Dec. 470.

An exemption of household furniture from execution is not strictly limited to such furniture as may be absolutely necessary; but where the value is not so great as to be evidence of extravagance, it does not cease to be household furniture because it may be greater in amount than is required for the immediate need of the family. Haswell v. Parsons, 15 Cal. 266, 267, 76 Am. Dec. 480.

"Household," as used in a bequest of household goods and household furniture, "may designate the character of the goods or furniture wherever or in the possession of whomsoever they may be, or it may indicate whatever is connected with the testator's domestic establishment and employed as articles of use or ornament, although it may not be what is ordinarily known as furniture." Dayton v. Tillou, 24 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Rob.) 21, 27.

"Household," as used in an insurance policy insuring household furniture, means belonging to the house and family, and will be held to include such articles as books and games, writing materials, child's swing, and child's walker. Huston v. State Ins. Co., 69 N. W. 674, 675, 100 Iowa, 402.

A will of "household furniture and other household effects" comprises all the property in the house and on the premises intended for use, for consumption therein, or for the ornamentation thereof, so that pistols, a melodeon, paintings, an organ, a parrot, books, wine, and liquors will pass, but not a pony, cow, or fowling pieces, unless they are kept for the defense of the house. Cole v. Fitzgerald, 1 Sim. & S. 189.

Boarding house or school furniture.

Furniture of a householder, used in the sleeping rooms of his boarders or guests, is "household furniture," within Pub. St. c. 11, § 5, cl. 6, exempting from taxation household furniture not to exceed a certain value. Day v. City of Lawrence, 45 N. E. 751, 167 Mass. 371.

A will giving all the testatrix's household furniture to a certain person should be construed to include all the furniture used by the testatrix in a boarding school in which she lived, for a man's household is the place where he holds house, and is his home, and that which supplies it is its furniture. The home is not confined to the particular bedroom in which the master of the house sleeps, for it may include his rooms for guests and apartments he never enters. So, too, it would properly embrace a school room, for he may teach in his parlor. The particular use of a portion of the dwelling cannot make it any the less a part of the household. Estate of Hoopes (Pa.) 6 Phila. 364, 365, 1 Brewst. 462, 464.

"Household furniture," within the meaning of the statute exempting from execution the household furniture of a debtor, includes the same amount of household furniture belonging to a boarding house keeper as he would be entitled to if he maintained only a private residence. Vanderhorst v. Bacon, 38 Mich. 669, 672, 33 Am. Rep. 328.

"Household and kitchen furniture," within the meaning of a statute exempting from execution all household and kitchen furniture of the debtor, includes all the furniture of a widow with one child, who occupies a house of seven or eight rooms, and incidentally keeps boarders for the purpose of support, although a portion of such furniture is in the rooms occupied by the boarders. Mueller v. Richardson, 18 S. W. 693, 694, 82 Tex. 361.

A statute exempting from attachment such "household furniture" as is essential to the personal comfort of the debtor and his dependent family cannot be construed to exempt furniture kept for boarders and necessary to their use; the debtor being engaged in keeping a boarding house, and the furniture being used by such boarder for compensation, and useful to a debtor only as a means of profit, and such furniture not being necessary to enable the debtor and her daughter to live in a comfortable and convenient manner in ordinary housekeeping. In deciding what is necessary household furniture, the vocation of the debtor may properly be taken into consideration, as his personal wants and those of his family may depend largely on the nature of the business whereby he is seeking a livelihood. Weed v. Dayton, 40 Conn. 293, 296.

Books, pictures, and statuary.

Books are not within the term "household furniture." Towns v. Pratt, 33 N. H. 345, 350, 68 Am. Dec. 726; Kendall's Ex'r v. Kendall (Va.) 5 Munf. 272, 274.

Books will be included in the term "household furniture," as used in an insurance policy. Huston v. State Ins. Co., 69 N. W. 674, 675, 100 Iowa, 402.

A will bequeathing to a certain person all the testator's "library and household furniture of every description," etc., includes a portrait of the testator, painted after the making of the will and at the time of his death still in the possession of the artist in another city. The term "household furniture," though not susceptible of strict definition, has acquired a definite meaning, by which it is understood to include everything which may contribute to the use or convenience of the householder or to the ornament of the house, such as plate, linen, china, pictures, etc. McMicken v. Board of Directors of McMicken University, 2 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 489, 490. It also would include bronzes, statuary, etc. Richardson v. Hall, 124 Mass. 228, 237.

"Household furniture," as used in a statute taxing household furniture, cannot be construed to include works of art and antiquities. The word "furniture" is undoubtedly susceptible of use in a sense that would include paintings, engravings, and works of art and curiosity used in the ornamentation of a house. Ornamentation is not furniture, though incidentally to its own purpose it may contribute to the idea of furnishings. Appeal of Lea (Pa.) 15 Wkly. Notes Cas. 61, 62.

Pictures hung up, but not books in a library, will pass under the term "household furniture." Kelly v. Powlet, 2 Amb. 605, 611.

Carpets, curtains, and bedding.

Carpets and bedclothing are covered by the term "household furniture" in an insurance policy. Patrons' Mut. Aid Soc. v. Hall, 49 N. E. 279, 282, 19 Ind. App. 118.

A statute exempting from execution "household furniture necessary for supporting life" should be construed to include articles which to the common understanding suggest ideas of comfort and convenience, but to exclude all superfluities and articles of luxury and ornament. It cannot be construed to include four sets of lace curtains, with tassels, suspended from cornices of black walnut, which serve no strictly useful purpose, nor protect from heat or cold or observation; there being many families of refinement and culture, living in homes of comfort and convenience, in which these articles are not to be found. They are not necessary to the support of life in comfort or convenience. Nor can it include a pier glass with base of much value, though mirrors of common size and cost are exempt; nor a clock of considerable value, for clocks marking time with sufficient accuracy for the ordinary purposes of the household can be obtained for a comparatively small sum of money. Hitchcock v. Holmes, 43 Conn. 528, 529.

A fire policy on the stock of a grocer, wearing apparel, and household furniture does not cover linen sheets, etc., not laid in for the use of the family, but smuggled into the country for clandestine sale. Clary v. Protection Ins. Co. (Ohio) Wright, 227, 229.

China, linen, and plate.

"Household furniture" is incapable of definition. It is capable only of a description. It comprises everything that contributes to the use or convenience of the household or ornament of the house. The circumstances may be so various as to occasion different, and even contradictory, determinations as to what the term includes. The rank and quality of the person possessing it will occasion the determination one way. If a person of rank buys a service of plate suitable to his quality, and never uses it, yet I think the plate would pass by the term 'household furniture.' There is no general rule that plate will not pass, unless used as such by testator. This question always depends on circumstances, and was never determined by the plate being used or not. Linen and china, both useful and ornamental, in a house, * * * will pass under the term." Kelly v. Powlet, 2 Amb. 605, 610.

China, linen, and plate are within the term "household furniture," as used in wills. McMicken v. McMicken University, 2 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 489, 490.

"Household furniture," as used in a policy of insurance, includes a Japanese vase worth $500, which was in the house and a part of its furnishings. Bowne v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 46 Mo. App. 473, 477.

Clock.

The term "household furniture" may include a clock. Wilson v. Ellis (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 462, 463.

The necessary household furniture of a debtor, which is exempted by statute from execution, may include a watch or a clock, when the daily avocations of the family are such that a timepiece is indispensable. Bitting v. Vandenburg (N. Y.) 17 How. Prac. 80, 83.

Hotel or restaurant furniture.

Within the meaning of Act Pa. April 29, 1844, providing that all household furniture owned by any person shall be valued and assessed and subject to taxation, beds and bedding, carpets, and personal property necessarily required and used in and about the keeping and management of a licensed hotel for the accommodation of strangers and travelers, is not per se household furniture, and is such only in case the owner resides in the hotel and occupies it as his home. As a legal term the text-books say: "Household goods will only include things in domestic use, and not what a testator has in the way of trade." In some of the cases, however, the courts have said: "Household furniture has as general a meaning as possible. It is incapable of a definition. It is capable only of a description. It comprises everything that contributes to the use or convenience of the household or ornament of the house." McWilliams v. Gable, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 467, 468 (quoting Ward, Legacies, 217; 1 Roper, Legacies, 225).

Rev. St. tit. 20, § 4, providing that whenever the occupant of any dwelling house, having a family, shall mortgage the "household furniture used by him in house-keeping" by a deed in which such furniture shall be particularly described, and which shall be executed, acknowledged, and recorded in all respects as mortgages of lands are required to be, such mortgage shall be good and effectual, although the mortgagor shall retain possession of such mortgaged property, should be construed to include the furniture of a hotel kept by the mortgagor and in which he resides with his family, so that such furniture does not lose the immunity conferred upon it by the statute, in exempting it in such case from the necessity of a change of possession. The statute should not be held to embrace only furniture which is used by the mortgagor exclusively for his own family house-keeping. It is remedial in its nature, and its design is to be mainly regarded in its construction. It is very clear that the intention was to exempt a mortgage on the articles of personal property therein specified, on its being executed and made public by its being recorded, from the general rule applicable to conveyances of personal property, by the construction that those articles are such as are constantly used by the owner, and constitute the means of livelihood, and that he would necessarily be subject to great and peculiar inconvenience and injury by being deprived of their use. Croswell v. Allis, 25 Conn. 301, 309.

A will bequeathing all of testator's money, household furniture, plate, books, linen, wearing apparel, etc., cannot be construed to include such articles of furniture in the house, or the tavern where the testator's tavern or victualing business was carried on, as applied to the business, and were used only for the purposes of the business. The words "household furniture" would only pass what the testator kept for his domestic and personal use. Manning v. Purcell, 31 Eng. Law & Eq. 452, 457.

Household and kitchen furniture, within the meaning of a statute exempting from execution to the head of a family his household and kitchen furniture, is limited to household and kitchen furniture for the use of the family, and does not include such furniture used in hotels and restaurants beyond that which is used by the family. Heidenheimer v. Blumenkron, 56 Tex. 308, 314; Dodge v. Knight (Tex.) 16 S. W. 626, 628.

Jewelry and watches.

"Household furniture" means those things provided for, appropriated to, and used in a house, as a clock, etc. A watch kept hung up for use in a house may be considered as household furniture. There may be articles which are sometimes used in a house, that are carried out by day and brought in by night, which have in fact such a fixedness as to be considered household furniture. Gooch v. Gooch, 33 Me. 535.

The term "household furniture" should be defined to mean those articles of usual use in the household for the benefit and comfort of the family, and as so used could not be construed to include a watch and chain habitually carried on the person of the debtor for his own convenience, and not used by the household nor for the benefit or comfort of the family. Brown v. Edmonds (S. D.) 59 N. W. 731, 732.

Under Gen. St. c. 66, § 279, exempting household furniture to a certain value from execution or attachment, "household furniture" does not include a silver watch worn by a debtor, though it is the only timepiece used in the household. Rothschild v. Boelter, 18 Minn. 361 (Gil. 331, 332).

A devise of household furniture does not pass watches and jewelry for personal wear, or money, though contained in the house. Ludwig v. Bungart, 67 N. Y. Supp. 177, 179, 33 Misc. Rep. 177.

Jewelry is not included in the term "household furniture," as used in exemption statutes; nor is a mahogany cabinet, designed for ornamentation and for holding jewelry. Towns v. Pratt, 33 N. H. 345, 350, 66 Am. Dec. 726.

Kitchen utensils.

A statute exempting from execution the "household furniture necessary for supporting life" should be construed to include a cooking stove, which is an article of household furniture, calculated for no other use, and is not an article of ornament or luxury, and though of modern invention it is in the present state of the country as necessary as any other single article of household furniture, and when actually appropriated to the use designed falls clearly within the reason of the statute. Crocker v. Spencer (Vt.) 2 D. Chip. 68, 69, 15 Am. Dec. 652.

A statute exempting "household furniture necessary for upholding life," from attachment should be construed to include a cooking stove, though the use of it by the debtor has been temporarily suspended; for it is an actual or permanent necessity. Hart v. Hyde, 5 Vt. 328, 332.

"Household furniture" includes goods, vessels, utensils, and other articles necessary and convenient for housekeeping. Webst. Dict. The words as used in a policy of insurance insuring "household furniture," when not otherwise restricted, include all articles necessary and convenient for housekeeping, such as a sausage mill, churn, cook stove, dishes, kettles, etc., not particularly specified. Reynolds v. Iowa & N. Ins. Co., 46 N. W. 659, 661, 80 Iowa, 563.

Piano.

A piano is an article of household furniture, within Gen. St. c. 152, § 5, providing that the household furniture of a married woman shall not be conveyed by her husband, unless she join in the conveyance. Von Storch v. Winslow, 13 R. I. 23, 24, 43 Am. Rep. 10.

The lease of a hotel "and the furniture and other property of the hotel," made with knowledge on the part of the lessor that its president had agreed to purchase from plaintiff a piano which had been placed in the hotel for the use of the guests, shows an intention to receive and accept the piano, and the lessor is therefore liable to plaintiff for the price. Allen v. Grove Springs Hotel & Steamboat Co., 85 Hun, 537, 540, 33 N. Y. Supp. 355, 357.

A statute exempting from attachment and execution "such suitable apparel, bedding, tools, arms, and articles of household furniture as may be necessary for upholding life" does not mean that the means of an intellectual enjoyment, of gratifying refined tastes, of participating in social pleasures and hospitalities, of cultivating the affections and the moral and religious sentiments, so far as these objects may be promoted by the possession of property, shall be embraced within its provisions, and hence a pianoforte is not exempt as an article of household furniture. The object of the statute was simply to protect a poor man in the enjoyment of the necessities of his life, so that the reasonable subsistence of himself and his family might not be endangered by the exactions of creditors. It was intended to secure the fruits of industry to the primary object of labor—the maintenance of life in reasonable comfort. Dunlap v. Edgerton, 30 Vt. 224, 226.

A piano is not "household goods, furniture, and utensils," within the meaning of How. Ann. St. § 7686, subd. 7, classifying exempt property. Kehl v. Dunn, 61 N. W. 71, 102 Mich. 581, 47 Am. St. Rep. 561.

Sewing machine.

A sewing machine is an article of household furniture, within the meaning of that phrase in Gen. St. c. 152, § 5, providing that the household furniture of any married woman shall not be sold, etc., by the husband without her consent. Von Storch v. Winslow, 13 R. I. 23, 24, 43 Am. Rep. 10.

Trunk.

Rev. St. c. 184, exempting household furniture of a debtor to a certain value from attachment and execution, must be understood to mean those vessels, utensils, or goods which, not becoming fixtures, are designed in their manufacture originally and chiefly for use in the family as instruments in the household and for conducting and managing household affairs. The term does not include a traveling trunk. Towns v. Pratt, 33 N. H. 345, 350, 66 Am. Dec. 728.

Wearing apparel.

"Household furniture," as used in a policy of insurance, must be construed in its common acceptation to mean "furnishings for the house," and as such is not to be held to exclude wearing apparel also insured in the same policy. Longueville v. Western Assur. Co., 2 N. W. 394, 51 Iowa, 553, 33 Am. Rep. 146.

HOUSEHOLD GOODS.

Household goods "means every article of a permanent nature which is not consumed in its enjoyment." Marquam v. Sengfelder, 32 Pac. 676, 679, 24 Or. 2.

"Household goods" embrace articles of a permanent nature—that is, articles of household use which are not consumed in their enjoyment—that are used or purchased or otherwise acquired by a person for his house, but not goods in the way of his trade. Plate will pass by this term, but not articles of consumption found in a house, as malt, hops, or victuals. Smith v. Findley, 8 Pac. 871, 876, 34 Kan. 316 (citing 1 Bouv. Law Dict. p. 758).

"Household goods and furniture," as used in a will giving to a certain person the testator's household goods and furniture, not being connected with anything else, and no reason appearing to show that it was meant they should be confined to a particular locality, must be construed in a general signification as meaning all the household goods, etc. Willis v. Curtois, 1 Beavan Ch. 189, 192.

"Household goods will only include things in domestic use, and not what a testator has in way of trade." In re Hoope's Estate (Pa.) 1 Brewst. 462, 465.

The words "household goods," as used in Act July 7, 1889, regulating chattel mortgages, and providing that no chattel mortgage executed by a married man or married woman on household goods shall be valid, unless joined in by the husband or wife, as the case may be, means such goods as, being suitable in the condition and station in life of the mortgagor and the way he lives, are used by him in his household for personal, home, or household convenience, and do not include goods kept for mere purposes of trade or business. Schoenhofen Brewing Co. v. Merriion, 67 Ill. App. 123, 125.

Books, paintings, etc.

"Household goods" is "nomen generalis summo," and fairly embraces articles commonly used in a family. Other things than those which are commonly used in a household or family may be made household goods by the use which is made of them, as, for instance, books belonging to a well-filled library, paintings and statues in a large gallery, curiosities of an extensive museum, or numerous specimens belonging to a well-selected mineralogical collection, etc. Dayton v. Tillou, 24 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Rob.) 21, 27.

Clock.

The term "household goods" will include a clock, if not fixed to the house. Slanning v. Style, 3 P. Wms. 334, 335.

Clothing, jewelry, and watches.

A will disposing of the rest and residue of the testator's household goods and effects, including books, pictures, furniture, and the like, cannot be construed to include a watch, chain, clothing, and jewelry. In re Kimball's Will, 40 Atl. 847, 20 R. I. 619.

Coal.

A will bequeathing the testator's household goods to his widow should be construed to include coal remaining unconsumed at the testator's death. In re Hurley's Estate (Pa.) 12 Phila. 47.

Gas fixtures.

Gas fixtures are "household goods," within Laws 1886, c. 495, exempting such goods from the operation of Laws 1884, c. 315, declaring that the reservation of ownership in a contract for the conditional sale of goods, where possession is given, shall be void as to subsequent purchasers and mortgagees in good faith, unless the contract is filed as required by law. Iden v. Sommers, 18 N. Y. Supp. 779, 61 N. Y. Super. Ct. (29 Jones & S.) 177; Baldinger v. Levine, 82 N. Y. Supp. 483, 484, 83 App. Div. 130.

Guns or pistols.

The term "household goods," as used in a will, does not include guns or pistols, if used as arms in riding or shooting game. Slanning v. Style, 3 P. Wms. 334, 335.

Hotel or hospital furniture.

A statute exempting household goods from execution does not include furniture and goods in a hotel, which are not necessary for the accommodation of the family of the keeper thereof, but are only used for hotel purposes. Commonwealth v. Stremback (Pa.) 3 Rawle, 341, 344, 24 Am. Dec. 351.

"Household goods," as used in a marriage contract, by which it was agreed that the wife should have the household goods on the husband's death, extended only to the goods in the house in which he lived, and not such as were owned by him in a hospital used by the government. Pratt v. Jackson, 2 P. Wms. 302, 304.

Liquors.
